I would much rather teach an apprentice how to borrow student funding and pay it back to the government, than how to apply for unemployment insurance benefits while he is continuing his education. An apprenticeship program is post-secondary education. It is just as important as a university education or a community college education, particularly with the critical shortage of skills that we have here. Therefore, I ask the minister to look carefully into this area when reviewing the report of the federal-provincial task force on student loans, because this act could pertain to apprenticeship programs which have been approved by the provinces.

In reading the report of the task force, which was established in 1979 and reported to the minister on December 2, 1980, I noticed that it reflects the task force's activities in a number of key areas: A review of past studies in the area of student assistance, both in Canada and elsewhere; an analysis of existing student aid to programs in Canada; and a consideration of the potential future trends that might bear on student aid in the 1980s. In addition, the task force brought together detailed statistical information on the operation of existing federal and provincial student aid programs.

The task force received some 300 submissions from interested organizations and individuals, and conducted three special surveys—one of the general student population; a second of graduates of post-secondary programs; and a third of financial aid for students in colleges and post-secondary institutions.

At the request of student organizations and the Council of Ministers of Education in Canada, and of the Secretary of State, they agreed that adequate opportunity should be given to students, student groups and the public generally to provide input into the report. Accordingly, comments are invited by June 1, 1981. The two levels of government have agreed that the task force will be asked to receive this public input and present an analysis for ministerial consideration by December 1981.

Honourable senators, in view of the fact that this report of the task force is not completed, and that they will still be presented with submissions which they will continue to study, I feel that this legislation is half-baked and that, within a year or so, we will have to amend this bill again in order to implement the latest findings of the task force. The government always says that there are great emergencies which require the passing of certain legislation, which then has to be amended some time later anyway. I personally feel that we should have waited for a final report before introducing this legislation.

Knowing that it will have to be amended again, I do not see the necessity of referring this bill to a committee, and I feel that it should receive third reading whenever the government wishes.

Hon. Daniel Riley: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if Senator Riley speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I wish to express my appreciation to Senator Bélisle for his kind words and for his sage comments and recommendations, even though I know he has reservations with respect to certain aspects of the bill.

I appreciate his reference to the possible need for apprenticeship assistance, but the apprenticeship system is financed by both the provincial governments and the employers, and as I understand it this system has worked out very well. It may be that in the recommendations of the task force, which will be coming out in June, there will be reference to the apprenticeship system and assistance to it. As I pointed out, the system has been working very well, and I have heard very little criticism with respect to this process.

I point out again that there is some need for having this bill passed as soon as possible, particularly bearing in mind that it is merely a housekeeping or stopgap bill which is intended to benefit the students of this country until such time as the recommendations of the task force can be placed before the government, and that will be after they have heard all the briefs and representations of the general public, student bodies, university faculties and the like. I am advised and assured that it is the intention that new amendments will be introduced to the 1964 statute. I, for one, am eagerly looking forward to seeing these amendments, which may well encompass many of the recommendations that the honourable senator has suggested today.

Honourable senators, passage of this bill was considered to be urgent in the other place. All parties agreed it was a bill that had to be passed as soon as possible, for the benefit of the students concerned. In order for the students to be able to apply for loans by July 1, a great deal of printing is required in respect of brochures and application forms. This printing, as honourable senators know, does not occur overnight. The material has to be prepared.

In view of the fact that this legislation is intended for the benefit of students, I know that Senator Bélisle and all other honourable senators will agree that there is some requirement for urgency. Therefore, I concur with Senator Bélisle in asking that this bill not be referred to committee, which was the procedure followed in the other place.

I have here, by the way, an answer to Senator Buckwold's question of the other day. It is quite detailed. He asked about an article in the Toronto Star of April 17, 1978. I have made this information available to Senator Buckwold, and if honourable senators are interested, as I am sure many of them will be, I will ask that this reply be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of answer, see appendix, p. 2088.)

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Riley: Honourable senators, I know that our Irish senator may have some objection to this, but I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that this bill be now read the third time.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Will there be royal assent later today? If there is to be no royal assent today, we gain nothing. We can have royal assent tomorrow, and we might as well have third reading of this bill tomorrow. Last Thursday I was willing to let the Judges Act amending bill be read the third time because it was understood that we would have royal assent on that day.

Senator Riley: That is quite agreeable to me, Senator Flynn.

Senator Riley moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 12, the debate on the motion of Senator Olson for second reading of Bill C-60, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, it is not my intention to take up the time of the chamber at any length with respect to Bill C-60, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act.

As was explained by my honourable friend, Senator Olson, last week, this measure—and its predecessor, Bill S-12 of a previous session—is the product of a great deal of thought and deliberation, in the main on the part of members of this chamber in committee about two years ago.

In substance the bill reforms the process of right-of-way acquisition for pipeline purposes, including the determination of routes and the amount of compensation, and the manner in which compensation shall be paid to affected landowners.

Coming from western Canada I am, of course, conscious of the need to adequately protect the rights of surface owners across whose land pipeline facilities are required to be built. At the same time, within my own practical experience while living in the west, I have observed that in the vast majority of cases, once a pipeline is in place, the effect on the operator of the surface of the land is generally insignificant.

I have had a discussion with Senator Hastings, the Chairman of the Northern Pipeline Committee, of which I am a member, and he has assured me that, notwithstanding the urgency of passing this legislation, adequate opportunity will be provided for representatives of both landowners and pipeline companies to appear and be heard.

I believe that time is of the essence since it would be most regrettable if, for example, the Montreal extension of the gas pipeline were delayed through the regulatory process, including acquisition of right-of-way, to the extent that potential gas users will be denied access to gas supply during the coming winter of 1981-82.

I have another concern which will be explored at greater length and in greater depth during the committee proceedings, and that is the question as to whether the re-determination provisions for compensation payments, which the bill contemplates will occur at five-year intervals, will become an onerous and expensive burden—a cost burden, I point out, which will not be borne by the pipeline company, since the cost of renegotiating these contracts will be passed on to either or both of two other groups, namely the gas producer and/or the consumer.

There will be literally thousands of separate transactions which could be affected by this provision and, if one uses one's imagination, one can visualize a virtual army of lawyers and land men in constant motion renegotiating acquisition contracts.

It has occurred to me that either a longer time interval might usefully be established for renegotiation or, alternatively, a re-determination formula could be established at the time the original contract is entered into, which would obviate the need for renegotiation. However, these are questions which can perhaps more properly be raised in committee and I, for one, will keep an open mind on this point.

Honourable senators, I believe that is all I can usefully contribute at this stage, and we on this side would be pleased to have the bill referred to the Northern Pipeline Committee for further study.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Olson, moved that the bill be referred to the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 12, the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Honourable senators, at long last we have before us for consideration the motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen asking that there be placed before the Parliament of the United Kingdom an act to amend the Constitution of Canada. This proposed legislation is set out in detail in the Address which we are being asked to approve.

When the proposals were first put forward by the Prime Minister on October 2 last year, they were not presented to Parliament as is the usual practice and, indeed, the resolution containing the proposed message was not placed before either the Senate or the House of Commons, but was merely tabled. A simple motion to establish a special joint committee to study the document, which was not before Parliament, was moved in each house. In due course, the committee was set up and it, on the completion of its work, tabled its report, but did not present it to either house as was required by the motion creating it.

However, on February 13, 1981, the resolution before us appeared on the order paper. It is substantially the original resolution as amended by the joint committee of the two houses, subject, of course, to a very slight technical change. I welcome the fact that the matter has finally come before us for consideration. As honourable senators know, last autumn I objected to the manner in which Parliament was by-passed, and indeed, to the whole procedure as then envisaged.

I have nothing further to say now with respect to the procedure, other than to express the hope that no Canadian government will ever again follow such a course of action. I welcome the government's change of heart in bringing the proposed Address before Parliament rather than merely relying on a motion for concurrence in a committee report and representing that as being an Address.

I would like at this point to express my respect for the work done by the members of the joint committee, those appointed by both this house and the other place. I recognize that they had to do their work under severe time constraints, without having had the benefit of a decision of the two houses as to the principles contained in the legislation, which would have been done at the second reading stage had this legislation been enacted by our own Parliament. I recognize also that they did not have the benefit of independent committee counsel and experts to assist them, but had to rely for assistance on the public service proponents of the bill, the research facilities of the Library of Parliament, albeit rather good facilities, and the Parliamentary Centre for Foreign Affairs and Foreign Trade. None of this assistance was under their own control and direction. Yet, notwithstanding these difficulties, they patiently heard representations from many different segments of the community. They made many amendments which improved the resolution greatly. I, for one, appreciate their efforts.

As I have attempted to follow the debate and, indeed, reports in the media about it, I fear there is much confusion in the public mind as to what Parliament is being asked to do—perhaps I should say there is a lack of information as to what we are being asked to approve. I, therefore, would like to take a moment to look at the resolution itself and try to indicate what I see as its substance.

Before doing so, it is perhaps well for us to remind ourselves that the British North America Act, passed in 1867, created a federal system for the government of Canada, giving sovereign and exclusive jurisdiction to each province over a number of regional and local matters as set out in section 92. In addition, and notably in section 93, it gave the provinces rights in some other areas. It is to be noted that subsection (1) of section 92 gave the provinces exclusive power to make laws in relation to:

> The Amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this Act, of the Constitution of the Province, except as regards the Office of Lieutenant-Governor.

The federal authority was given power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, to make laws in relation to all matters not coming within classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces and, for greater certainty, it was declared that the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extended to all matters as set out in section 91 of the act.

As to the amendment of the British North America Act, the provinces had the authority to amend the Constitution as I have indicated. Originally, no such authority to amend the Constitution in respect of its sphere of jurisdiction was given to the federal Parliament. Later, the power to amend the Constitution, in all matters within its exclusive jurisdiction, was given to the federal Parliament in the 1949 amendment to the British North America Act. I will be making further reference to that amendment later in my remarks.

It will be seen that the sovereignty of Canada, which resides in the people of Canada, was set up in a federal system that provided for its exercise by the people of Canada, through their elected legislative assemblies in the provinces, in certain local and regional matters, and its exercise in all other matters through the Parliament of Canada.

I acknowledge with pride the great efforts of our political leaders of both parties, who have had the responsibility of government, in taking the necessary steps towards securing our total independence. Very little has been said in this debate about the development of our constitutional practice in this respect during the first great war and the decade immediately thereafter. I, for one, shall always feel grateful to Sir Robert Borden, our Prime Minister during that war, to the Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King, our Prime Minister for practically the entire decade after that war, and to the Right Honourable Ernest Lapointe for their work in extending and perfecting our independence.

The most significant event in this process, which, in fact, was only the culmination of the rapid changes in constitutional practice, was the Imperial Conference of 1926, which was continued in the Imperial Conference of 1930. These conferences between the representatives of the governments of the United Kingdom and the six dominions—namely, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland—adopted certain resolutions, one of which established the constitutional position that no law thereafter made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom could extend to any of the dominions as part of the law of that dominion. This is subject to a qualification, but I shall deal with that later. At that point the thrust of these conferences was to declare that the six dominions were free and independent, and that each was sovereign in its own right and was in no way under the control of the Imperial power. They were splendid conferences.

To give statutory effect to the conclusions of those conferences, the Statute of Westminster was passed by the United Kingdom Parliament in 1931. Incidentally, approval of that statute was expressed in the Canadian Parliament through the procedure of a Joint Address of both Houses of Parliament. That debate makes for very interesting reading, and I would commend it to parliamentarians.

When the actual legislation was prepared, it became apparent that while the sovereignty of Canada was divided between two jurisdictions, the provincial authority and the federal authority, there was no method of amending our Constitution.

To meet this problem, which was recognized by all the authorities concerned with the passage of that legislation and with the full concurrence of the provincial authorities and of the federal authorities, provision was made whereby the United Kingdom retained, for what was then thought to be a short, temporary period, jurisdiction in relation to amending the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, as set out in section 7 of that act.

So that there will be no danger of my being accused of misreading that section, I shall put it on the record in its full terms. It reads as follows:

> 7. (1) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.
> (2) The provisions of section two of this Act shall extend to laws made by any of the Provinces of Canada and to the powers of the legislatures of such Provinces.
> (3) The powers conferred by this Act upon the Parliament of Canada or upon the legislatures of the Provinces shall be restricted to the enactment of laws in relation to matters within the competence of the Parliament of Canada or of any of the legislatures of the Provinces respectively.

Honourable senators will note that the power retained by the Imperial Parliament was not a reservation over our Constitution, but a reservation over amendments to the British North America Act.

As I have said, it is to be noted that this reservation in section 7 relates only "to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930". The United Kingdom Parliament did not reserve any other rights over our Constitution, and, indeed, has no jurisdiction whatever in respect of our Constitution, save and except what may be derived from this reservation in the Statute of Westminster. It is to be noted also that that reservation relates only to the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, and, since it is a statute of the United Kingdom Parliament, our Interpretation Act is not applicable to its interpretation.

When one looks at the Statute of Westminster, one sees that its whole substance and purpose is the giving up of any imperial control over the authority of the dominions, and to confirm in the dominions their complete sovereign independence from the Imperial authority. Section 7 must be read in that context. It is not to be read as if it were an act standing by itself, as is being done by some of the proponents of the legislation which is before us.

The next significant development in the perfecting and making obvious our complete independence was the 1949 amendment to the British North America Act. It transferred from the United Kingdom Parliament any power under section 7 to amend the Constitution, and gave such power to the federal Parliament, subject to certain exceptions. Again, so that there will be absolute clarity as to exactly what this 1949 amendment to the British North America Act implies, I shall set out its full wording:

> 91. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing Terms of this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming with the Classes of Subjects next herein-after enumerated; that is to say,—
> 1. The amendment from time to time of the Constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this of any other Constitutional Act granted or secured to the Legislature of the Government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language or as regards the requirements that there shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada at least once each year, and that no House of Commons shall continue for more than five years from the day of the return of the Writ for choosing the House: provided, however, that a House of Commons may in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection be continued by the Parliament of Canada if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of such House.

● (1600)

It will be seen, then, that all that is left within the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom Parliament, under clause 7 of the Statute of Westminster, is the small range of matters outside the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures and outside the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal Parliament, or, in other words, those coming within the exception set out in section 91(1) of the British North America Act. You will note that by that section the legislation made it very clear that the power given to the federal Parliament, unlike that which the provinces had enjoyed from the first, was to amend their own Constitution, not just the B.N.A. Act, which is only part of the Constitution.

The resolution before us is for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen to cause to be laid before the United Kingdom Parliament legislation set out in the Address, for enactment by that Parliament. Of course, it must be limited to the jurisdiction that the United Kingdom retained under the Statute of Westminster and after passage of the 1949 amendment to the B.N.A. Act. That is the only jurisdiction they have in the matter.

Let us look at the resolution before us. It starts off with a draft of a very short act, to be cited as the Canada Act, which merely provides that schedule B to it shall have the force of law in Canada henceforth, and that no act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after schedule B, which is to be known as the Constitution Act, comes into force shall extend to Canada as part of its law.

The proposed Constitution Act is then set out in detail in some 65 clauses.

Part I, bearing the heading "Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms," is made up of 32 clauses, or half of the proposed act. Many of the proposed rights and freedoms—indeed, most of them—are laudable objectives. That is not the point which concerns me. I am one who, by the way, would have wished to see a Charter of Rights and Freedoms that would command the respect of all Canadian people and of all the legislative bodies that have the responsibility of legislating in accordance with it. But more of that later.

The charter contains a great conglomeration of rights and freedoms, some mere transfers of provisions in the Bill of Rights, some transfers from other parts of the B.N.A. Act, some wholly new. Of the new guarantees or rights contained in it, it is interesting to note that some are in an area of jurisdiction over which the federal government now has exclusive legislative jurisdiction and which could be enacted by the federal government without the necessity of going to the United Kingdom. Some—such as the right to use both official languages in the legislature of New Brunswick—are within the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament, with the consent of that province, to have enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom under section 7 of the Statute of Westminster. And some—such as the proposed section 15—clearly are legislation affecting not only matters within the federal jurisdiction but also matters which are within the jurisdiction of the provinces; indeed, matters which may be within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

As all honourable senators know, clause 15 deals with the discrimination provisions. Perhaps it is useful to quote that clause for the record. It states:

> 15. (1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Those are laudable objectives; I do not want anyone to misunderstand me on that. However, they are being made binding on the provinces. They would require all of the legislation now in existence in each of the provinces to be examined to see if it is, in any way, in violation of that laudable provision.

That is all very well, but we are attempting to do that without the provinces having any part in the draftsmanship or in the examination of exactly what that means. I could give you, perhaps, a hundred examples of legislation that, of necessity, deals with discrimination on the basis of age. There are many provincial pension schemes which discriminate on the basis of age, as they must; certain regulations for the licensing of motor vehicle drivers discriminate; and there are examples of discrimination in a wide range of acts.

It is true that there is what purports to be a saving clause in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but, again, is the saving clause to be the only remedy for those provincial legislatures, without their having been concerned in its preparation or in its draftsmanship?

Senator Hicks: Before my honourable friend leaves this subject, would he permit a question?

Senator McIlraith: I would prefer that you put the questions later. I am quite agreeable to questions; do not misunderstand me.

To make very clear the extent to which this does trench upon the area of provincial jurisdiction, I would draw your attention to clause 31(1)(b) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which states that this charter applies:

(b) to the legislature and government of each province and to all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

So much for Part I of the resolution. As I have said, it consists of half of the clauses of the resolution.

Part II deals with the rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada. I am inclined to think that that is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal Parliament, and that it might not have been necessary to include it in the resolution at all—but there may be other views on that.

Part III of the proposed act deals with the subject of equalization and regional disparities. To me, it is rather unclear as to whether this adds anything to the existing constitutional practice, so successfully established over the last few decades. In any event, if it does in any way change the constitutional practice in the area of equalization payments, it is clear that the provision seeks to commit the provincial governments.

● (1610)

Part IV of the act provides a mandatory requirement for a constitutional conference by the Prime Minister and first ministers of the provinces once each year, something that was formerly done by mutual arrangement and by a simple announcement in the House of Commons.

Part V deals with the interim amendment procedure and rules for its replacement, and is an important part of the resolution.

Part VI will come into force with or without amendment two years after the Constitution Act comes into force. Part VI deals with the procedure for amending the Constitution of Canada and will, if not amended in the meantime, be the permanent amending formula for our Constitution.

Part VII addresses some wholly new provisions having to do with non-renewable natural resources, forest resources and electrical energy, and adds to the rights of the provinces certain additional jurisdictions in this respect.

Part VIII contains some general provisions dealing with the language versions of the act, the date of its coming into force and some incidental provisions necessary to complete the patriation of the Constitution.

It will be noted that only three of the eight parts in the resolution before us relate to the subject of patriation of our Constitution or the amending formula. The other five parts relate to other matters.

It will be seen at once from an examination of the resolution that the measure before us is not a measure to patriate the Constitution with an amending formula, but rather is a series of basic amendments to the Constitution and then, when that is accomplished, a patriation of the amended Constitution, not a patriation of the present Constitution as we seem to be led to believe. In other words, patriation with the necessary amending formula is not the main thrust of the measure before us. It is only incidental and tied to drastic changes in our Constitution of a most basic and fundamental nature. All this is to be brought about by the two houses of the Parliament of Canada unilaterally requesting the parliament of another sovereign power to do it for us, albeit that other power is a very friendly power.

So far as I can observe, virtually all Canadians want their Constitution brought back to Canada. They all recognize that this carries with it the necessity for an amending formula, and while there is some discussion as to the amending formula chosen—that is, amendments in the future to be brought about by the Parliament of Canada together with a combination of the provinces as set out in the provisions of the resolution—there is no real objection. There is some limited suggestion that the requirements of the combination be changed slightly.

I take second place to no one in Parliament in my desire to have the Constitution returned to Canada with an amending formula making it possible for all changes to our Constitution henceforth to be made in Canada, for Canadians and by Canadians. None of them will be made in another sovereign jurisdiction, albeit as I said a few moments ago, a friendly one. I must, out of fairness, say that the Parliament of the United Kingdom has several times during my years in Parliament made it clear that they found it embarrassing to have to legislate in relation to the Canadian Constitution. On two occasions—the first when I was a private member of the House of Commons and the second when I was a minister of the Crown—the Prime Minister of the day reported directly the desire of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to be free of the responsibility reserved to them in the Statute of Westminster, and their desire that we make provision for our own amending procedure.

I, for one, am most anxious that the Constitution be patriated to Canada, and that that be done now. This, obviously, involves providing an amending formula. The government's proposal that amendments be made only with the consent of the provinces for the first two years is an excellent one. Its proposal for an interim amending formula with the concurrence of a combination of the provinces, as set out in the proposal, is also excellent. There may be some who will argue about bits and pieces of it. It is, undoubtedly, the closest we can come to having the approval of the provinces and certainly, as far as I am concerned, the government is well justified in using it. I believe it is within the proper legislative jurisdiction of the Parliament of the United Kingdom to enact it, since it is incidental to removing the last item of control over our sovereignty by that Parliament, even though that control is only in the nature of a limited trusteeship in respect of amending a limited part of our Constitution.

The proposal contains a new and basic change in our Constitution by permitting the use of a referendum to bypass the provinces in certain circumstances. While I do not like the introduction of the referendum, I am quite prepared to accept it in the proposed interim amending formula. Perhaps that can be justified because of what is now popularly called the deadlock or the failure of the eleven heads of governments to reach agreement. The special joint committee deserves credit for the excellent improvements they have made in the provisions relating to it. I regret that they did not make it clear that it was to be used only in the interim proceedings to break the present deadlock. I regret that it may, under the proposed legislation, continue in our permanent amending formula. I again repeat my request to the government, that even at this late date they proceed with the patriation of the Constitution, the amending formula and such other items as are properly within well-established constitutional practice and good parliamentary practice—for example, the language provisions pertaining to the province of New Brunswick and those pertaining to aboriginal rights.

However, where I part company with the government is in their attempt to procure basic amendments to the long-established sovereignty of the legislatures of the provinces in the spheres of jurisdiction assigned to them, and to do this without the concurrence of the legislatures of the provinces, and, knowing they cannot do it directly, also seeking to have it done by the United Kingdom. To succeed in this latter effort, they would return us to colonial status, and then have another sovereign power pass the necessary legislation. This is totally offensive to me as a Canadian, as I believe that it will be found offensive to all Canadians who study the matter. It is not acceptable to have one sovereign jurisdiction diminish or take away the powers of another sovereign jurisdiction, nor is it acceptable to return us to colonial status.

Honourable senators, in the event that it has been missed—it has not been mentioned in the debate here—I would like to take a minute to show you just what is in clause 55(1) of the resolution before us. It provides:

> Class 1 of section 91 and class 1 of section 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (formerly named the British North America Act, 1867), the British North America (No. 2) Act, 1949, referred to in item 22 of Schedule 1 to this Act and Parts IV and V of this Act are repealed.

A few minutes ago, I read at length section 91.1, yet—with our having the power to amend our Constitution, and there is no better way of our amending the Constitution than by repealing a clause in one of the acts comprising it—we are asked to go to the Imperial Parliament, which in 1949 had transferred that sovereign authority to the Canadian Parliament, and to say, "Repeal that section for us."

I am a Canadian. I have been proud to be a Canadian. I have always thought that we were free and independent. Yet what we are asked to do is quite unnecessary because, while it is obvious that if the legislation passes the sections to which I have referred will have to be repealed, it is already within the power of the Canadian Parliament to do so. However, we are asking the Parliament of the United Kingdom to do this, even though it can be done by a simple act of the Canadian Parliament to come into force if and when the legislation passes.

I have spoken about the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom Parliament. That is a matter for them to decide; but it is a matter for us to decide whether or not they have remained within their jurisdiction, and when, in our courts, we decide that, it may well be, as the matter now stands, that such legislation, if we think it is beyond their jurisdiction, renders those parts of the legislation a mere nullity.

However, I will leave those two points—the point with respect to one sovereign jurisdiction exercising authority over another, and the point as to returning us to colonial status.

It may well be that it is beyond the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom Parliament to enact such provisions without the concurrence of the provinces, because they divested themselves of that authority many years ago.

The constitutional practice that causes the United Kingdom to enact legislation affecting Canada on the request and consent of the federal government does not confer on them any right to repeal or override the provisions for sovereignty which the Canadian people now have.

It is interesting to note that in all cases of amendments to the British North America Act involving the provinces directly, with the exception of the 1907 act, the constitutional practice has been for the federal government to obtain the consent of the provinces. In the 1907 act, when one province objected, it is interesting to note that the Canadian government of that day sent a message to the United Kingdom government requesting them to hear the objection of the premier of the province, and, on his objection having been made, the federal government consented to a change in the proposed legislation to meet his wishes—the striking out a couple of words only, but very important words.

The leaders of both political parties have approved this constitutional practice of obtaining provincial approval of amendments where the amendment related to provincial jurisdiction. Let me quote some of them. For instance, in House of Commons Debates of January 28, 1907, at column 2199, the following quotation will be found from the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was then Prime Minister:

> Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this House and to the best consideration of its members, that this compact not be lightly altered. It should be altered only for adequate cause and after the provinces themselves have had an opportunity to pass judgment on the same.

Then, omitting a few words:

> This House ought to hesitate in passing judgment until it has before it the views of all the provinces affected.

Let me quote from House of Commons Debates of February 18, 1925, at page 298. The Honourable Ernest Lapointe, then Minister of Justice, said:

> The British North America Act itself is not only the charter of the Dominion of Canada; it is just as much the charter of the provinces of Canada . . . Would it then be fair for us to arrogate to ourselves the right to change the act which is just as much the Constitution of the provinces as it is our own? . . .
> Within their sphere the provinces enjoy the powers of self-government just as much as the Dominion Parliament does, and if so, surely the Dominion Parliament cannot take upon itself the right to change a statute which gives to those provinces the powers which they enjoy—

I have another quotation. This one is from the precis of discussions of the Dominion-Provincial Conference of 1927. It is the official precis, number 3, dated November 4, 1927, at page 11. The Honourable Ernest Lapointe said:

> —Canada in view of the quality of status which she now enjoys as declared at the last Imperial Conference and in view further of the cumbersome procedure now required, should have the power to amend her own Constitution, and that legislation should be asked for from the United Kingdom for that purpose. In order that adequate safeguards should be provided it was proposed that in the event of ordinary amendments being contemplated the provincial legislatures should be consulted and a majority consent of the provinces obtained, while in the event of vital and fundamental amendments being sought involving such questions as provincial rights, the rights of minorities, or rights generally affecting race, language and creed, the unanimous consent of the provinces should be obtained.

I then come to House of Commons Debates of May 11, 1931, page 1474. There was a private motion for Canada having the right to amend its own Constitution. The Honourable Hugh Guthrie, who was then the Minister of Justice, said:

> My contention has always been that in all matters appertaining to the legislative jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada the Parliament of Canada has the right, and should have the right expressed, to make such amendments to the Constitution as it shall see fit. But, on the other hand, the rights of the provinces of the country are just as plenary, just as high as the rights of this Parliament. Can this Parliament therefore, by amendment or alteration of any kind, interfere with the rights which are specially set apart as matters of provincial jurisdiction and provincial concern, without the consent of the various provinces of Canada? . . . I submit that we cannot. In respect of any matters arising under section 92 or section 93 of the British North America Act, this Parliament cannot, without the consent of the various provincial legislatures, amend the British North America Act in any respect—

Then again, on May 11, 1931, according to House of Commons Debates at pages 1477 and 1478, the Honourable Ernest Lapointe said:

> But those amendments have to be made through the statute enacted by the Imperial Parliament. In that matter the Imperial Parliament is not really a dominating power; it acts as a trustee and guarantor and merely gives effect to the will of the Canadian people.

> I think that the amendments to the Constitution could be divided into two classes: First those which would affect the provinces, which would add powers to the federal Parliament and in that way affect provincial rights. In such cases surely the British parliament, even under the situation as it exists today, would not agree to pass a law to effect a change. Then the other class would be amendments which would give broader effect to the federal power within its own jurisdiction. I agree that the provinces under the constitution as it is need not be consulted, and that was the position taken by various prime ministers on other occasions . . . ; but on the question of the respective jurisdiction of the Dominion and the provinces, there is no doubt that this could not be changed by either without agreement with the other—

● (1630)

You will note that it was quite clear in his mind that when dealing with the respective jurisdictions of each of the sovereign bodies there needed to be consent.

Again, in the House of Commons Debates of January 28, 1935, at page 222, we have the Honourable Hugh Guthrie saying:

> Would it be fair to assume that a province which has been clothed with exclusive authority in certain matters should now calmly submit to limitation of its powers at the instance of the Senate and House of Commons? Would a province agree to any alteration in regard to its exclusive jurisdiction? I take the view that the provinces should be and must be consulted in regard to any important change in our constitutional act which affects provincial interests. I agree that some constitutional changes are necessary, but I submit that the only way of bringing them about is by agreement between the parties to the original bargain . . .
> I think that we would have to have agreement. I do not think the parliament at Westminster would disregard the views of the provinces merely at the request of the parliament of Canada. If the provinces refused to agree upon any fundamental question which concerned their rights I doubt very much if the parliament of the United Kingdom would grant such amendment.

In the House of Commons Debates of 1943, at page 4366, the Honourable Louis St. Laurent said:

> I would readily concede to hon. members that if there were to be any suggested amendment to change the allocation of legislative or administrative jurisdiction as between the provinces, on the one hand, and the federal parliament, on the other, it could not properly be done without the consent of the organism that was set up by the constitution to have powers that would assumedly be taken from that organism.

Then again, in June 1946, we have Mr. St. Laurent—who, by the way, was then the Minister of Justice—saying:

> I submit again that the statute apportioned the sovereignty to parliament for certain purposes and to the legislatures for other purposes, and what is assigned to the legislatures is in no wise under the jurisdiction of this parliament and cannot be touched without the consent of those who have jurisdiction over it. But what is within the powers of this parliament, this parliament can deal with without requesting the consent, or submitting to the superintendence of any provincial legislature.

Then, in that same debate, a few days later, the Minister of Fisheries of the day, Mr. Bridges, spoke, and quoted with complete approval the following statement of the Minister of Justice, Mr. St. Laurent. Of course, it is Mr. St. Laurent's words that I am quoting, though, as I say, Mr. Bridges made it clear that he supported them totally. Mr. St. Laurent said:

> The provinces, that is to say, the people of the provinces, are all represented in this parliament, and for the purposes of such matters as are confined to the jurisdiction of this parliament it is by those representatives here that the people of the provinces speak. There are other matters given by the act to the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures and the provincial governments; with respect to any of those it is my view that it would not be possible to deal with them without the consent of those to whose jurisdiction they have been confided.

Then we come to proceedings of the constitutional conference of federal and provincial governments of January 10, 1950, at page 9. This is the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent speaking. By this time he had become Prime Minister of Canada. He said:

> It is, and has always been, the view of the present federal government that the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces which gives a federal character to the constitution of Canada must be respected.
> I should like to repeat again the opinion I have expressed on many occasions that, regardless of the legal position, nothing placed by the constitution under the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature should be dealt with or altered without provincial participation.

That is the word used on that occasion.

Then we come to 1965 and the remarks of the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson, Prime Minister of Canada. In his introductory remarks to "The Amendment of the Constitution of Canada", in February, 1965, at page vii, he had this to say:

> In any federation, the two most critical questions are the distribution of powers between the two levels of government and the manner in which the constitution can be changed. A federation is necessarily a delicate balance between conflicting considerations and interests. It is to be expected that the most delicate of all questions should be the way in which such a balance might be altered.

Then, again, we have the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson speaking in the House of Commons on January 20, 1966:

> My right honourable friend also referred to the fact that we said very little in the Speech from the Throne about constitutional amendment, and that we seemed to have dropped the Fulton-Favreau formula. We have not dropped it, Mr. Speaker. We shall do our best to put it into effect if and when we get the agreement of all the provinces, but without that agreement it cannot be done.

These are the views of some of the leaders in parliamentary life. All of them made the comments I have referred to during the time I have been observing Parliament, except for the ones made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The rest of them, after Mr. Guthrie's, occurred when I was a member of the House of Commons.

To me, it is imperative that good constitutional practice be followed in all cases if the sovereignty which is shared between the federal authority and the provincial authority is to work in a way that is satisfactory to Canadians.

I should make this clear now. Canadians who reside in a province exercise this sovereign authority in two different ways: in local and provincial matters they exercise it through their elected members in the legislatures; in the federal field, in all other matters, they exercise it through the federal Parliament and through our federal authority. The only limitation on the latter is this anachronistic provision in the Statute of Westminster covering a very limited field, which I dealt with a few minutes ago.

As I have said, to have the federal system work in a satisfactory way, if we are to respect the two sovereign authorities, I completely reject—and I must make this clear—the assertion of some provincial leaders that the governments of the provinces speak for all the people of the provinces, and that the federal authority is something that is limited to the will of these collective sovereignties. That proposition is abhorrent and, indeed, I do not think it merits much discussion here. It is nothing of the sort.

The federal authority must speak for Canada. We must have a strong central government, but, by reason of our history, our geography and our diverse origins, it is necessary that, in matters of a local and regional nature, the local or provincial authorities should have sovereign jurisdiction. When the premiers assert that their governments speak for all the people in the provinces in all matters, they are wrong. The federal members of Parliament speak for their provinces in all matters except those limited ones assigned to the legislatures of the provinces.

I, for one, have felt that, in the decades since the second world war, we in both houses of the federal Parliament, have carelessly or inadvertently neglected to separate and emphasize the authority of the federally-elected members of Parliament. We have seen the provincial premiers usurp the role of the federal members of Parliament by speaking for the provinces in all matters instead of only those matters that lie within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. This has arisen innocently enough and in large measure due to the signing of a great multiplicity of agreements between the provincial governments and the federal authority on various joint programs.

I hope that when the resolution before us and matters arising out of it are resolved, our federal government, whether it be Liberal or Conservative, will give attention to this point and make an effort to keep clearly before the public the fact that the provincial members of the legislatures represent Canadians only in the class of subjects assigned to the provinces, and that the federally-elected members of Parliament represent Canadians in all other matters.

Several of the provinces have indicated their opposition to this resolution by commencing litigation in the courts of their provinces to question its validity. Appeals from these cases will undoubtedly come to the Supreme Court of Canada in due course. This litigation will not be completed and will, presumably, continue before the courts while the legislation before us is being dealt with. I regret that the federal government had not made a reference directly to the Supreme Court of Canada under section 55 of the Supreme Court Act. I notice, for instance, that the questions raised by the Manitoba government in the Manitoba Court of Appeal did not take into account all the matters affecting the validity of the present course of action. The jurisdictional question was not raised at all. I do not propose to pass on all of the litigation before the courts, but one cannot help but notice the inadequacies of some of the court references on the part of the provinces.

My objection to the resolution lies in the attempt by the federal government, without regard for proper and long-established constitutional practice, and possibly even illegally, to bring about far-reaching and extensive changes in our Constitution. Parts of the proposed legislation may well be beyond the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom Parliament. Even if it should decide that it has the power to pass the resolution in its entirety, it is possible that the Canadian courts may find otherwise, and such parts of the legislation would be a mere nullity insofar as Canadians are concerned. I do not understand the reluctance of the federal government to refer these parts of the resolution to the courts for decision.

The difficulty with the provinces' litigation which is now before the courts is that it does not raise all the matters that may affect the decision as to the legality of the procedure or as to the legality of the proposed legislation, if passed. In my view, we should delete those provisions that diminish the sovereignty of the provincial legislatures in matters within their exclusive jurisdiction and which drastically amend the Canadian Constitution. We should proceed with the patriation provisions, the amending formula provisions and the one or two other items that I have mentioned as being clearly within both our federal authority and that of the United Kingdom Parliament under what is left of section 7 of the Statute of Westminster, and which fully meet our constitutional practices.

There is a widespread feeling of frustration and dissatisfaction with, and alienation from, the federal government in large areas of this country. This is most obvious, perhaps, in western Canada and Quebec, but it exists to a limited extent elsewhere. To add to this feeling of frustration and alienation, there is the fact that this government, like the last one, has no representation from large and important regions of the country. It derives its support mainly from central Canada.

Surely, all this indicates that more than ever we should proceed with great delicacy. Surely, we should not further exacerbate the already dangerous alienation of such large segments of the Canadian population.

To proceed as we are being asked—unilaterally, with a federal Parliament without representation in large sections of the country and against the expressed opposition of the provincial governments—is wrong. It is wrong for three reasons:

First, it is not legal. It is beyond our jurisdiction to proceed as we are. Yet we do not let the courts decide; we simply press on.

Secondly, it is contrary to long- and well-established constitutional practice, which may even be construed as law through long usage. Again, we do not let the courts decide. Why?

And, thirdly, it is politically wrong for us wilfully to jeopardize the unity of this country as we are doing. We in Parliament surely have an obligation, in serving our country, to keep it strong and united. Yet, if we persist, we may be contributing to the break-up of the present federal system and its replacement by some lesser system of government.

We in the Senate were sent here for the purpose of protecting the regional interests of the country against the mere weight of the popularly elected majority from the thickly populated parts of the country. I believe that, by the very nature of our country, such a provision is necessary and desirable.

I have served in Parliament now for the past 41 years. During that time the governments have been headed by five prime ministers. I have been a Liberal all my adult life. All of the political leaders I noted earlier in my remarks were leaders I respected and admired. With the exception of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Honourable Hugh Guthrie—whom I merely met but could not say I knew—they were friends of mine. Were they all wrong? Were all the leaders of the Liberal Party in the past three-quarters of a century totally wrong, or could it be that our present government is wrong in taking a diametrically opposed course of action to the one all those leaders thought necessary and proper? Could it be that the present government is wrong in this attempt to make these basic amendments to our Constitution unilaterally, with a bare majority in the federal Parliament? And here I refer to the portion about which I have spoken; not the portion dealing with patriation.

I want patriation but I cannot acquiesce in the wrong and dangerous course we are being asked to follow in most of the proposed legislation before us. In the exercise of my responsibilities as a senator, I have no alternative but to vote against this resolution in its present form.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: The question I wanted to address to my honourable friend refers to clause 15. I am sure that he had noted that clause 15 begins by stating that "every individual is equal before and under the law" and goes on to say that every individual is entitled to the "equal protection and equal benefit of the law." Some of the preceding clauses, and notably clause 6, refer to "every citizen of Canada." When clause 15 refers to every individual, does it not include non-nationals who are resident in Canada and might it not preclude a provincial government from enacting legislation for residents of the province who are Canadian citizens exclusively and enable others to take the same benefit from that legislation? It seems to me that clause 15 as it is presently worded could have very wide ramifications. Has my honourable friend given that matter any thought?

Senator McIlraith: In answer to Senator Hicks, I have not thought specifically about that situation. The clause was put in there for another purpose, which appears in the transcript of evidence given before the committee. I believe committee members will correct me on that if I am wrong.

However, I have noticed that the Charter of Rights—which I would like to look upon with a feeling of respect and pride and as a rather elegant piece of draftsmanship—while the motives for it may be quite laudable, as I said in my remarks last fall when I was raising the procedural point, is "devoid of distinction" or perhaps I said "destitute of distinction". In any case, there are many portions of that charter which should be reviewed more thoroughly. I apologize for giving this kind of indirect answer to the honourable senator.

Senator Hicks: In light of my honourable friend's knowledge of the work of the committee, knowledge which I do not share, would he comment on an anomaly which I cannot explain that is found in clause 45. It deals with the amending formula, or the so-called Victoria formula. Clause 45 refers to the concurrence of two or more of the Atlantic provinces and two or more of the western provinces that have in the aggregate a population of at least 50 per cent of the population of the western provinces. Why were the Atlantic provinces not accorded the same protection as the western provinces?

Senator McIlraith: I am afraid I cannot answer that question. However, I believe that it is probably because of the small population of Prince Edward Island. However, I am not qualified to give an answer or, more precisely, I have not looked at that point.

Senator Hicks: On the contrary, that clause would mean that Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland could frustrate the interests of the Atlantic provinces, though together they do not have as great a population as either of the other provinces.

Senator McIlraith: Yes, but the purpose was to give Prince Edward Island some rights, otherwise it would have no say in such matters.

Senator Macquarrie: Hear, hear!

Senator McIlraith: I must say that I have not specifically looked at that point.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, the afternoon grows late, and I would like to assure you that my intervention will not be lengthy. At the outset of my remarks, I extend to my colleagues on both sides of the chamber who participated in the work of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution my congratulations on a difficult task performed with great diligence and skill that did great honour to this institution. As well, I have been greatly impressed by the high level at which the debate has been conducted by those who preceded me. I disagree with many of the positions taken by speakers opposite, but I recognize and respect the sincerity and strong conviction which motivates those who have taken those positions.

I also expressed my opinions in this chamber last October on the matter of constitutional reform. I regret to say that little has occurred since then to allay the doubts and concerns which I had at that time with respect to the path the government of Canada has set out upon. I am opposed to what is proposed to be done, not upon legalistic or technical grounds, but upon two fundamental grounds which, in my view, transcend much, if not all, the surrounding underbrush of constitutional reform.

It is proposed that fundamental, far-reaching changes to the constitutional relationship of the Governments of Canada, federal and provincial, shall be carried out by the legislative actions of a foreign country. That, honourable senators, is wrong. As part and parcel of that constitutional change, it is proposed that in the future constitutional amendments may be achieved by the unilateral action of the federal government through a process of a referendum. That likewise, honourable senators, is wrong.

Last October I expressed my views in strong terms concerning the offensive process by which the Prime Minister intends to achieve his constitutional objectives, namely, by an act of the Parliament at Westminster. I speculated with respect to his motives in this regard, particularly in light of his well-established representations as opposing any continued vestige of colonial status so far as the conduct of the affairs of this country are concerned. I wondered then, as I wonder today, if by this means he hopes to incorporate changes in our Constitution which would not be subject to review by the Supreme Court of Canada. At the same time I suggested, as others have suggested, that the substance of the resolution before us could easily, at the initiative of the federal government, be referred to the Supreme Court now for a determination of its validity within the context of our Constitution.

The question of unilateral amendment is so offensive to both the opposition in this Parliament and practically all the provincial governments of this country that I have concluded the government is motivated to make this drastic change in our constitutional relationship because it has concluded that the existing federal system no longer works and that progress in this country can no longer be achieved by the judicial process of consensus. On that premise the Prime Minister of Canada justifies in his own mind arbitrary and unilateral action against the opposition of both the provinces and, if recent Gallup poll figures are to be believed, 65 per cent of the people of Canada. On that premise the government intends to take unto itself the power unilaterally to amend the Constitution of Canada over the heads of elected governments and legislatures of the provinces of Canada, and it proposes to do this by asking another country, Great Britain, to, in effect, alter basic Canadian rights and freedoms, an act which amounts to a blatant surrender of Canadian sovereignty.

This action was recently and succinctly characterized by the former Leader of the Opposition as a coup d'état. Mr. Robert Stanfield is correct in that assessment. Again and again it has been stated by members of the government party that Canadian federalism is a 54-year record of failure. The fact of the matter is that Canadian federalism in years past has produced agreements between the two levels of government on such matters as hospital insurance and the delivery of medical services, on a Canadian pension plan, on fiscal equalization, on highways and on energy, and, most recently—in September—on the so-called Vancouver consensus as the basis of an amending formula which would make it possible, as it must be made possible, for Canadians to change their own Constitution here in Canada.

Canadian federalism can and does work when reasonable governments and reasonable leaders permit it to work. The system fails only when its leaders permit it to fail. I reject completely the proposition that 114 years of our history as a successful, Canadian federal state should now be abandoned to be replaced by some form of unitary state.

Our federal system grew out of the diverse nature of this country, Canada. I submit that no other system will succeed here. No other system will adapt to our diversity, our size and, if you like, our geography. This carries with it significant regional differences which, if we are to remain a united country, must be accommodated, and accommodated by a process of negotiation and consensus. To do otherwise, I suggest, means running a grave risk of tearing this country apart; and then, indeed, our 114 years of history will become truly irrelevant.

The Parliament at Westminster has no business deciding the substance of the Constitution of Canada. But what is more to the point, Canada, as a mature, independent nation, has no business asking the British to do what it is asking them to do, namely—to use the words of the Prime Minister of Canada—to hold their noses and pass it. There is only one acceptable act for the Parliament at Westminster to perform, and only one proper request to be made of them by this country. They should be requested to send the Constitution home immediately with an amending formula acceptable to Canada, and then let every other question of our Constitution be decided in Canada by Canadians.

On motion of Senator Guay, debate adjourned until later this day.

RETIREMENT AGE POLICIES

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITEE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, January 13, 1981, consideration of the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Retirement Age Policies, entitled Retirement Without Tears, tabled in the Senate on Tuesday, April 15, 1980.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators will recall that the last time I spoke on this matter I said we were awaiting the report of the Ontario Royal Commission on Pensions. I have now received the report which comes in the form of eight volumes, the price I am informed, being $60 a set. Fortunately, I was one of those to receive a free copy. Contained in that report are 93 recommendations.

The contents of the report are best summed up by William M. Mercer Limited, one of the Canadian authorities on the subject. They state:

> The Ontario Royal Commission Report has departed considerably from other recent pension studies. It does not recommend increased coverage for non-earners under the CPP. It does not recommend significantly increased vesting for private pension plans. It does not press for adjustments to reflect the cost of living in private pension plans; but instead recommends the introduction of an Inflation Tax Credit to allow government to deal directly with the problem.

> The main thrust of the proposals is to introduce a provincial universal money purchase pension plan—

Similar to the RRSP.

> —to solve long term economic problems—a solution which would cost the private sector very little and would take 47 years to mature.

We haven't got the time.

The Senate was the first to study the field of retirement pension policies, and that was in November 1977. Since then the subject has become the most urgent problem facing the people of this country, and it is so recognized.

Today Canada has the worst industrial pension plan of all the industrial countries in the world. How we got into that position is beyond me. Obviously, our sight in that direction was rather limited.

Five reports have been prepared on the subject of retirement pension plans. First there was the Senate report which you have before you and which I will deal with in a moment. I almost fell out of my seat this morning when, on my desk, appeared the William M. Mercer Limited Recipe for Action, dated March 9, 1981, containing all of the recommendations encompassed in our original report which is now public property. Our report was sensible at the time we made it, and it still is.

The Senate report tended to favour the Canada Pension Plan as the only plan which could provide the best possible pension most efficiently, and for the least amount of money. So far, this thesis has been upheld.

The Quebec government also completed a study of this matter and it came to the same conclusion with respect to the Canada Pension Plan, although it could not agree on premiums. The Economic Council of Canada said that we should go along with the Canada Pension Plan in order to strengthen our institutions. The Lazar Task Force, which was set up by the government, produced an excellent report containing four choices, without recommending anything.

Contained in the Senate report are five ingredients necessary for a pension plan, and they are all contained in the Canada Pension Plan. The first is complete portability. That means that a man working in the Yukon, who moved to Newfoundland, could transfer his pension plan with him. As it presently stands, a man could work in a factory for, say, seven years and when he leaves he takes with him no portion of what the employer has contributed to his pension plan, although the pension is part of deferred salary.

Everyone recommended that vesting be changed and applied after one year. In France vesting is immediate; in Sweden it is at 28 years of age and immediate; in the Netherlands it is immediate at any age; in the United States it is after 10 years; in the United Kingdom it is after five years; and in West Germany it is after 10 years. But in Canada we have the craziest rule of all: you must be 45 years of age and you must work 10 years before you can get vested. How we got left, in the whole civilized world, with that kind of regulation is hard to understand.

[Senator Croll.]

In addition to that, we have indexing, and nobody can match us on that. We have universality, which means that the premium cannot vary as between men and women. We have the mandatory survivors' benefits. That is most important of all. Thousands and thousands of women are left without pensions because their husbands did not make any provision for benefits for them. The husbands intended to do it, but they never did.

We have 750,000 old people without pensions in this country today. If a private pension plan could fill these requirements, that would be fine, but it cannot. One of the first successes we had was regarding compulsory retirement. That has been a winner, because we had the first case in New Brunswick in which a man recovered almost $30,000 for being improperly fired. Non-discrimination as to age has been added to the Bill of Rights.

We have a judgment of the Supreme Court of Manitoba in which the judge says:

> In conclusion, pursuant to Queen's Bench Rule 536, I declare that section 6(1) of The Human Rights Act does apply to the position of the applicant. The University of Manitoba may not refuse to employ her or to continue to employ her because of her age.

Many arbitration awards have been made from time to time. In any event, the golden handshake has gone out of fashion, and it will appeal to Senator Grosart that an employee will have to have some green rustling in his hands when he shakes hands with an employee as he bids him goodbye.

One of the important things that has come about is a top-level conference of every organization in this country that will be held on March 31, April 1 and 2, and the Senate will be represented at it.

This was one of those situations you get into, and then do not really understand how you did. I was a member of the Pension Plan Committee when we held the pension hearings, and there was much opposition to it. Agreement was reached, except for the province of Ontario. We needed two-thirds of the population and two-thirds of the provinces to formulate it. The province was holding back and would not agree. Finally, they made a bargain and said that Ontario would go in—this is at the request of the pensioned people—if we would limit the pension to give them a chance to fill the vacuum. At the time that seemed sensible to me. We were dealing with fine and honourable people. We would take a low pension with a low premium and let them fill the vacuum. Ten years later, here I am to tell you that they did no such thing. Ten years ago the pensions of this country consisted of 53 per cent paid by the government, 35 per cent paid by the man himself, and 12 per cent private pensions. It has not increased one bit. They know it, and they are in great trouble, because either they come up with something now or a certain portion of the field will belong to us.

On top of that, we have been waiting around for things to happen. Saskatchewan went off on its own and started making some changes in vesting and other matters. The changes were radical but necessary. I would like to read part of an article from the Toronto Star dated November 15, 1980:

> Wes Robbins, Saskatchewan's minister of revenue, who's responsible for the province's pension legislation, says he hopes that companies don't find the new laws too burdensome.
> "If that's the case, the state might have to take over the whole private pension system itself. Our aim is simply that private company pension plans should have the same fair characteristics of the Canada Pension Plan—full portability and a full pension after a working life."
> Robbins says that the province moved fast on the pension reforms because everyone else was dragging their feet.
> "The fact is that these changes have been discussed for many years by pension people and not one province has done anything about it. Senator (David) Croll told us to go ahead—just as we did with Medicare—and the rest of the provinces would follow."

They did go ahead, and the rest of the provinces will follow. I cannot say what it will bring forward, but it should bring forward a pension much in excess of $290. We were taken in rather badly because we fixed our employer-employee premium rate at 1.8 per cent. The United States rate is 6.13 per cent. In Italy, the employee pays 7.15 per cent, and the employer pays 16.35 per cent, and if they are short the government makes it up. In the United Kingdom the employee pays 7.75 per cent and the employer pays 8.75 per cent. The U.K. government pays approximately 18 per cent on top of that. In Greece the employee pays 4.75 per cent and the employer 9.50 per cent. In Germany the employee pays 9 per cent and the employer 9 per cent. They add no subsidy in France. The insured person pays 3.45 per cent, the employer pays 7.7 per cent, and the government pays nothing. The model plan is the French plan. They give a good deal of consideration to their pension plan, and give a lot of thought to what it will mean at the end of the day. They watch it very carefully.

We talk about a man working 10 years, of coming to the end of the Canada Pension Plan and receiving $290 per month. I have here the Senate Report on Poverty updated from 1969 to 1979. A man and his wife receiving less than $11,700 are poverty stricken in this country. An individual earning less than $5,860 is poverty stricken. Not only have we given people pensions that were not adequate, but inflation has produced two million pensioners who are caught. Their pensions are worth 20 or 30 per cent less than they were worth when they commenced. We have got ourselves into a situation that we did not intend to get into.

The conference to which I referred will include everyone who wants to attend. The minister has said that if the conference does not come up with something satisfactory in connection with pensions, the government will have to step in. Everyone has said that, including the labour people. We do not want that to happen.

Sometimes the situation reminds me of the automobile industry. As a boy, I recall that when the Ford Company started to build cars someone came to see Henry Ford and asked, "Why can't we have a blue car or a yellow car, or a car with some colour?" Henry Ford replied, "You can have a car any colour you want—so long as it is black."

The automobile industry in the United States and Canada insisted on making big cars because there was big money in it. Then along came the small car, which has taken much of their business away. We now have to deal with businesses such as Chrysler, in the motor industry, and Massey Ferguson—companies which will not change their policy. They want to operate in their way, or else; but the world does not accept that view these days.

I wanted to give honourable senators a report to indicate that we in the Senate have made a contribution. That contribution is recognized. Our report will be before the people of Canada, and already it has been well received. At the last moment they are coming around and are saying, "You were right; it is something that we need."

I would like to thank honourable senators for giving me another opportunity to speak on this subject, because it is one that is vital to Canadians. The committee has done a good deal that is of special interest to people who need the kind of help that we are providing. They are people who have never been able to do very much on their own; they have always been caught in the middle.

The Canada Pension Plan is a better plan than an RRSP, a Registered Retirement Savings Plan. In the latter there is a forward charge, there is no indexing, and some of the money can be taken out. In the Canada Pension Plan you cannot do that. It is your pension; it is indexed; it does not cost you anything—and that is what we are trying to sell to the Canadian people. But sometimes we find it hard to sell them something that is such a great bargain.

Anyway, we have submitted our report. Others have made reports that are equally as good. The victory belongs to all of us together, and I hope that the conference will produce some necessary and essential results.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in this debate, this order is considered as having been debated.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before moving the adjournment until 8 o'clock this evening, I feel that honourable senators would wish me to say something, inadequate though it is, to express our appreciation to Senator Croll for the work he has done on this subject. We are proud to be associated with him and are grateful for the honour that he brings to the Canadian Senate through tireless effort during a lifetime of public service, and currently in connection with pensions. We are reassured, proud and pleased that he will be representing us and the people of Canada at future conferences dealing with these matters.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn during pleasure, to reassemble at the call of the bell at approximately 8 o'clock this evening; and that at that time Order No. 6, standing in the name of Senator Guay, be called.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8.10 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—CHANGE IN COMMONS MEMBERSHIP

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate with a change in the list of members appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages.

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an address be presented to her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, our debate on the Constitution Act, 1981 has been extensive and thorough. All have been given the opportunity to speak on the matter, and because of this we can say that this Constitution is being prepared quite differently from the way in which the B.N.A. Act was prepared, or, for that matter, the Manitoba Act. It has been shown by one historian that those documents were prepared by a small number of CPR lawyers for the benefit of a select few. That is one interpretation of those happenings long ago. We know, however, that the same could not be said of this Constitution Act, since many Canadians have participated in its conception and preparation.

I have noted with pleasure and satisfaction, as many other senators have, the variety of groups, briefs and representations that we have received and which have been so useful to us. Indeed, so many valuable contributions have been made that I hesitate to add to the length of this debate. However, I think it is necessary and that it is my duty to mention a few important points.

[Senator Frith.]

Before doing this, I would like to thank the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau for his dedication and effort with regard to the Constitution. I would also like to thank the joint chairmen of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, Senator Hays and Mr. Serge Joyal, for having done such a good job as representatives of the Senate and the House of Commons, respectively.

I have listened with interest and appreciation to the contributions of other honourable senators, and have particularly noted the remarks made by Senator Olson, Senator Hays and Senator Steuart. They have expressed the true feelings of Canadians on the Constitution, and I wholeheartedly approve of their remarks.

The Honourable Senator Flynn thought that Senator Olson's speech was the most despicable he had ever heard in this place, and that it was absolutely shameful. I was here when that was said. I was hoping that Senator Flynn would be here this evening, since I have a remark to make in this regard; but after he reads my speech in Hansard he may wish to confer upon my speech a judgment similar to the one that he made at that time. Nothing would please me more than to be ranked with Senator Olson as a master of Canadian history. That would really be something.

[Translation]

As senators, we represent more than a community, a province or a region, namely Canada. But I am a Franco-Manitoban, and as representative of that proud community I can bring to this debate a different perspective.

When Manitoba became a province of Canada in 1870, the two great language groups were equal in number, and the Manitoba Act recognized that duality by enshrining language and education rights. This earned us the name of "Little Quebec", because in Manitoba there was a duality based on goodwill and harmony. It is sometimes tedious to recall the historical errors, missed opportunities and bitter deceptions we went through after so promising a start. But it is sometimes necessary and useful to remember one's history. Be that as it may, until very recently we have experienced oppressive language legislation, private schools without funding, a political and cultural climate that was hostile not only to the French language but anything that wanted to be or was different. The administration of justice wished to serve everyone, provided everything went on in English. There were principles of equality, opportunity and free education in the school system, but francophones had to put up with cardboard schools, a lack of teaching materials and the sad picture that went on for years, and I said years, of having to hide their French books when the inspector went through the schools.

Our parents, our generation and our children put up with all this to ensure the survival of their culture and their language in Western Canada. How did we do it? Through tremendous sacrifices, self-denial and patience, with the assistance of our enlightened friends who were willing to help us. Among them, there was Quebec and I would like to take this opportunity to thank on behalf of my fellow-citizens in the west "la belle province" for everything they did for us. Most Quebecers, it is true, are aware of the dramatic achievements of French Canadians in the west, but most westerners are unaware of it. The people of Quebec came to our help during those trying times and made common cause with us. From Quebec came members of religious orders and lay teachers who served for many years and were paid ridiculously low salaries. From Quebec also came funds collected by "Survivance dans l'Ouest" well known to all Quebecers. Thanks to those nickels and dimes collected in Quebec schools and parishes and to financial aid provided by the Knights of Columbus, especially, in setting up the first French radio station in western Canada, CKSB in St. Boniface, we managed to survive. Finally, our culture and our language survived hoping that one day, our rights would be acknowledged.

With the recent judgment rendered by the Supreme Court of Canada, with the amendments to the educational legislation and, finally, with this constitutional resolution which we are debating today, the French-speaking residents of Manitoba have at long last achieved equality.

In a speech delievered recently in Brandon, Manitoba, our Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, was expressing the hope that we would be given an opportunity to devote to our cultural growth most of the energy we have expended thus far to obtain justice, and yet, even under such difficult conditions, French Manitoba has already contributed a lot. A stranger visiting us cannot expect to find the 44,000 French-speaking Manitobans gathered in a community such as, for instance, Quebec City, Grandy or Saint-Hyacinthe. Our francophones set up camp out west with the first arrival of settlers and today we can find them in small communities scattered throughout the prairies. Our community, small in number and growing in adversity, has made a generous cultural contribution to the efforts of French Canada. Our writers and our artists are known all across Canada. Our young graduates hold key positions in the Canadian metropolis and in our capital city. Our farmers have done Canada proud. In all endeavours this small community successfully manages to give much though it has received little.

Having known firsthand the difficult times unilingualism has had in Manitoba, and having contributed throughout my political career to the great efforts for bilingualism in this country and to the recognition of educational and linguistic rights for all Canadians, it is with enthusiasm that I support this resolution, which will bring us one step closer to full partnership. I am concerned, however, that this resolution perhaps does not go far enough, since it does not guarantee to the French speaking people of Ontario the same basic rights as have been recently recognized in Manitoba and as are to be found in clauses 16 to 20 of the resolution.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Guay: Some may even wonder that many amongst us who have fought for bilingualism and for the recognition of basic and elementary rights for French Canadians could support a resolution today which does not extend those same rights to all Canadians at every level of government.

One thing about my party is that we can speak quite freely without being told what to say, and I am taking this opportunity to do that.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: It's a wonder the light fixtures didn't crack.

Senator Guay: I would like to hear you all; I am listening very carefully.

Should we not take this opportunity and settle, once and for all, the historic grievances of the Franco-Ontarians? The answer to that question is not legal but political, and in politics in Canada provincial premiers have their say.

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes?

Senator Guay: And I am disappointed in Premier Davis of Ontario. I thought that we had achieved greater progress, greater understanding and a greater willingness for change in Canada, but Mr. Davis has refused this unique opportunity to provide services in the French language to his French-speaking community. Why don't you people over there talk to him, then?

Senator Flynn: Why don't you put clause 133 to him?

Senator Guay: Mr. Davis justifies—

You know, I have been sitting here, honourable senators, for a long time, and I have noticed during my time here that the Honourable Leader of the Opposition seems to enjoy interrupting whoever is speaking, notwithstanding who it may be. He will make a certain comment and start to laugh, and in fact he is laughing at his own jokes! He does not want to listen; therefore, he is continually interrupting people because he does not want to learn anything.

Senator Flynn: From you, it's impossible!

Senator Guay: I believe that, as Leader of the Opposition, he should set an example to his backbenchers and at least keep quiet when someone is making a speech in this chamber.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Guay: Mr. Davis justifies his inaction by saying that bilingualism cannot be imposed. It has never been imposed. A proper study of our history reveals, rather, that in the area of language legislation, if anything was imposed at any time it was English unilingualism.

In the final analysis, though, I agree with Mr. Davis that bilingualism cannot be imposed, but I would like to add that, at the same time, it cannot be repressed. We have embarked in Canada upon a process of which this constitutional resolution is but a step on the path that will eventually lead to the recognition of bilingualism throughout Canada. It will happen without being imposed. It will happen through popular will, as those candidates who oppose it will discover at the polls. It will happen because there exists in Canada a growing number of citizens, especially amongst the young and educated, who are not only dedicated to eradicating historical grievances and injustices, but who perceive a tremendous opportunity for achieving a truly bilingual country at every level of government, in our work places and in our leisure activities. Many of you present today will see this happen and will bear witness to the foresight of our Prime Minister in these developments.

This constitutional resolution will play a role in educating those who fear bilingualism in this country, when they see the results of our deliberations consecrated in the Constitution and when they see its principles applied. I know that they, like others before them, will come to espouse those ideals. Certainly, a new climate will come about in Canada in which our citizens will no longer be subject to that demagoguery emanating from certain circles.

I would like to refer now to Jim Richardson's latest blunder, the advertisement that he placed in all the newspapers across Canada—a full-page advertisement containing nonsense. If nothing else, this advertisement proves to all that in our society one only needs to be rich in order to have the news widely circulated. Substance is of no importance to Mr. Richardson; nor is truth, it would appear. In this advertisement he asks the question: "Can a bilingual Canada ever be united?" I am sure that all of us here will agree that the answer to that question is, yes, a bilingual Canada can be and is a united Canada.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Guay: If Mr. Richardson truly believes that bilingualism is a dividing factor, I wonder why he did vote for the Official Languages Act himself, particularly when he was in cabinet. If bilingualism is a dividing factor, how then could the honourable gentleman publicly support official bilingualism over a number of years? How could he remain a member of the cabinet supporting bilingualism while believing that it was dividing this country? Honourable senators, he must have been suffering terribly and with profound anguish, having to hide his true beliefs in such a manner and for so many years.

I have here another example. It takes the form of an article by Professor Lowell Clark, of the University of Manitoba, which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on Wednesday, November 26, 1980. I compliment the Free Press for printing such an article because it does not happen too often. Although I do not believe that I can, I would like to have this article appended to my speech tonight. However, I suggest that all honourable senators read the article which outlines some of the history of the year 1887. The only difference is that federally the Conservatives were in power, and provincially most of the provinces were represented by the Liberal Party. The same problem existed at that time. I quote from the article by Professor Clark:

> Along with these developments there was a series of racial and religious feuds between the French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians stemming from the Riel affair. One result was the emergence into prominence of D'Alton McCarthy, a renegade Conservative, who commenced a crusade against the official status of the French language throughout Canada. He may be regarded as the James Richardson of that day.

On the subject of federal-provincial relations, Professor Lowell Clark's article may be of some assistance to this chamber. We have heard many comments of late by the opposition with regard to the state of federal-provincial relations. Professor Clark wrote a most interesting comment. He said:

> In the television debate which he held with Prime Minister Trudeau and Mr. Broadbent during the 1979 election campaign, Mr. Joe Clark made a comment which seems to have escaped all and sundry. He said that all successful Prime Ministers had had harmonious relations with the provincial premiers, and in this connection he twice mentioned Sir John A. Macdonald, our first Prime Minister. Nothing could be further from the truth.

This article was written by a professor of the University of Manitoba who had done some substantial research. The author goes on to relate how Sir John A. Macdonald set the pace for federal-provincial relations, how his time in office was marked by continuous rumblings and confrontations with the provinces—provincial bills were disallowed; there were the 1886 Nova Scotia secession election, annexation and the first interprovincial conference convened by Quebec's Premier Mercier. Such were the "harmonious relations" to which the Honourable Leader of the Opposition refers. Professor Clark wrote further on in the same article:

> To him the meeting (at Quebec) was nothing more than a league of malcontent provinces in organized opposition to the national policies and national leadership of the Dominion.

The "him" refers to Mr. Macdonald. I suggest that honourable senators read this article.

Senator Flynn: What are you trying to prove?

Senator Guay: I agree that Sir John A. Macdonald was a successful Prime Minister, and I am sure that comment will please Senator Flynn. However, none, except perhaps the Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition, Joe Clark, would qualify Sir John A. Macdonald's relationship with the provincial premiers as "harmonious". Mr. Clark would have the history of this country conform to his wishful notion. Federal-provincial squabbles are as old as this country, and to blame our Prime Minister for this state of affairs is tantamount to intellectual dishonesty.

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Guay: The Right Honourable Joe Clark's position on federal-provincial relations is another example of where the real problems lie within this country. I could also mention Manitoba Premier Sterling Lyon and some of his recent statements, but may I say, instead, to all honourable senators that it is not worth the effort to mention what he has said or done? If these gentlemen chose to work for unity rather than for disunity—consciously or unconsciously; if these gentlemen sought true harmony rather than petty political advantage; if these gentlemen sought common and reasonable grounds for understanding and comprehension amongst all Canadians, then we could make further progress in many areas.

Luckily for Canada, our destiny does not depend on these gentlemen. Luckily for Canada, Liberal policies on bilingualism, biculturalism and multiculturalism have produced results.

Senator Perrault: That is a good, objective comment.

Senator Guay: As an example, I cite the gala held last Tuesday at the National Arts Centre in celebration of President Reagan's historic visit. We saw in that cultural event the elements which truly represent the makeup of Canada. I am convinced that this Constitution Act, as proposed for our consideration, provides a basis for the solution of problems and challenges facing this great nation.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: Bravo!

Senator Guay: Finally, honourable senators, there is no better way of ending my comments than by quoting a fellow senator.

Senator Asselin: Senator McIlraith?

Senator Guay: I feel that Senator Rousseau's ending to her speech of March 3, 1981 would be an appropriate ending to the remarks of any one of us here today. I would like to quote that ending in its entirety.

Senator Flynn: Why don't you quote the whole speech?

Senator Guay: Senator Flynn, I wonder if you talk in your sleep. I also wonder if you laugh in your sleep.

Senator Flynn: Certainly, when I dream of you.

Senator Guay: Senator Rousseau's ending was one of the best I have heard. It is as follows:

> I have no doubt that following this debate we will have given the future generations a permanent solution to our constitutional problem, and to the Canadians of today, the pride to say "Long live Canada" on the 1st of July, 1981, for they will then be in possession of the missing element that will give the word Canada the meaning of country.

That is the meaning it actually deserves.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Would Senator Guay allow me to ask him a question to clarify a point which his remarks have raised in my mind—

● (2030)

[English]

I am not sure whether I should ask my question in French or English. With your permission, Senator Guay, I shall ask it in French.

[Translation]

Senator Guay: Why not? I am bilingual, I speak French, and I made part of my remarks in French.

Senator Flynn: We were deeply moved by your conclusion.

Senator Tremblay: As Senator Flynn has just indicated, I was deeply moved by Senator Guay's argument. My question is this: would Senator Guay's argument in favour of the bill under review mean that we should add Manitoba to the province or provinces already referred to in this bill, namely, New Brunswick, a province represented here in a certain way by his neighbour to the right, to those which must apply for more . . .

Senator Guay: Do you have a question?

Senator Tremblay: . . . than that which is provided under Section 133, for Clauses 16 to 20 of this bill—

Senator Guay: Do you have a question?

Senator Tremblay: —cover a lot of ground—

Senator Frith: It is a "bootlegged" speech.

Senator Tremblay: This is not a speech, and I realize, Senator Frith, that you cannot feel the punctuation, although there is some punction in my question. In view of the fact that Clauses 16 to 20 provide for a lot more than what is provided for under Section 133, does Senator Guay's intervention mean that we should include much more than what is covered under Section 133 which applies now to Manitoba—comma, as requested by Senator Frith—namely, Manitoba?

Senator Langlois: Why not include the province of Quebec?

Senator Tremblay: The honourable senator has caught on to the meaning of my commas pretty well!

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I thought Senator Tremblay would never get to his question. I should like to point out, honourable senators, that frankly you are asking me to make another speech in this chamber. Because, to answer your question, I would need not five minutes but half an hour; I am quite willing to do it though, mind you!

The fact is that I am surprised that you are comparing, in a way that seems different to me, the assets or the rights of Manitoba with those of New Brunswick, because our rights have just been recognized, as I said in my speech a few minutes ago—

Senator Flynn: You already have—

Senator Guay: Please let me speak, Senator Flynn. You will get your chance too, if you so wish, later on. With regard to the specific question, in order to give an adequate answer I would have to speak for a good long while and I feel that I have said enough for tonight.

Senator Tremblay: You will allow me to understand, comma, that in the light of what you have just said, comma, you are not willing to make a specific proposal, this evening, in the Senate, that would place Manitoba—

Senator Langlois: And Quebec.

Senator Tremblay: —on an equal footing—bracket, since we are talking about punctuation, Senator Frith, bracket—and Quebec? Question mark. Why not? Question mark.

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Tremblay: Why not? Question mark. Once again, close the bracket. Let us now come back to the main topic: I understand, Senator Guay, that you are not ready to recommend to this house that Manitoba be placed on an equal footing with New Brunswick.

Senator Frith: Exclamation mark!

Senator Tremblay: No, period and paragraph!

Senator Guay: I should like to tell the honourable senators, and especially Senator Tremblay, that I only wish he could be even 75 per cent as pleased as I am this evening with the Constitution as it stands. It seems to me that Manitoba has already made a giant's stride. Which does not mean that we will sit on our laurels and say "Good enough!". Quite the contrary. But I do appreciate very much what has been accomplished to this date—

Senator Flynn: By whom?

Senator Guay: —and I would point out that, had you been listening carefully, you would have understood that I am sincerely happy even with what has been accomplished until now. I am proud of our Constitution, as it stands, which will give equal status with regard to the official languages of Canada.

Senator Asselin: You already have them!

Senator Guay: Well, I am talking for my province. I would simply say to you, members of the opposition, that if we at least appreciate the crumbs that are thrown to us, why are you not supporting them, please, you who are supposed to be knowledgeable in this field?

Senator Flynn: We are not taking anything away from you.

Senator Asselin: That does not give you anything.

Senator Guay: You should be helping us instead of thwarting us.

Senator Tremblay: Could I suggest to Senator Guay that he consult with Mr. Justice Monin, who was, at the time we had the Bloc universitaire, in 1941, among the fighters in Manitoba, coming from St. Boniface. He would confirm what Senator Guay has just said, that what was done during those years was in accordance with what has been said in 1979 or 1980—

Senator Flynn: In December 1979.

Senator Tremblay: In 1979. At that time, if I recall well, it was not done. Quite the contrary.

Senator Guay: That is what you say.

Senator Tremblay: I suggest that you consult with your fellow Manitoban, Mr. Justice Monin.

Senator Guay: There you are, quoting bits of sayings. I am not the one who said these things. You are quoting from what Mr. Justice Monin has said. I am not in a position, honourable senators, to know what Mr. Justice Monin said in Manitoba or maybe what he told Senator Tremblay.

Senator Asselin: You said he was a great man.

Senator Guay: I am not in a position to know what Mr. Justice Monin has said. I know him quite well, but I am not aware of his conversations with Senator Tremblay. I once again ask Senator Tremblay to support us, to help us gain benefits for French-speaking Manitobans, and even to offer suggestions, if he thinks I am not doing things the right way.

Senator Tremblay: I am offering you . . .

Some Hon. Senators: Order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order.

Senator Tremblay: I am prepared to support you, if you propose that Manitoba be entrenched along with New Brunswick.

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I hope that Senator Tremblay will not take me to task as Senator Guay did but, on the other hand, we shall see at the end of my speech, if he so wishes. I find it impossible, honourable senators, to stay out of such a historic debate and I cannot help but try to make a contribution, however modest, on such a controversial issue, as we just saw, the outcome of which will change completely the political situation in Canada. In a debate of such significance, in such an emotional legal dispute, it is indeed not very easy to avoid repetition.

Even though we will often hear the same arguments sometimes in different form, I think it is an exercise of the utmost importance and of unquestionable value.

When I was first elected to the Government of Canada in 1964, I entered immediately another historic debate, the debate on the Canadian flag. I see that some of the emotional arguments used at that time are repeated occasionally by the opposition, especially in the other place, in the present debate.

The debate is apparently becoming as heated and as extravagant as in 1964, when the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker said of Prime Minister Pearson, and I quote:

> "He has created splits in the nation which will remain vivid in the memory of Canadians for more than one generation.

This is what the same gentleman said about the flag:

> This proposal is going to divide Canada as never before—

You will agree with me, honourable senators, that these arguments are still being made today, as well as many others that have been put forth in 1964 and, of course, it would take too long to restate them now.

Senator Flynn: So get on with it!

Senator Leblanc: But since I had the honour and the privilege to participate in the flag debate in 1964 as a member of the House of Commons, I could not but draw a parallel as I now participate in the debate on the Constitution, in 1981.

Senator Flynn: Obviously!

Senator Leblanc: Not being a lawyer, I will not try to express legal opinions, and I will leave it to the distinguished lawyers who sit in this House.

I would be remiss, however, at this point in my speech, in failing to extend my most sincere congratulations to the joint chairman of the joint committee representing the Senate, the Honourable Harry Hays, as well as to all those senators who have actively participated and who have therefore sacrificed their precious time and who have expressed their views clearly and precisely. I think the value of their contributions cannot be assessed in monetary terms.

I also wish to extend my congratulations to those members who had to neglect their other duties for some time, especially the joint chairman representing the House of Commons, Mr. Serge Joyal, whose work, patience and general attitude have been praised by people from all parts of Canada and by all the political parties.

We all agree, judging by the speeches heard in the Senate up to now, that the committee has definitely improved the original proposal of the government. We are now in a position to debate this new text submitted by the committee to the Canadian Parliament.

In my intervention before the Senate on Wednesday, October 29, 1980 on this very subject, I dealt briefly with the issue of the unilateral aspect of this proposed resolution. This action is not, I think, as unilateral as many people claim it is. All Canadians agree on the principle of patriating our Constitution, like the Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition, the leader of the NDP, most honourable senators and members of the other place. Mr. Yurko, a Conservative member of Parliament, has even obtained unanimous consent in the House of Commons already for a motion requiring the government to patriate the Constitution. In addition, on January 20, 1981, the Honourable Jake Epp, official spokesman of the Progressive Conservative Party, stated the following before the joint Committee on the Constitution at the outset of this presentation, and I quote:

[English]

> In presenting our proposed amendments to the government's resolution we do so in the knowledge that it is the popular will of Canadians that our Constitution rest in this country. It is also the popular will that we have a Charter of Rights and Freedoms for the Canadian people embedded in the Constitution. The Progressive Conservative Party's position in these matters reflects the popular will.

[Translation]

As the Honourable Mr. Epp says so well, the Progressive Conservative party agrees, and so does the population, as he states that his party is reflecting the will of the public. The provinces in general agree, but what Canadians are mostly beginning to disagree about is the amending formula, the referendum and the wording of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In fact, no one disagrees about the principle but rather about the form of the resolution. The proposal also has the support of most NDP members, most of whom are from western Canada. It has the support of the Conservative Premier of New Brunswick, the support of the Ontario premier, another Conservative, and the support of two of the three major political parties in Canada, which represent nearly two thirds of the members of Parliament.

How then can we talk about unilateral patriation with an amending formula when the Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition himself has proposed patriation with an amending formula? Moreover, Mr. Broadbent, the leader of the NDP, proclaims that he is not only in agreement, but also enthusiastic, and all the parties represented in Parliament want patriation with an amending formula.

We should insist instead of the high degree of consensus which exists and which certainly indicates that this is not unilateral patriation since the word "unilateral" is defined in the dictionary as:

> Affecting one side only—involving only one of several persons or parties.

With your permission, honourable senators, I would like to look at the famous unanimity rule which now prevails. To this date, no prime minister has been able to reach unanimity, even though the political adversaries of the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau are trying to make him seem solely responsible for the failure to reach unanimity. In spite of all their efforts, the following prime ministers never obtained a consensus: King, Bennett, St. Laurent and Diefenbaker. There was always at least one province that did not agree, and since 1927, the principle of unanimity has failed. As a matter of fact, if we apply this principle to our public or private lives, we can see that it is impossible to reach unanimity, whether in Parliament, in municipal councils, in school boards, in co-operatives, in associations of young people, not so young people or senior citizens, in religious orders, and so on. In view of the impossibility of reaching unanimity, we must find another way to break a perpetual deadlock.

The role of heads of governments is to try to give appropriate direction to the people. It is not necessary to have unanimity since this concept has caused the failure of all patriation attempts in the last 54 years. We have no choice: We shall have to patriate without unanimity. We only need a high level of consensus as I said earlier, and I believe that we now have it.

We are now taking a first step, that of patriating the Constitution. A second step will be to grant another period of two years to the provinces to attempt to reach the miracle of unanimity that everyone wants. Indeed, sections 36 to 44 in Part V of the proposed resolution provides for a constitutional amendment procedure which could be used in the two years following the implementation of the permanent amendment procedure described in Part VI and the proclamation of the rest of the act.

During that two-year period, it will be possible to amend the Constitution with the unanimous consent of the eleven governments. This "interim" agreement will renew the principle of unanimity. If during that time the provinces do not forsake the tradition and cannot reach agreement, an alternative solution will become mandatory and the formula prescribed in Part VI will automatically come into force. Being naturally an optimist, I am convinced that the provinces will make every effort to achieve the unanimity which has eluded them so far. Unlike the Honourable George Hees, I have not yet lost hope, once the Constitution has been patriated, to see the provincial premiers reach agreement with the central government on the constitutional issue.

That two-year period offers the provinces a last chance to amend the Constitution with unanimous agreement. We will see if in fact the provinces will take this extra time at their disposal to reach unanimous agreement when negotiations resume. We will see if they will take into consideration the fact that Canada is the only sovereign country in the world that must still ask the Parliament of another country for permission to amend its own Constitution. However it seems that right now the provinces cannot agree among themselves and achieve that unanimity.

In that respect, I would like to quote an article published in the newspaper La Presse of Saturday, February 28, 1981, written by Marcel Adam and entitled "Can the provinces only agree to disagree?"

> It is not enough to alert public opinion and to try to have it endorse one's cause. Such constructive initiatives must also be taken as are likely to end the crisis. Otherwise the provinces will be saying that Mr. Trudeau is right, he who points out that the provinces are still unable to reach a consensus every time the premiers or their intergovernmental ministers hold a meeting to define their strategy.
> From that standpoint, it is difficult to say that Mr. Trudeau is wrong. The only time the provinces managed to show a common front was at the very end of the September conference when they isolated Mr. Trudeau and made him look like a bad partner. This obvious consensus did not amount to anything, it was nothing more than the result of ad hoc underhanded dealings achieved in a catastrophe. On that occasion they delivered a monster: the so-called Vancouver amending formula which the provinces themselves find rather shaky today. So they are trying to draft a new one but the operation appears laborious. How can they ask for a new constitutional conference and maintain, as Mr. Blakeney did recently, that a consensus might be reached? The best trick Mr. Trudeau could pull on them would be to call them together to show Canadians once again that there is no relying on them to break out of the constitutional impasse.
> In a press conference, Mr. Trudeau admitted that if early in the month, in Montreal, the provincial premiers had reached an agreement on these counter-proposals, they would have put the federal government in a bad position.

The Quebec government launched a shameless advertising campaign, at taxpayers' expense, feeding the people all kinds of slogans instead of appearing before the joint committee to argue its points as other provincial governments have done.

Senator Flynn: Mr. Ryan did not come.

Senator Leblanc: He is not the premier either, he will come after April 13. We will certainly be glad to have a new premier in Quebec. So he will come after April 13. The Quebec government uses slogans that say: "We must not be had", "Ottawa wants to take away Quebec's right of veto", and many others. That is completely untrue since the opposition and several provinces are complaining precisely on the fact that Quebec will have the right of veto.

That is very distasteful propaganda, in my opinion, by a government which wants to separate its province from the rest of Canada and which would have its people believe that their elected representatives in Ottawa are about to betray and deceive them. This is the same government which claims that the Trudeaus, the Ouellets, the Lalondes, the Chrétiens, the De Banés, the Joyals and others, who have repeatedly and openly fought to have the rights of French-speaking Canadians respected throughout Canada and especially in Quebec, have overnight become the enemy of the province they represent. That is pure fantasy, nonsense and hypocrisy, I would even go so far as to say that it is treachery. Quite the contrary, federal representatives want now more than ever to ensure the survival of the French language by enshrining it in gold letters in our new Canadian Constitution.

This proposal is but the embryo, although still imperfect, of our future Constitution, of which all Canadians, I repeat, all Canadians will be proud in the years to come. This is but the beginning of a process which will take many years to reach its peak. Although imperfect the document now before us deserves our support, because it is not the end of a constitutional debate but rather a promising start. If unfortunately, and I am convinced to the contrary, the proposal was sent back with a negative vote, all of us parliamentarians would jeopardize for I do not know how long the considerable time and effort, the more than 300 hours of hard work by the joint committee, and all the other efforts that have gone in that project before and after the committee was established.

There will remain in a subsequent stage to be negotiated the sharing of the tax basis between the two levels of government. The confrontation should start early in 1983, because the five-year tax agreement will terminate in 1982.

We at the federal level must keep in mind, honourable senators, that Canada is one of the most decentralized federations in the world, because the total provincial spending is now double that of the national government. This is a disquieting situation that we should seriously ponder. How can the national government exert its influence on the national economy if it does not have the tools needed?

In fact, a number of questions arise. What do the people want? A weak federal government with strong provinces? Or a strong federal government with weak provinces? Or something in between?

It must also be remembered that spendthrift federal governments were largely responsible for financially and politically launching provinces that have now unlimited ambitions, some of them especially. As it grew poorer and went seriously into debt—almost out of all proportion—Ottawa divested itself from the means to effectively intervene in an economy plagued with inflation and unemployment. How do we reverse the process? How can we reverse the trend that endangers our federation? How do we get out of the deadlock?

process? How can we reverse the trend that endangers our federation? How do we get out of the deadlock?

Let us start by accepting the proposal. This will further the issue, and let us trust our government in this first stage to a renewed and modernized Canada.

APPENDIX

CANADA STUDENT LOANS PROGRAM

COLLECTION PROCEDURES FOR DEFAULTED LOANS

1. When a claim for loss is paid under the guarantee provisions of the legislation the debt becomes due the Crown.

2. All defaulted accounts are passed to commercial collection agencies under contract to the government to locate, monitor and collect from delinquent borrowers. It should be noted that more than 3/4 of all defaulted accounts were claimed as losses because the borrower failed to keep the bank advised of an up to date address or refused to respond to bank letters.

3. In the event a debtor refuses to provide financial statements to the government agents in order that an equitable monthly repayment schedule may be established, the account is referred to the Department of Justice for registration of a judgment and subsequent collection by that Department of Justice for registration of a judgment and subsequent collection by that department under the judgment.

4. As of June 30, 1980.

	79,045	students had defaulted.
(29.7%)	23,490	of students had repaid their loans in full.
(33.3%)	26,283	of those students were paying on a monthly basis.
(20.6%)	16,263	of those students had repayments temporarily suspended due to unemployment, illness, return to school, etc.
(10.2%)	8,080	of the students were in course of being located by agencies.
(4%)	3,150	accounts had only recently been transmitted to collection agencies.
(2.3%)	1,779	accounts had been written off because of the death of the borrower, permanent disability or other justifiable cause.

These figures show that almost 85% of students who have defaulted have since repaid, are repaying on a regular basis or have justifiable reason to have their repayment program suspended but are maintaining contact. Since only some 2% of accounts have been written off after 16 years of operations it seems clear that virtually all loans outstanding will be repaid over time.

5. In the 5 cases quoted in the Toronto Star article of April 17, 1978, although, as noted in the article, all had been contacted by our agents this was only after extensive tracing operations which, in some of the cases, extended over several years as the debtors concerned continually moved. Two of the accounts have since been paid in full and the others are repaying on a monthly basis. The article quotes four as saying that they either paid no attention to notices, or refused to pay or, in one case, "after quitting school, he hit the road—a guitar in one hand, a suitcase in the other—I had no account at a bank or anything—this individual had, as noted in the article, been found by our agents and has since paid in full." It is true that, in some cases where a debtor moves frequently and leaves no forwarding addresses, it may take some time for our agents to locate and arrange repayment. I believe the procedures outlined are effective and the statistics bear this out.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, March 18, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Commission of Inquiry relating to the Security and Investigation Services Branch within the Post Office Department (Commissioner, His Honour Judge René J. Marin), dated January 7, 1981.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Tuesday next, March 24, 1981, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, if leave is granted, I will explain the reason for my motion.

Senator Flynn: Explain why you want leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I make this motion as house leader on behalf of Senator Bird, who, as deputy chairman, was presiding at a recent meeting of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee when the need for this permission arose. I now yield to Senator Bird, and ask her to explain why the committee should have that permission.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, as you know, Bill C-40 was passed on the understanding that we would study its subject matter later, which we are doing, instead of forgetting about it.

This request relates to the witness whom we heard last night. Senator Marshall was very helpful, and I am grateful to him for his participation, but at a quarter to ten, yesterday evening, after an extremely long day, he still had a number of areas that I felt were important to discuss. Senator Marshall suggested the witness return on another occasion, which I felt should be next week, because the minister is coming the week after, and we should be well primed with questions that should be asked. I do hope, therefore, that the Leader of the Opposition will agree to this request.

Senator Flynn: Why me? I do agree.

Motion agreed to.

● (1410)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, while we are still on Notices of Motions, because this is the heading under which we usually discuss house business and our plans for sittings in the following week, I ask permission to make some comments.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: First, to tidy up the dangling end of a question just raised by Senator Flynn relating to the debate yesterday on the need to explain not only why a motion is being made but why leave should be granted, I would have had some trouble explaining why I asked for leave to move that the Health, Welfare and Science Committee be permitted to meet while the Senate is sitting, because there was nothing to prevent my giving notice of that motion for tomorrow.

At any rate, with regard to house business, honourable senators will remember that at this stage we frequently discuss, in addition to our business, the Constitution resolution which is before us. I am glad to report that we have continued to deal with this important piece of business in a co-operative manner. We have attempted to develop a schedule consistent with our wish to give everyone a full opportunity to debate, amend and generally deal with this important matter in the Senate. What I am about to say represents, I believe, the views of the leadership in the Senate and, I hope, all senators as to how we should proceed from this point on.

We have already had some weeks to debate the resolution, and I know there are still a number of honourable senators who wish to speak on the resolution, and perhaps propose amendments for consideration, debate and disposition. There are approximately 10 or 12 senators on this side of the chamber who still want to speak and perhaps the same number on the other side. These are not exact figures at all, but there seem to be some 20 or 25 senators who have indicated an interest in speaking on the resolution. I am not now dealing with the question of amendments, proposed or debated, but our judgment as to the schedule, and it appears that our requirements would be met if we were to increase the number of senators speaking per sitting instead of increasing the number of sittings.

I have discussed this matter with Senator Flynn and Senator Macdonald, and it is our recommendation that we have regular sittings next week—that is, Tuesday night, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon—and that we attempt to increase the number of senators speaking during each sitting. Therefore, I would ask honourable senators to be prepared to speak so that we may hear more speeches next week than we have in the past. I suggest that we judge the situation again next week at this time. In the event that we need to sit in the evenings or on Friday to meet our requirements, we will do so. However, our feeling today is that we probably will not need to. As you know, Senator Flynn and Senator Perrault have agreed on the principle that we provide time to discuss and debate this resolution after its disposition in the House of Commons. That would be the time when, as Senator Flynn has so poetically called it, "the last sprint" would take place and when we might find that we are sitting both extended hours and extra days in order to dispose of the resolution on the Constitution within the time frame which we will then try to settle upon.

I hope that this explanation will help honourable senators to make their plans and give them a good idea of what is happening. So, in sum, the intention is to sit regular hours next week, but we should be ready for extended hours in order to meet the requirement of allowing every senator the opportunity to participate in the debate.

I want to underline that it is the wish of the opposition and the government that, for the sake of the Senate, no senator or any other person be able to say that we in the Senate did not afford reasonable opportunity for all senators to participate in this important debate.

Hon. Allister Grosart: May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if we may assume from the statement he just made, and from previous statements, that there will be no attempt to bring on a vote to end debate on the resolution until we have received a message on the resolution from the other place?

Senator Frith: I cannot agree exactly with the honourable senator's phraseology because I do not believe that when dealing with a concurrent resolution we receive a message from the other place. However, the essence of what Senator Grosart has said is correct. At present it is agreed and desired by both sides that there will be a set time for debate on the resolution once it has been disposed of in the House of Commons.

Senator Olson: One day, 24 hours.

Senator Asselin: Shame.

[Senator Frith.]

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON IMPLICATIONS OF 200-MILE LIMIT

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is really supplementary to the question I asked him yesterday on the negotiations between Canada and France with regard to the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. I was a little slow on the uptake when the leader mentioned that the last round of negotiations between Canada and France concerning St. Pierre was in January 1979, and went on to say that it would be inappropriate at this stage to discuss the details of the negotiations. Would the honourable senator explain what he meant?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The coming negotiations.

Senator Marshall: Then is there any way we can obtain information on the negotiations which took place in 1979, and why has it not yet been received?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will seek further information on that point, but before today I do not think the honourable senator had requested the information. The reference yesterday to the possibility of providing information with regard to the negotiations referred to the negotiations anticipated to take place in May.

Senator Marshall: I can understand that the negotiations taking place now would be classified.

HOUSING

MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES—ASSISTANCE TO HOMEOWNERS

Hon. Jack Marshall: I wonder if I could move to another subject and direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It is with regard to the pressures faced by homeowners in meeting their mortgage obligations. From the letters I am receiving—and I am sure other senators are receiving the same letters—the situation has reached crisis proportions. While I am aware that questions have been asked in the other place, I wonder if we can get a better answer from the Minister of State for Economic Development than was given in the other place by the Minister of Finance and the minister responsible for housing.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I may be able to give a better answer, if that is what my honourable friend would like, but I think, after careful analysis of the substance of the answers given in the other place, he will find that it is the same answer.

Senator Marshall: What does that mean?

● (1420)

Senator Olson: The Minister of Finance is, of course, primarily responsible for fiscal and monetary policy, along with the Bank of Canada, and his answer has been consistent: he has no plans at this time to interfere with, or to be involved in attempting to change, interest rates.

Senator Marshall: Because of the pressure involved—and I am sure it is going to become more serious—I feel the time is coming when the minister responsible for the CMHC will not need more new houses, because there will be so many repossessions that there will be lots of houses for anyone who can afford them, since they will, of necessity, be reduced in price.

Could an attempt be made to appeal to these charter banks that are leaning on mortgage owners who are paying interest rates of 17 and 18 per cent, while the banks' profits are reaching between 70 and 80 per cent? Perhaps they should show some human responsibility by relieving the pressures on young Canadians who are trying to maintain their homes and not to lose them to the vultures that will appear in the coming months.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will convey to the Minister of Finance those concerns expressed by the honourable senator.

THE ECONOMY

ANNUAL REPORT OF BANK OF CANADA—GOVERNMENT POLICY RE INFLATION

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development, and deals with the annual report of the Bank of Canada. The Governor of the Bank of Canada made it clear that the right monetary policies the bank has been following have not been successful in combatting inflation to the degree that he would like to see. He appears to indicate that other measures will have to be taken.

Would the Minister of State for Economic Development tell us what plans the government has in order to try to assist the Bank of Canada in bringing down these inflation rates?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the government of the day does not, publicly, indicate plans, nor does it lead public discussion with respect to the actions taken by the Bank of Canada from time to time.

My honourable friend knows that on occasion discussions are held respecting the monetary policy of the Bank of Canada. However, the government does not speculate on that subject prior to an announcement being made.

I would also caution my friend that what I am saying now does not, in any way, indicate that there will be any change in the present monetary policy, but if and when there is to be a change, it will be announced, in the first instance, by the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Senator Doody: As a supplementary, I would point out that I am well aware of the policies of the Bank of Canada. Governor Bouey said, quite clearly, that he expects the tight monetary policies to continue; in fact, he thinks they may become tighter.

I asked what measures the government, particularly the Economic Development Committee of government, intends to take in order to support and help the fight against inflation. Governor Bouey indicated that, in themselves, the tight fiscal policies of the bank would not be sufficient to solve the problem.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think I would agree with Governor Bouey, but I would point out that he said he was not confining the admonition to government action. Other action can be taken by business, commerce, and, indeed, consumers with respect to relieving inflationary pressures.

Senator Doody: I do not think that was a very direct answer; I am not even sure it was an answer. I realize that the public sector has been asked to assist, the business sector and all the others, and if I meet these people from time to time I will certainly ask them what they intend to do. Right now I am asking what the minister intends to do.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could bring in a long list of policies that are already in place, although none of them is new or sensational, to indicate what the government has done to mitigate some of the problems involved. I think the thrust of my honourable friend's question is that we may have some fiscal policies that would compensate in large measure for the monetary policies. I do not believe that the question put in those terms can be answered any more precisely than I have already done.

Senator Doody: In effect, then, is the minister saying it has no further comfort for the people of Canada who are worried and concerned about this 12.2 per cent inflation rate, and that the policies in effect now are those we can expect to see during the coming year?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend can read the statements that have been made, particularly by the Minister of Finance, and make an interpretation from them. I think that he and other Canadians will get a lot of comfort from that and will realize it is a very responsible and balanced approach to the problem.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PRODUCTION OF IRISH MOSS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I hope that this will be my last question about Irish moss. Despite any appearances, I am not at all mossified.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Say it isn't so!

Senator Macquarrie: However, I am still disturbed that any member of this house should receive the dosage of evasion, if that is the way it comes, which came to me yesterday. I believe it would be very useful for students of this institution to peruse the long answer which the Leader of the Government was kind enough to give me yesterday. In it he pointed out that Statistics Canada was of the opinion that the value of Irish moss to the three maritime provinces and its volume were confidential. Then, surprisingly, in the answer, they went on to say that while they did not give the information, other departments of government did. They went on to restate their views that the dissemination of this in a parliamentary answer was an affront to confidentiality, thereby, I would say, impugning the other departments.

I am not interested in that internecine warfare between departments. We all know that in the bureaucracy there are people who have a penchant for secrecy. We have all heard the old story about the Christian Science Monitor editorial which one External Affairs officer sent to another marked, "This is worth reading," and, a week later, it was marked as a classified document for the minister's eyes alone. That is a sort of inbred thing.

I ask the honourable leader, who is always eager to help the Senate and the cause of Parliament in the government, if he will find out from those more enlightened departments like Industry, Trade and Commerce, Regional Economic Expansion, and Fisheries and Oceans, just what the figures are. I would cite the same answer that Statistics Canada referred to yesterday given to a certain distinguished member of the House of Commons on October 10, 1978, who was told exactly the volume and value in the provinces mentioned. All I have done to change that from the earlier one, was to add Newfoundland. Senator Marshall tells me there is no Irish moss there, but I thought that in this new era of Peckford prosperity even the Irish moss might be growing, and I want to keep up with that. If the Leader of the Government will get me that information, I will guarantee that we will have no more moss until the next Parliament.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourables senators, I have listened with interest to the question posed by Senator Macquarrie. I would appreciate it very much if he would provide me with a copy of the answer provided in 1978. It may be useful in my efforts to obtain supplementary information for the honourable senator. I want to assure honourable senators there is an earnest endeavour being made in order to obtain this information.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

BRITISH HIGH COMMISSIONER—LUNCHEON ENGAGEMENT WITH DEPUTY LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. I noticed that he was having lunch with Sir John Ford, in the company of Mr. Prud'homme, Mr. Hal Herbert and, I think, Senator Neiman. I would like to get some assurance that Sir John Ford did not try to influence the people who were having lunch with him, and that Mr. MacGuigan will not have to make another investigation to condemn the behaviour of Sir John, even if at the same time giving him absolution.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: That is not very funny.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am pleased to be able to give the Leader of the Opposition unqualified assurances on both points.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Is he trying to get an appointment to the Senate?

THE SINAI—CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN U.N. PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Has Canada been invited to participate in a multinational peacekeeping force for the Sinai?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can confirm the fact that discussions have been held involving those who were party to the Camp David accords concerning a proposed multinational peacekeeping force in the Sinai.

• (1430)

As honourable senators are aware, Canada has played a role in the past as a valuable peacekeeper in troubled areas. I can state that Canada has not yet received any formal request to participate in the force, but if such a request is received it will be given very careful consideration.

Senator Bosa: I have a supplementary question. When we had troops on the Syrian-Lebanese-Israeli border, did we offer those troops to the United Nations or did we wait for the United Nations to ask for them?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is my understanding that a request was made to Canada to participate in that force. I understand that is the usual action taken by the United Nations in its peacekeeping initiatives.

EL SALVADOR—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA AND PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Senate government leader. During the recent visit of the President of the United States and his party, the issue of El Salvador obviously came up. Did the American President ask the Canadian government to play any specific role at the political level in order to resolve the present conflict in El Salvador?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received no memorandum on that subject from the Office of the Prime Minister. However, if some information is available, I will certainly ask for the opportunity to revert to Question Period in order to provide it.

Senator Asselin: Are you saying that you already have the information before you?

Senator Perrault: No. I am saying that I have not received that information, and I will not comment before I receive it.

Senator Asselin: When do you expect to get that information?

Senator Perrault: I can only direct a request to the office of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and attempt to obtain it.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

RECOMMENDED GRAIN AND OIL SEED ACREAGES

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. The Prairie snows have disappeared and now is the time when prairie farmers are thinking of seeding their crops.

I might say, incidentally, if honourable senators will allow me, that the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board has been one of the most effective ministers in that portfolio that we have had for a long time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: I do not know of anyone who has been more active. I am giving the minister some praise before asking my question. He has been a most effective and hard-working minister, and his efforts are much appreciated by western Canadian farmers—and even by some of the members on the opposition benches, judging from the smiles on their faces.

My question is: Can the minister inform the Senate of the recommendations he is making to prairie producers concerning the acreages they should plant this spring in grain and oil seed crops?

Senator Asselin: He has a big statement. Can I get a copy of it?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, apparently I have one supporter, and I thank Senator Buckwold. I can see that the number of supporters on the other side is not very great, but that's fine.

Senator Perrault: But they are smiling at you.

Senator Argue: The market outlook for grain this year is exceedingly good. The Canadian Wheat Board is able to sell all of the stocks of wheat, oats and barley that it now has on hand. As a matter of fact, world demand for those Canadian Wheat Board stocks exceeds the supply. So the challenge to grain producers in western Canada is to produce all of the grain they can possibly produce this crop year.

Because of the demand, certain recommendations are being made to producers to consider in connection with their planting program for this spring. I hesitate to recommend acreages to farmers, because the individual farmer has an excellent idea of what he should plant and produce in relation to his own particular farm, but I suppose that these recommendations will give farmers generally an idea of what the market outlook may be.

Consequently, I am recommending that the acreage seeded to spring wheat in western Canada be increased from 25 million acres last year to 27.5 million acres this year, an increase of 10 per cent.

With respect to Durum wheat, for which there is a premium price but demand is about equal to supply, I am recommending that there be no increase in acreage; that the acreage seeded to Durum this year should be the same as last year, namely, 3.5 million acres.

The demand for oats, particularly high quality oats, is excellent. As a matter of fact, there is a real problem for mills in eastern Canada to obtain high quality oats. For that reason, we are recommending an increase in acreage seeded to oats from 3.2 million to 3.4 million, a modest increase of 6 per cent.

The main feature, to encourage the production and marketing of high quality oats, is the provision this year for the first time of a grade of designated oats, namely oats of high quality. A farmer in the west, who wishes to market a carload of oats, can send in a sample, and if it is selected as high quality oats, and subsequently, when it is shipped, accepted as high quality oats, it will go into a special pool for a designated grade, and called a designated grade, for which grade, in the final payment, he will receive a premium. Therefore, this is a response to an excellent demand, one that has not been met to date in eastern Canada for high quality oats.

The recommendation for barley is an increase from 11.5 million acres last year to 12.7 million acres this year, an increase of 10 per cent. The world demand for barley is exceedingly high, the markets are excellent, and therefore there is the recommendation for a 10 per cent increase.

The recommendation for rye is really not a recommendation because the fall rye has already been seeded, it is in the ground, and it is noted that last year the acreage seeded to fall or winter rye was 800,000 acres and this year it is 1.1 million acres.

The recommendation for flaxseed is that there should be no change; that it should be 1.5 million acres this year, which is the same as last year.

The recommendation for rapeseed is 5.1 million acres this year, compared to 5.1 million acres last year.

The recommended increases in acreage can be brought about only by a decrease in summer fallow acreage, and that would mean a decrease of approximately 13 per cent.

In light of what are quite dry conditions in certain areas on the prairies, and in view of individual farmers' own practices on their farms in relation to summer fallow, all I can say is that individual farmers should consider increasing their acreage, and cutting down on their summer fallow. However, that is not a recommendation that would go against their best judgment. We are merely saying to them that the market for spring wheat, for high quality oats, and for barley, is excellent and acreages seeded to those grains should be increased.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I would not want to underrate the efforts of the minister to fulfil his responsibilities as Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. I just want to point out to him that he is just as stubborn as his other colleagues who are ministers. Ever since the session started we have been telling him that it is the right of the official opposition to receive an advance copy of all ministers' releases allowing us to make comments if we so desire.

However, quite cleverly the minister is being asked planted questions by senators on his side of the house, which allows him to make ministerial statements. Good for him if he scores points in so doing—

Does Senator Langlois wish to ask me a question?

Senator Langlois: You are imputing motives.

Senator Asselin: I still say that the minister is not acting in good faith. He refuses, just as the other ministers do, to co-operate with the opposition when making ministerial statements without providing the official opposition with an advance copy of—

Senator Guay: Ask your question.

Senator Asselin: I am raising a point of order not a question. What I say is this: the minister does not provide the opposition with an advance copy of his ministerial statements and therefore the opposition is unable to express its views. Once again I regret that the minister has seen fit to use his prestige as a minister to make this ministerial statement without giving notice of it to the opposition.

• (1440)

[English]

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, that is not a point of order; it is not a question of privilege;—

Senator Flynn: But it is!

Senator Argue: —and it really does not have anything to do with the practices of this house.

The Honourable Senator Buckwold asked me a question. It was open to any other senator, including senators opposite, to ask a question about what my recommendations may be with regard to increased acreage. I read, not from a prepared statement, but from a table. I think honourable senators will understand that it was in fact a table I was reading from, and that therefore—

Senator Asselin: Give us a copy in advance, and we will understand it.

Senator Argue: That is what I was doing. I am sure honourable senators on the other side of the house who are experts—and there are experts over there—in western grain matters are perfectly capable of asking questions on this subject, either directly or by means of supplementaries, and do not require me, when I answer a question, to come in with a prepared text and pretend that it is a statement to be made under Motions, which is not the fact.

[Senator Argue.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, on the point of order that has been raised—and it has been raised once or twice before, with respect to information that I give to the house from time to time—we certainly do try to give the opposition a copy of the statement at least a few minutes and, sometimes, several hours before the sitting in this house.

Senator Asselin: When?

Senator Olson: The point that Senator Argue has made clearly demonstrates that members opposite do not do their homework.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Olson: The statement that Senator Argue made today was made earlier in Saskatoon, and was carried in the press all across that part of the country. If honourable senators opposite had been doing their homework they would have known that and could have asked the question themselves.

To raise this as a point of order on the ground that this is a new statement that is being made today is absolutely invalid, and, therefore, there is no question of a point of order at all.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not think we should get excited, but the point raised by Senator Asselin is perfectly well founded.

Senator Argue: No, it isn't.

Senator Flynn: Well, I will ask His Honour the Speaker to rule on this question. He does not have to rule today, but he can do so later, for our future guidance.

What Senator Argue did, really, was to make a statement to the house as to the policy that he will suggest to farmers for this year. This is a ministerial statement. We do not have much experience with regard to this kind of thing in this chamber, because in the Senate we have only had ministers responsible for departments for two years.

I would like to draw the attention of honourable senators to rule 1 of our rules, which says:

> 1. In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

There is no doubt in my mind that, had the statement which Senator Argue made been made in the other place, it would have been introduced at the point where we have ministers' statements, and a copy would have been provided to the opposition in order to allow us to make comments if we so desired. I do not mind Senator Argue planting questions through Senator Buckwold, or anyone else—

Senator Perrault: Shame! Shame!

Senator Flynn: There is nothing shameful about that.

Senator Asselin: He did the same with Senator Molgat a few weeks ago.

Senator Flynn: If Senator Buckwold is scandalized by my remarks, he can stand up and say that he never discussed this matter with Senator Argue, and I will accept his word. I do not mind that. I am just saying that, as a matter of practice, when a minister makes a statement of the kind made by Senator Argue, he should make it at any point in our proceedings he likes, but should make it as a statement and give notice of it to the opposition.

If the question was a real one I would not mind. But this was not a question; it was merely a matter of affording Senator Argue the opportunity to make a ministerial statement.

Senator Asselin: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: The point of order raised by Senator Asselin is well founded, and I would ask Your Honour to rule on it, not necessarily today but perhaps tomorrow.

Senator Buckwold: I have a supplementary.

Honourable senators, we were talking of seeding but are now into planting, and I resent very much the implication of the opposition that we plant questions on this side. We seed grain, but we do not plant questions.

All I can say is that the other side seems very nervous about this question. They do not seem to have a feeling for western farmers.

Senator Asselin: Be fair. Get on with your question.

Senator Buckwold: The fact is that the very same statements were made publicly by a minister, and that is one of the reasons why I asked the question. I went back home and I heard the same statements on the radio. I want the opposition to know that my questions are not always kind questions, in spite of the protestations of those on the other side.

The supplementary question I want to ask the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board now is: In view of the very welcome news of the increased acreage that he has proposed, how can he justify the weakness of our transportation system and ensure the ability of that system to transport that grain to market, so that we do not have to ask more supplementaries and so that our friends opposite will not have something else to say about seeded, planted, and vegetated questions?

1981-82 CROP YEAR—INITIAL PAYMENT

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: My other question to you, Mr. Minister, is: Why have you not yet announced the initial payment for the 1981-82 crop year? This is something which farmers in western Canada are very interested in.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Boa): This will be a statement, I suppose, along the lines of the other statement, since it is not a prepared one. I will, however, do the best I can with the material I have before me.

The honourable senator asks what the transportation system is like, and whether it is going to be improved so that it can handle the situation.

Senator Asselin: Don't tell me you have an answer ready!

Senator Argue: There are none so deaf as those who will not listen. Evidently, my friends opposite do not want the information because they do not want to listen.

Senator Asselin: Will you table the material?

Senator Argue: I will send you the material. Meanwhile, we can all struggle along with it.

I do not agree with those who say that our transportation system right now, in relation to the transport of grain, is not a good one.

Senator Asselin: Is it a question of policy?

Senator Argue: I think it is an excellent transportation system, and that it is working very well.

● (1450)

Senator Asselin: Is it a new policy?

Senator Argue: No, it is not; it is just a good transportation system and it is doing very well. Last week, the number of carloads of grain unloaded on the west coast amounted to 3,243 and the number of carloads of grain unloaded at Thunder Bay amounted to 1,550—for a total of 4,793.

In order to consider the transportation system, I suppose one could look at this year's performance as compared to that of last year, keeping in mind that last year's was excellent, breaking almost all the records that had been established theretofore in regard to the delivery of grain to seaboard and to market. This year, to date, 89,188 carloads have been delivered to the west coast, and 138,259 carloads have been delivered to Thunder Bay—for a total of 227,447.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: Consider last year's figures: the number of carloads delivered to the west coast was 82,314, while those delivered to Thunder Bay amounted to 137,023—for a total of 219,337; an increase of some 8,110 cars which have been unloaded this year as compared to last year. What do you call that?

Senator Olson: Last year was a good year.

Senator Argue: Last year was a good year, and this year has been slightly better.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: Next year, whether farmers are able to bring about the production that is recommended will depend not only on their intentions as to what they seed but also on the weather—and nobody can say what that will be. So, no one really knows whether these targets can in fact be reached. However, if there is the need for an improvement in the transportation system, those in authority will have to give attention to the question of obtaining further hopper cars for the handling of grain.

Senator Asselin: Table the document.

Senator Argue: My impression is that the Government of Canada has fully determined that the railway system which is in use now is adequate, and that it will be in the future, in relation to the handling of grain. I am confident that action will be taken in the future to make certain that the necessary quantity of hopper cars is made available.

Dealing with the further supplementary question as to why I am not recommending today initial prices that will be available on August 1, I would like to say that I tried that system a year ago. I may or may not be a popular minister—I am not saying that I am—

Senator Asselin: You would like to be, eh?

Senator Argue: —because I find that I am able to do nothing that receives general support or anything near unanimous support. However, sometimes I get a fair measure of support.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: Last spring I recommended certain initial payments, and I got into trouble because I was too careful, too conservative.

An Hon. Senator: That's incredible!

Senator Argue: I did not foresee that the markets would be expanding as they have. So I thought—keeping in mind my experience of last year, namely, making a recommendation very early in a period of expansion—that it might be wise to wait until July to determine what the market prospects will likely be. At that time I will endeavour to recommend to the cabinet initial prices, effective August 1, which will have a reasonable bearing on the prospects for the sale of grain and the price outlook for the coming year. These prices will possibly also be related to 70 or 80 per cent of the likely market price. It would seem that that is the range in which producers wish to have their initial prices set. Therefore, I am not making an announcement with regard to initial prices at this time. I anticipate that they will be announced this coming July, effective August 1.

Senator Asselin: You spoke like the good CCF, my friend.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like His Honour the Speaker, in considering his ruling, to take what has just been said at length by the minister in light of rules 20 and 28.

Senator Olson: What does that mean? Are the answers too long, or what?

Senator Flynn: I was not trying to make you understand it.

Senator Argue: If you did, there would be only one understanding.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

RECONSTITUTION OF DEFUNCT SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Some years ago there was a special joint committee called the National Capital Region Committee which, in my estimation, functioned extremely well. Then the committee died, and since then it has not been resurrected. Could the Leader of the Government indicate whether there is any intention on the part of the government to resurrect that valuable committee?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the National Capital Commission, of course, remains in existence, but I will take Senator Robichaud's question as notice.

ANNUAL REPORT OF BANK OF CANADA—GOVERNMENT POLICY RE INFLATION

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: I would like to ask the Minister of State for Economic Development a question concerning a matter that my colleague, Senator Doody, mentioned earlier relating to the figures released this morning, which show that the cost of living has increased in February by a full point to 12.2 per cent. That figure, incidentally, is two full points in excess of the budget projection regarding inflation for 1981. Last week, however, the Minister of Finance expressed contentment with his economic policies and their effects.

Could the Minister of State for Economic Development indicate that the cabinet will do its homework and establish a point above which inflation will not go before the government sheds its contentment in favour of action to reverse the situation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not quite sure what is implied in that question. If it suggests that the government should directly intervene in the market, I can assure the honourable senator that there is no intention of pursuing that kind of action. However, I do not think that he can assume that the government is ever completely satisfied that there is no further improvement which can be made with regard to economic performance, but that does not mean that we intend to take overt action with respect to some of these matters.

If my honourable friend would like to examine the figures a little more deeply, he will find that there are some reasons for that fairly significant increase in February that could not have been contemplated last October.

Senator Charbonneau: The minister said that I have implied that the government should take action in the free market. I think the government has done so, but with no success. I am suggesting that the government should find some policy that would reverse the trend.

The minister has just mentioned that there were probably some items, such as food and energy, which would create an increase in the rate of inflation, which is the song we hear every month. But I would point out that I have done a little research, and I think that the underlying rate of inflation, exclusive of food and energy, has also increased by almost a full point in February. How would the minister explain that?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my honourable friend can find some explanation for that if he wants to look at the Statistics Canada figures, but I am not sure that he needs to.

It is evident that world-wide inflation exists. Canada's involvement in world trade is perhaps, with one or two exceptions, on a higher level than that of any other country in the world. As long as Canada is so deeply involved in world trade, we can either intercept those prices at the border—which we neither favour nor are contemplating—or we must accept a certain measure of imported inflation. However, so long as we do better than most of our trading partners, I will continue to believe that the management of our economic, fiscal and monetary system is as good as can be expected, and better than most.

Senator Charbonneau: Then, am I to understand that the minister and the cabinet are content with an inflation rate of 12.2 per cent?

Senator Olson: No, the honourable senator should not have that understanding at all. But what he can do is put all the answers he has received together, and from that information he should come up with a far more accurate conclusion than the one he has just stated insofar as the attitude of the government is concerned.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION—AMENDED AND RESTATED LOAN INSURANCE AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Balfour asked when I would answer a question he asked on February 24 concerning the government's assistance to the Chrysler Corporation. In fact, I answered that question on March 3 and he will find it in Hansard on page 1917, in the right-hand column.

[Later:]

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I appreciate the information provided to me by the Minister of State for Economic Development. However, I must confess that I fail to understand his response to my question. It seems to be a non-response. The response is that according to the minister the information I have requested is confidential customer information between the Department of National Revenue and Chrysler Corporation. That is to say, the quantification of the penalty has either been deferred or forgiven by the Government of Canada.

While I do not expect the minister to respond today or to even respond in the chamber, I would appreciate receiving from him at his convenience the statutory authority for failing to disclose to the taxpayers of Canada the dollar amount of the penalty which is, in fact, either being deferred or forgiven by the Government of Canada in favour of Chrysler Corporation.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take the senator's question as notice.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

EAST COAST FISHERIES AND MARITIME BOUNDARY TREATIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have answers for Senators Flynn, Marshall, Murray and Muir. Their questions related to the withdrawal of the United States from the fisheries treaty with Canada.

President Reagan, during his visit to Canada, confirmed the rationale for the withdrawal of the United States from the fisheries treaty with Canada.

After his election, President Reagan appointed Rozanne L. Ridgway as a special ambassador to examine the prospects of concluding the fisheries treaty. She examined the situation thoroughly and recommended that the treaty be withdrawn because the United States Senate would not ratify it. Ambassador Ridgway then recommended to Secretary of State Haig that the treaty be withdrawn using the same rationale.

Secretary Haig then made the same recommendation to President Reagan. There are no discussions planned for the moment because the treaty is now a dead issue. The Americans are moving forward with the ratification of the boundary agreement and the fish management plan.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POLICY RE SIGNING OF TREATIES WITH UNITED STATES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): On March 12, 1981, Senator Flynn asked a question concerning government policy relating to the signing of treaties with the United States. Senator Flynn, although I am sure it was inadvertent on his part, was not correctly interpreting government policy when he asked if Canada "would not enter into any negotiation with the United States unless we have assurances that the U.S. Senate will eventually ratify any agreement we may reach with the U.S. administration."

The government policy is that Canada wants the best possible assurances from the United States that the United States Senate will ratify a treaty or agreement before Canada signs or concludes such an agreement. This would not be a requirement simply to enter into, to use the word of Senator Flynn, negotiation with the United States.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): On the same point, I was merely asking if Mr. MacGuigan meant what he said in this regard. Apparently that is not exactly what he meant.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have before me the entire text of the remarks.

Senator Flynn: I was quoting Mr. MacGuigan.

Senator Perrault: In any event, I hope that the answer serves to clear up any questions which honourable senators may have.

NORTH-SOUTH SUMMIT MEETING—STATEMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a statement on the North-South Summit which I am pleased to bring to the Senate.

I am pleased to inform the house that the Vienna Preparatory meeting for the proposed North-South Summit agreed last Friday that the summit should be convened in Cancun, Mexico, tentatively on October 22 to 24, 1981. A list of 22 participants was confirmed. Included are eight developed countries—Austria, Canada, Federal Republic of Germany, France, Japan, Sweden, U.K. and U.S.A.—and 12 developing countries—Algeria, Bangladesh, Brazil, Guyana, India, Ivory Coast, Mexico, Nigeria, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Tanzania, Venezuela—together with Yugoslavia and China. In addition, the U.S.S.R. will be approached to ascertain whether it wishes to be invited and, if so, an invitation will be extended.

A third preparatory meeting of foreign ministers of all proposed participants will be held in Cancun on August 1 and 2. The main purpose of the summit will be to see if substantive differences of view between countries involved in the North-South dialogue can be narrowed. It will be informal and non-negotiating. The agenda will likely include food and agriculture, trade and raw materials, energy resources, finance and international monetary affairs.

While the decision to postpone the summit was not based solely on U.S.A. concerns, it was based in part on the desire of the new administration to have more time to prepare itself. It is expected, therefore, that President Reagan will be able to attend.

GRAIN

STUDY BY CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, on March 12 last, in my absence, Senator Roblin directed a question to me, which was taken by Senator Olson. Senator Roblin was inquiring about a study which had been commissioned by the National Harbours Board and the Grains Group relating to the demand for transportation facilities to eastern Canada up to 1990. This study was conducted by Westburn Development Consultants Limited. Although Senator Roblin may have had a copy of that study, I understand that the results have not been made public and, therefore, I am not yet in a position to make them public in the chamber.

Senator Roblin also asked about a closed meeting of the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee to discuss the possibility of prairie producers reaching the production targets suggested by the Canadian Wheat Board. The only in camera meeting sponsored by the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory Committee, of which I am aware, is the symposium held in Saskatoon last October. Three volumes of the evidence taken at that symposium, and the forthcoming recommendations, are now available. It is my understanding that they have not been officially tabled since the French translation is not yet ready. I am informed that copies of this material are available at the offices of the Canadian Wheat Board, at 423 Main Street, Winnipeg, for anyone who may wish to have them.

I have only one copy in my possession but I have requested another. When Senator Roblin returns to the chamber I will be happy to supply him with a copy of these reports.

CANADA STUDENT LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Daniel Riley moved the third reading of Bill C-55, to amend the Canada Student Loans Act.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, it is now over five months since the government made public its package of constitutional proposals. In the intervening weeks, these proposals have been studied by a joint committee and debated at length in both houses of Parliament and across the nation.

The time is now approaching when we, in this chamber, must render our verdict on this controversial issue which has so grievously divided our country. Our decision will profoundly affect the future of this nation and, because of our unique role in this matter, may well affect the future of this house itself.

Stripped of all partisan political verbiage, the issue on which we must render our decision stems from two developments of which we are all aware. First, the government is asking the two houses of Parliament to join in requesting the Parliament of Great Britain to approve amendments to Canada's Constitution which will significantly change the nature and status of the federal union by which this nation was formed and under which we have lived for 114 years. Second, the wisdom of some of the amendments, and the procedure proposed to attain them, are open to serious question and are opposed, in whole or in part, by millions of Canadians and by eight of the governments of the ten provinces which are parties to our federal union. I have not included a reference to patriation because that is not an issue on which there is disagreement.

In light of these circumstances and our responsibility as senators to the regions of Canada, whose interests we represent, we must decide if we should or, indeed, can, give our support to the government's request.

May I first address the major consideration we must take into account in assessing the proposals themselves? The proposal to entrench a Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the Constitution is a significant departure from the concept of human rights which we have cherished in this country for over 100 years. The concept of human rights, which we inherited from Britain, rests on the conviction that men and women do not acquire their rights from the state. It holds that all human beings are born with inalienable rights which may be circumscribed only with the consent of the people themselves, through their elected representatives acting under the checks and balances of a parliamentary democracy. That is why, whenever it has been considered necessary to circumscribe the rights of individuals in the interest of society as a whole, or to provide individuals with the legal power to enforce some particular right, the procedure has always been by way of an act of Parliament or an act of a provincial legislature.

Advocates of entrenched rights frequently imply that for citizens to possess and enjoy such rights they must be entrenched in a constitution. This simply is not true. It has been a fact of our national life in this country for over 100 years that Canadian citizens have possessed and enjoyed a range of inalienable human rights extending far beyond the limited list of rights it is now proposed to entrench.

The concept of entrenched rights is an offshoot of the doctrine of the supremacy of the state, and a belief that individual rights are benefits bestowed by the state, rather than an integral part of that heritage of freedom to which all human beings acquire title at birth. It carries the implication that rights, not expressly conceded to individuals, remain with the state, which is the reverse of our Canadian concept that all rights belong to individuals except those which they, through the process of parliamentary democracy, voluntarily transfer to the state.

Our American cousins initiated the practice of entrenched rights on this continent when they passed their Bill of Rights in 1791, five years after the adoption of their Articles of Confederation and 15 years after their Declaration of Independence affirmed the doctrine of inherent inalienable human rights by those oft quoted words:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

Proponents of entrenchment argue that even if unnecessary, it is desirable for two reasons: One, it provides every citizen with legal redress if his or her entrenched rights are violated—certainly, legal redress may sometimes be desirable, but when it is, it can more appropriately be provided by the enactment of federal and provincial bills of rights; and, two, it takes away from Parliament and the provincial legislatures the power to pass laws which diminish or infringe on the rights which are entrenched. This is the fundamental difference between protecting rights by statute and protection by entrenchment.

There is something paradoxical about the arguments advanced. To hold that our proven system of parliamentary democracy is the best form of government ever devised to ensure the rights and serve the interests of free men and women in a free society, and, at the same time, contend that entrenchment of rights is necessary to protect the people from the parliaments they elect, to say the least, requires a mind unfettered by the virtues of logic and consistency.

After all the abstract arguments have been made, the fact remains that the greatest guarantee that human rights will be respected is not statutes of parliament or constitutional entrenchments, but the amount of social, political and moral integrity we ourselves build into our society.

This was well expressed by a former Prime Minister of Canada in these words:

> Our basic constitutional inheritance from Britain is the supremacy of Parliament and Legislatures within their respective jurisdictions. Thus no Bill of Rights can offer absolute protection in our system, but a constitutional amendment would not necessarily achieve this either. The American experience suggests that their constitutional law and courts were often unable to prevent violations of rights. Rights and freedoms are not established or protected merely or primarily, or often at all, by proclamations of beliefs or written constitutions, but by the slow, sure building of a sound progressive social, political, and economic structure of law, justice and understanding. That has been the British way, and it has worked there, and on the whole it has worked with us too. Rights require the protection of practice, not merely those of paper.

That wise observation was made by the late Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson during the debate on the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights. Canada would not be in the divided state it is in today if his successor had demonstrated comparable insight and wisdom.

For more than one hundred years our nation has demonstrated the soundness of those traditional twin philosophies of inalienable human rights and the supremacy of Parliament as the guardian of those rights. There is no logical reason to alter a system that has proven so eminently satisfactory. It would be a retrogressive step to transfer from the elected members of Parliament to the appointed members of the courts the authority and responsibility to define human rights and render decisions where the issue of human rights is the key factor involved. It is not a reflection on the courts to hold that it is improper to extend the role and responsibility of judges to decisions based not on legal facts but on the courts' interpretation of social policies and abstract rights, which belong in the political rather than the judicial realm. Adjudicating cases arising from disputed definitions and alleged violations of constitutional rights requires courts to make social and political as well as legal judgments.

Another cause for concern is the adverse effect entrenchment would have on the successful prosecution of criminals. The experience in other countries provides ample evidence that entrenchment of legal rights is far more advantageous to the criminal element than to law-abiding citizens. This was emphasized by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police in their submission to the joint committee. They said, in part:

> —we find the new proposals to be alarming in the extreme. We remain of the firm opinion that enshrining legal rights in a Charter of Rights and Freedoms in a Constitution is neither necessary nor desirable. In our view, U.S. constitutional provisions, similar to those now proposed by the Government of Canada, and subsequent judicial interpretation of those provisions, bear a significant degree of responsibility for the high levels of crime currently found across America.
> The Canadian people must understand that the appealing rhetoric of "due process" and "civil liberties" can disguise a gradual process which aims at the destruction of the law enforcement function. Instead of contributing to freedom and fair play, these concepts can be used as the basis for the gradual entrenchment of provisions whose cumulative effect will ironically result in not more freedom, but less.

These serious concerns voiced by those charged with protecting the lives and property of citizens are aggravated by the use in the proposed legal rights section of ambiguous terms such as "reasonable" and "unreasonable" which occur no less than four times, and such expressions as "cruel and unusual punishment." Such terms are open to a wide range of interpretations. Given the trends of our times and the bias in favour of the criminal of many civil rights pressure groups, it may soon be held cruel and unusual treatment to confine a rapist or murderer to a cell without hot and cold running water and a coloured television. When ambiguous terms in statutes are interpreted by the courts contrary to the intent of parliament, amendments can readily be made to clarify the intent, but when the provisions are entrenched in the Constitution such clarifications are next to impossible. They, therefore, become the basis for a continuous succession of appeals through the courts, while the guilty remain unpunished and justice languishes on the sidelines. In the eyes of the public, justice delayed is justice denied.

At a time when rampant violence and crime is a matter of far greater public concern than the government's desire to amend the Constitution, it is irresponsible and wrong to render, unnecessarily, the task of law enforcement even more difficult. This chamber should not be a party to such a retrogressive step.

The government's proposals do more than impair the supremacy of Parliament and provincial legislatures by restricting their powers to legislate on behalf of the people. In the field of education they take away from the provinces the exclusive jurisdiction that was a basic tenet of our federal union, and an undisputed right the provinces have possessed and exercised for more than a century. This is being done by making one facet of entrenched language rights a provision for parents to demand educational facilities in the official language of their choice at provincial expense, if the number of students in any community so warrants. The decision as to whether the number of students so warrants will no longer remain with the provincial government or elected school boards, but with the courts. Provisions of this kind discredit the government's oft-repeated assertions that their proposals do not in any way lessen the constitutional powers the provinces now possess.

I now turn to the matter of an amending formula. The proposals are complicated, and I will not delay the house by dwelling on the details. Basically, the provisions are that the so-called Victoria Charter amending formula may be brought into force by unanimous consent at any time within two years after the Constitution Act is proclaimed, or by proclamation under the Great Seal at the expiration of the two-year period, unless the legislatures of at least seven provinces representing 80 per cent of the population have formally made a joint proposal for an alternative formula. If so, a referendum will be held within two years to decide between the Victoria Charter amending formula and that proposed by the seven or more provinces. The formula approved by the referendum will become part of the Constitution Act, by proclamation, within six months of the referendum. Future amendments will then be made under the adopted formula or by way of a further referendum which may be authorized by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada if, within one year of a resolution of both houses of Parliament proposing an amendment, such amendment has not been endorsed by the number of provinces required to give consent under the amending formula.

These proposals contain features which are discriminatory and objectionable, and if implemented will be permanent causes of regional resentment and alienation.

The Victoria Charter amending formula provides that an amendment affecting all provinces requires a resolution of both houses of Parliament, the approval of Ontario and Quebec, at least two of the Atlantic provinces, and at least two of the western provinces which combined have a population of at least 50 per cent of the four western provinces. The effect of this is to create three categories of provinces: (1) the two central provinces, each of which will hold a permanent power of veto over any amendment; (2) the four Atlantic provinces, any two of which will be sufficient to approve or reject an amendment; and (3) the four western provinces where two have an effective voice only if they represent over 50 per cent of the population of all four. This means that Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, with a combined population of less than any one of the western provinces, could approve or prevent an amendment. But for the western provinces, the formula is different. No two of them can approve or prevent a constitutional amendment, unless one of the two is B.C., because no two of the other three represent 50 per cent of the population of the four western provinces combined. Such a provision is grossly discriminatory and does violence to the concept of all provinces as equal partners in Confederation. If the federal government had set out deliberately to devise a formula to alienate the prairie provinces further, they could not have come up with a more effective procedure.

Some provision to recognize the tremendous disparity in population between provinces is reasonable, but surely a far more responsible approach would be to give all provinces identical limited veto powers restricted to amendments which would deprive the province of a traditional constitutional power conferred on it when it entered Confederation.

The provision that the federal government will in the future be able to resort to a referendum if the required number of provinces fail to concur under the amending formula, may well become a cause of serious national disunity. Apart from the divisive effect of any referendum, it will be perceived as a political strategy to by-pass the duly elected provincial legislatures by bringing the full force of federal government propaganda campaigns to bear on the population as a whole. Such situations are not the ingredients of a meaningful federal union and will hinder rather than help in building a strong and united nation.

This brings me to one of the most important aspects that we, as senators, must consider in reaching a sound and objective decision. Whether the proposals are good or bad, sound or unsound, in a federal state a fundamental change should not be made in the Constitution of the nation without widespread public support and the concurrence of at least a majority of the provinces. Whether we agree or disagree with the proposals, we must ask ourselves whether it is right, legally, constitutionally and morally, for the Government of Canada to ask the Parliament of another country to amend our Constitution in the manner proposed, in the face of widespread public opposition and without the consent of at least a majority of the provinces, which are members of our federal compact and whose present constitutional rights and powers will be significantly affected by the changes proposed.

My submission is that it is not right, especially when it is extremely doubtful that the Prime Minister could obtain in this country today the governmental and public support necessary to implement his proposals under his own proposed amending formula.

Whether his action is legally defensible is a matter currently before the courts, but its moral and constitutional rightness, in the broad sense, is a judgment that we in this chamber must make.

There are three pertinent facts which we must take into account. First, the constitutional rightness of what the Prime Minister is asking has been challenged not only in Canada but also by some of the leading constitutional authorities in Britain, where members of Parliament are deeply disturbed about the constitutional propriety of what they are being asked to do. We will certainly be hearing more on this if the government succeeds in forcing its proposals through Parliament.

It should be remembered that for years the Judicial Committee of the British House of Lords was the highest court of appeal for constitutional references from this and other members of the Commonwealth. Its membership includes eminent constitutional authorities with a wealth of experience in constitutional law. Men of that calibre will not be intimidated by the Prime Minister's veiled threats, or the blusterings of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, into rubber-stamping the Constitution Bill, if they conclude that they do not have the constitutional right to do so without the concurrence of at least a majority of the provinces who are joint partners with the federal government in Confederation and whose legislative powers are being changed by the amendments.

Second, the course the government is following does violence to our longstanding Canadian tradition of proceeding with major constitutional amendments only after unanimous or near-unanimous support of the provinces has been secured.

Third, the inappropriateness of the government's arbitrary unilateral action, as I have pointed out in this house before, is underscored not only by the fact that eight of the ten provinces are opposed, but by the fact that the federal government party in the present Parliament is in no sense a representative national government. Over 50 per cent of its members are from one province, Quebec, another 36 per cent are from the other central province, Ontario, leaving only 20 government members from all the rest of Canada, and only one from the four western provinces whose six million people account for 25 per cent of Canada's population. For a federal government, with no broad national representation in Parliament, to use its numerical majority concentrated in the two central provinces to impose its will on the entire nation in a matter as vital as the country's Constitution, in the face of strong opposition from all but one of the other eight provinces, is wrong and indefensible.

The government has sought to lessen its vulnerability by wooing the support of the NDP, whose members in Parliament are mostly from western Canada. There was a willingness on the part of the NDP national leadership to enter into a marriage of expediency in the hope of some political gain, but it did little to strengthen the government's position. Four Saskatchewan NDP members have repudiated their national leader's capitulation to the government's political seduction. The NDP Government of Saskatchewan has rejected the federal proposals, and has been joined in its opposition by the Manitoba and Alberta wings of the NDP. The government therefore remains without any truly national representation in its determination to force on the Canadian people the Constitution the Prime Minister has decided they need and are going to have, whether they want it or not.

I remind honourable senators that this pressure for constitutional change did not originate with the Canadian people. There has never been, and is not now, any significant public demand for constitutional change, certainly not of the kind the government is proposing. No urgent national situation exists that makes such action a matter of national necessity. The pressure for constitutional change was initiated by the Prime Minister and has become a national issue only because he has made it so. Nor can it be justified on the grounds of commitments to hasten constitutional change to satisfy Quebec's aspirations and concerns. What Quebec has long demanded and repeatedly emphasized during the referendum debate is a new federalism that will give the province greater autonomy in the management of those affairs which directly affect its internal interests. There is absolutely nothing in the federal proposals that gives Quebec or any other province more latitude to be masters in their own house. In fact, the very opposite is true. The effect will be to circumscribe further rather than enlarge provincial legislative powers.

We would all be delighted to see our nation adopt a new, modernized, made-in-Canada Constitution that would provide the foundation for a new federalism and a new national policy under which our two levels of government and the diverse regions of our country could work together in harmony, and in which our people could take justifiable pride. But it will never be brought about by the arbitrary course of action on which the government has embarked. In a democratic nation it is folly for a government, especially one with only limited national support, to try arbitrarily to force fundamental constitutional change, unless and until there is that widespread measure of public and governmental approval necessary to ensure willing and enthusiastic acceptance of the changes proposed.

That is why constructive constitutional change will always be the last step in a long and sometimes frustrating process, and the reward not of political leaders willing to tear the country apart to gain their own ends, but of those who by wise, patient, and constructive leadership have first guided the nation into an era of mutual trust, willing co-operation and national good will.

This is a far cry from what we find in Canada today. We are faced with a nation angered by its government, shot through with regional alienations, and divided as never before. We are faced with a controversial set of constitutional proposals born in an atmosphere of confrontation and ill will. We are faced with a government prepared to use its majority, drawn from only two provinces, to force on the entire nation a Constitution unacceptable to millions of Canadians and rejected by eight of the ten provinces. We are faced with a government determined to act unilaterally to alter the present constitutional rights and restrict the legislative power of those provinces, not only without their consent but over their vehement opposition. These are the sobering facts we must consider as we vote on this resolution.

As senators, we occupy a position uniquely different from that of the elected members of the other place. We constitute more than a chamber of sober second thought. We have been appointed to represent our respective provinces in this house. We have been selected to provide the necessary checks and balances on a parliamentary structure where representation by population results in imbalances that invite the kind of abuse of parliamentary majority power we are witnessing today. We, as senators, have a particular responsibility in matters where the Constitution of Canada is concerned. The positions we take and how we vote must never be dictated by party affiliations, party loyalties or party discipline. Our positions and our votes must reflect the positions of the regions and provinces whose rights and interests we are appointed to protect. To that end, far more than elected members of the other place, on constitutional issues which involve all provincial governments as well as the federal government, we have a responsibility to take into account the position of the governments of the provinces we represent.

It is superficial to argue that provincial governments do not represent the position of the majority of their people. In our democratic system, the smaller the unit from which a government is elected, the more accurately it represents the position of its electors, and for this reason provincial governments are by their very nature closer to the people than the government of the country as a whole. While federal members of Parliament speak for the people of their province in federal matters, provincial governments represent and speak for their people in matters where their provincial rights and interests are concerned, and that is at the heart of the issue we are dealing with in this debate.

We are all well aware that the obligation to represent the position and safeguard the rights and interest of their respective provinces in this instance creates a difficult problem for senators affiliated with the government's political party. It is not easy for a senator to reject the recommendations of a government of which he has been a long-time supporter; but sometimes his constitutional responsibility leaves him no choice. Surely that is what the role and responsibility of this upper chamber is all about. None of us, including those affiliated with the government party, are here to rubber stamp whatever the government asks us to approve. In the case before us, our responsibility is clear. Not only are the government's proposals unsound in themselves, but eight of the ten provinces are on record as opposing the government's request that its constitutional package be approved. We, as representatives of those provinces, have an inescapable duty to give tangible expression to that opposition.

Over the years, the value of this upper chamber to the Canadian people has frequently been questioned. It has been criticized and belittled, often through ignorance, sometimes through prejudice, but not always without cause. Too often there has been a timidity with regard to exercising our constitutional power and responsibility to say "no" to the government majority in the other place. Too often there has been a tendency to protest questionable government proposals with our voices but not with our votes. As a result, the public has become increasingly critical of, or indifferent to, our existence and our role in the parliamentary process. Recently, when the government proposed removing the Senate's power of veto, intervention by senators persuaded the government to change its mind; but many may well ask, "Of what practical value to the Canadian people is the Senate's power of veto if it is not exercised even in those instances where there is an obvious constitutional responsibility to do so?"

The issue before us now is precisely such a case. It is doubtful if there has been an occasion in the past century when members of this chamber, as guardians of provincial interests and rights, faced a more obvious responsibility to say "no" to a government request. On this occasion at least, the eyes of Canada will be on this chamber as we vote. At such a crucial hour in our nation's history and on a constitutional issue of this magnitude, if party loyalties or discipline prevail over our responsibility to the provinces we represent, public disillusionment with this house will be complete.

If we fail in our responsibility on an issue of this importance to our nation, I, for one, and I am sure other senators as well, will find it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to continue to justify before the Canadian people the existence of the Senate.

On the other hand, if, on this historic occasion, we demonstrate by our votes the practical value of this house as the constitutional guardian of the rights and interests of Canada's diverse regions and provinces, we will by that one tangible act gain for this chamber a degree of public respect and confidence beyond anything it has known before. To paraphrase the words of Churchill: If this house endures another hundred years, men will still say, "This was their finest hour."

For the reasons I have stated, I intend to vote against this resolution. For the good of Canada, I earnestly hope that a majority of other senators will do likewise.

Hon. Florence B. Bird: Honourable senators, it is evident that the Honourable Senator Manning does not identify himself with a minority group, nor with the aboriginal peoples of our country. It is also plain that he is indeed not a woman.

I should begin by saying that I was ill during the month of February, and that to be absent during this vitally important debate has been, for me, a desperately frustrating and unhappy experience. Fortunately, I have been able to read Senate Hansard and to attend by way of television many of the meetings of the joint committee and the debates in the other place. I have also had a chance to think, to look into my own conscience, and to try to hold the truth sub specie aeternitatis.

It seems to me that as we face a momentous decision for our country we must acknowledge honestly the difference between shadow and substance.

By "shadow" I mean such things as warnings of impending doom, manipulation of the ignorant, organized defeatism, threats that Canada will not endure if we draft a new Constitution suitable for a pluralistic society in 1981, and also slanderous, unwarranted personal attacks from another country on the duly elected Prime Minister of Canada. Even in this country I find that arguments ad hominem are the cheapest, most despicable, least convincing form of political dialectic.

The truth—the substance—is that during the last three and a half months something exciting, heartening and very important to the future of our country has been happening here in our nation's capital. Hour after hour, day after day, the parliamentarians sitting around their big table in the West Block, under the harsh, hot lights and probing cameras, have slowly, laboriously and successfully produced a charter of human rights of which we can all be proud, and for which generations to come will call us blessed.

It was remarkable to see what happened to the members of the joint committee. At first there was considerable posturing and procedural filibustering. Questions from the opposition were often leading, loaded, even patronizing, in an attempt to belittle the whole important operation.

As the cold autumn days turned into winter, a change began to take place. Some of the members of the committee may have seen themselves on the delayed broadcasts on television and been ashamed. The television eye has a way of showing up what Damon Runyan called the "phonus belonus". It did that very effectively with Senator McCarthy in the United States during the 1950s. And it did it here during the committee hearings. Televising the proceedings acted as a valuable, modern educational process for the public as well as for members of the committee.

Anyway, after a while, the "phonus belonus" faded away. A new mood of responsible co-operation developed on both sides of the table as these men and women heeded the call of duty, "stern daughter of the voice of God." They had obviously become converted to the importance of their job by the high quality of the submissions, the sincerity of the witnesses and the cogency of the arguments put forward. And so they listened. They asked sensible, probing questions, obviously searching for clarification and understanding, and they made 67 valuable amendments.

Both of the chairmen put on an impressive performance of exemplary patience and careful fairness. Mr. Joyal grew in stature as he showed the same degree of intuitiveness, good manners and forbearance to each and every one of the witnesses. Senator Hays was his usual good-humoured, irrepressible self—I trust that I am in order and I am sure he will accept the spirit in which I say, "That boy done us proud." I am sorry, but I thought that he would be here today.

Personally, I have a sense of urgency about the proposed Charter of Rights because I am a woman and because I have been involved in the cause of human rights for over 40 years. Anyone who has studied the shameful history of western women knows how long it has taken us to move from the status of chattels to that of persons under the law.

Up until the latter part of the last century, we were denied the right to a higher education and to practise in the professions. Only half a dozen menial, badly paid jobs were open to us. When we married, our husbands had control of our property and jurisdiction over the education of our children. Even as late as the 1930s a married woman in Quebec could not have a bank account or a surgical operation without her husband's consent. Even during the last world war, married women in Manitoba were not allowed by law to teach in public schools. Within the lifetime of most of the honourable senators, women were denied the right to vote or to hold public office. We were deprived of our citizenship, as were our children, when we married an alien. We were, in fact, what Simone de Beauvoir called "le deuxième sexe."

Today, thanks to a prolonged and bitter battle, women are separate as to property when they marry. In one province, Quebec, women now are granted a partnership of acquests, and in several other provinces the contribution of a wife to a marriage is recognized under the law, with the extent of that contribution decided by the judiciary when a marriage is dissolved by separation, death or divorce.

Today women are pouring into universities and graduate schools. Most jobs are now open to us. We have equal political and citizenship rights. Since 1929 we have been recognized as persons and can sit in the Red Chamber. In the last decade we have made great progress. But, and it is a big "but", women still do not have equal economic rights. We are still paid less than men when we do work of equal value. We are still largely outside the power structure in government and the private sector.

The majority of old women are poor because we often earn less than men even when we do work of equal value, because we live longer than men and the work we do in the home is often not recognized under many husbands' superannuation plans, and because we are still generally confined to low-paid jobs, so that our earned pensions are so small that we are condemned to penury in our old age. In recent years there have been several court cases that illustrate that in some areas we do not have equality under the law. In fact, we do not, in general, have equal opportunities in every aspect of Canadian society. In particular, Indian women living on reserves are grossly and flagrantly discriminated against.

The majority of informed Canadian women—and I am one of them—believe that Canada must have an entrenched Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms to give us equal rights and opportunities in every province and in those areas under federal jurisdiction. In recent months I have been seized with the conviction that it is imperative that our rights be entrenched now, not next year, in five years, in ten years or in some indefinite number of years from now. We need to have our rights entrenched now so that they cannot be taken away from us except by an amendment to the Constitution. We need it now because strong reactionary forces are spreading in the United States. The attitude of the Republican Party toward women and the likely rejection of the Equal Rights Amendment are writing on the wall. We need the entrenched Charter of Rights in Canada now to protect us against infection from the virus of reactionary forces which does not respect international boundaries.

Already in Canada it has been suggested by a powerful lobby that married women be deprived of unemployment insurance because they should be treated as secondary wage earners. During a period of inflation two pay cheques have become a necessity for thousands of Canadian families. In most families the wife is the secondary earner because women are still confined to badly paid occupations, but that does not alter the fact that they are making a tremendous contribution to the family and the country and need to be protected by unemployment insurance just as much as any male wage earner.

Several of the 67 amendments made by the joint committee seem to have given women the protection they demand and must have. I am not a constitutional lawyer, but I am confident that the law officers of the Crown and the members of the committee who drafted the amendments to clause 15(1) and 15(2) have put the obvious intention of the clause into correct legal language which will not be misinterpreted by the courts. It is gratifying that clause 15(2) will enable women to take part in affirmative action programs which will in time enable them to make full use of their potential ability and qualify for jobs now denied them.

I am confident that all the hard work by members of the committee and their efficient support staff during the exhaustingly long hours has produced a greatly improved version of the original draft of the Charter of Rights. Neither the breast beating nor the territorial howling of seven provincial premiers can alter the fact that the proposed charter is a splendid document. It is a compassionate and liberal charter based on a concept of tolerance and pragmatic idealism. It amounts to a clear act of faith, which is rare and inspiring in the materialistic, intolerant and obfuscated world in which we find ourselves. It was written in Canada for Canadians by Canadians. No one from any other country had anything to do with it. It would be a tragedy if it were allowed to wither on the vine of political partisanship.

When I look across the red carpet, I see several members of the opposition whom I respect and admire.

I know that they are fine citizens and that they love Canada. I hope that when the time comes to cast their final vote on the joint resolution, some of them will have been persuaded by my dear colleagues not to try to prevent Canada from entrenching a Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in its new 1981 Constitution.

[English]

This will not, of course, be the final charter. There will never be a final charter. In the years ahead there will be amendments to the Constitution, since no constitution should be an inflexible, unalterable document. Undoubtedly, Parliament and legislatures will, in the future, bring in legislation to improve human rights.

We will, of course, always need legislatures to improve human rights and freedoms. At the same time we will always need an entrenched Bill of Rights to protect us from legislatures. They can give but they also can take away. The Constitution of Canada, 1981 will prevent basic rights from being taken away without an amendment to the Constitution.

In conclusion, it seems likely that the provinces may behave as mature adults instead of as selfish, unreasonable adolescents, so that we can have a final amending formula two years after patriation. At least it seems reasonable to suppose that the provincial premiers, faced with a deadline, will cease their shadow boxing and come up with a formula which will be accepted by Parliament.

● (1600)

As we consider amendments to the proposed charter, let us remember that this is a great debate in which we are asked to shape the aspirations of our country.

Let us, therefore, for Canada's sake, forswear partisan politics and opposing merely for the sake of opposing.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh!

Senator Bird: This is merely a time for us and for you on the opposite side of the house, Senator Flynn, to think as statesmen, not merely as politicians—to think as statesmen, with wisdom, vision and love of country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, first of all, I want to commend honourable senators for the quality of the Constitution debate we have been hearing in recent weeks. It is precisely with that approach in mind that I offer you today my thoughts on the Constitution resolution before us. The proposed constitutional package unilaterally achieves a number of objectives on which most members of the Canadian federation do not see eye to eye. In addition, it is an in-depth change in the very nature of our federation and the fundamental values of Canadian society.

For reasons which he deems justifiable, the Prime Minister has opted not only for unilateral patriation of the Constitution but also for entrenching a Charter of Rights and Freedoms which jeopardizes the balance between the two traditional levels of government. Moreover, the efforts made to entrench collective rights will have serious consequences on individual rights and on the future of our country.

First, I want to refer to property rights in Canadian society. Is there any element that makes it more distinctive than private ownership? Farms and family businesses are among the basic elements upon which our different provinces were founded. Where is the Canadian man or woman who today still does not dream about owning his or her own home or business? And yet, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not contain anything on that subject.

[English]

The right to own property is fundamental in a democracy. It is also essential to a free-market system, in that it enables individuals to improve their status to the best of their abilities, unhindered by the dictates of the state which might impose redistribution of wealth to meet its political or ideological objectives. In other words, the shape of our society is determined by the degree of freedom our citizens have to choose a way of life and to have access to opportunity in order to improve or change it.

The absence of freedom of ownership in the Constitution reflects a compromise in favour of state interventionists, and for that reason it is a direct threat to the free-market system of Canada. It is an anomaly for a nation such as ours not to have as one of its fundamental freedoms the right to own and enjoy property. Property is, after all, the reward of labour in a free-enterprise society.

Property is also a protection for the individual citizen against invasion of privacy, attempts on human dignity, as well as on life itself. Although the laws of decency make a home sacrosanct, whether owned or rented, it is undeniable that there is more reluctance to invade the rightful property of an individual because the law protects the owner in fact as well as in spirit. Doing away with the right to property undermines our Canadian way of life; it makes nationalization easier and even acceptable; it makes the state the source of great financial power and of reward for the individual, therefore making it the supreme power over the welfare and the values of citizens.

It is spurious to pretend that property ownership creates class distinctions. This holds true only for nations where equality of opportunity is non-existent and where the citizens enjoy inherited property mainly, rather than acquired wealth. A strong democracy such as Canada needs and thrives on property ownership. It is only by protecting the right to property and encouraging initiative and individual efforts and creativity that we will develop our vast potential. If we channel our wealth—from energy, for example—towards acquiring existing assets or centralizing economic power in the hands of the state, we will be destroying the fabric of our free-enterprise system and its free society.

[Translation]

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms therefore remains silent about property rights, while the Bill of Rights of Mr. Diefenbaker included the right of enjoyment of property. We have to believe that this is not simply an involuntary omission on the part of the government, but rather a voluntary one.

Honourable senators, it is not unusual for property rights to be recognized by the constitution of a country. The charters of rights and freedoms of over 30 countries recognize them. Among those, there is at least one whose social democrat spirit is admired by the Prime Minister, namely West Germany. Therefore it would not be an unusual or backward step to recognize property rights in a democratic country such as Canada, even if we aim towards a greater respect of the community as a whole. The community would lose nothing in the process, quite the opposite.

To those who influenced the government in deciding to exclude property rights by suggesting that this would be an interference in an area of provincial jurisdiction, I can give a very simple answer. While a national constitution comes within the federal jurisdiction and spheres of administration are shared fairly and properly between the two levels of government, the enjoyment of property can surely be considered a sacred right of the individual. Besides, my colleagues on this side of the house have been saying, since the beginning of our proceedings on this resolution, that no provision in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms should apply to a province against its will. It would therefore be possible to protect individual rights against an aggression by the state while giving to the appropriate administrative level the responsibility of legislating practical rules.

I am convinced that the failure of the constitutional dialogue in 1980 was caused by a climate of cynicism and bargaining created by the very procedure followed during these negotiations.

I am also convinced that the premiers and the public have made a lot of progress since last spring. The public is better informed and much more committed, although tired of this rather unhealthy concern for abstract concepts when it must each day face some very real problems, such as inflation, unemployment and bankruptcy.

I am also convinced that the premiers, who have always wanted to serve their own province—just as the federal government tries to serve its own interests—have nevertheless understood that, once informed, the public would demand that they behave responsibly towards the nation. The public will now want us to concern ourselves with our first loyalty, which must be to the country as a whole and the future of our children. I believe that an informed public will be able to get rid of objectives which are self-centered and damaging for the nation.

[English]

In this context of concern for our nation's future, allow me, honourable senators, to speak of equalization and regional disparities. I will address this subject in the same vein as I did property rights. The same principles of equality of opportunity and respect for the fundamental rights of our Canadian society are involved.

• (1610)

The principle of equalization appears altruistic on the surface. When looked at from the point of view of a federation, however, it appears economically doctrinaire. It is also difficult to accept that the Constitution should be entrenching a process—that of redistribution—before it addresses the methods whereby regions can foster their economic independence. What this has done is confirm the respective roles of donor and beneficiary provinces, without establishing the right for a province to move from being a recipient of equalization payments to equal partnership and contribution. Without settling the ownership of offshore resources, fisheries and other distribution-of-powers questions, the Constitution confirms the duty of provinces to share and the inevitability of some provinces to wait a long time for economic independence.

Without being dramatic, we could say that this confirmed inequality serves the government well, in that it ensures it a strong arbitrator's role and confirms its awesome spending powers.

We would say that the same inequality in the matter of resource ownership also serves the government's end. Although there is danger in relinquishing powers to a number of entities with their own regional aims and peculiarities, nevertheless, on the basis of economic independence, resources should be a provincial domain. Of course, if, for doctrinaire reasons, a government is against economic independence for regions, it will refuse to allocate to the regions the means whereby they can be independent of federal handouts.

I choose to believe that if regions become wealthy, their adherence to the national government will stem from a positive and active motive rather than one of passive dependence and need. We have, in the case of the west today, a perfect example of the weakness of the economic link for the purpose of nation building. When a once poor and dependent province such as Alberta or Newfoundland finds itself on the brink of economic independence, it seems more likely that it will rethink its relationship with the national government and the rest of the country, than if the relationship were a purely economic one of dependency.

If, on the contrary, a province joins others to form a nation in order to give its people a common goal and heritage, as well as protection against outside forces, the relationship should not founder for selfish or doctrinaire reasons. The referendum in Quebec defeated the sovereignty-association option because Quebecers, who had come lately to a middle-class and modern-economic status, thought they would lose out economically if their province seceded from the rest of Canada. Alberta and Newfoundland, however, have all to gain economically, and less to gain of a cultural nature, by the tie which binds them to the rest of Canada.

We should stop thinking that we can cement Canada together through fear of economic hardship. We can, however, cement the country through mutual respect and a desire to form a country of thriving and strong regions. This would not preclude self-help and mutual-help programs which would spread Canada's wealth around. But it is now impossible, short of imposition by force, to dictate to a region a dependent role or a second-class role when it has the possibility of wealth and equality. Moreover, efforts by the national government to force a wealthy province to reduce its own wealth, trigger in that province a wish to be all powerful in order to dictate to itself the terms of sharing, or even to refuse any sharing. In other words, force brings out the worst in both protagonists. Reality dictates the need for a negotiation of equals, in order to get the best deal for Canada and the provinces.

[Translation]

So, in closing, I come back to what I said at the outset, namely, that the protection of the rights of the community must not imply the denial of individual or provincial rights. A strong and proud nation such as ours must not fear the fulfilment of the individual or the regions. As for us, honourable senators, I can only add that our duty lies not only in representing the provinces—or the various regions of the country, if you will—but in protecting them against the erosion of their rights. If we fail to play that fundamental role, then there is no reason for us to exist. Our presence in government as legislators in this upper house would no longer be justified.

[English]

If the Senate forgets its fundamental role as protector of the provinces, it should cease to exist. We are not only the appointed representatives of the provinces, we are their protector. I believe that it is our duty, as senators, to oppose this constitutional package until it reflects the fundamental rights of all Canadians and respects the equality of all the partners in our Confederation.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PETITION FROM SOLIDARITÉ QUÉBEC

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the government leader. I have received from the Premier of Quebec a letter in which he refers to a petition from Solidarité Québec, which was signed by 715,180 people who ask that the Constitution of Canada not be patriated or amended without the agreement of the Province of Quebec, and that their signatures be referred to the appropriate Parliament.

In this letter, the Premier of Quebec says he also contacted the Prime Minister of Canada, the leader of the official opposition and the NDP leader. I am wondering whether the Leader of the Government could tell us whether the Prime Minister of Canada did receive notice of this petititon or a copy of it, and whether he intends to table it in the House of Commons and before the Parliament of Canada?

● (1410)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not heard from the office of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister with respect to the petition or whether it has been received. However, an inquiry will be made. Perhaps it has been delayed in the mail.

Senator Flynn: Never say that!

The Hon. the Speaker: I should probably inform the Senate that I did receive the same letter.

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS—OFFSHORE DRILLING—SUBMISSION OF CANADIAN SHIPBUILDING AND SHIP REPAIRING ASSOCIATION RE BILL C-48

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of State for Economic Development with regard to a submission from the Canadian Shipbuilding and Ship Repairing Association having to do with Bill C-48. One of their recommendations has to do with the special privilege of 10 per cent customs duties on offshore drilling ships and support vessels and the re-introduction of the normal 25 per cent duty. I think the point they are trying to make is that this will deny a build-up of the industrial capability of Canada in the Canadian shipbuilding industry I am wondering if the minister is aware of this. If so, could he comment on any action that could be taken to help the shipbuilding industry?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am aware of it, but in order to give a full reply I should like to take the question as notice and refer it to the ministers who are more directly involved.

OIL AND GAS INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY—REPRESENTATIONS OF PANARCTIC OILS LTD.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday the president of Panarctic, a firm half owned by the Government of Canada, joined the chorus of those condemning Bill C-48, particularly its so-called "Canadianization" aspects. Will the Minister of State for Economic Development heed these representations and encourage his cabinet colleagues to alter what seems to be a counter-productive policy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, if those comments are made directly—and perhaps they will be—to members of the government, we will regard them as representations, along with a lot of other representations that have been made on the same subject.

Senator Muir: I thank the minister for his initial reply. As a supplementary, I would like to say to him that the minister, upon introducing the Canada Lands Act, extolled its potential ability to Canadianize the industry. However, Panarctic's president has indicated that for a company like his, which is already 100 per cent Canadian owned and a heavy investor in frontier exploration, the bill will only reduce the attractiveness of private participation in the industry.

Will the minister, in view of his earlier comments, at least commit himself to seeking a change in the legislation insofar as it relates to companies already predominantly Canadian owned, and not wait until he receives further representations, but take the onus upon himself and investigate any possible damage which could result, and make the necessary changes?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Muir does not expect me to state positively that I will take a position different from that of the Government of Canada, but that is what he is really asking me to do. I say to him, categorically, that it is both an unfair question and one to which no answer is deserved, if I may put it that way. I reaffirm what I said a moment ago, that this representation from the president of Panarctic will be taken into account.

● (1415)

I would also remind the honourable senator that it is a matter of argument, and not of seeking information, as to whether some of this action is or is not helpful. For example, there are some areas where known commercial deposits of gas and oil exist. Some estimates indicate that finding it would account for around 20 per cent, or less, of the costs involved in bringing it to market. As a partner, Petro-Canada will, obviously, be required to pay its share of those other costs, involving perhaps five times as much as the exploration and development costs on site.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, far be it from me to direct an unfair question to the honourable gentleman. I would never do anything like that. I truly did not expect him to make a statement opposed to what the government has already decided.

In his position as Minister of State for Economic Development, I am sure that he is interested enough in this country, and in the development of this country, to take into consideration what Mr. Charles Hetherington—whom I have never met—the president of Panarctic, and others who are experts in the field have said. Would he not agree that he and the government might be able to learn something from those who are involved in the business?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have already given an undertaking to take that into consideration. I do not really think I can say more now which would add to the explicit answer I gave a few minutes ago.

EAST COAST FISHERIES AND MARITIME BOUNDARY TREATIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a statement on the subject of the United States Senate hearing on the Canada-United States boundary settlement treaty and its relation to fisheries' problems on the east coast. I may say that the statement has just been made available to me by the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The United States government is proceeding to ratify the boundary settlement treaty. The United States has abandoned the fisheries treaty to which it was originally linked as a package.

The United States government is in no doubt as to Canada's profound disappointment and regret at this unilateral abandonment of the fisheries treaty. We are particularly concerned for the conservation of the fisheries resource on Georges Bank. The President has said that he intends to institute a scallop-management plan for United States fishermen there. Given the disputed ownership of the resource, Canada would expect to be consulted on this plan before it is instituted.

United States government spokesmen have said in Senate hearings that an interim fisheries arrangement between Canada and the United States is not possible unitl a boundary line is drawn. This does not mean, however, that appropriate conservation measures cannot, and should not, be put into effect.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—FISHING PERMITS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Williams on March 12 concerning the Law of the Sea Conference and fishing permits within Canada's 200-mile economic zone.

The 200-mile economic zone and the Law of the Sea Conference are totally separate issues.

The issuing of fishing permits is a bilateral matter between Canada and other individual nations, except in the case of the European Economic Community which we deal with as a unit. These permits are not issued except when there is a surplus of stock.

EFFECT OF PROPOSED CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS ON LAW ENFORCEMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Bosa on March 12, concerning the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the article in the Globe and Mail on March 11 by one Roderick McLeod. Since this is a rather extensive reply and is of some importance, I would ask that it be incorporated in today's record of proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

EAST COAST FISHERIES AND MARITIME BOUNDARY TREATIES

Hon. Jack Marshall: I have a supplementary question to the delayed answer that the minister gave on the Canada-U.S. fisheries treaty. It is obvious that the right course to follow is to have a management plan in connection with scallops; but, evidently, according to the TV news, Nova Scotia draggers have already been apprehended for fishing undersized scallops, which means that someone has already taken the bulk of the catch. This is early in the season.

I would like to find out the extent of the crisis. It should be pointed out to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, and also to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that they should demand of the American government that renegotiations take place as soon as possible.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that all honourable senators sympathize with the concerns expressed by Senator Marshall. Further information will be sought on the points raised by him.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, as I take part in the "second round" of the debate on the Constitution, I should like to join the many senators who have preceded me in congratulating the joint chairmen and all the members who served on the committee. I had the privilege of serving on it, as a substitute, for one sitting. The members of the committee have received much praise for their untiring work, and their report will be regarded as one of the most important reports in the history of the Canadian Parliament since Confederation.

In the "first round" of the debate, on October 28 last, I said that I was in general agreement with the principles of the resolution, but that I intended to criticize the government for not going far enough in some areas of the Charter of Rights. I was particularly concerned, among other things, about the absence of any reference to multiculturalism and a more concise definition of our native peoples. Both these concerns have been met in clauses 25 and 27 of the new and improved resolution.

Before I speak on the Charter of Rights, I would like to deal with some other aspects of constitutional reform, starting with the principle of "unanimous consent" or "liberum veto," to put it in the language of my ancestors.

Constitutionally speaking, the rule of unanimous consent has been in disrepute since the eighteenth century. In the mid-seventeenth century, Poland made the so-called liberum veto an integral part of the Polish Constitution. The liberum veto was based on the assumption of the absolute political equality of every Polish gentleman, the corollary being that every measure introduced in the Polish Parliament had to be adopted unanimously. Consequently, if any single deputy believed that a measure already approved by the rest of the house might injure the interests of his constituents, he had the right to exclaim, "I disapprove," and the measure was defeated. Subsequently, the principle was extended further to allow the individual deputy to force the dissolution of Parliament and reconsideration by the following Parliament of all measures already agreed upon.

By the end of the seventeenth century, the liberum veto was being used so recklessly that all business was frequently brought to a standstill. The collapse of the Polish state in the eighteenth century is usually attributed by historians to the existence of the liberum veto, because this principle paralyzed constitutional change and left Poland unable to adapt to changing circumstances.

Some Canadians maintain that we should try again to reach a consensus by all eleven governments before any action is taken on the patriation of the Constitution. Can we afford to take as much time as the Swiss have taken for the adoption of their constitution? The Swiss considered and debated their constitution for 350 years before they approved it in 1848. To this day, there are some Swiss who believe they have been too hasty in adopting such an important document, but they did not have television in those days. We now live in the electronic age and Canadians believe the time has come to cut the umbilical cord.

After 113 years of nationhood, Canada still has not shaken off the last vestige of its early colonial status. Canada's key constitutional document, the British North America Act, can only be amended by an act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

While, by convention, the B.N.A. Act is amended only at the request of Canada, the fact that the Parliament of the United Kingdom still must ratify Canada's requests stands as an impediment to nationhood. Canadians from coast to coast are agreed that this last vestige of colonial status should end. Patriation of the Constitution is an important symbol of renewed federalism. Patriation of the B.N.A. Act means, in essence, empowering Canada, solely, to amend the act.

Patriation is a simple, straightforward measure, but the action has been frustrated by federal-provincial differences over the amending formula and other elements of constitutional change. The B.N.A. Act cannot sensibly be patriated until an amending formula is defined, for application once the power to amend rests solely with Canada.

There have been numerous attempts to patriate the B.N.A. Act, dating back to 1927. While federal-provincial accord was reached on patriation in 1971, on the basis of the so-called Victoria amending formula, Quebec subsequently refused to ratify the agreement. It refused, not because of the amending formula, but because it wanted exclusive control over social policy as a condition of patriation.

The provinces have tended to follow the example of Quebec, by looking upon patriation as their trump card. By holding out on patriation, they have endeavoured to win concessions to their points of view on other issues, such as resources and social policy. The September 1980 Constitution Conference of First Ministers is testimony to the difficulty of reaching an accord among eleven governments. The provincial governments gave tacit approval to a Quebec consensus or common front, which covered over the concerns of several provinces with an alternative amending formula—the so-called Vancouver formula with opting-out clauses in exchange for concessions amongst them in other areas, such as language rights.

The federal government could not accept the common front of premiers, packaged as it was by the Parti Québécois Government of Quebec, since so many unsatisfactory aspects surrounded each of the twelve items contained in their manoeuvre of a "last offer." The September 1980 Constitution Conference of First Ministers ended in failure. This failure was a bitter disappointment, especially in light of the exhaustive four-month round of intergovernmental discussions that had preceded the conference.

The Government of Canada felt it could not simply let the federal-provincial discussions end indecisively. The whole country had been challenged as never before by the Quebec-Canada unity debate. Throughout the country, but particularly in Quebec, Canadians were engaged in the question of how to renew federalism. Reports by the Task Force on Canadian Unity, the Canadian Bar Association,, the Quebec Liberal Party, the Government of British Columbia and many others offered foundations for "a future together". Were all these aspirations, this opportunity for all Canadians, to be lost by discord among 11 governments?

Quebecers have a special stake in constitutional reform. The Quebec referendum was fought on the grounds that sovereignty-association was a non-starter and that a renewed federal system can and will ensure the full expression of Quebec's society. Promises were made, not just by the federal government but by the premiers of the western provinces, Ontario, and the Atlantic provinces. There is an obligation on all of us to see that promises made are promises kept.

There is general consensus across Canada that constitutional changes should be made. Inevitably, there are differences on the substance of these changes, but there is also a great deal of harmony of thought.

The contentious issue is the process. Six provincial premiers are challenging the constitutionality of the federal government's constitutional initiatives. The Manitoba Court of Appeal has already ruled against the Government of Manitoba's reference. The joint address of the House of Commons and the Senate regarding the Constitution Act 1981 has been found by the Manitoba court to be both legal and within constitutional convention.

The Leader of the Opposition, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, wants the joint resolution to be limited to simple patriation and an amending formula. He has argued that additional constitutional changes can be made in Canada, once the power to amend is lodged solely in Canada. Given the expectations generated during the unity debate, this would appear to be a faltering step towards the renewal of federalism. Further, his position ignores the difficulty of gaining agreement among 11 governments beset by competing interests.

The constitutional log jam needs to be broken. For this reason, the federal government has tabled a "people's package," a package that reaches out to Canadians and gives them basic rights and freedoms. The division of responsibilities and powers between the federal and provincial governments is left aside, to be pursued once the power to amend the B.N.A. Act has been patriated to Canada.

In its original form, the draft resolution sought to draw upon the consensus that had been registered in past federal-provincial discussions. Thus, the Victoria amending formula of 1971 was included in the resolution, as it had been agreed to earlier by all eleven governments. No other formula has ever received such broad support. Minority language education rights were expressed in the exact wording of the communiques issued by the ten provinces. Other aspects of the Charter of Rights reflected a compromise between what the federal government felt was just for Canadians and the legislative concerns of the provincial governments.

The process of debate on the original draft resolution has sought to reach all Canadians and to incorporate their views. After debate in the House of Commons and the Senate, the draft resolution was referred to a special joint committee of Parliament for exhaustive study and amendment. No official constitutional discussions have ever been conducted with the degree of openness and public participation enjoyed by that committee.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Blah, blah, blah!

Senator Bosa: I beg your pardon, Senator Flynn?

Senator Flynn: I said, "Blah, blah, blah!"

Senator Bosa: Is what I say not correct, Senator Flynn?

Senator Flynn: No. Blah, blah, blah!

Senator Bosa: A lot of people have watched those proceedings and disagree with your expression.

Senator Flynn: Sure. I disagree with you; that's all.

Senator Bosa: In nationally televised proceedings, the committee heard the testimony and recommendations of witnesses from all parts of the country and from all walks of life. Ninety-seven groups of witnesses advised the committee, their testimony overwhelmingly supporting the principle of a patriation initiative that includes a Charter of Rights. Additionally, the committee received some 1,280 written submissions. The committee held 106 meetings over a four-month period and debated the resolution for 267 hours.

Senator Flynn: How many were opposed?

Senator Bosa: How many were opposed to what?

Senator Flynn: To the proposal.

Senator Bosa: There was consensus—

Senator Flynn: No!

Senator Bosa: —on the basic principles set out in the Charter of Rights. They met with the approval of the majority of those who made representations.

Senator Flynn: Just read the appendix.

Senator Bosa: The result is a considerably changed and improved resolution. Some 76 amendments were made to the original draft, many of which profoundly strengthen the position and dignity of the Canadian people.

The report of the committee is now being debated in the House of Commons and in the Senate. A critical crossroads has been reached in Canadian history. The time has arrived for a clear and unequivocal last request to the British Parliament to amend the BNA Act so as to give it a form shaped by Canadians for Canadians.

The opposition contends that the proposed unilateral patriation by this government has created divisiveness in the country. First, this process of patriation is not unilateral. The government has the support of the federal NDP and that of the Premiers of New Brunswick and Ontario, Ontario being the most populous province in Canada. Moreover, both those premiers are Conservatives.

Secondly, the process of substantial constitutional change is perhaps the most divisive stage through which any nation must pass from time to time. Indeed, the lack of at least violent and even divisive debate over constitutional change is associated with authoritarian or totalitarian states, largely because it is realized that the regime will not respect the Constitution if it is not in its interest to do so. In democratic states, or states in the process of democratization, constitutional development is traditionally accompanied by strong, sometimes bitter, resistance. This resistance tends to be more determined in nations organized according to federal principles than in unitary states, because at least some of the constituent parts of the federation will oppose the proposed changes and provide a rallying point for other dissidents. Disruption, violence and civil strife are more likely to be the result of a persistent refusal to adjust a constitution to new realities than of the changes themselves.

Canada is virtually unique among modern and democratic nations, in that for more than 140 years she has consistently engaged in intense, even violent debate over constitutional issues and has kept disruption and public violence to an absolute minimum. Every step she has taken in her evolution from dependent colony to independent nation has been at least controversial and often attended by dissension. Her independent position in the British Empire, while it was still an empire, the elimination of appeals to the British Privy Council, the legislation of a separate Canadian citizenship and the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag are examples of controversy and dissension.

Many Canadians will remember the bitter and prolonged debate on the flag. As special assistant to the government house leader of the day, the late Honourable Guy Favreau, and later to the Honourable George McIlraith, although I was not on his staff, I had the opportunity to follow the debate from beginning to end. Let me recite some statistics about that debate. The debate began on June 15, 1964. On September 10 the subject matter was referred to a special committee. The special committee reported back to the house on October 29. The resolution was finally adopted on a closure motion on December 14, though it was actually December 15 at 2.13 a.m., exactly six months to the day from the day on which the debate began. In the course of the debate speeches were delivered as follows: the NDP, 19; Socreds, 33; Liberals, 38; and Conservatives, 197. Do honourable senators see any similarity between the flag debate and the Constitution debate?

All of these actions led to intense and acrimonious debate and dispute. Patriation, like the earlier steps, will seem completely natural, a "motherhood" issue, a couple of years after its adoption.

One does not have to look far to find examples of countries less fortunate in their constitutional development than Canada. Our next door neighbour, the United States, was born in revolution and civil war, because not all its citizens approved of the violent breach with Great Britain. The present Constitution of that country was approved only after a sometimes violent dispute over the entrenchment of a bill of rights. Incidentally, federalists opposed the bill as unnecessary, while supporters of states' rights demanded it as a fundamental curb to the power of the federal government. The issue of extending constitutional civil rights to African slaves was one cause of the terrible Civil War. The 1960s were marked not only by dissension over an amendment to ensure to blacks their civil rights, but also by widespread and sometimes violent demonstrations for and against the change. Even today, Americans are divided over the controversial Equal Rights Amendment.

So, it is not surprising if Canadians are also divided over the issue of entrenchment of a charter of rights, but it was not always so. Canadians will recall that at Victoria, in 1971, all governments were agreed to entrenching at least fundamental freedoms, democratic rights and certain guarantees for the use of the English and French languages. The charter before us now has been considerably improved. In addition to the fundamental freedoms, it assures the right to move freely across the country from one province to another, and to take up residence and pursue employment in any province. Citizens will be protected from discrimination on the basis of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex and physical or mental disability.

The charter recognizes and affirms the aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada, as outlined in clause 25.

The Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism, of which I had the privilege of being chairman from 1976 to 1979, has made consistent and persistent representations to the government on behalf of the minorities of Canada. Let me quote just one sentence from the brief that, the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism presented to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, on December 18 last:

> To develop Canada as a bilingual and multicultural country in which all its citizens, male and female, young and old, native peoples and Metis, and all groups from every ethnic origin feel equally at home—

Clause 27 reads as follows:

> This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

I want to thank the Prime Minister and the members of the committee for having responded to the sensitivities and aspirations of a large segment of Canadian society. Canadians who have the vision to see the Canada of the future will rejoice at this significant event. It is an historical coincidence that it should be taking place on the tenth anniversary of the announcement in the House of Commons, on October 8, 1971, of the policy on multiculturalism by the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau. That announcement has given millions of Canadians a feeling of really belonging to this country—the feeling that one is accepted for what one is and not for what others would like one to be. This policy on multiculturalism has strengthened national unity. The entrenchment of the policy in the Charter of Rights is a meaningful example of this government's commitment to creating cultural equality.

The last paragraph of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism brief to the joint committee reads as follows:

> Culture is a dynamic aspect of our lives. It affects our perception of ourselves and of others. By creating greater appreciation of cultural values, multiculturalism serves as a strong and unifying force in this country. Multiculturalism is not merely a term synonymous with cultural pluralism or diversity, it is the joining together of all traditions which collectively express the reality called "Canada", joining together while still maintaining individuality and distinctiveness.

All party leaders supported the Prime Minister's announcement in the House of Commons, in 1971, of the policy of multiculturalism. The Honourable Robert L. Stanfield, the then Leader of the Official Opposition, told the House of Commons at the time:

> This declaration by the government of the principle of preserving and enhancing the many cultural traditions which exist within our country will be most welcome . . . What we want is justice for all Canadians and recognition of the cultural diversity of this country.

Since the policy of multiculturalism received all-party support at the time of its announcement, I urge the opposition not to vote against the constitutional package, because that might be interpreted by the minorities as meaning that the policy no longer has the full support of all parliamentarians.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I rise to intervene at what has come to be a rather advanced stage in this debate. I hasten to say that, had my intervention come earlier, the kind of speech I would have addressed to the house would have been very different from the one I propose to make this afternoon. After hearing Senator Lamontagne's laboured argument about constitutional matters, I felt that I should rise and respond. But time went on. Senator Thompson rose and, with wit, charm, knowledge and evident research, demolished the proposition advanced by Senator Lamontagne. It was done better and more completely than I could have done it, and it was from a source more telling than me.

Senator Frith: "Some chicken! Some neck!"

Senator Donahoe: At a later stage in the debate, I heard Senator Connolly give a very learned address. He made a great appeal that we should support the resolution before us. Before I had taken the opportunity to analyze fully what he had said, I thought he had made a very strong, convincing speech. A day or two later, the old veteran of this house rose to his feet and, starting at the very beginning with the nature and the makeup of the proposition that we are now considering, he destroyed, without question, the entire proposition that Senator Connolly had worked so hard to establish.

Early in the debate I was encouraged when Senator Cook took the floor, because he was able to provide the authentic voice of Newfoundland, a voice which indicated that, whatever the relationship of the other provinces to Canada, Newfoundland came in under circumstances peculiar unto itself. So it was refreshing and reviving to hear Senator Cook take the position he took.

A little later in the debate, when I began to ponder what we would hear from the province of Quebec, Senator Deschatelets took the floor. From Senator Deschatelets we heard the answer, the reaction and the expression of belief which I thought would have risen naturally and quickly to the lips of every Quebecer in this house.

Only a day or two ago we heard Senator Manning. If anyone can say that he is not an authentic voice of the west, I would like to hear him say it; because Senator Manning's authenticity seems to me to be self-evident. We listened to his position on this subject and to his analysis of the proposition before us, and we came to the conclusion that the government that prepared the proposition could have had no conception of the feelings in that great western part of our country. Having said that, I want to make one or two further passing references to other speeches which were made in this debate.

There is the speech made by Senator Olson. I do not know whether one should dignify it by calling it a speech. It was a sort of tirade he made in an effort to indicate that those people who did not share his views were in some way lesser Canadians. He spoke, as Senator Bosa did this afternoon, about the flag debate. I will not spend a great deal of time on that. All I wish to say to both those gentlemen and to all honourable senators is that, if people cannot understand the distinction between a debate about the flag that this country should possess and a debate about the fundamental, vital building of the Constitution which is to govern and control the growth and development of this country for generations to come, it seems to me that it would be a waste of time to try to make them understand. The distinction is between a symbol and an essential; there can be no doubt about that.

Enough of what other people have had to say. Perhaps you would like to know what I am going to say on my own behalf. I would like to begin by saying that, so far during the course of this debate, almost everyone who has risen to participate has felt it necessary to make reference to the work of the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, whose report is now under consideration.

I was not an original member of that committee but, during the course of its deliberations, I sat as a replacement member on several occasions. I can attest, as others have, to the attention and expertise which the members of that committee brought to their task. I endorse all the complimentary things that have been said about the participation of the members of this house in the work done by that committee, especially by those senators who were originally named to the committee and, perhaps more particularly, the contribution of senators from this side of the house.

I did not, however, rejoice at the result of the committee's deliberations as reflected in the report under consideration. It may be said that this committee was writing a new Constitution for Canada. If that is so, one must be struck by the difference between the procedures followed in this instance and those followed by the great men who formed and framed Canada's first Constitution. I say this notwithstanding what Senator Guay said the other night, because I thought that his remarks with respect to the procedures which were followed in the formation of the first Constitution of Canada missed the boat as completely as it could have been missed.

In 1864, the leaders of Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia met in Charlottetown to consider a maritime union. To the west of them, in Upper and Lower Canada, an experimental union was already in existence, which was not working particularly well, since it too frequently resulted in a state of deadlock. However, Sir John A. Macdonald, a practical politician, upon learning of the maritime meeting, believed that he saw in it two possibilities. First, he saw an opportunity to involve the maritime provinces in a union with Upper and Lower Canada, thereby making his own union a more workable one. Second, he saw, with the vision of the great statesman that he was, that such a union could mark the beginning of a great nation which would extend from sea to sea. Post haste, together with his colleagues and his opponents, he arranged to charter a steamer and proceed to Prince Edward Island, where his suggestion was put forward to those who were considering the lesser project. To this day, those in Prince Edward Island are proud to say that the chamber in which the delegation met is the cradle of Confederation.

All I want to say is that the child rocked in that cradle was a natural child, the result of a natural process; but the child that will be rocked in the cradle of this new Confederation will be the product of a violent Caesarean birth.

Senator Frith: Shame!

Senator Flynn: So it will!

Senator Donahoe: Having discussed the proposition of Sir John A. Macdonald, the delegation moved from Charlottetown to Halifax, where they discussed the matter further. Finally, in Quebec a series of resolutions was prepared and agreed to, and these became the basis of the British North America Act. Those resolutions were further considered and refined in some detail in London.

Three years after the process began, when there had been the fullest opportunity for consideration, reflection and discussion, the propositions were placed in the hands of the British government, along with the request that the act, which came to be known as the British North America Act, be passed. The resolutions upon which that act was based were the result of long, careful consideration. The delegation followed a procedure which allowed for opposing points of view to be considered and adapted one to the other in order to arrive at an acceptable solution.

In the process no one, neither Sir John A. Macdonald nor anyone else, produced a set, preconceived, rigid format which the Constitution should ultimately take. What was introduced into the discussions was an idea. The form in which that idea was to emerge was to be determined by the free exchange of opinion and the adoption of a rational mode of operation which gave full play to the views and opinions of all.

Compare that procedure to the one which surrounds the formation of the joint committee which has presented this report to us. To begin with, the basic material of which this report is comprised sprang full-blown from the mind of Pierre Elliott Trudeau. It was advanced as being the most desirable way in which the Constitution of Canada could be written. The provinces were denied any right to an input into the form which the future Constitution should take. The position taken with respect to the proposal was that its illegalities should be accepted on the authority of those who proposed it, and that it should not be referred to the supreme judicial authority of the country for the determination of its legality. This has been done according to a brief and rigid timetable. The provinces have been excluded from the discussion of the proposals and, to a very great extent, the House of Commons has been precluded from carrying on full, free and open discussion. Through the invocation of closure the matter was referred to a committee.

I know that it will continue to be argued, as it has already been, that many amendments came about as a result of the operations of that committee. Indeed, we have heard it argued in this chamber this afternoon. However, I would point out that of all these amendments, the great bulk were put forward by the administration, through the Minister of Justice, and were, in effect, dictated to just the same degree as the original provisions had been. I am not prepared to admit now, and I will never be prepared to agree, that the procedure followed in this instance is the appropriate method to amend the Constitution of this Confederation, which has served Canadians so well.

I have heard Sir John A. Macdonald quoted in this house as having said that the form of government which evolved from the procedure which I began this address by describing was not the form which he would have preferred had he been able to dictate, alone, the form which this future nation should take. He would have made it, not a Confederation but a strong, unitary state. Obviously, in the process of negotiation, and in the effort to create a union, he was obliged to retreat from the position he might have preferred and was obliged to accept the position which brought about the kind of country that was formed in 1867. Honourable senators, would that Pierre Elliott Trudeau were able to display the same degree of respect for the opinions of others and the same willingness to arrive at a reasonable compromise in his effort to rewrite the Constitution that was written in those days, so long ago.

I have followed, with the closest interest, the discussion which has thus far taken place in the Senate. Many thoughtful, learned and scholarly addresses have been made, reflecting a great depth of research. Some of them have come from this side of the house and others have come from the opposite side, as I have already indicated. Much of the argument emanating from the other side of the house has been directed in an attempt to prove that the course of action being followed by the government is a legal one. None of those who took this line of argument has tried to give us reasons to make us understand why we should accept his rulings as to legality and be denied a ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Much of the argument has been directed towards the desirability of, and justification for, entrenching a Charter of Rights and Freedoms in our Constitution because we, on this side, have not been heard to give unreserved approval to this method of procedure. Strenuous efforts have been made to picture us as being persons opposed to assuring the rights of the people.

I wish to assert now, with all the vigour at my command, that I and my colleagues yield to no man in our respect for, and our devotion to, the human rights which are vested in the Canadian people under our Constitution. We may differ from our friends opposite in our view as to the best method for ensuring the enjoyment of those rights, but we differ not one iota in our belief that these rights are part of our Canadian heritage and are the birthright of all Canadians and must remain so.

Much oratory and many thousands of words have been expended here, and in other places, by those who would attempt to justify the unilateral proceeding to Westminster to seek, not—I have no hesitation in saying—true amendment of our Constitution but, in effect, a rewriting of our Constitution, which means that the Constitution we have enjoyed, the nature of our country and the nature of our federation will, to all intents and purposes, have been destroyed once these changes are made.

No one—I repeat, no one—has been able to give a satisfactory explanation of why it is wrong for a member of the House of Commons or of the Senate of Canada to have a free and unfettered opportunity to effect the shaping of the future Constitution of this country, while a member of the British House of Commons—who certainly is not likely to have been born in Canada, who may never have even seen Canada and who, throughout his lifetime, may have no interest whatever in the internal workings of the Government of Canada or of the welfare and wellbeing of the people of Canada—should sit in Parliament at Westminster and have the final and deciding say as to the form the Constitution of this country shall take for the time to come.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe: We have been told that a constitutional convention is not a constitutional convention; that a confederation is not a confederation; that the constitutional rights which we were all brought up and taught to believe are ours are, in fact, in the words of Senator Deschatelets, only an illusion. I am asked to reach the conclusion that all of the constitutional propositions taught to me in my law school days are invalid, those propositions which I heard supported and advanced during the experience I shared with Senator Connolly of attendance at constitutional conferences during the '60s. By the way, when Lester Pearson was Prime Minister, Senator Connolly never espoused the point of view he has advanced in this debate. I was, reluctantly, being drawn to the conclusion that no credence should be given to the constitutional views of Keith, Dicey, or Dawson and all the others, whose writings were once advanced to me as being the distilled essence of constitutional wisdom.

At that point, I was fortunate enough to turn to that great old classic, Alice in Wonderland, by Lewis Carroll. In an effort to seek relaxation from the mental strain to which I had been subjected in endeavouring to follow this constitutional debate, I took the opportunity to renew my acquaintace with Alice. In the description of the table conversation at the Mad Hatter's tea party, I found the same attitude towards the use of words that was causing me so much mystification in attempting to follow the arguments of my honourable friends opposite.

Let me read to you a brief extract. After Alice had said to the Hatter that he should learn not to make personal remarks, because it was very rude, the Hatter opened his eyes very wide. But all he said was:

> "Why is a raven like a writing-desk?"
> "Come, we shall have some fun now!" thought Alice.
> "I'm glad they've begun asking riddles—I believe I can guess that," she added aloud.

[Senator Donahoe.]

> "Do you mean that you think you can find out the answer to it?" said the March Hare.
> "Exactly so," said Alice.
> "Then you should say what you mean," the March Hare went on.
> "I do, " Alice hastily replied; "at least—at least I mean what I say—that's the same thing, you know."
> "Not the same thing a bit!" said the Hatter. "Why, you might just as well say that 'I see what I eat' is the same thing as 'I eat what I see'!"
> "You might just as well say," added the March Hare, "that 'I like what I get' is the same thing as 'I get what I like'!"
> "You might just as well say," added the Dormouse, who seemed to be talking in his sleep, "that 'I breathe when I sleep' is the same thing as 'I sleep when I breathe'!"
> "It is the same thing with you," said the Hatter; and here the conversation dropped, and the party sat silent for a minute, while Alice thought over all she could remember about ravens and writing-desks, which wasn't much.

Further on, in the description of the trial of the Knave of Hearts for having stolen the Queen's tarts, I found a sentence or two which seemed to me to describe exactly the technique being employed by the government of this country in order to advance its constitutional proposal. I quote them as follows:

> "Let the jury consider their verdict"—the King said, for the twentieth time that day.
> "No, No!"—said the Queen. "Sentence first, verdict afterward."
> "Stuff and nonsense!" said Alice loudly.—"The idea of having the sentence first!"
> "Hold your tongue"—said the Queen, turning purple.
> "I won't!" said Alice.
> "Off with her head!"—the Queen shouted at the top of her voice. Nobody moved.

Do you think that my quotation from Alice in Wonderland is a little far-fetched, a little silly? Perhaps you do. I should give you some illustrations of why I feel that it is apropos the debate that is going on at present.

On February 23 this year, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, Mr. Allan MacEachen, made a speech in Nova Scotia and is reported to have said that the provinces are "attempting to alter federalism." This, in face of the fact of what is going on in the country. This, in face of the Trudeau-Chrétien effort to put one point of view forward, cause it to become the law of the land, and to override and ignore the rights of the provinces in this Confederation and to deny them any say as to what the ultimate result should be.

In case you have any doubt that Mr. MacEachen was talking through his hat, let me quote a further part of his speech in which he was attempting to say that the constitutional proposals were not solely the idea of Mr. Trudeau. He said:

> That is not so, it is the will of the Liberal Party, the Cabinet, the caucus and the people that is expressed in the patriation package . . . and not the will of one man.

That the will of one man is endorsed by the Liberal Party, by the cabinet, by the caucus, I am afraid that I must reluctantly agree; but that the people endorse it—I do not agree and I do not believe that such is the case, and I do not think that anyone who is at all in tune with the feeling of the country today believes it either.

Everyone knows that the Liberal Party sold its soul, not once but twice, to have Pierre Trudeau at its head. When the Liberal Party, or the Liberal cabinet, or the Liberal caucus speaks, they may be heard through different voices, but in this matter the words and thoughts advanced are those of only one man: Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

● (1510)

Senator Flynn: Right.

Senator Donahoe: In still another part of his speech, Mr. MacEachen says:

> This country is more than 10 provinces . . . it is not a community of communities . . . the Government of Canada is not an agent of the provinces.

Whoever said it was?

Senator Thériault: Joe Clark.

Senator Donahoe: No, he didn't. I will come to that. If the Government of Canada is not an agent of the provinces, still less are the provinces the creation of the Government of Canada. Municipal governments, great and important as some of them are, are the creation of the provincial governments; but the provincial governments themselves bear in no sense the same relationship to Canada as the municipalities bear to the provinces, although I very much fear that that is the way in which Mr. MacEachen conceives the relationship.

If honourable senators think that the Alice in Wonderland comparison is far-fetched and ridiculous, let me quote a few words from a speech made by the Minister of Labour, Gerald Regan, as they are reported in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of March 3, 1981:

> "Because as a government we moved to end 50 years of deadlock on patriation [Mr. Clark] contended that we have given up on the federal system. He [Mr. Clark] argued that we should not have done that, that the federal system has not failed, that we should meet and listen to the premiers disagree among themselves for another 50 years or longer to achieve unanimity" . . .
> "What the opposition leader [Mr. Clark] does not understand," Mr. Regan said, "is that the federal system has not failed. It is unanimity which has failed."

Well, if for the time being unanimity is part of the federal system—and I believe it to be, because that is exactly what Mr. Trudeau says it is; he says it is inconvenient for him; he says he won't put up with it; he says he can't stand it; he says he can't have his own way because of unanimity, but he recognizes that unanimity is there as a part of our system—then the proper way to describe the whole thing would be not that unanimity has failed but that the Minister of Labour's powers of reasoning have failed; and just to prove that they have, I will give honourable senators one further quotation from the minister's remarks:

> "Clearly Mr. Clark has the wrong vision of Canada", he [Mr. Regan] said. "No other federal nation in the world expects or requires unanimity in order to achieve change, and neither does Canada."

Perhaps I could agree with him if he were prepared to say: "And neither should Canada"; but surely he must admit that Canada, in its present state, does require unanimity. It is exactly because Mr. Trudeau has been unable to achieve unanimity that he says he will disregard the necessity for it and will proceed on a unilateral course to rewrite our Constitution.

Speaking of the failure of unanimity, I say that in 1980 that failure was not a true failure but a contrived one. Arbitrary deadlines were imposed, and then conditions were inserted into the federal proposal which, by their very nature and their mode of presentation, ensured that it would be impossible to secure consent for them.

In a speech in this house before those dominion-provincial meetings were held—I am old-fashioned; I keep saying "dominion-provincial"—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe: I am glad that I have approval, in some quarters, at least—Senator Murray spoke and indicated that to him the arrangements had all the appearances of a setup designed to invite failure, thereby providing an excuse for the unilateral action which the Prime Minister had said he was prepared to take if unanimity was not forthcoming by his self-imposed deadlines.

Senator Murray's remarks at the time were the cause of some resentment on the opposite side of this chamber; but when the meetings were held, when the Kirby documents were made public, when the government took the course of action, in the penultimate stage of which we are now engaged, it then became abundantly clear that Senator Murray's assessment and suspicions were not mere figments of his imagination but were, in fact, the cold, distasteful truth.

Speaking of truth, it is not truth to say that there have been constant and unremitting efforts to secure agreement on a policy of patriation with an amending formula for more than 50 years, as the Prime Minister and so many of his supporters have endeavoured to say and would like the people of Canada to believe. Nearly all of the earlier meetings that were held with respect to the amendment of the Constitution directed their attention to ways and means of dividing the allocated powers under sections 91 and 92.

Senator Deschatelets made a thoughtful and helpful contribution to this debate. He is reported, at page 1963 of Senate Hansard for March 5, 1981 as saying:

> Everyone is free to interpret events as he or she sees fit. As far as I am concerned, it is only in 1960 or 1961 that > we discussed in committee, for the first time at the parliamentary level, the problem of patriation, of an amending formula, and a charter of rights, and in a way which, I must admit, was most superficial.

Later, on the same page, he said:

> It is in 1964, if I remember right, when my late colleague the Honourable Guy Favreau became Minister of Justice, that the patriation proposal, with an amending formula, was officially put forward. That formula became known as the "Fulton-Favreau Formula".
> That was in 1964-65, still far away from any acute constitutional crisis, even though the process of constitutional change was not only slow but painful. In the following years confrontation became more frequent. But I do not believe—> —that even today there can be any reference to any emergency threatening the security of the state, because otherwise the support of the people would be obvious. And this is not the case now.

It is Senator Deschatelets speaking, not I.

We are told that the urgency in connection with this constitutional package arises from the fact that the province of Quebec, in the course of Mr. Lévesque's referendum, was promised by Mr. Trudeau that there would come out of their voting for the federal system a renewal of that system.

May I go on record, here and now, as saying that if Mr. Trudeau had been honest with the people of Quebec, and had disclosed to them the nature of the renewal which he proposed to advance, then the result of the referendum might have been very different indeed, because the changes he now proposes to the shape of our Constitution do violence to all those things in our Constitution which have had the greatest significance over the years for the people of the province of Quebec—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Donahoe: —and the machinery is being set in place to deprive them of some of their most cherished rights.

To return to Mr. Regan, let me tell honourable senators that as he proceeds in his attempt to downgrade the qualities and abilities of Mr. Clark as Prime Minister, he succeeds fully in showing that the true relationship between federal Canada and the provinces of Canada, that was created by the British North America Act, is beyond his understanding, just as fully and as much as it is beyond the understanding of the Minister of Finance.

● (1520)

Speaking of Mr. Clark, there are those who would say, and have said, that he was wrong on Jerusalem and, for that reason, he was not fit to be Prime Minister of Canada. May I simply say that if I were given the choice between a Prime Minister who was right on Jerusalem and wrong on Canada, and one who was wrong on Jerusalem and right on Canada, I would much prefer the second to the first.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Donahoe.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): And at least 60 per cent agree with you.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I was much impressed with the quality and tone of the splendid address delivered to us the other day by Senator Connolly. At page 2041 of Hansard of March 12, we find these comments:

> I begin by saying that every independent country worthy of the name should control its own destiny. To do that it becomes imperative for it to control its basic law, its constitution, and to control it completely. From its constitution flow the principles that establish a country's government, its society, its economy, and its external relations. Therefore, it alone can determine the appropriate extent of constitutional change needed to meet its own emerging circumstances.

These are noble sentiments, nobly expressed. There is not a senator in this house who cannot or will not endorse and support them. But, surely, in order for them to have the meaning and construction which Senator Connolly goes on to give to them, it is necessary to remember that he is justifying and approving the placing of our constitutional needs before the Parliament at Westminster. It is necessary, to understand the meaning of what he has said, to interpret the word "country," because his opening words were "every independent country worthy of the name". I submit that in order to make the arguments which Senator Connolly proceeded to make, he has to construe the word "country" in his own speech as meaning Canada without its provinces.

Surely, this country should have the right to amend its own Constitution. Equally surely, this country is more than the federal government alone, because the federal government exists only because those original partners in Confederation were prepared to yield a portion of their sovereignty to create it. Some portion of it, however, they retained, and, in their respective jurisdictions and fields, the provinces are as sovereign as the federal government is in its field.

It has always been argued and suggested that we, on this side of the house, in some way are opposed to having a strong central government. Not so. We Nova Scotians, in particular, recognized that a strong central government was essential if the confederation was to be a great nation, and we have never wavered in that belief. However, we do not believe that to have a strong central government it is necessary to eliminate or emasculate the provincial governments so as to render them mere adjuncts to the federal chariot.

May I ask honourable senators to remember that as we participate in this debate we are functioning as the upper house of a bicameral parliament? Since I have no doubt that everyone will agree that that is a self-evident proposition, I would ask honourable senators to consider why there is a Senate. Having reflected upon that question, I would ask them to consider one further question: Why are we sitting here as members of that Senate?

My answer to the first question—as to why there is a Senate at all—is very simple and straightforward. I believe there is a Senate because without it Canada could not have been brought into being in 1867. The provinces, and particularly the smaller ones, were apprehensive that their claims, their position and their interests might be overwhelmed in an elective House of Commons where they would be such a small numerical proportion. They conceived the Senate as a place in which their hopes and aspirations could be brought forward before a deliberative and legislative body in which it was guaranteed that their representation would never fall below a certain level and in which, in proportion to the entire membership, their representation would always be capable of making itself heard and felt in unmistakable terms.

I am convinced that, without the insertion of the device of the Senate in our constitutional framework, there never could have been a Canada, because I cannot conceive the provincial representatives of that day agreeing to a Constitution which did not have in it what they conceived to be the safeguards for their rights and position which they believed were assured by the creation of the Senate.

As reported in Senate Hansard of April 17, 1980, at page 62, in the course of his splendid address on the nature and function of the Senate, Senator Connolly said:

> Most of the schemes for Senate reform have centred around the idea that this house should have a higher profile in the area of regional representation. With that we can agree.

He went on to say:

> However, that view must be balanced against the representation which the regions of this country have in the House of Commons, in the cabinet, in the provincial legislatures, and at the federal-provincial conference.

I take "regional" to mean "provincial" and, like Senator Connolly, I agree that the Senate is not the sole spokesman for the provinces, and that there has to be balanced against such a view the voice the provinces have in the cabinet, in the provincial legislatures and at the federal-provincial conference. But when we find ourselves in a situation where the cabinet is prepared to approve a position which, in effect, means that the provinces have no rights in the matter of the Constitution, where the views of the provincial legislatures are ignored, and where the federal-provincial conference, having spoken out in clear and unequivocal terms as to its opposition to the federal proposal, is totally ignored and brushed to one side, and a unilateral course of action, such as the one being followed here, is adopted, in such circumstances I should have thought that Senator Connolly would agree with me that at that point—at that point, if ever—the need for the Senate to accept its responsibility with respect to representation of the provinces and of the provinces' rights should have become pressing and paramount. But, to my dismay, he chose instead to follow the party line. He had a good precedent for his course of action in the person of the senator in this house who rose in this debate to state his position on the government's proposal. He indicated that he found procedures being followed repugnant and distasteful, so repugnant and distasteful that he made it clear that the whole procedure created a bad odour in his nostrils. Then, having said that and having asserted his independence from direction or pressure, he indicated with a true demonstration of independence and spirit that he was proposing to hold his nose and vote for the whole mess.

Why are we here in the Senate? In my view, we are here for the express purpose of defending the provinces from improper incursions into their position and field of authority by the federal authority. Mr. Trudeau has no belief in value of the Senate. He would abolish it at a moment's notice, if he could have his own way in the matter.

Throughout the years, opponents of the Senate have criticized it on a variety of grounds: because it is not elective; because it is too readily acquiescent to the wishes of the other house; and because it serves no useful purpose. Now here, in the Year of our Lord 1981, we have before us a perfect opportunity—a golden opportunity—for the Senate to demonstrate that it has meaning and purpose. If it fails to accept the position that it is honour-bound to preserve the character and quality of this nation, then I say that Mr. Trudeau is right: the Senate is useless; the Senate deserves to be abolished; and we, who sit in it, have been recreant to the trust imposed upon us by those who framed and formed the confederation which has served as a vehicle to bring this country to its present point of greatness.

I have been uplifted and inspired by the evidence of adherence to high principle demonstrated by those members on the other side who have risen to say that they propose to vote against this proposal. All of them have been lifelong supporters of the government party; all of them have supported the party loyally. It is patently obvious that to oppose it now causes each of them considerable personal anguish; but reason and justice have prevailed in their minds, and conviction and conscience have brought them to the position they have adopted. I commend them and applaud them, and pray that their valiant example may be infectious and that others on that side may be similarly moved.

In the course of the work of the joint committee, there emerged two amendments to clause 44 of the original proposal to which I must refer. This clause, in its original form, was as follows:

> An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation under subsection 41(1) or section 43 without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within ninety days after the passage by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not passed such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of those ninety days, the House of Commons again passes the resolution, but any period when Parliament is prorogued or dissolved shall not be counted in computing those ninety days.

This clause does not appear in the amended form of the proposal: It has gone; it has disappeared. It did not, however, simply drop out of sight; it went by gradual stages. Some time after the committee began to function, a proposition was advanced by the government which was essentially the same as the original clause 44, but they thought it might be appropriate to say that, instead of waiting only 90 days, they might wait twice as long: they decided that they might wait 180 days, after which period the voice of this chamber would no longer be heard in the land, or, having been heard, it could be totally disregarded and they could then proceed.

In the draft that is before us now, that proposal too has disappeared. It has gone, and gone completely. That clause, as originally proposed, would have given a 90-day suspensive veto to the Senate in place of the co-equal legislative position it now holds with the House of Commons. Suddenly, the Minister of Justice announced that he would agree to the suspensive veto being increased to 180 days, and then, still later, he announced that he was prepared to accept the status quo and leave the Senate with full power to reject any legislation which it thinks proper to reject.

This was hailed as a great concession to the Senate—nay, it was hailed as a great concession to those senators who were alledged to oppose the government proposal; and certainly the news media described it as a bribe to win back the support of the dissidents.

Now, I do not know if such a group ever existed, nor do I know what prompted Mr. Chrétien to backtrack on his original position, but I do know that if there is, among us, any senator so base as to allow this so-called concession to influence his opinion on the acceptability of the package, then he deserves to remain in the Senate long enough to see Mr. Trudeau succeed in abolishing it; and I can tell him that, on that occasion, Mr. Trudeau will have my full support and my vote.

Honourable senators, I love Canada. I love my native province of Nova Scotia. I believe our Confederation has justified its existence and has allowed us to grow towards greatness through the years since 1867.

I do not believe that our Constitution is incapable of improvement. I do believe that, faced with a fresh division of powers in 1981, adjustments are required in the allocation of those powers to conform to developments unknown and unforeseen in 1867. But I believe passionately that those changes should be made in Canada, by Canadians, with the participation of all components of our nation—the federal government, the provincial governments, and the people of Canada. Only on such a foundation can we build a strong and enduring union for the future.

I beg of you to join me in rejecting the proposal before us, for the sake of our beloved Canada.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Croll, debate adjourned.

APPENDIX "A"

(See p. 2110)

THE CONSTITUTION

CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND EXCLUSION OF ILLEGALLY OBTAINED EVIDENCE

In his article in the Globe and Mail of March 11, 1981, Mr. Roderick McLeod, speaking for the Canadian Association of Crown Counsel, contends that the provision in the Charter of Rights (clause 24(2)) empowering the courts to exclude illegally obtained evidence in certain circumstances will result in the adoption by Canadian courts of the American rule of automatic exclusion of illegally obtained evidence. This is simply not the case.

In the United States, the doctrine of excluding evidence obtained in contravention of the U.S. Bill of Rights (protection against unreasonable searches and seizures and the right to remain silent in the absence of counsel) has been developed by Courts as an absolute rule designed to prevent law enforcement officers from violating a constitutionally protected right of individuals. The rule operates automatically in every case regardless of how minor the breach of the right and regardless of whether the admission of the evidence would cast doubt on the integrity of the administration of justice. This is why, in the Williams case referred to by Mr. McLeod, the accused was set free even though on the facts of that case there did not appear to be a serious breach of his constitutional rights.

The situation in Canada, under the proposed provisions of clause 24(2) of the Charter, would be rather different. Clause 24(2) provides that a court shall exclude evidence obtained in contravention of a Charter right (eg., by an illegal search or seizure or by evidence obtained from an accused who has been denied counsel) only where it is established, having regard to all the circumstances, that admission of the evidence would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

Consequently there would be no rule of automatic exclusion of illegally obtained evidence. The accused would have to establish to the satisfaction of the court that the illegality of the manner in which the evidence was obtained was of such a serious nature that using it would bring the administration of justice into disrepute. The circumstances which the court would consider in reaching a decision would include

(a) the extent to which human dignity and social values were breached in obtaining the evidence;

(b) the seriousness of the case;

(c) the importance of the evidence;

(d) whether the harm to the accused was inflicted wilfully or not; and

(e) whether there were circumstances justifying the illegal action, such as a situation of urgency where the evidence would have been destroyed or lost.

In other words, the underlying principles of the proposed Charter "exclusionary rule" are two-fold.

> (1) to ensure a proper balance between effective law enforcement activities and the fair administration of justice
> (2) to avoid the court becoming parties to activities which are serious violations of Charter rights.

By providing the test of "bringing the administration of justice into disrepute", we are clearly signalling to the courts that we do not want the adoption of the automatic and absolute exclusionary rule of the United States, but one which operates to curtail the use of evidence where it has been obtained in flagrant violation of Charter rights.

Mr. McLeod quotes the dissenting opinion of Chief Justice Burger in the Williams case which condemns the absolute exclusion rule. This is, of course, the position of the Chief Justice because of the fact that the rule is automatic and absolute, being applied without regard to the seriousness of the breach. As the Chief Justice noted in the Bivens case (1971), he is opposed to the U.S. rule because it represents a "mechanically inflexible response to widely varying degrees of police error". The proposed Canadian rule would allow for flexibility in determining when the breach of rights was serious enough to justify excluding illegally obtained evidence.

Mr. McLeod also asserts that the best means to ensure that the police observe the rights of persons is by "before-the-fact direction" or subsequent prosecution or disciplinary action for illegal conduct. The simple fact is that, even if such ex post facto action occurs, it is of little solace to the person whose rights have been infringed. As Laskin, J. remarked in his dissenting judgment in Hogan v. The Queen (1975):

> Illegalities or improprieties attending the eliciting or discovery of relevant evidence are, on the orthodox common law view, res inter alios acta. They are said to have their sanction in separate criminal or civil proceedings, of which there is little evidence, either as to recourse or effectiveness; or, perhaps, in internal disciplinary proceedings against offending constables, a matter on which there is no reliable data in this country.

Laskin then went on to observe with respect to constitutionally protected rights:

> It may be said that the exclusion of relevant evidence is no way to control illegal police practices and that such exclusion merely allows a wrongdoer to escape conviction. Yet where constitutional guarantees are concerned, the more pertinent consideration is whether those guarantees, as fundamentals of the particular society, should be at the mercy of law enforcement officers and a blind eye turned to their invasion because it is more important to secure a conviction. The contention that it is the duty of the Courts to get at the truth has in it too much of the philosophy of the end justifying the means; it would equally challenge the present law as to confessions and other out-of-Court statements by an accused. In the United States, its Supreme Court, after weighing over many years whether other methods than exclusion of evidence should be invoked to deter illegal searches and seizures in state as well as in federal prosecutions, concluded that the constitutional guarantees could best be upheld by a rule of exclusion.

As for the propriety of the courts using the test of bringing the administration of justice into disrepute as a basis for excluding illegally obtained evidence, Chief Justice Cartwright and Justices Spence and Hall, dissenting in The Queen v. Wray (1970), were clearly of the opinion that this was a primary duty of the courts. As Mr. Justice Spence remarked:

I am most strongly of the opinion that it is the duty of every judge to guard against bringing the administration of justice into disrepute. That is a duty which lies upon him constantly and that is a duty which he must always keep firmly in mind. The proper discharge of this duty is one which, in the present day of almost riotous disregard for the administration of justice, is of paramount importance to the continued life of the state.

In the present case, the confession or statement of the accused and also the information given by the accused as to where the weapon could be found, as Aylesworth J. A. pointed out, were procured by trickery, duress and improper inducements and they were clearly inadmissible. Moreover, as the Chief Justice of this Court has indicated in his reasons the purpose of exercise of such trickery was stated by the Inspector of the Provincial Police to avoid taking a chance that the accused, as the result of speaking to his lawyer, would not take the police to the place where the gun was found.

Under these circumstances, I am in agreement with the Chief Justice when he characterized the description of the situation by the Court of Appeal as not any overstatement.

I am of the opinion that were the trial judge to have, as he very properly did, excluded as inadmissible the statement of the accused and yet have permitted the Crown to have adduced all the evidence as to the accused's accompanying the police officers and pointing out to them the place where the weapon had been thrown away, in accordance with the information which he had given to them in the excluding statement, it would not only have brought the administration of justice into disrepute but it would have been a startling disregard of the principle of British criminal law, nemo tenetur seipsum accusare. Surely no authority need be stated to establish that as the most basis principle in our criminal law.

Mr. McLeod also expresses concerns about the manner in which the government changed its position between July 1980 and February 1981 on how to deal with the exclusionary rule in the Charter. The simple fact is that the government was searching for a provision that would strike a proper balance between the absolute and automatic exclusionary rule of the United States and the common law rule in Canada which (with the exception of involuntary confessions) allows the admissibility of relevant evidence even when it has been obtained by illegal or improper means.

In this regard, the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution received submissions from many groups that Mr. McLeod characterizes as "misinformed special-interest lobby groups" which advocated some provision that would permit courts to exclude illegally obtained evidence in proper cases. These groups included bodies such as the Canadian Bar Association, the B.C. Civil Liberties Association, the National Association of Women and the Law and the Canadian Civil Liberties Association. The only groups before the Committee advocating the maintenance of the existing evidence rule was the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police and the Canadian Association of Crown Counsel.

Finally, in response to the specific questions that Mr. McLeod poses in his article, the following might be said.

1. The Charter is not adopting the U.S. exclusionary rule, but a test which will require the accused to show that admission of illegally obtained evidence would, in all the circumstances, bring the administration of justice into disrepute. There is nothing automatic or absolute about this rule.

2. The results in the Williams case would not occur under the proposed Charter rule since admitting Williams' statement would not have brought the administration of justice into disrepute.

3. Both disciplinary actions against the police and the prospect to excluding evidence in cases of flagrant violations of rights by the police are considered necessary to ensure respect for civil liberties.

4. The Supreme Court will develop interpretations of the new exclusionary rule which will establish guidelines for the lower courts and Crown counsel for determining when evidence is inadmissible.

5. While the Task Force on Evidence may be recommending against the U.S. exclusionary rule, that is not the rule which is being adopted in the Charter. The rule adopted in the Charter is the same as that proposed by the Canada Law Reform Commission in its Report on Evidence in 1975.

6. The wording of the proposed exclusionary rule is not inconsistent with any provision of the U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights which does not deal with admissibility of evidence.

7. The report of the McDonald Commission on the R.C.M.P. is not relevant to rules relating to admissibility of evidence.

8. The suggestion that rapists will be turned loose in the streets despite their guilt because of a technical error by the police is nonsense, since the test for exclusion in the Charter would not apply to minor breaches of the Charter rights.

9. The government's flexibility in the development of the exclusionary rule is simply an illustration of its desire to develop the best Charter possible, taking into account the views of the groups who appeared before the Committee and the members of the Committee themselves.

In sum, clause 24(2) of the Charter seeks to strike a proper balance between the interests of the effective administration of justice and the interest of the fair administration of justice.

Attempts by the police and Crown counsel to create in the minds of the Canadian public fears that the exclusionary rule will turn our cities into havens for criminals who would otherwise be behind bars is to do a serious disservice. The proposed rule is not the same as the exclusionary rule in the United States and should not be held forth as such.

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)

March 19, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981, were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, March 5, 1981, examined the said Supplementary Estimates (C) and reports as follows:

(1) The Committee was authorized by the Senate as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of March 5, 1981 to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981.

(2) In obedience to the foregoing, your Committee examined the Supplementary Estimates (C) and heard evidence from the following officials from the Program Branch of the Treasury Board: Mr. H. J. Mullington, Assistant Secretary; Mr. L. J. O'Toole, Assistant Secretary; Mr. E. R. Stimpson, Director General, Budget Co-ordination Group.

(3) These Supplementary Estimates (C) total $1,630 million. The budgetary expenditures total $1,222 million of which $97 million are statutory items and $1,124 million represent funds for which Parliament is being asked to provide new authority. The non-budgetary expenses, that is to say, loans, investments, and advances include $32 million to be voted and $376 million for statutory items. The total Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981 are now increased to $62,070 million.

(4) Treasury Board supplied the Committee with a list giving additional explanations for the $1 Votes included in Supplementary Estimates (C) which is attached as an Appendix to this Report.

(5) The Committee would like to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from Mr. O'Toole of the Treasury Board Secretariat in which the position of the Treasury Board with respect to the use of $1 votes in supplementary estimates is confirmed. For information, a copy of this letter is also appended to this report.

(6) The Committee will be provided with additional information regarding the write-off of loans to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited with regard to its heavy water facilities. However, the Committee was informed that these loans are presently considered uncollectable but should the plants become profitable then in effect the loans would be repaid through revenue recovery.

(7) With regard to CIDA expenditures the witnesses assured the Committee that previous difficulties with respect to delays between the provision of spending authorities and actual expenditures by the Agency had been rectified. No present authorizations in respect of CIDA are of the non-lapsing variety.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT,
Chairman.

ADDITIONAL EXPLANATION

CATEGORY D

Finance

Vote 18c—To authorize the Minister to issue non-interest bearing non-negotiable demand notes in an amount not exceeding $11.5 million, in respect of Canada's commitment to the Sixth Replenishment of the International Development Association (I.D.A.).

Explanation—Canada has made a commitment to I.D.A. totalling $601.810 million which is to be paid over the next few years. Supplementary Estimates (B), 1980-81 authorized the issue of demand notes in an amount not exceeding $165.9 million in respect to this commitment.

These Supplementary Estimates will authorize further demand notes for 1980-81 of not more than $11.5 million. This requirement arises because of the accelerated needs of the I.D.A. The funds are used by the World Bank to provide loans to the least developed countries for developmental purposes.

Industry, Trade and Commerce

Vote 7c—To authorize the guarantee of loans to the de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Limited in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate of $450 million.

Explanation—It is proposed to guarantee loans to this firm for additional financing in the development of the DASH 8 aircraft, for other general obligations and to replace a $70 million Letter of Comfort issued by the Minister on December 24, 1976 in respect of the DASH 7.

Vote 8c—To authorize the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to guarantee 62.5% of the investment by designated purchasers of a prescribed security of Massey-Ferguson Limited and 62.5% of unpaid eligible returns on investment up to an aggregate amount not exceeding $130 million.

Explanation—It is proposed to guarantee directly or indirectly in co-operation with Ontario the capital risk of a $200 million Massey-Ferguson Limited security plus the value of any eligible return on the investment unpaid by the Company. Canada's portion of the guarantee would be 62.5% with the Province of Ontario providing the remainder.

Transport

Vote 92c—To authorize the entering into of agreements with the Canadian National Railway Company (C.N.R.) for the conducting of a Testing and Evaluation Program on the Newfoundland railway operations and for the payment in 1980-81 of $8 million to the Company.

Explanation—Authority is requested for the Canadian National Railway to conduct a Testing and Evaluation program which will look at options for the improvement of the railway system in Newfoundland.

Approval is also requested to provide a payment of $8 million to the C.N.R. as the 1980-81 cost of the program. These funds will be used to cover studies ($2 million) and to compensate the Railway for the cost of retaining employees ($6 million) who would be redundant if the evaluation were not being carried out.

ADDITIONAL EXPLANATION

CATEGORY E

—Authorize a reimbursement of a Wheat Board Pool Account

Industry, Trade and Commerce

Vote 56c—To authorize the reimbursement of the Canadian Wheat Board for the 1979-80 Oats Pool Account deficit.

Explanation—The Canadian Wheat Board incurred a deficit of $830,000 in its operation of the 1979-80 Oats Pool Account. This deficit is the result of sales made early in the crop year when prices were lower; and higher costs from cancellation of shipments due to the prairie drought and the producers consequently withholding deliveries in late spring and summer of 1980.

The Canadian Wheat Board is responsible for the export marketing of Oats grown in the prairie provinces and Peace River district of British Columbia. The Federal Government is responsible for any deficit incurred in this and any other Canadian Wheat Board Pool Account. This is the seventh time such a deficit has occurred.

—Amend a previous Appropriation Act

Agriculture

Vote 25c—To authorize the termination of a loan guarantee for Canfarm.

Explanation—In Supplementary Estimates (A), 1979-80, the Government of Canada guaranteed a loan obtained by Canfarm from the private sector.

A $3.5 million contribution is being made to Canfarm to assist in paying back its loan. Funds for this purpose are available within the program because of reduced requirements for drought assistance.

It is therefore proposed in these Supplementary Estimates to terminate the guarantee authority obtained in 1979-80.

—Increase borrowing authority and authorize the transfer of an asset

Energy, Mines and Resources—Eldorado Nuclear Limited

Vote L107c—Authority is requested to:

a) Increase the borrowing limit of the Corporation from $130 million to $280 million;

b) utilize this authority for debt repayment and working capital by the issue and sale of securities; and

c) to transfer from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to Eldorado Nuclear Limited the title of the Uranium Stockpile in exchange for the issue to the Minister of shares valued at $300 million.

Explanation—Eldorado Nuclear Limited requires parliamentary authority to increase and extend its borrowing authority. The Corporation has already used $80 million of the present borrowing authority of $130 million. Since the net 1981 capital requirements total some $200 million, the borrowing limit must be increased to finance this program.

In addition, it is proposed to transfer a Uranium stockpile, with a current market value of $300 million, to the Corporation. This stockpile while improving the Corporations debt to equity ratio would also provide cash flow as the Uranium is sold, over the next decade. The value of this stockpile is listed as $76 million in the Accounts of Canada, being the original cost of production. The Minister will receive $200 million of preferred shares and $100 million of common shares from the Corporation in consideration of the transfer of the stockpile asset.

The change in the borrowing limit has always been effected by Appropriation Acts as follows:

Appropriation Act No. 4, 1977-78—authorized the borrowing of up to $30 million from the private market.

Appropriation Act No. 3, 1980-81—increased the authority from $30 million to $130 million.

—Ratify payments made in previous fiscal years

Transport

Vote 36c—To ratify the application of appropriations by the Atlantic Pilotage Authority in the amount of $368,084 between 1972-73 and 1979-80 for deficits in fiscal years other than that cited in each appropriation.

Explanation—During the audit of the Authority's financial statements it was noted that in some years the actual deficit was lower than the amount forecast and the payment approved by Parliament. Conversely the opposite appeared in other years where the deficit was larger than the amount forecasted. (The Authority used the overpayment in one year to reduce the deficits in other years). The net difference in all years, taking into account the overpayment of appropriations of $368,084, would be a requirement for a further appropriation of $1,774 which is being absorbed by the Authority. The purpose of this item is to ratify the use by the Authority of overpayments of appropriated deficits in certain years to offset the underpayment in other years.

—Authorize an increased pension

Solicitor General

Vote 5c—To authorize the payment of a pension to the survivors of a deceased penitentiary officer at the same rate as members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Explanation—It is proposed to provide an increased pension to the family of a penitentiary service officer (W. A. Morrison), who was killed during an uprising at Dorchester Maximum Security Institution. The increased pension would be equal to that payable under the R.C.M.P. Superannuation Act to survivors of families of officers killed in similar circumstances.

The family now qualifies for a pension under the Government Employees Compensation Act. It is proposed to deem the penitentiary officer's family to qualify for a pension equivalent to one paid under the R.C.M.P. Act. The difference between the pensions will be paid by Correctional Services.

Similar provisions were made in 1964-65 (Supplementary Estimates A and B), 1975-76 (Supplementary Estimates A) and 1979-80 (Supplementary Estimates A).

Chairman,

National Finance,
The Senate,

RE: $1 Votes in Supplementary Estimates

Dear Senator Everett:

When I appeared before the Committee on November 8, 1979, I outlined the operating position of Treasury Board Canada with respect to $1 Votes in Supplementary Estimates and agreed at the time to confirm this in a letter to you. I should mention, as I did then, that this has been agreed to by Ministers of the Treasury Board.

Our position is that $1 Votes will continue to be used for the following cases.

1. Transfer of Budgetary Funds between Votes and Programs of the Same Department—to provide operating flexibility consistent with the accountability of the heads of departments and agencies.
2. New and increased Grants—since Parliamentary authority is required for new and increased grants even when funds are available within the vote.
3. Deletion of Debts—the Financial Administration Act requires that the deletion of operating debts in excess of $5 thousand be approved by Parliament although no additional funds as such may be required.
4. Amendment of Previous Appropriation Acts—to effect changes to previous votes authorized through Appropriation Acts. (e.g. increasing limits for Revolving Funds).
5. Other—to provide financially-oriented authority in instances where separate legislation would not appear to be warranted (e.g. to authorize guarantees or to deem an individual to come within the ambit of existing legislation).

The Committee is known to be particularly interested in the following specific instances from among the many situations where the $1 Vote would not be considered acceptable.

1. Transfer of Budgetary Funds between Departments and Agencies—since this is not concerned with operating flexibility. It should be mentioned, however, that such transfers would be acceptable if there was a related transfer of a function during the fiscal year.
2. Transfer of Non-Budgetary Funds—because of the specific nature of each non-budgetary vote.
3. Amendment of Existing Legislation (other than Appropriation Acts)—since the relevant Act should normally be amended.

As I told the Committee on November 8, 1979, exceptions to these ground rules might be agreed to by the Government from time to time because of factors arising in particular cases and for which the Government would be expected to furnish an adequate explanation to Parliament.

Yours sincerely,

L. J. O'TOOLE

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

RECOMMENDED GRAIN AND OIL SEED ACREAGES—SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before Question Period, I should like to rule on the point of order that Senator Asselin raised last week.

[English]

On Wednesday, March 18, as found at pages 2093 to 2096 of Debates of the Senate, Senator Buckwold asked a question of the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, the Honourable Senator Argue, regarding his recommendations pertaining to grain and oil seed acreages. The minister replied with a lengthy answer. The Honourable Senator Asselin raised a point of order that it is the right of the official opposition to receive an advance copy of all ministers' statements in order to be able to comment on them. Senator Argue replied that he was only answering a question and was reading "not from a prepared statement, but from a table".

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Extensive notes.

The Hon. the Speaker: The Minister of State for Economic Development, the Honourable Senator Olson, raised the point that "the statement that Senator Argue made today was made earlier in Saskatoon, and was carried in the press all across that part of the country" and was therefore not a new statement. The Leader of the Opposition maintained that it was a ministerial statement and asked the Chair to rule on what Senator Asselin referred to as a point of order.

The Leader of the Opposition drew the attention of honourable senators to Rule 1 of the Rules of the Senate which states:

> In all cases not provided for in these rules, the customs, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof.

He stated that if Senator Argue's statement had been made in the other place, it would have been made under the heading "Statements by Ministers" and "a copy would have been provided to the opposition in order to allow us to make comments if we so desired".

• (2010)

Happily for the Chair, the Speaker is not being asked to rule on whether the answer the minister gave to Senator Buckwold constituted a statement. The Rules of the Senate do not provide a specific procedure for statements by ministers. Undoubtedly, statements are made by ministers in the Senate, but our practice is varied with regard to how and when they are made. They are sometimes made during Question Period, such as the statement made by the Leader of the Government, the Honourable Senator Perrault, on the release of the American hostages in Iran, found at pages 1541-42 of Debates of the Senate of January 20, 1981. At other times, a minister will ask for leave to make an "announcement" such as the one made by Senator Argue regarding the adjustment of initial prices for western grain, found at pages 1579-80 and pages 1586-88 of Debates of the Senate of January 28, 1981.

What could be interpreted as statements are also often made when the Chair calls "Delayed Answers to Questions," and there are many examples that bear this out. It must also be noted that the practice in the House of Lords, as described in Erskine May at page 312, is that "a statement made by a Minister on a matter of public importance may be made without notice."

To repeat, the Chair is not being asked to rule if the minister's answer constituted a "statement," but rather on the more narrow point raised by Senator Asselin that when a statement is made by a minister copies of that statement should be provided in advance to the opposition to allow them to express their views.

Senator Flynn quoted the appropriate rule regarding procedure in cases not provided for, which is that "the custom, usages, forms and proceedings of either House of the Parliament of Canada shall, so far as is practicable, be followed in the Senate or in any committee thereof."

Since the Standing Orders of the House of Commons do provide for a specific procedure regarding statements by ministers, it would be helpful to look at the practice followed in the other place.

The grievance that opposition members in the House of Commons did not receive copies of a minister's statement beforehand is often heard, but I must refer honourable senators to the ruling of Speaker Lamoureux of May 17, 1973, found in House of Commons Debates at page 3862, in which he said:

> —the Chair must take into account that in so far as it can judge there is no obligation under the terms of the Standing Order for a minister making a statement under the Standing Order to provide copies or even give advance notice to parties in opposition that he proposes to make a statement on motions.

Senator Asselin, therefore, while he may have a grievance, does not have a point of order since ministers are not procedurally obligated to provide copies of their statements to opposition members beforehand.

The Chair can certainly sympathize with the grievance expressed by both Honourable Senator Asselin and Honourable Senator Flynn.

[Translation]

At this point, honourable senators, I should like to make a comment on the situation in the House of Commons to which I have just alluded. At the time, I was sitting in the House of Commons; an agreement had been reached by the opposition and the government whereby the opposition would be allowed enough time to read the statement of the minister, after which the house would revert to motions, the opposition having indicated that it was ready to discuss the statement.

Now, that procedure was not followed under the provisions of our Standing Orders but under a grievance the government representatives considered justified at that time.

[English]

Since our practice regarding statements by ministers is so varied, there may be a certain "taking advantage" of the opposition by ministers who make statements or give lengthy and detailed answers during Question Period and during the time provided for delayed answers to questions. I can only suggest—and it is only a suggestion and not to be taken as a ruling—that it would be helpful, if lengthy announcements or statements are to be made during Question Period, were copies of such statements to be provided in advance to the Leader of the Opposition. Such action would certainly add to the spirit of courtesy and gentlemanly conduct which so distinguishes our chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know I speak on behalf of all honourable senators when I thank our distinguished Speaker for his wise and balanced ruling in this particular matter. On behalf of the government, I believe his suggestion is a good one and, where feasible and practicable, statements should, of course, be provided to the Leader of the Opposition in advance.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I also thank His Honour for his ruling, and the Leader of the Government for his comments.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—EFFECT OF UNITED STATES PRICE DECONTROL ON VIABILITY

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development and pertains to the Alaska Highway gas pipeline project. What effect will the decontrol of natural gas prices in the United States have on the viability of the Alaska Highway natural gas pipeline?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, that depends on what other rules and regulations are adopted in the United States. We are really in a position in which we would have to ask what volume of gas would go into the blended price in the United States, and the levels. We know that is a commitment already made by the United States administration, but I would not like to speculate without seeking some advice with respect to the totality of the effect.

Senator Balfour: As a supplementary question, is the minister still convinced that Canada has "iron-clad" guarantees that the pipeline will be built?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, we have a level of commitment from the new administration that is equal to, or greater than, the commitment from the previous administration.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—FRAMEWORK FOR CONTINUOUS DIALOGUE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It arises out of a statement made during the course of a press conference in Ottawa on March 11 by the United States Secretary of State Alexander Haig in which he said, with regard to Canada's national energy policy:

> —we are going to establish a framework for continuous dialogue between the United States and Canada, and that was one of the things we discussed this morning and it is in train.

My question is: Will the minister report to the Senate on what exactly is the "framework for continuous dialogue" on the National Energy Program; what departments of the Canadian government are engaged in that dialogue—is it taking place at the cabinet, diplomatic or official level; and what exactly is the purpose of the dialogue?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will answer the last part of the question first. The purpose of the dialogue is to have an understanding on both sides of the border with respect to the proposals and, indeed, with respect to details of the proposals that are made.

As to the framework, my honourable friend is asking for some formal structure that does not now exist, and he is probably reading too much into the statement made by Secretary of State Alexander Haig.

There certainly was a discussion about an exchange of views between ministers here and their counterparts in the United States, so that there could be a better understanding, in the early stages, of a number of matters that are of common interest to both countries.

The honourable senator is asking for a formal structure built on the word "framework." I will ask for a written document to support that, but I do not think it will be a great structure that my honourable friend is looking for.

● (2020)

Senator Murray: I would appreciate having that report in due course.

ENERGY

ALASKA HIGHWAY GAS PIPELINE—EFFECT OF UNITED STATES PRICE DECONTROL ON VIABILITY

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, may I ask a question supplementary to that posed a moment ago by our colleague, Senator Balfour?

Will the minister indicate what he meant when he said that the commitment received from the new Reagan administration in the United States might be even greater than that obtained from the previous, Carter administration?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The only question that arises is the point at which, if necessary, an amendment to the rules in the United States respecting equity participation by the producers on the North Slope will be made, and we were given an indication that it would be forthcoming, sponsored, or initiated, if you like, by the administration, if necessary.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—STATEMENT BY SECRETARY GENERAL OF NATO—REQUEST FOR ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE BY AMBASSADOR

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government.

On January 14, in reply to a question of mine on the subject matter of economic assistance to Poland, the leader stated that on January 12 the Polish ambassador had presented a formal request for economic assistance, and that the Canadian government would give prompt and serious attention to this request.

Now that two months have passed since the presentation of that request, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government whether the federal government has made any decision in this regard, and if so, would he give us the date of that decision and the details of the Canadian response?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to thank the Honourable Senator Haidasz for providing prior notice of his intention to ask a question on this general subject this evening.

On March 19 the Canadian government's reply to the Polish request for economic assistance, which we had received in January, was conveyed to the Polish ambassador. The response, essentially, had three elements.

First, Canada will provide short term balance of payments relief by agreeing to defer approximately $21 million of repayments due on official credits. This will be accomplished by postponing for five months the equivalent of 70 per cent of the principal amounts due to the Canadian Wheat Board in the period March 15 to June 30. This interim relief is designed to alleviate Poland's immediate repayment burden pending the working out of a longer term arrangement.

Secondly, Canada will continue to participate in the ongoing discussions between Poland and her western creditors to establish means of dealing with Poland's external indebtedness over the longer term. We hope these discussions can be brought to an early and satisfactory conclusion.

Thirdly, Canada will continue to be a major supplier of grain for Poland under the provisions of an agreement which provides for the supply of 1 million to 1.5 million tonnes of grain annually during the period 1980-82. This level of supply meets roughly 20 per cent of Poland's total annual grain import requirements. Canada is continuing to provide Poland with the credits required to finance these grain shipments.

We believe that this contribution, in conjunction with those of other western countries, will assist Poland in coping with its present economic problems and in implementing a viable program for economic recovery.

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question. Would the Leader of the Government inform us whether the Canadian response exhausts the list of requests, and if not, what are the outstanding items? I ask this question because we have learned that in January the Solidarity Union signed an agreement with the Polish health ministry providing for the receipt from donor countries of drugs which are very much in demand and in short supply in Poland.

Could the minister this evening, or at some later time, inform us whether the matter of shortage of essential drugs was on the list presented to the Canadian government by the Polish ambassador?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have that information, and consequently the question must be taken as notice. The information will be sought.

POLAND—RUSSIAN MILITARY MANOEUVRES (SOYUZ 81)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do have a report with respect to Poland which has been received this afternoon from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It may be of interest to honourable senators.

Canada and its NATO allies did not receive—I repeat the words "did not receive"—prior notification of the current military exercises in and around Poland, and were not invited to send observers. There is an obligation, under the Helsinki Final Act, to give notice of major military manoeuvres involving more than 25,000 troops. The Warsaw Pact had given such notification in the past, and we can therefore only assume that Soyuz 81 involves less than 25,000 troops. Information we have received supports this assumption. Prior notification of smaller manoeuvres is optional, as is the extension of invitations to observers.

One of the aims of the French proposal for a conference on disarmament in Europe, which Canada supports at the Madrid meeting of the CSCE, is to strengthen and develop confidence-building measures, including the obligation to notify of manoeuvres and to exchange observers.

MR. REEVES HAGGAN—ROLE OF PUBLIC SERVANT IN LONDON

Hon. Lowell Murray: I have one question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Will the minister obtain from the appropriate department of government a statement indicating the role in London of Mr. Reeves Haggan, a public servant from Ottawa; how that role relates to his position in the public service here in Ottawa; and whether his role and conduct in London are consistent with his status as a public servant?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

ALBERTA

PROVINCIAL REFERENDUM BILL

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised on March 12 by Senator Austin which concerned the Alberta provincial referendum bill.

I am informed that this bill has received first reading in the Alberta legislature. It is expected that, when the legislature returns from its current recess later this month, the legislature will be prorogued and a new session commenced. Of course, in that event, the referendum bill would die on the order paper. I do not know if the Alberta government intends to re-introduce this legislation.

Senator Flynn: Well, how would you know? It is none of your responsibility.

Senator Olson: Unfortunately, the federal government has no further information. Any further comment would only be conjecture. I hope that answer satisfies the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: You should satisfy the curiosity of Senator Austin.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO CHRYSLER CORPORATION—AMENDED AND RESTATED LOAN INSURANCE AGREEMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would also like to respond to a question raised on March 18 by Senator Balfour which concerned government assistance to the Chrysler Corporation.

I am informed by officials of the Department of Finance that the statutory authority requested by the honourable senator is section 172(3) of the Customs Act.

TRANSPORT

EAST COAST SHIPPING—DART CONTAINER LINE AND CP SHIPS

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to respond to a question raised on March 4 by Senator Donahoe which concerned the relocation of the Dart Container Line from Halifax.

I am informed that since the honourable senator raised his question, my colleague, the Minister of Transport, has had an opportunity to meet with Premier Buchanan to discuss the Dart move.

While my colleague did not agree to the premier's request to hold an inquiry into the effect of Canadian National's investment in CAST—that is, the Canadian Atlantic Sea Transport—he did indicate that the Province of Nova Scotia has several opportunities open to it to present its case.

For the honourable senator's information I would like to list the following examples: If freight rates were considered to be a factor in the Dart move, section 23 of the National Transportation Act provides for an appeal to the Canadian Transport Commission. Under section 27 of the act, Canadian Pacific must obtain CTC approval for its proposed investment in Dart Container Line, at which time an objection may be filed and public hearings held. Likewise, if CN were to increase its participation in CAST, CTC approval under section 27 would again be required.

EDUCATION

FEDERAL GRANTS TO POST-SECONDARY INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a good deal of interest in the question of federal support for post-secondary education is being expressed in the nation these days. Honourable Senator Macquarrie asked a question concerning the subject on February 12. The other day I brought a reply to this chamber in response to the senator's question, but my response was incomplete. I now have further information on the subject of established programs financing.

Federal support for post-secondary education is in the form of transfers to the provinces under the established programs financing, or EPF, arrangements. Under the EPF arrangements, which came into effect on April 1, 1977, federal contributions to the provinces for three of the four major shared-cost programs—hospital insurance, Medicare, and post-secondary education—are no longer tied to provincial expenditures on the basis of fifty-fifty cost-sharing formulae. Rather, federal contributions in a base year, 1975-76, are escalated by the nominal rate of growth of the economy. The fourth major federal-provincial shared-cost program, the Canada Assistance Plan, remains on an open-ended, fifty-fifty cost-sharing basis.

Federal contributions under the EPF arrangements are in the form of cash payments and tax transfers. The tax transfer under EPF arrangements consists of 13.5 personal points and 1 corporate income tax point. These are equalized to the national average under the general equalization formula. The cash payments consist of so-called "basic cash" contributions and "transitional adjustments." The "basic cash" portion is calculated by taking 50 per cent of the federal contributions under the three "established" programs in 1975-76 and escalating them by the rate of growth of GNP at market prices. The "basic cash" contributions are intended to provide for stable funding and for continued federal presence. The "transitional adjustments" are equal to the difference, if any, between the value of the tax transfer and the "basic cash" contribution. In other words, the "transitional adjustments" top up the value of the tax transfer to ensure that no province loses as a result of accepting part of the federal contribution in the form of a tax transfer.

Payments to the provinces are made by the program departments. Roughly one-half of the cash payments is allocated to hospital insurance, one-sixth to Medicare and the remaining one-third to post-secondary education.

The current federal-provincial fiscal arrangements period comes to an end on March 31, 1982, and the existing legislation will be reviewed with the provinces prior to that date.

The Minister of Finance, in his budget of October 28, 1980, indicated that in the interest of expenditure restraint the government intended to achieve net savings in the social affairs envelope, beginning in 1982-83. He also indicated that these savings were expected to include reductions in transfers to provinces relating to areas coming under provincial jurisdiction.

This statement has led to a good deal of speculation, expressed in this chamber by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, about what the federal government intends to do in the course of the forthcoming negotiation of the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. However, no decision on what form any expenditure cuts will take has yet been made.

Indeed, any such decision prior to the report of the parliamentary task force on the federal-provincial fiscal arrangements would be premature. The task force is to report by June 26 of this year, and the government's position in the forthcoming negotiations with the provinces will take that report into account.

Finally, it should be noted that there is no explicit relationship, under the present arrangements, between the amounts paid to the provinces by the Secretary of State in respect of post-secondary education and the amounts which provincial governments make available to universities. In other words, the post-secondary education component of the EPF arrangements is completely unconditional.

• (2035)

I must apologize, honourable senators, for the length of this statement, but there is a great deal of interest throughout the country in the subject of financial support for post-secondary education. I felt that the Honourable Senator Macquarrie's inquiry of February 12 deserved a complete reply.

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 19, the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, the joint chairmen of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, Mr. Serge Joyal and Senator Hays, ran a very good show; they seemed to complement each other. The members of the committee took their work seriously, and their devotion, sense of responsibility and understanding were noted across the country. Credit is due to both institutions of Parliament. The participation by members of this chamber in that committee once again proved that there is talent in this house—talent which enables us to succeed in almost any undertaking. While it is not often that we are called upon, the country is noticing and appreciating more and more the work of the Senate.

For me, this is an opportunity, which I welcome, to participate in an historic event. I am not likely to have an opportunity to speak under similar circumstances again. I do not anticipate that by the end of my speech honourable senators on the other side will be influenced by what I have said, but I am sure they will find my remarks worth listening to.

I do not intend to discuss legalistic matters, for they have been so thoroughly and ably covered that, regardless of the source, the comments are becoming repetitious. I have practised law for 55 years, actively for 50 years. My law school, Osgoode Hall, which is the best law school in the country—

Senator Flynn: Hey!

Senator Croll: —paid very little attention to constitutional law in 1925. As a result, I have very little grounding in constitutional law, and when I am out of my depth I rely on experts. I am no expert on constitutional law, yet I recall an occasion—and it is recorded—40 years ago, after I had been in practice for nine years, when my opinion on the Constitution, to my utter surprise, ended up in the Privy Council, and I won. There and then I decided to quit while I was ahead. I realized that constitutional law was not for me. I devoted myself to other fields.

● (2040)

Constitutional law, as this chamber well knows, is a very specialized field. In my view, there are not a dozen top specialists in the whole of Canada, and half of them are in the Department of Justice. There are five or six in the academic field. Most of them speak very loudly, but do not pay too much attention to what they say. The experts are well known.

I decided, early in my career, that I would leave the matter of the Constitution to the experts, and when a constitutional matter arose in the provincial government I consulted the experts. In the House of Commons, it was Maurice Ollivier and, in the Senate, it was the late Russell Hopkins, recognized as the expert of all experts. Now it is Raymond du Plessis, whom I have not consulted on this matter because I did not think it proper. I am sure he will turn out to be as good as any of the people in the Department of Justice.

The experts in the Department of Justice must be just that because every constitutional lawyer in the employ of the provincial governments is looking over their shoulders. Their record is about 90 per cent correct. You cannot ask for more than that. I accept their opinion that what we are doing is legal.

I first ran into the constitutional question in 1927 when the Old Age Pension enactment was turned down by the Senate of the day on the grounds that we could not afford it, there was no mandate, and it was unconstitutional. I reasoned that they must be wrong, and proceeded on that assumption. It occurred to me that the state's first function was to provide food, shelter and clothing for its citizens. How could it be unconstitutional?

I have now come full circle. I met the problem of unconstitutionality when I began my political career and now, 50 years later, in my twilight days, I meet it once again. I met it coming in and I meet it going out. I shall treat it as I treated my original introduction to it more than 50 years ago.

I was the earliest supporter of a Bill of Rights. As a matter of fact, I used to have a motion respecting it on the order paper—even when my party scoffed at it. Now it is augmented to help the disadvantaged, the disabled, women, those whose ancestors came from other countries and aboriginal peoples. The duality of our country concerning federal institutions and access to education in either language are included in the Bill of Rights.

I can recall no time in our history when we have moved so quickly and firmly to help the disadvantaged. For me, it is social paradise, and damn the torpedoes.

In speaking tonight, I have arrogated to myself the right to speak for other Canadians, and by that I mean naturalized Canadians. I am aware that success has many fathers. I am the only member of this house who, as a naturalized Canadian, has served, for a total of more than 50 years, in all Canadian political institutions, municipal, provincial and federal. I use the term "other Canadians" instead of using the term "naturalized Canadians."

Honourable senators, I have stood in this house for many years, and for many years in the other place, to speak on vital issues, most often on what have come to be called "social issues"—that is, matters of overpowering concern to me as a Liberal, such as a bill of rights, old age assistance, medicare, unemployment insurance, poverty, pensions, immigration, job discrimination and, yes, I even spoke for the Japanese when I came back from the war and found what they had been subjected to. I spoke more than once on their behalf, and I thought I helped their case. I spoke on the citizenship issue 30 years ago and in the flag debate 15 years ago.

My passion for these matters is part of the public record. This is the third speech I have made on an historic act of Parliament and I am not likely to have too many more chances to do so. I was right in my first two speeches, and I am confident I will be in this one.

Today, I stand to speak on yet another social issue, the most important of them all—the future political organization of this country. There has been much misunderstanding of the constitutional question by the public, by the media and even in Parliament itself.

The constitutional question before us is not primarily one of who gets what, or even a question of who has the primary jurisdiction in respect of natural resources; and it is not primarily a question of how the Constitution is amended once it has been brought home. It is obvious that neither the Victoria formula nor the Vancouver consensus could obtain unanimous agreement.

Under the Vancouver consensus an amendment would require the approval of seven provinces with at least half of the national population. Ottawa rejects that because it contains a provision which would allow individual provinces to opt out of certain amendments which directly affect them.

The federal government favours the 1971 Victoria formula which requires a majority of six provinces, so long as the majority includes any province that has or has had 25 per cent of the Canadian population—such as Ontario or Quebec—two of the four Atlantic provinces, and two of the four western provinces representing the majority of the population in the west. There would be no opting out. In Winnipeg they are now considering the alternatives, and they will certainly choose one or the other which will be acceptable to the government.

Though these are all, of course, enormously important concerns, the real question—the fundamental question—is: What form of government can best provide the conditions of social justice and human dignity which are, or ought to be, the goals of all our other policies? No matter how you approach it, what we are talking about in this resolution is power, money and freedom.

I have lost track of how long this Constitution debate has been going on, and sometimes it seems like forever, but by now we must have heard from every pressure group in Canada, except one. We have heard from the east, the west, the premiers, women, native people, the handicapped, the Anglos, the Francos, the oil companies—you name it and we have heard from it. We have heard from just about every lobby in the country except mine, and that is because the group I refer to, and to which I belong, is not a pressure group and does not have a lobby. Nobody speaks for it which is kind of funny, because it just happens to be the largest group in the country. It has no official spokesman, no slogans, no battle cry. In fact, we have been listening to every interest group trying to protect its own piece of turf, whether political or economic. One almost begins to believe that our group does not exist, because up until now no one has even mentioned it or said very much about it. However, let me assure you that we do exist and that we are now 9 million strong.

We are the 35 per cent of the population who are neither English nor French in origin. We are not one of the founding races, although some of us were here when the nation was founded, but we are everywhere. We are in Parliament, on the bench, in the universities, in industry and on farms. We are in every business. We are drilling for oil, and we are in the Book of Remembrance in the Peace Tower. We are a true, silent majority coming from almost every land in the world. Some of us have this advantage—we chose Canada. People who are born in this country sometimes have little to say about it, but there are millions of us who became Canadians because we wanted to become Canadians, and for that reason our feelings about this country are a little different from those of others.

We have been called new Canadians, hyphenated Canadians, and a few other things as well. Some of us in the past have sometimes been treated like second-class citizens, but let me assure you that there is nothing second-class about our devotion to our country.

Some of us have been a bit puzzled by the tone of much of the Constitution debate, not only in Parliament but elsewhere in this country. You see, we believe in freedom. That is why our fathers and mothers came here.

I cannot resist the temptation to read what I said in the Canadian citizenship debate on April 9, 1946:

> We have not come, in the main, from some dark European morass where learning and culture never flowered. It was not ignorance that led us to reject our homes and our friends and the countries of our birth—and out of all lands to which we might have gone, to choose Canada. We, or our fathers, were actuated by those same impulses which, one or two or three centuries earlier, had led the forebears of the hon. members, whether they speak English or French, to make this same venturesome, sometimes desperate, move from an old world to a new, to escape from drudgery without hope of security, hunger of social injustice, religious faith without the freedom to practise it, democratic idealism ruthlessly supressed by the despot . . . So we made our choice, and gambled our lives and those of our families and by and large we won. Not without pain were the deep-grown roots of generations wrenched from the familiar soil; but mercifully soon, we found, new roots were taking hold in new, far more nourishing clay than ever we had known. We settled fairly easily, at least the younger of us did, into the new scene as gradually the old one faded. We became, in our own thinking, Canadians in all but citizenship, and we were eager for that day when that final proof of right and liberty would be added.

We believe in free institutions, freedom to associate together, to worship, freedom before the law. We believe in the whole collection of personal freedoms that are gathered under the umbrella called "civil liberties," and now in the Bill of Rights. I have to say that we—and I am not speaking for myself—have trouble understanding some of the vocal, even violent opposition, to the constitutional package, particularly to the Bill of Rights.

A few weeks ago the entire constitutional text was reported in many newspapers across Canada. It took up a double page in my evening paper. I read it, as did many of my friends and acquaintances with whom I discussed it later. Let me tell you something. There was nothing in that entire text that any of us could seriously take objection to. There may have been a word or phrase here and there that could have been improved upon, but basically the text was good and, more important, it was right.

As I listen to the debate—here and across the country—it strikes me that objections to the constitutional package fall under three main headings. The first is what I call philosophical objections; the second is what I call practical objections; and the third are procedural objections. Let me try to tell you briefly what I mean.

Philosophical objections come from more people who are against having things like those in a Bill of Rights written down. They say, "Look, the beauty of the British system is that nothing is written down—no Bill of Rights, no written Constitution. In England, people's rights are protected by the common law, by the decisions of the great judges over hundreds of years that defined people's rights and protected them against injustice by other people or by the state." "Our rights have historically been protected by the common law," they tell us, "and there is no need to write them down, no need to enact them as part of the Constitution." In fact, they argue that to write them down might be to limit them. "If we write them down," the argument goes, "the only rights we can be sure of are those that are actually set out in the Bill of Rights. Anything not specifically mentioned would be—or might be—excluded. How could we ever be sure that we had included everything?"

● (2100)

That, it seems, in simplified form, is the argument of the common law people. They turn away in horror from the idea of putting things down neat and tidy in a certified form because, they tell us, rights cannot be certified; they have to be left free and at large to be defined and protected by the common law judges, just as they have been doing it in England since the year 1215. That was the year when the great charter of liberties of England was granted by King John under pressure from his barons at Runnymede.

There is a great deal to be said of Magna Carta that is as valid today as it was 766 years ago—for example, that no freeman should be imprisoned except by the law of the land. But does anyone seriously believe that Magna Carta, even with almost 800 years of interpretation by common law judges, is adequate for Canada in the last quarter of the twentieth century?

One will look in vain to Magna Carta to decide whether the legislature of one Canadian province may validly pass laws prohibiting Canadians from other provinces from taking a job or buying a home within its territory. Surely the need in this country for a new charter of basic human rights scarcely requires to be demonstrated. Nor will it be lost on common law lawyers that Magna Carta itself was a written charter of rights.

Speaking for the silent majority, I think it is fair to say that many of us come from lands where human rights have more often been honoured in the breach than in the observance. It does not shock us at all to have our rights written down. Most of us think it is a good idea. To our way of thinking, rights that are written down are a lot clearer and better than rights that are not written down. It is as simple as that.

The second kind of objection to the constitutional package is called the practical objection. By that I mean opposition to the slightest change in the division of powers between provincial and federal governments. I find it strange that provinces that have been complaining for generations about how imperfect and inadequate the B.N.A. Act is are suddenly sent into a panic at the thought of changing so much as a comma in that suddenly sacred document.

There was a report in the Globe and Mail on March 21 dealing with the federal excise tax on natural gas. It reads as follows:

> A federal excise tax on natural gas cannot be levied against gas produced and sold by the Alberta Government, says the Alberta Court of Appeal.

This is the part that is interesting. The whole thing is interesting if you like the decision—which I do not. It continues:

> The court said the tax, as it relates in this particular case, is not a tax on a transaction, or on the movement or consumption of gas.
> "It is a tax on a province respecting its property and is prohibited by section 125."
> The federal Government argued the tax is legal under trade and commerce powers granted in the BNA Act, but the court said that argument "confuses the raising of the money with the objective of a separate legislative program on which it will be spent."
> The court said it would be unwise, "and in this case, unnecessary," to speculate on problems that could occur if provinces nationalized all business within their borders.
> In addition, the argument that government activities different from those in vogue when the BNA Act was written remove the immunity "is not in keeping with the tradition of progressive interpretation" of the act.

This is the killer:

> "Governments within Confederation are not to be chained to the past," the court said.

I call to your attention that statement made by the court because of the discussion here wherein statements that were made in the past about the BNA Act were held to be almost untouchable. The provinces think it might lessen their powers by one iota. I have news for them. The original BNA Act was not brought down from the mountain by Moses: it was a document prepared by men who were trying, in their imperfect way, to make a nation out of a bunch of squabbling colonies. When I look around the country today, I do not think the situation has changed all that much in 114 years. The provinces, with some notable exceptions, are still a bunch of squabbling colonies, each one threatening to take its marbles or its oil and "leave home" if anyone tries to change the rules and finally succeeds in making a nation—one and indivisible—out of this federation.

Who knows, it might even come to pass. We have been waiting for 50 years for it to happen, ever since the Statute of Westminster, and it has not happened yet, while even the thought that it might happen seems to scare some of the provinces stiff.

I am not all that impressed, either, with scare stories about how many oil rigs are leaving the country. Any time the oil rigs want to depart, along with their American owners, they should feel free to go. I would feel much easier if I knew that these people had left Calgary.

We Canadians who are neither Anglos nor Francos have different ideas about the future of this country. We believe that Canada's natural resources, whether they lie under the ground or under the waters off our shores, belong to all Canadians. They are not the sole and exclusive property of the province beneath whose soil or under whose coastal waters they happen by the design of Providence to exist. They most assuredly are not the property of the multinational corporations which cannot wait to make as much money out of them as the OPEC bandits, who are holding the world to ransom, are making out of theirs.

We other Canadians find it indecent that any province which threatens to turn off the oil tap on the rest of the country should say, in effect, "If you will not give us our price for oil, go buy it on the world market at whatever the price." Can you imagine how long any federal administration would last if it adopted that attitude towards the provinces? We, in this country, have a habit of remembering, remembering and remembering.

We hear this from a member of the family sitting at our family table who has $12 billion rotting in the bank. We other Canadians find it unfair and unjust that one province should amass a fund of $12 billion at the expense of the rest of us, and when the rest of us includes three-quarters of a million old women—divorced, widowed and disabled—and half a million old men, all of whom are living below the poverty line. It bothers me and it should bother everyone in the country. We other Canadians believe that this could belong to us—to all of us—and that its benefits should be shared. We other Canadians believe that Canada is a family, where the members help their less fortunate siblings, because that is what families are all about.

The third kind of objection to our constitutional package is what I have called the procedural objection. That comes from the people who do not so much oppose what the government is doing as the way in which it is doing it. That goes back to what I was saying earlier, that there is precious little in the substance of the package that any reasonable person can object to, so they fall back on complaining about the procedure.

That brings to mind a story about the philosopher who once said that all good ideas pass through three stages—ridicule, discussion and adoption. Social ideas, with political amplification, pass through five stages: those who are opposed say, first, it is impossible; secondly, it is unconstitutional; thirdly, it may bankrupt the country; fourthly, it is not a bad idea, but you are going about it the wrong way; and fifthly, well, we were for it all the time, anyway.

We should, they say, bring the dear old B.N.A. Act home just the way it is, without touching it in any way, and then, after patriation, we will be more than happy to sit down in a nice, calm, reasonable way and talk about an amending formula, a Bill of Rights and anything else your heart desires. Well, as they used to say when I was a boy—oh yeah? It was a little rougher than that, but that is what I am saying. There cannot be anyone in the country over the age of 12 who really believes that that will ever happen. Trying to reach agreement with 10 provinces is like trying to nail jelly to the wall. It cannot be done, and anyone who thinks otherwise is dreaming.

The government's constitutional package is fair and reasonable—and in their heart of hearts the provinces know it. But over the past 10 years or so they have become locked into their positions, and now they can't move. It's really the flag debate all over again on a larger scale, and I for one am convinced that once this thing is over and done with, we will not hear much more about it.

In any event, if, following patriation, the provinces do get their act together and agree on changes in the Constitution, it can then be changed; but I venture to make a small prediction that it will be a long, long time before we see any significant movement for further change. Once the shadow boxing is over, I predict that we will hear precious little from the self-interest groups. It will be a brave man indeed, perhaps a foolhardy one, who will stand up and argue that basic rights, which will then be enshrined in the Constitution, should be cancelled.

That really is what is so significant about the proposed Bill of Rights. Just as the provinces have never been able to get together and agree on it, so they will never be able to agree on abolishing it. That will be its greatest safeguard. Once those rights have been spelled out, no politician will ever dare risk the wrath of the electorate by threatening to remove them.

To me, these rights spell social progress. To have the rights enshrined in the Constitution is, for me, social paradise, unbelievable progress, that I did not anticipate in this century. It even leaves me with the hope that in my lifetime I shall see the promised land. Many of us who are legislators must keep in mind that the ultimate aim of law is social justice, and our job must be to insist that whatever laws we are instrumental in enacting serve that end before any other.

Two weeks ago, at the Juno Awards in Toronto, the Prime Minister said that legislators create the conditions in which freedom can flourish. That is true, and it is true also that freedom can flourish only when the excesses of inequality, that continue to plague our society, have been eliminated.

The disadvantaged in our society do not have the luxury of concerning themselves with a constitutional crisis. They must survive the daily crises of poverty, human indignity, lack of hope, and despair for their children's future. The 500,000 old men and the 750,000 old women who live below the poverty line cannot be expected to share our concern for the Constitution—but it is for them that it is being written.

The student with no job prospects; the immigrant who suffers discrimination in the work place, or in trying to obtain decent housing; the native Canadian who feels, justifiably, that he is a second class citizen; the parent whose child has been taken beyond the reach of the law to another province; the handicapped and infirm, the unemployed—none of those can be expected to share our concern for the Constitution. But it is for them—for them more than for any of us—that it is being written. It is for them that we are debating today, not dry legalisms, not empty rearrangements of powers, but, first and foremost, a social document, a charter not merely of rights, which are so important to us, but of national emancipation. That is what, in essence, we are debating today.

In patriating the Constitution, we are taking a giant step toward patriating the national consciousness, the national dream—indeed, our national integrity. In voting for this resolution, we are helping in the long process of freeing this country from the forces, both inside and outside, which have historically prevented the fulfilment of the best possibilities which we could offer to all segments of society.

It is not possible to dream someone else's dream, honourable senators. That is what we have been trying to do in this country for all too long: we have been dreaming someone else's dream; we have been dreaming it in someone else's bed; and all too often we have watched our dreams become our nightmares. We have not been able to offer our citizens the best that is possible, because we have not owned our resources; we have not been able to moderate the effects of inflation, of technological change, or regional disparity, because our economy has not been entirely within our control. The passage of this resolution will be an unmistakable signal to all that the best interests of Canadians can be served only by Canadians. We can only dream our own dreams when we control our own destiny, and that is also what we are debating today.

To the critics who argue, honourable senators, that unilateral action by this government is a radical alteration of the federal character of this country, let me answer that without such unilateral action we would still be a colony today: we would have no flag; we would still be British citizens; we would have no national social policies. Indeed, honourable senators, we would probably still be a disunited rag-tag of provinces arguing whether or not there should be a confederation.

The argument that the provinces are losing their traditional powers by this resolution is a red herring. They have in fact been deprived of no powers. Not a crumb, not a morsel of provincial powers will be lost, except one: the petty power to stand in the way of national unity.

We have what is already the most highly devolved federal system in the world, and that remains, and the relative balance of powers remains, too. I do not argue with the proposition that it is necessary to have strong provincial governments to represent the diverse regional interests in Canada. The federal system is one of sharing responsibility between federal and provincial legislatures, a wise arrangement by the very wise men who structured our political order, who accommodated themselves to the reality of the Canadian fact that no one government could properly represent the diverse interests of so diverse a country; but it is also true, truer now than ever, honourable senators, that it is essential to have a strong central government to hold together those disparate elements.

On their own, the provinces cannot agree on anything. The seven premiers who got together in Montreal could not even agree on how to disagree. The sum total and end result of their meeting was that Premier Lévesque criticized the government for "British bashing". There's a joke for you, honourable senators: a man determined to bash the entire structure of this country can do no more than accuse the government of "British bashing." It is an empty and hollow joke, honourable senators, and we should be wary of laughing too loudly. It shows us how barren is the provincial position, how little the people of Canada can rely on their provincial leaders to take the necessary action. They are riders on pale horses, honourable senators, tilting at empty windmills, and we cannot allow them to play politics with the future of this country.

For years we have witnessed provincial attempts to use constitutional conferences to hold to ransom the people of Canada to achieve their demands for increased power and increased jurisdiction over the national wealth. It has been said before, honourable senators, and it is very true: you cannot bargain fish for fundamental freedoms, or oil for autonomy, or political power for national dreams. Yet that is what some of the provincial premiers have been doing.

If we wait for the provinces to get their act together, the curtain will never rise. The same empty wrangling will go on for the next 53 years as it has for the last 53. We cannot afford that kind of time, nor can the country.

The central government is the only government which can and must speak on vital issues for all Canadians. After much soul-searching, much consultation and redrafting, after hearing from Canadians right across the country, it is acting now. It is acting to redeem the future from a record of dismal failure.

It is clear to me now—just as it was clear nearly fifty years ago, but now more than ever—that only strong, bold action by the central government can preserve the fabric of this Confederation.

Honourable senators, it is now, and always has been, in the best interests of the multinational corporations, in the best interests of the oil companies, in the best interests of short-sighted provincial governments, in the best interests of all those whose vision of society goes no further than the bottom line on a financial statement, to maintain the dependent and fragmented nature of our economy and our institutions. That is what colonialism is all about, honourable senators, and it is high time that we in this government said: No; no more of this. We will no longer sell our hopes to the absentee profiteers; we will no longer sell our future to the multinational rip-off artists whose vision of society is to be found entirely within the confines of a balance sheet. That is evidenced by the most recent voluminous report made by the Combines Investigation Branch—on which there is bound to be some follow-up.

The only way we can oppose these rapacious forces is by affirming a different vision, a vision which sees Canadian society as more than the sum of its parts, a vision in which the national good has precedence over the regional will. To ensure this, we must insist not only upon constitutional patriation, but on the repatriation of the national economy. The two, honourable senators, go hand in hand. If we remain an economic colony, constitutional independence is just so much paper.

We must make sure that the ownership of this country's resources is in Canadian hands, not in the hands of the robber barons who see Canada as a place to get rich quick and run home with the profits. It is beginning to be understood now that the national energy policy is an important step towards the protection of our economy from the economic colonialists who have done this country so much harm.

The process must continue, honourable senators. Canadianization of our resources must assume the highest priority. This great debate symbolizes a new direction in Canadian national life. There is nothing sinister about being a Canadian nationalist or in arguing that the control of Canadian institutions and resources must be in Canadian hands—and by "Canadian hands," honourable senators, I mean in the hands of all Canadians, to be used for the national good, not to pile up billions of dollars for a heritage fund which benefits only a few.

While Mr. Lougheed calls on the people of Alberta to "bleed" for their province, there are Canadians—in the maritimes, for example—who have in fact been "bleeding" for years. In my view, the maritimes have always given more than they have received from Confederation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Croll: How generous Mr. Lougheed could have been had he used some of Alberta's Heritage Fund—which now amounts to $12 billion and will, in ten years, amount to $50 billion—to aid the Nova Scotia coal mines by lending $1 million, without interest, in perpetuity. If this were done, I would venture to say that he would hardly miss it. Unlike the American dream, which has always meant power, wealth and freedom, the Canadian dream has meant sharing and freedom.

No member of the Canadian family should be allowed to suffer at the hands of any other. We can no longer tolerate a state of affairs in which there is punishing and dehumanizing poverty in the midst of plenty. The national good must always come before the local good. The people of this country will not tolerate this grotesque aberration of the social order in which some have so much while many have so little. We agreed to share our wealth. That was the promise we made to one another when we agreed to Confederation, as is evidenced by the equalization payments that are made by the government today, small as they may be.

If Canadianization of the Canadian economy still frightens some die-hard continentalists among us, if those left-over doubting Thomases and nervous Nellies believe that when Washington or Imperial Oil sneezes we should take out our handkerchiefs, well, honourable senators, I say that we can no longer afford the luxury of the crocodile tears being shed over the obvious route this country must follow. The oil is ours, honourable senators. The trees, the coal, the uranium, the natural gas, the potash, the asbestos, the nickel, the water—these are the real heritage funds of the future, and they are too important to be left in private hands. This land is our land.

If some run scared at the thought that Canadianization is another way of saying nationalization, well, honourable senators, so be it. Let us stop being afraid of the word. Nationalization has worked well for us in the past in vital areas of the national economy, and that is the road along which, for the good of all of us, we have to proceed. I say that if we could afford it we should buy back the whole works right now—we will only have to pay more later. Our resources, honourable senators, can only increase in value. If we buy them back now, we won't have to pay through the nose, financially and socially, later.

Let the multinationals go. They pay only disrespectful lip service to our laws and very little in the way of taxes. They are more acquainted with the loopholes than with the spirit of the Income Tax Act, not to mention our social needs. We don't need them any more. If we buy our natural resources back now, we can manage, develop and plan every bit as well as they can, and a whole lot better than those corporate panhandlers like Chrysler and Massey-Ferguson can—those economic incompetents who are asking us to keep them afloat in a sea of red ink.

The amending formula that really counts, honourable senators, is the one we will use to amend the resource ownership for the national good. We can no longer be hewers of wood and drawers of water for someone else's industry, someone else's research and development, and someone else's profit.

This is the real job of "bashing" that has to be done—bashing into the heads of multinationals the idea that Canadian resources must be used to benefit Canadians, not head office Chicago or head office London. It should go without saying that it is only the central government which can do this job, because it is only that body which represents the interests of all of us. In voting for this resolution, we are affirming that the central government has that right, that mandate, that responsibility. We would also be affirming what is quite literally the "last act of colonialism." Westminster will send back the Constitution post haste, because it knows that a joint resolution of this Parliament represents the best interests of the Canadian people.

Honourable senators, I have dreamed many dreams for this country in the last 50 years, and at the centre of all of them was the passion that my country would be strong and independent so that it could provide a more just society for all its citizens.

I entered local politics largely as a result of this dream; I went to war because of this dream; and I came to Ottawa, and ultimately to this chamber, in defence of this dream.

● (2140)

I believe as strongly now as I did 45 years ago that it is better to march with the workers than to ride with General Motors. I believe as strongly now as I did then that it is the duty of good government to alleviate the human suffering that arises out of social and economic inequality. I believe now as strongly as I did then that only a dismal and derelict society ignores the needs of the disadvantaged, the old, the sick and the injured.

That dream and those beliefs have given meaning to my life and to my political career; and as I come closer to the end of that career, honourable senators, I don't want to see that dream hazarded by wrongheaded nay-sayers who do not understand the moral imperatives in our society.

And those dreams go back a long way, honourable senators; they are almost as old as this century. I was born a scant 33 years after Confederation, and in many ways I feel myself to be an almost archetypal Canadian: I was an immigrant, like so many Canadians before and since. My parents chose this country. I know what it means to have an immigrant's view of the human possibilities in a new world, the vision of the future that melts away fears and forges hope. I was aware from a very early age of the ideals that ultimately shape a society's future.

I remember my father taking me to hear Sir Wilfrid Laurier speak in the election campaign of 1909. When the speech was over, my father pointed to Laurier and said, "That's a Liberal." And to my father that wasn't a partisan designation, but the measure of a man's political philosophy. It characterized for him, as it has for me almost ever since, the best human values that a society and political system could embody.

The process of my Canadianization, like that of so many Canadians, was a process of understanding the possibilities offered by political action based on liberal principles. In that sense, honourable senators, I have become Canadianized in the fullest possible way. The Canadian dream served me, and I served it, and thus, in a way, I am a symbol of the pioneer Canadian immigrant—only in my case, I not only benefited from political liberalism; I took an active part in it, and I helped to build up the state to assist those who were less fortunate.

I remember when the first old age pension bill was passed by the House of Commons in the late twenties, and was rejected by the Senate of that day on three grounds: first, that the Senate had no mandate to pass such a bill; second, that there was not enough money to pay for the bill; and, finally, that it was unconstitutional. Well, honourable senators, we didn't reward obstinacy in a bad cause then, and we must not reward it now.

I supported that pension bill and the political ideals that lay behind it, and when I was elected Mayor of Windsor, a city very hard hit by the Depression, those ideals led me to establish a welfare department. And when I went into provincial politics in 1934 and to the cabinet, I followed those ideals to establish a department of welfare.

When I went to war at the age of 40, it was in part because I believed that the ideals of political liberalism at home demanded the defeat of fascism abroad. Indeed, honourable senators, it could be argued that the essence of this country, the very best that has been created here, that which will endure the longest, is a consequence of this kind of political liberalism. This liberal sense of society was behind the Old Age Pension Act of 1927—a first small step, but a vital step. It was the first social measure enacted by the Government of Canada. I participated in its acceptance, and in every social measure since—and there have been many—in which I have participated.

I have been lucky to be in Parliament for so long a time. Because of that, I know that the view of society is behind the commitment that food, shelter and clothing are the fundamental rights of each citizen of this country—a commitment that was given shape and meaning during the Depression. It was behind the decision in 1952 that the Old Age Security Act should be made universal, and that the degrading and humiliating means test should be done away with. Political liberalism lay behind the suggestion made by Prime Minister King in 1919 that there should be a national health plan.

It took us 50 years to fulfil the promise of that suggestion, honourable senators, but in 1959, in this place, we passed one of the best national medicare plans in the entire world. It was the spirit recognized by my father, an immigrant from a repressive regime, who had dreamed of the future, it was the political spirit that he had recognized in Laurier, that made that plan possible. This is what the Bill of Rights is all about. I have told you I have always been a supporter of it. That fact did not help me any in my party, but it was worth it.

Honourable senators, I have been personal witness to this long, slow process of change in Canadian life. I am able to remember when lack of work meant lack of food; when the children of the poor were hungry because they were made to suffer the imagined sins of their fathers. I remember when there were no unions to protect workers' rights; when sickness could mean personal bankruptcy; when the best medical care was reserved for the rich; when accident or illness on the job meant the degradation of relief; when that relief was not enough for more than a bare subsistence.

I remember a time not so very long ago when old age meant poverty for all but the very few; when widows were not provided for; when the disabled were offered neither hope nor protection. I remember, honourable senators, when this was a harsher country by far, a more unfair country by far, and a meaner country by far than it is now—in short, when society was working for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many.

But I have also been witness to the softening of the harshness by slow degrees over the years, so that we now have a much more human and humane place to live than we once had. Most of us are at least able to agree that "poverty is no disgrace to acknowledge, but a real degradation to make no effort to overcome."

Honourable senators, I was privileged to be there at each small step along the way to where we stand now: I held office; I spoke in the debates; I raised my hand to vote; I helped make policy; I served on many committees, and chaired some of them; I served my constituents; I have served my party; and I have served my country. I have been in the front line of the battle for human decency in our society. So the dreams that I am dreaming now are not pipe-dreams: they are founded on a clear understanding of what can be accomplished and of what has been accomplished in this country.

I am a creature of my dreams, and they have led me to this debate, and to the great dream embodied in this resolution. I am here to remind you that the progress we have made has been won by idealism married to practical politics. And I am here to remind you as well that that idealism is rooted deep in the hearts of our people, that in the end it will brook no opposition, no watering down, no endless delays. I am here to remind you that people whose memories are otherwise very short never forget when those deepest desires are frustrated.

It seems to me that there are two roads before us: we can go back to the moral meanness of the past; or we can continue on the road towards a humane society. The way back is easy, and it has been mapped out for us for years by those retrograde forces who, during all those great debates on the great social issues, said, "No" or "Not yet" or "Too much" or "Too soon." Those same forces are with us again; they are asking us again to follow them backwards by opposing the spirit of political liberalism which has accomplished so much. They would divide and fragment this society so that no useful programs for the national good can be set in place.

The other road is the one to the future. Following it demands that we recognize that what is truly in the national interest is also in the regional interest; while what is in the regional interest is not always in the national interest. Following it demands that we give assent now, in this place, in as loud a voice as we can muster, to the ideal of a nation, of nationhood and of the national goals that are symbolized by this resolution.

In doing so, we are taking possession of this land that has for so long been only partly ours; in doing so, we are giving voice and substance to that idea of nationhood; in doing so, we are registering the claims of millions upon millions of Canadians to a piece of their country's future; in doing so, we are telling our citizens that they will not have their dreams deferred, as they were in the past. In his song, The Canadian Railroad Trilogy, Gordon Lightfoot writes:

> Open our hearts and let the life-blood flow,
> We've got to get on our way,
> 'Cause we're moving too slow.

Honourable senators, I've watched this country come a long way in the last 50 years, but for the hundreds of thousands of Canadians whose lives continue to be blighted by inadequate human and social conditions, we are still "moving too slow". This resolution puts us in a position to remedy that tardiness, at least partially.

My pioneering days are almost over, but before my political career comes entirely to a close, I would like to see my dream come true, of a strong and just Canada, independent and united, proud in its diversity rather than strained in its dissention. That would be a confirmation, not only of my dreams but also of the dreams of all Canadians.

DEFECTIVE SIMULTANEOUS INTERPRETATION SYSTEM IN COMMITTEE ROOM 256-S—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, as a result of complaints from me and from other people about the interpretation system in Room 256-S, Mr. F. Belzile, the Director of Committees, sent a memorandum dated March 20, 1981 to the Clerk of the Senate, Mr. Robert Fortier, Q.C., and copies of the memorandum were also sent to the following persons: the Honourable Senator Everett, Mr. Bowie, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, Mr. Dean, the Director of Administration and Personnel, Mr. Cocks, the Clerk of the Committee on National Finance, and Mr. Vosburgh, the Chief of Electronic Services.

With leave, I should like to take the liberty of reading the full text of the memorandum:

[English]

To: Mr. Robert Fortier, Q.C.

Clerk of the Senate

From: Director of Committees

Subject: Interpretation System in Room 256-S

It has been brought to my attention that difficulties were encountered with the Sound System in room 256-S during the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, held yesterday, March 19, 1981.

[Translation]

I must point out here that on that occasion the principal witness was the Honourable Pierre Bussières, the Minister of State (Finance), who spoke in French only. Even Senator Grosart who was in attendance could not understand the answers because at one time he said: "I think that must be the correct answer, but I did not understand anything".

[English]

Since this has happened before and the problem is well known, I will not elaborate on the technical aspect of it. What I would like to emphasize however is the serious situation that it creates.

Simply it means that Honourable Senators, or witnesses, cannot use the language of their choice or if they do, they make it more difficult for other senators to follow a conversation in a language they are less familiar with. No doubt, this constitutes a breach of the privileges of Honourable Senators and the situation has to be corrected with the least possible delay.

The technicians have informed me they cannot do any better with the existing equipment. They conduct a test before each meeting to make sure everything is O.K. but they can give no assurance it will last till the end of a meeting. The equipment is too old and in such a bad state that overhauling it would cost more than buying a new one.

Therefore I would suggest that new equipment be installed in that room immediately.

[Translation]

It was signed by F. Belzile, the Director of Committees.

Immediately after my appointment to the Senate, I became a member of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and I had the honour to be elected vice-chairman of this committee at the opening of the 32nd Parliament. This committee meets regularly in Room 256-S and my question of privilege concerns neither the members of the committee, nor the staff, nor the interpreters, nor the officials, nor the witnesses, but rather the outmoded, ancient and defective interpretation system. I was informed that this system was installed over 20 years ago, and those in charge of the committee have on several occasions tried to correct its problems.

Since I find it easier to speak in my mother tongue and since I wish to continue to take part in the very interesting sittings of this committee, it is important that, to be effective, I can speak in French rather than in English. In fact, this is a privilege that I wish to keep, especially as the federal government has recognized that it should serve the people in either official language.

Yet, very often, because of this defective system, if I want to be understood not only by the witnesses but also by the honourable members of the committee, I have to use English. This fact is an unacceptable infringement on my privilege to use my own language, and I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to use your influence and your power as Speaker of the Senate to have those responsible—I have been told that this comes under the Department of Public Works—to take the appropriate action as soon as possible to correct this deficiency and to provide adequate facilities in Room 256-S so that I can work in my own language, as I do in this assembly.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would simply like to tell Senator Leblanc that I believe his question of privilege to be valid. In fact, I think that we have already said at the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration that the Senate has only one room with adequate facilities for the committees, and this is Room 356-S.

I know that the chairman of the Committee on Internal Economy and Administration, Senator Graham, has already discussed this and that the situation is being reviewed, but I agree, Mr. Speaker, that you might confer with Senator Graham, and also with the Leader of the Government, if need be, to determine whether any improvement can be made.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, in reply to Senator Leblanc and to the other honourable senators interested in this matter, I would like to say that the Clerk of the Senate has kept me informed of the situation. The honourable senator has called on the Speaker to use his influence to correct the deficiencies which he mentioned.

The true powers of the Speaker in this regard should be analyzed. As you will see, they are very limited. I believe that the Leader of the Opposition was right to mention the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration which has the power to act in this regard and to decide on the allocation of funds to correct the deplorable situation which has been described.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Honourable Senator Leblanc has made a very persuasive case, and I know that the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee and those who serve on that committee will undoubtedly give their usual fair consideration to any such request.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

> Document entitled "The Role of the United Kingdom in the Amendment of the Canadian Constitution", dated March 1981, issued by the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I suppose that what I have to say is not strictly relevant under Notices of Motions because I do not propose to give notice of a motion. However, I wish to take the opportunity to tell the house, as has been the custom recently, the present plans for our sittings so that honourable senators may make their plans accordingly.

It will be recalled that last week we decided to meet at the usual hours, namely, Tuesday evening, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon, holding ourselves ready to sit on Friday if the pace of the Constitution debate increases to the point at which extended sittings, in terms of both days and hours, appear to be necessary.

It seems to me that this situation has not arisen, and I have discussed the matter with the honourable Leader of the Opposition accordingly. Therefore, it is suggested that we proceed next week as we have this week, and meet during our usual hours on Tuesday evening, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon, but holding ourselves ready to meet on Friday, should something take place that makes that appropriate. We would probably sit from 10 a.m. until 1 p.m. on Friday, if such a sitting becomes necessary, although that is not settled.

I tell you this now, honourable senators, so that you can make your plans. At this time tomorrow, unless something dramatic occurs in the meantime, the motion I will put will be one to adjourn until Tuesday, March 31, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, it has been my impression that the agenda for this week has gone rather well, with Tuesday having been utilized as much as possible for committee meetings. No comment was made with respect to Tuesday of next week. Is there a similar plan for next Tuesday? Do we still have a backlog of committee meetings?

Senator Frith: So far as I am aware, senator, there is no backlog of committee meetings, but, as a corollary to what I have already said, I presume that Tuesday will be available as usual for committee meetings.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

MEETING OF PROVINCIAL PREMIERS—TENTATIVE AGREEMENT ON AMENDING FORMULA

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government, and, depending on his answer, I suppose the deputy leader might say that something dramatic has happened which has led to a decision not to sit at other than our usual hours.

It is reported that the representatives of the eight provincial governments opposing the constitutional resolution reached a tentative agreement on an amending formula at their meeting in Winnipeg yesterday. Is the government considering suspending the debate on the resolution in either the other place or this house in order to give the Prime Minister an opportunity of meeting with the provincial premiers to discuss the consensus that may have been arrived at?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is no intention to suspend the debate.

Senator Flynn: Does the leader mean to say that, even if there is the possibility of reaching an understanding or agreement with all of the provincial governments, the federal government has decided that it will not change its stance?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question, in its present form at least, is hypothetical. It presumes that some sort of agreement has been achieved. The Leader of the Opposition is alluding to various news reports, but I must remind him that over the past 50 years or so a number of agreements have been reported which never came to fruition. For example, an agreement was reputed to have been achieved in Victoria in the spring of 1971, but that was a spring of doomed hopes, because the premiers ultimately agreed to disagree, one of the major provinces pulling out of the agreement just a few days after that conference had concluded. So, on the basis of the truncated news reports brought to this chamber by the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon, one cannot expect the government to be inspired to respond in a positive way.

• (1415)

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government speaks of several years of frustration and of the 1971 meeting at Victoria. However, it seems to me that, if the matter is so urgent, the government has missed many opportunities over the past ten years to take the action it is taking now. I suggest to the Leader of the Government that there be a month's delay to enable all parties concerned to come to a consensus. Such a delay would probably resolve a fairly difficult problem, and avoid division within this country.

Senator Perrault: To be fair to the Leader of the Opposition and to the premiers, if there is an official communication on the way to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister from the premiers, then perhaps we should await official receipt of that communication. Should this event transpire, Senator Flynn's question will be taken as notice.

Senator Flynn: Thank you. I prefer that answer.

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—ASSESSMENT BY CANADIAN GAS ASSOCIATION

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. No doubt the minister is aware of the Canadian Gas Association assessment of the National Energy Program. The association has concluded that the program will hinder, rather than help, the natural gas industry to increase its share of the home heating market and, in some instances, will actually reduce the ability of that industry to retain the penetration it has already achieved in the commercial and industrial markets.

In view of the National Energy Program's aim to increase the use of gas as an energy source, would the minister advise us as to whether the government will take the assessment of the Canadian Gas Association into consideration and amend its energy program accordingly?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, if Senator Charbonneau will read the National Energy Program carefully, he will note that the government intends to take a number of steps and, indeed, provide significant funding to encourage the use of natural gas for domestic heating in Canada. The funds are also intended to support projects which provide for more penetration of the existing delivery systems and projects which provide for expansion of both main lines and lateral lines. We believe that this funding will be of major assistance in increasing the use of natural gas, of which we have a large, secure supply in Canada, and that it will help cut back on the use of oil in many places.

Senator Charbonneau: Honourable senators, if the minister feels that he is right in his reply, then I suggest that he write the Canadian Gas Association, because they do not seem to see the government program in the same way.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is often the case that different parties arrive at different conclusions after they have analyzed the same set of facts. If our conclusion is slightly different from the conclusion of the Association of Natural Gas Distributors and Producers, it will not be the first time it has happened. However, I am sure that my friend will agree that there is a very good foundation for our conclusion.

Senator Charbonneau: In other words, big brother knows best.

Senator Olson: No, that is not it.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with regard to supply, the document to which Senator Charbonneau has referred makes the point that so long as the federal government continues to arrange for large imports of heavy fuel oil, and helps to create a surplus of heavy fuel oil in this country, there will be a disincentive to convert to natural gas. What is the position of the government with regard to that assertion?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the answer to that question is very straightforward. The National Energy Program provides for incentives through financial contributions to refineries to change their refining capacity so that it will result in a lower volume of that kind of residual oil being refined. This is probably a wise thing to do, whether or not greater volumes of lower-grade crude oil are coming into Canada, because even our own domestic supply projection would indicate that crude oil with a higher carbon-to-hydrogen ratio than formerly will probably be going into the refining capacity.

Senator Murray: I do not wish to enter into a prolonged argument with the minister about the merits of the case put forward by the Canadian Gas Association. It has made the point that the incentives referred to in the National Energy Program are not sufficiently specific to encourage the kind of conversion the government is talking about.

The exchange between the minister, Senator Charbonneau and myself, again raises the question of whether we will have an opportunity, in a committee of this house, to discuss the National Energy Program. I put a motion on the order paper some time ago in this regard, and I wonder if the government has yet decided whether to refer the National Energy Policy to a committee of this house so that we may have an opportunity of examining ministers, officials, representatives of the industry, producing provinces, and so on.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would think there is a more positive and expeditious way of dealing with all the matters raised by the honourable senator, and that is for the opposition to assist us to proceed with and dispose of, in a proper way, those motions on the order paper now, in both this house and the other place. We could then get on with the other matters on the order paper that have been put down, and which deal specifically with the matters he has raised. That would be the most helpful and constructive action the opposition in this place could take.

THE SENATE

CLERESTORY OF CHAMBER

Hon. John J. Connolly: May I have the indulgence of the Senate for a moment or two? I look at honourable senators opposite and, with very few exceptions, they are squinting. I believe there is a remedy for that situation, which may get worse before it gets better since we are sitting now during better weather.

A few years ago, a Special Senate Committee on the Clerestory of the Senate Chamber—and that word itself created some problems for Senator Flynn and a few others until the committee got going—made a report concerning the clerestory of this chamber.

I would encourage honourable senators opposite, regardless of party, to have a look at that report with a view to, perhaps, suggesting that an early start be made on implementing the recommendations concerning the clerestory portion of this chamber, which is on the west side.

When one goes to a bull fight one pays a little more money for a seat on the sunny side than for a seat on the shady side but, in this case, perhaps a little money will have to be spent to make the seats on the sunny side more attractive.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): They need a little enlightenment over there.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HEALTH OF JAMES BAY CREE INDIANS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and relates to the serious health situation, which has been reported, facing some Crees in northern Quebec, specifically, the James Bay area. My understanding is that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has declared that, because the government is legally obliged to transfer jurisdiction over several matters to the Cree, and because it is doing so, the issue in hand now is not a health one and not within her jurisdiction.

Would the Leader of the Government please explain to us the policy of the government in this regard, and what it believes its responsibility is to ensure adequate health and sanitary conditions for the Cree?

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice since I do not have that information on my desk at the present time. Is there a supplementary?

• (1425)

Senator Nurgitz: Yes, there is. I assumed the Leader of the Government would take that as notice, but I have two other brief questions.

Under the James Bay agreement, a Cree regional authority was established to implement and operate these programs that the minister is talking about transferring. This authority was to receive core funding for its administrative costs from the federal government. Despite two years of negotiations, no monies have been received. Perhaps when the Leader of the Government is seeking an answer to the earlier question, he will attempt to find out when the federal government expects that it will commence its funding in accordance with the commitments made under that agreement.

Lastly, in light of certain specific health problems, there was a report in a magazine dealing with a number of children who died as a result of a tuberculosis incident. My understanding of that situation was that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development then stepped in and undertook to do some funding. I further understand that those funds have not been received. Can we also get a report with respect to the commitment, of whatever kind it was, from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

Senator Perrault: That supplementary information will be sought at the earliest opportunity.

HON. ANN ELIZABETH BELL

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I welcome back to the house the Honourable Senator Bell who has been ill and in hospital and is now restored to her usual good health.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

AGRICULTURE

ATLANTIC REGION—PROPOSED VETERINARY COLLEGE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, from this sunny side of the house, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. It may not be precisely under his purview, but I know of his broad interest in agriculture and his capacity to bring forward full answers.

I refer to the planned establishment of the veterinary college in Charlottetown which will serve the needs of the Atlantic or maritime area and which is an excellent example of governmental co-operation on the provincial and dominion level and, indeed, on regional grouping. Could the minister indicate what the federal contribution is, the planned arrangement for it; and, generally speaking, would he give us a progress report on how this highly interesting and co-operative venture seems to be going forward insofar as he and his colleagues are concerned?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I think Senator Macquarrie realizes that I do not have that information at my fingertips. I will be pleased to take his question as notice and will do my best to supply the information as requested.

STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS CONCERNING WIDOWS' PENSIONS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I imagine he will have to take the question as notice. It arises out of evidence we received before the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science having to do with widows' pensions under what was Bill C-40.

As a result of the evidence, it became clear that there is a certain group of widows at the lower end of the scale who would qualify within six and a half years. Statistics show that they will never reach that stage to be able to receive those benefits. There is obviously a requirement for further amendment. Evidently, the government unintentionally made a mistake, as did we all, in accepting the premise of a six-and-a-half years' phasing-in. Even though we are going to hear the Minister of Veterans Affairs in a week, would the Leader of the Government bring the matter to his attention, so that he will be prepared to bring forward evidence to support our claim that the bill should be further amended, because the item is now at crisis proportions and should be dealt with immediately?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that information will certainly be brought to the attention of the minister.

GRAIN

EXPORT SHIPMENTS THROUGH WEST COAST PORTS

Hon. Harry Hays: Honourable senators, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Recently there has been great difficulty in the west coast ports because of a lack of vessels to carry grain. Could he tell us what the current situation is relative to this problem?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, unloads of grain at west coast ports in January and February reached 1.64 million tonnes—an all-time record for that period. Unloads for March 2 to 7 were 3,452 cars, but these were down to 2,724 cars last week.

I am informed that the major difficulty is that the Chinese have had unloading problems at their own ports resulting from bad weather. This situation has resulted in shipments against the Chinese contract being behind schedule, but the weather in China has improved and this should help the situation in the future.

• (1430)

I am advised that yesterday five vessels were loading at Vancouver and one at Prince Rupert. An additional four vessels were waiting at Vancouver and are expected to begin loading today. Eight additional vessels are expected to arrive during the remainder of this current week. However, stocks at Vancouver and Prince Rupert are currently at high levels and, with the other factors, accounted for unloads being reduced last week.

I should like to point out that the surge capacity built by the Alberta Wheat Pool and the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, and the additional capacity following reconstruction of Burrard Terminal by Pioneer at Vancouver, have certainly helped keep the unloads at high levels despite the current shipping difficulties to which I have referred.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Does the minister have any figures on the total amount of grain that has been moved through all the ports up to the end of February or the middle of March, as our fiscal year ends on August 31? I should like to know how that relates to shipments over the past three or four years.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the figures I have in my hand—

Senator Flynn: Accidentally, of course.

Senator Argue: Well, I accidentally bring them in every day, so I guess I accidentally have them. The figures are from the Grain Statistics Weekly dated March 11, and show that to date exports—that is, overseas clearance—amount to 12.7 million tonnes compared with 12.1 million tonnes a year ago; and exports in the last crop year exceeded 23 million tonnes, which was an all-time record for Canada. We may or may not achieve another all-time record. If we do not, it will not be because of lack of sales or of transport facilities, but because of stocks on hand at a reduced level from last year. But to date the exports are exceedingly good, transportation facilities have been increased and are functioning well, and, apart from the difficulty to which I referred earlier, exports have been going along very efficiently.

TRANSPORT

TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—INTERRUPTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Opposition relating to what is described as—

Senator Flynn: He has moved to the other side.

Senator Grosart: I mean the Leader of the Government.

An Hon. Senator: It won't be long now.

Senator Grosart: I was confused by Senator Connolly's comment about those of us on this side being on the sunny side. I was going to comment that perhaps if he was inclined to blame the former government for not having done anything about it, it might be because we did not expect to be on the sunny side that long.

My question to the Leader of the Government is in respect of what has been described as a "warning of the likelihood of increased air traffic control delays for travellers using Toronto International Airport." It arises from a statement made by the president of the Canadian Air Traffic Control Association, Mr. W. J. Robertson, who attributes the problem to a now familiar government position, because he describes it as a unilateral and arbitrary decision made by the Department of Transport.

My question is: How serious is the situation; how long is it likely to last; and is Mr. Robertson correct in attributing this to arbitrary and unilateral decisions by a department of government?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not had the opportunity to read Mr. Robertson's statement and, as a result, it is not possible for me to provide an answer at this time. The question will be taken as notice.

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

MEMBERSHIP—REPRESENTATION OF ATLANTIC REGION

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I have a release from the Prime Minister's Office dated March 17, in which it is announced that four new members have been appointed to the Economic Council of Canada. Of those four, one is from the province of Quebec, two are from the province of Alberta, and one is from the province of Manitoba.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, oh.

Senator McElman: I hope that "Oh, oh" did not come from the Atlantic provinces. I have checked the Annual Review for 1980 of the Economic Council of Canada. With these additions and the deletion of one of the members, who has left the board of the Economic Council, I find that the members are as follows: one for the province of British Columbia, three for the province of Alberta, one for Saskatchewan and one for Manitoba. There are eight for Ontario, four for Quebec, one for New Brunswick, none for Nova Scotia, none for Prince Edward Island and none for Newfoundland. So, on a regional basis, the western region has six, Ontario eight, Quebec four and the Atlantic provinces one.

I would suggest to the minister that representatives of great efficiency in the Atlantic region can be found from the labour organizations; mining industry; fisheries industry—which is one of the great industries of Canada and is getting greater every day; from our forestry industries—we have 10 pulp and paper mills in my province; from agriculture—we provide potatoes for the whole of the nation; and secondary manufacturing.

The board members currently total 19, with the new appointments. There is legislative provision for three full-time members—currently there is only one—and 25 part-time members, for a total of 28.

Would the minister please inquire as to why the Atlantic region is under-represented, and what action will be taken in the near future to correct that under-representation?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take the representations that have been made by the honourable senator and refer them to the government—and, in this case, to the Prime Minister's Office.

I believe there is one error in the summation that was made. It was pointed out that there were three from Alberta. There are not three from Alberta, but two. Indeed, Alberta was without representation on the Economic Council for many months. I believe that two were appointed, as has been pointed out, in the last four weeks or so. We are cognizant of the fact that there are a large number of vacancies on that council before it is brought up to the figure of 25, and I recognize, as clearly as the honourable senator, that there are some important industries and sectors in Atlantic Canada that should be represented. Indeed, when I was a member of that council—for approximately four years—I believe there were three or four members from Atlantic Canada.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I believe the minister suggested that there were only two from Alberta.

Senator Olson: That is right.

Senator McElman: One member remains from the former group. He is Mr. Ralph G. M. Sultan, from Calgary. The two newly appointed are Mr. Alastair Ross, from Calgary, and Mr. Patrick Shimbashi, also of Alberta.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take that back. Mr. Sultan must have moved from Montreal to Alberta since he was appointed. He was appointed in Montreal, from the bank.

TRANSPORT

VIA RAIL—REPRESENTATION OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES ON BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government, or the Minister of State for Economic Development, has given an answer to the question raised previously by Senator McElman about the appointment of a director for VIA Rail from New Brunswick or the Atlantic provinces.

● (1440)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, may I put a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate? A few weeks ago I asked for information about the profits of Petrofina before it was sold to Petro-Canada, and also about the takes paid yearly by Petrofina.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that information has certainly not been made available to me as yet. Perhaps it has been made available to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I do not have the information with me, but I think it would be relatively easy to obtain one of the annual reports of the company.

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPE LINES—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question that I would like to address to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

I see that Trans Quebec & Maritimes Pipe Lines Inc. has reached a conclusion as to how much assistance it will require in order to construct its line, and that the figure mentioned is $300 million. My question is: Does the federal government intend to give a speedy and affirmative answer to that request?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Well, honourable senators, the senator knows that that application is now before the National Energy Board, and I think, although I am not absolutely sure of this, that the figures and recommendations he has just quoted from TQ and M form part of the submission made by the representatives of that company to the National Energy Board. The honourable senator, I am sure, would certainly not want me to comment on what is before that body, which is judicial in nature, or at least quasi-judicial, at this time.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The National Energy Program, when it was announced concurrently with the budget, promised $500 million to assist in the construction of gas pipelines on both coasts. The commitment of assistance to the Vancouver Island pipeline now seems in doubt. I see that the minister lifts his head when I say this, as if he were in a state of shock, but my reason for making that statement is that on February 24 last the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Perrault, took notice of questions from Senator Nurgitz and Senator Austin, who asked if the government's commitment stood, regardless of which company was awarded the west coast contract. The Leader of the Government in the Senate promised to bring a statement to the Senate on the question, something that to my knowledge has not yet taken place.

It does seem to me that the delay in answering that rather straightforward question casts some doubt on the quality of the answers that we might expect. If there is any doubt, and perhaps the minister will disabuse me if there is none, I would ask: Is it likewise the case that the government may not honour its commitment on the east coast either?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Donahoe is going to be frustrated if he thinks he is going to drag me into a debate in which I ought not to be a participant. He knows very well that no transprovincial pipelines are built in the areas he is talking about—and this includes the one on the west coast which crosses the body of water between Vancouver Island and the mainland—without applications being filed before the National Energy Board, so that that board may hear the submission and the arguments supporting the submission.

The honourable senator also knows what the government's commitment has been because he just read it out, but to draw me or any other minister into a debate dealing with the pros and cons of those applications, as he knows very well, is improper conduct. Therefore I am not going to be dragged into such a discussion.

Senator Donahoe: I have another supplementary. I take issue with the suggestion that my conduct is improper.

Senator Olson: You are asking me to do an improper thing, and I am refusing to do so. It is that simple.

Senator Donahoe: I was really not aware that what I was asking the honourable minister to do was in any sense improper, because unless I am mistaken it is the Trans Quebec & Maritimes Pipe Lines Inc., and no other company, which will build the gas line to the maritimes, if one is built.

On October 29, in this house, the minister said that the government is determined that the line will be built. On October 30 he quoted, in this house, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as saying, in the other place, that in order to proceed rapidly with the construction, and if necessary, a bill will be introduced to achieve that purpose. Now the company appears to have fixed its requirement at $300 million. That is a contribution which I am frank to admit, considered in a certain way, is only of the value of $200 million, but my question was a very simple one, and one that I would have thought the minister would be free to answer. Does the government intend to keep its promise with respect to this pipeline, or not?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, that is not exactly the way the honourable senator put the question a few minutes ago. He was asking me then to comment on certain submissions that had been made to the National Energy Board. For me to do that, in my view, would be improper conduct. One does not comment on those kinds of applications when they are before regulatory bodies.

Furthermore, the honourable senator does not need constantly to ask whether the government is going to keep its promises, because the government always does.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—CRISIS—SAFETY OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the serious situation that is developing in Poland, what has been done to ensure the safety of Canadians in the event that the situation continues to deteriorate?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there are approximately 235 Canadians resident in Poland who are registered with our embassy in Warsaw, about 80 of whom live in the Warsaw area. The remainder live in other widely dispersed locations.

Honourable senators may be interested in the occupational breakdown of our countrymen living in Poland. This is as follows: Canadians and their dependents studying at Polish universities, 85; Canadians who have re-established themselves in Poland on retirement, 70; employees, and a few dependents, of Canadian firms employed on contract work, 40; embassy staff and dependents, 40.

I have been assured by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that should a threat to their safety develop as a consequence of future events, the government will do what it can to assist those who wish to leave to do so.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, the first category was students at Polish universities, and there are 85 of them. I missed the second category, however. Would the Government Leader in the Senate please repeat that?

Senator Perrault: They are Canadians who have re-established themselves in Poland on retirement. In other words, these are people who have retired from the Canadian work force and have opted to return to Poland for their retirement. There are 70 of those.

LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—OBSERVER STATUS FOR SENATORS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will recall that Senator Marshall asked a question on March 17 about possible Senate representation at the Law of the Sea Conference in New York. I had a personal meeting with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and he has this afternoon asked me to convey to the Senate an invitation to have two senators, one from the opposition and one from the government, present at all of the Law of the Sea meetings in New York between March 19 and the twenty-fourth. The conference is now under way. I hope that we can meet with the Leader of the Opposition at some time soon to establish the name of someone from the opposition who will attend that conference, which is scheduled to meet from March 19 to April 24.

● (1450)

Senator Frith: Oh, April 24.

Senator Perrault: Did I say March 24?

An Hon. Senator: That is quite an invitation ex post facto.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Perrault: We are not asking you to live in the past any more than you are at the present time.

Senator Frith: The sun has not been shining in your eyes that long.

Senator Perrault: The sun will set on the Conservative Party opposite in the chamber later this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: You have always been in the dark!

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—IMPLICATIONS OF 200-MILE LIMIT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on March 18 concerning negotiations between Canada and France regarding the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

Information on the negotiations which took place between Canada and France in 1979 remains confidential, since the negotiations are ongoing and the bargaining positions of both sides must be safeguarded.

EL SALVADOR—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA AND PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Asselin on March 18 concerning discussions between Prime Minister Trudeau and President Reagan about El Salvador.

Although the positions of the respective governments were explained during discussions between the Prime Minister and President Reagan, Canada was not specifically asked to undertake any action on the subject by the President.

EAST COAST FISHERIES AND MARITIME BOUNDARY TREATIES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have a delayed answer to the question asked by Senator Marshall on March 19 concerning scallop stocks and renegotiation with the United States over the East Coast Fisheries and Maritime Boundary Treaties.

The fact that Nova Scotia draggers have already been apprehended for fishing undersized scallops does not necessarily indicate that the catch has mostly been taken. This does, however, point to the urgent need for conservation on both sides.

Because of U.S. efforts in recent years to increase its share, scallops are declining in abundance, and this is showing up in the size of the catch. The standards set are 40 meats per pound, which ensures that scallops on the ground are left to grow to a reasonable size. The scallops referred to amounted to 55 meats per pound.

The U.S. Senate is about to ratify the Boundary Adjudication Treaty which is a pre-condition that the U.S. has set before it will negotiate a fish management plan.

Efforts by the Canadian government, including representations made by the Prime Minister to President Reagan, and representations made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to U.S. officials, focussed on the urgent need for a management plan, not only for scallops but for other species as well. We are still awaiting the U.S. response on this matter.

Senator Doody: How many scallops to a pound?

Senator Perrault: Fifty-five per pound.

Senator Doody: Those are of the larger size?

Senator Perrault: Those are of the smaller size.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

HIS EXCELLENCY F. P. FULCI, AMBASSADOR OF ITALY, AND MRS. FULCI

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am pleased to bring to your attention the presence in the South Gallery of His Excellency F. P. Fulci, Ambassador of Italy to Canada, and Mrs. Fulci.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would like to begin by referring to the kind concern of the Honourable Senator Connolly, who said that the sun was shining on the Conservative benches. I am sure that all honourable senators opposite who wish that they were Conservatives realize that the sun always shines on Conservatives, which is why we are so often right.

Honourable senators who have preceded me in participating in this discussion have referred to the report of the Joint Committee on the Constitution. It is easy for me, honourable senators, to join in the sentiments expressed, and it is indeed a pleasure to extend congratulations to the committee members for their work.

Groups presenting briefs to the committee came from varying regions, cultures and political backgrounds. They clearly demonstrated that Canadians, in spite of our differences, still form a cohesive and free nation under the present Constitution. The committee meetings were extensive, yet the committee failed to justify the need for the new Constitution. One brief would support one viewpoint, and the next day another brief would oppose that viewpoint. The briefs all questioned the future effect of this resolution; they questioned the amendment and its effect on Canada's future. Honourable senators, I think this is a most important point; one worthy of our consideration. There were many briefs presented, but I am not aware of one which supported the entire resolution, and surely that must tell us something.

The only unanimous support for this resolution that I am aware of came from the Liberal and NDP caucuses. The unanimous support from the NDP caucus terminated when the honourable member for Yorkton-Melville decided that he could no longer support Mr. Broadbent's blind allegiance to Prime Minister Trudeau. Honourable senators, there are those occasions in Parliament when someone comes forward and displays a lot of courage. Mr. Nystrom displayed that type of courage in taking his position, and I respect him very much for what he has done. He was placed on that committee because he was his party's expert on the Constitution and on dominion-provincial relations. I suppose I should follow the pattern established by my good friend, Senator Donahoe, and apologize for using the term, "dominion-provincial." That is no longer in vogue. However, I think it is still appropriate. The honourable member listened to the briefs; he considered them seriously; and he made up his own mind. I had the pleasure, when I was substituting as a member, to sit alongside him, and I discussed various problems with him. He came out of that committee with a new viewpoint. He changed his mind, and he had the courage to say so. Honourable senators, that shows one basic fact: Parliament does work, even if it is only on rare occasions. Mr. Nystrom has shown that Parliament does work.

The actions of Mr. Nystrom produced some interesting horsetrading, honourable senators. In the fashion in vogue in professional sports, the NDP demanded compensation from the Grits, whose first proposal was, "We will give you back Senator Argue." But, naturally, his former colleagues, who know him quite well, refused to take him back. After considerable trading back and forth, the Grits offered Senator Steuart as partial payment, and the NDP accepted him as partial payment—mind you, a very small part. They accepted Senator Steuart, but they also demanded the future rights to two Grit senators. I have found it rather interesting, honourable senators, to see various Grit senators manoeuvring themselves into position to be drafted by the NDP. I find it curious also that Stanley Knowles has been looking this chamber over, trying to decide which of the two Grits he will draft into the New Democratic Party.

Honourable senators, I had my secretary draw up a list of the objections that were raised by government supporters when this resolution was introduced last October. That list is most interesting. I do not intend to embarrass anyone here by giving the names of the senators and stating what their objections were. I will simply remind honourable senators that last October certain government supporters did have objections to unilateral action; certain senators did have objections to the provisions having to do with language rights, and how immigrants coming into Quebec would be affected, and so on; and certain government supporters did raise objections with respect to women's rights.

Now those objections have suddenly been forgotten. We now find Grit senators hastening to support the resolution; but in doing so they swallow themselves.

This is the season, honourable senators, for awards like "Emmys" and "Oscars", and for the best performances to date I feel I must nominate the Honourable Senator Steuart and the Honourable Senator Godfrey. They are in a particular class by themselves, and I am sure they will receive the Pepto-Bismal award for indigestion after having swallowed themselves.

It is dangerous to make political predictions. They have a habit of coming back and haunting the person making them. However, I will stick my neck out by saying that Senator Godfrey will soon be joining Senator Steuart in the NDP caucus.

It is not my intention to discuss the strictly legal aspects of the resolution, honourable senators, but rather to discuss the legitimacy or, as the Prime Minister described it, the moral aspect of the procedure being followed by the federal government. The legitimacy, as I think of it, is the demand or the unspoken consensus initiating or preceding any government legislation. In other words, you do not pass a piece of legislation unless there is some general public demand for it. The legality of the procedure should be decided by the Supreme Court. As Senator Nurgitz has stated, the Constitution should receive the same legal consideration as a prostitution case. He was advised that you do not discuss a certain prostitution case because it is before the Supreme Court; yet, honourable senators, we in this chamber discuss the Constitution while it is before the court.

I have often heard the Honourable Senator Frith refer to Beauchesne. In fact, on occasion he even pretends to have read it. I would ask the Honourable Senator Frith to have a look at page 118 and page 119 of the Fifth Edition of Beauchesne, section 338, subsection (4).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I would not want to spoil your allegation by reading it, because then I would be able to say I had actually read it.

Senator Phillips: I think it would do you good, Senator Frith, to read something, and in particular Beauchesne, since you often quote it to us on this side.

Senator Frith: If you think it will do me good, doctor, I will read it.

Senator Phillips: Good. Section 338(4) reads as follows:

> The reference of a bill to the Supreme Court of Canada withdraws that bill temporarily from the jurisdiction of Parliament. If the constitutional situation of human rights is submitted to the Supreme Court, it thereby becomes sub-judice and cannot be considered by a committee of the House until the Court has given its decision. The question cannot be before two public bodies at the same time.

• (1510)

I recall several Grits saying that this resolution deals with human rights. I ask the Honourable Senator Frith to take a close look at section 338(4) of Beauchesne.

It is my hope that the Supreme Court will be given the opportunity to deal with the legal aspects of this resolution before it is sent to Westminster. What would happen if this resolution was passed and sent to Westminster before the Supreme Court had an opportunity to hear the case and render its decision? Would the Supreme Court be allowed to continue its hearings after the British Parliament had voted on the resolution? Will Canadians be denied their right of appeal to our Supreme Court?

It is even more interesting, honourable senators, if we ask the basic question: What would happen if this matter were referred to the British Parliament, passed by that institution, and the Supreme Court of Canada subsequently said that it was unconstitutional? Surely honourable senators will consider this scenario before they decide to vote in favour of the resolution.

Earlier I mentioned the unspoken consensus that should initiate legislation. I ask honourable senators to bear with me while I look for that unspoken consensus. It will be very hard to find a consensus for the proposals contained in the resolution which is to be sent to the British Parliament. Such a consensus does not exist among the provinces because eight out of the ten provinces oppose the resolution and the other two provinces, Ontario and New Brunswick, have given only qualified support to the resolution and, in fact, have some very severe reservations. The Gallup polls are also another source of consensus. Such polls are a favourite of politicians. But the government will not find support in the Gallup polls because they show that two out of every three Canadians oppose the resolution and that only 22 per cent, or one out of every four Canadians, support the government's action.

In an attempt to be fair, I suggest that another place to look for consensus is among the provincial Liberal parties, but there is very little support there as well. In fact, the largest provincial Liberal Party in Canada, the Quebec Liberal Party, opposes the resolution. Indeed, Mr. Ryan, the leader of the Quebec Liberal Party, says that if he is elected on April 13 he intends to pick up the telephone and say, "Hey, boss, back to the bargaining table." I presume that the Liberal Party of Canada anticipates that Mr. Ryan will be elected. If that is the case, it would be logical that the government put this resolution in abeyance until after Mr. Ryan has made his telephone call to Prime Minister Trudeau.

Perhaps it is more than coincidence that the government is now imposing closure to terminate the debate on this subject. Is it possible the government wants to get the debate over with before April 13 simply because Mr. Ryan may win and could cause some embarrassment to the federal government if it had to deal with him as the Premier of Quebec? I believe that that is the reason for the government's imposition of closure on the debate on the resolution.

The thought has just occurred to me that we are the only free nation in the world which intends to develop a constitution through closure. It is not something of which we should be proud.

Let us go beyond the legislatures and parliaments in our search for support. Naturally, I do not expect to find such support among Conservatives, but I would like to take a look at the prominent Liberals of our time. There is the Honourable Jack Pickersgill, a prominent Newfoundland Liberal who, I believe, was referred to as the "grey eminence" of the Liberal Party. He is opposed to the constitutional procedure. There is also Mr. Gordon Robertson, who was a long-time constitutional adviser to the present Prime Minister before he was dropped, and he opposes the government's plan. I can also think of the Honourable John Turner, who is known and respected by a good many people in this chamber. He opposes the resolution.

● (1520)

Honourable senators, where is the support for this resolution? The only support I can find is from the Liberal caucus, and even that support is not wholehearted. We have heard a variety of excuses, honourable senators, for supporting the resolution; they are excuses, they are not reasons. Surely we should have reasons for supporting the resolution and not political excuses. Instead, honourable senators, we are told that Canada must have a strong central government. I suppose that has a certain public appeal, but a strong federal government has to have a function and should be dealing with the problems facing the country today.

Senator Fournier has stated that we should be dealing with the urgent problems such as high interest rates and inflation—rampant inflation at 12.2 per cent.

The federal government says that the provinces are too strong. A very simple test of the strength of the governments is to examine their spending power. Let us have a look at the amount spent by each of the three levels of government as related to GNP which passed through government coffers. The federal government, in 1980, spent about 42 per cent and, strangely enough, that was an increase over 1979 of 1.5 per cent; the provinces spent 30 per cent; and the municipalities spent 21 per cent. Those figures belie the argument that the provinces are too powerful.

The federal government's approach to the Constitution is based not on the past performance of a parliamentary system and on the development of our country, but, rather, it is based on a vague concept of a modern Canada. Who can forget Mr. Chrétien's plaintive, petulant cry, "I want a modern Canada"? It is very effective on television, honourable senators, to say, "I want a modern Canada," but what does the concept of a modern Canada imply?

Throughout the world there are a number of modern democracies which are vastly different from our concept of democracy, a concept that has worked extremely well in this country. Recent news broadcasts have shown that the Soviet praesidium, or parliament, meets whenever it is convenient for the Communist leaders. The delegates of that Parliament have said, "We do not need any debate; we do not need any consideration; the leaders already know what is best for the people. Therefore, there is no opposition." Is that the type of modern Canada you want, honourable senators? Is that what is meant by a "modern" Canada?

Canada was founded on the compact theory of Confederation. The provinces created a federal government to assume certain joint responsibilities such as the Post Office and defence. I will resist the temptation to comment on how effective the federal government has been in those two fields, except to say that they will both be crown corporations within five to ten years. The provinces retained the responsibility for the needs of the people in the regions, and they were considered equals, regardless of the size of the province. This concept has suddenly changed.

I would point out how this concept has changed. In 1921, Sir Robert Borden stated:

> Confederation was enacted by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Necessary amendments have been effected by subsequent acts, passed by the Parliament upon joint resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons and no such amendments have been refused. Doubtless, the Canadian Parliament would hesitate to pass any such resolution if its effects would be properly regarded as a violation of the original contract between the provinces. In any such case it would be proper and, indeed, necessary to obtain the consent of every province affected by the proposed amendment.

In the interval since 1921, there has been a complete reversal of the attitude of the federal government. For some strange reason, this present government has a mandate for change. Why? It says, "We have a majority in Parliament." Honourable senators, a majority in Parliament is not a new situation. Sir Robert Borden had a majority in Parliament. The Right Honourable William Lyon Mackenzie King had a majority in Parliament, and he did not use it to ride roughshod over the provinces. The Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent had a majority, a majority that was based, largely, on his Quebec support, and he co-operated with the provinces. The Right Honourable John Diefenbaker had the biggest majority of any Canadian Prime Minister. He met with the provinces and attempted to overcome the differences and, indeed, succeeded in overcoming a good many of the problems, including several of the problems facing Quebec at that time.

The change in the Liberal philosophy appears to have originated with the present Prime Minister. I would ask my Liberal colleagues in this chamber: Have you had the opportunity at a Liberal meeting to review and consider this anti-provincial stance that your party has taken, or do you get that opportunity in a modern Canada? Today a small parliamentary majority—it is a small one—has been used as an excuse for ignoring and even belittling the provinces and the two out of three Canadians who oppose the constitutional proposals.

One hundred and forty-four Grits in the House of Commons, and somewhere in the vicinity of 60 Grits in this chamber, are riding roughshod over the wishes of about 15 million Canadians. Is this the type of modern Canada that you really want? The present resolution is only the first step in the constitutional proposals. I ask honourable senators to recall what the Minister of Justice said on October 6 when he introduced the resolution in the other place. He said: "We have the ball; we will run with it." He went on to say:

> The second stage of constitutional reform will deal with division of powers and with the updating—

And I use his term "updating".

> —of our political institutions.

If I may, honourable senators, I would ask you to bear with me while I take a moment to go through some of his comments in a speech on February 17. On that occasion the honourable minister asked:

> Why do we need in Canada an amending formula that has some flexibility? The answer is very simple, that what we are doing today is the start of the process, not the end.

I ask you: Who created the impression that this resolution is our Constitution? Honourable senators, it is not. It is a very dangerous basis of federal control for the division of powers in changing our political institutions. Need we ask why the provinces oppose the present resolution? They will be helpless to oppose the imminent re-division of powers that is already on the drawing board. If anyone has any doubts that future unilateral action is being planned, I will read to you from page 7377 of the House of Commons Hansard. Mr. Chrétien says:

> Much reform has to be undertaken in Canada in future in terms of constitutional powers. For example, take the upper chamber, the Senate . . . some agreement will have to be reached on it.

I notice a few smirks on the faces of some senators opposite who seem to think that removal of the original section 44 has safeguarded them. May I remind you, honourable senators, that both the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister are still committed to your early demise?

On that same occasion the Minister of Justice went on to state:

> We will have to constitutionalize the Supreme Court, that will have to be done some day.

Honourable senators, what does the Minister of Justice mean by constitutionalizing the Supreme Court? Is it to be expanded and packed with government supporters, or, as has been suggested in some quarters, is it to have a special section dealing with constitutional matters?

This would be an appropriate time to remind honourable senators that recently the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada mentioned his views. He emphatically pointed out that the Supreme Court serves all Canadians, not just the federal government. Obviously, the Minister of Justice does not think very much of the Supreme Court as it is presently constituted and presently performing. I hope that most honourable senators do not share that view.

Honourable senators, I want to point out to you that once the Senate has been removed, the Supreme Court has been constitutionalized, or, in effect, made a government institution, what will stop this government from dealing with the Constitution in the future? There is no check once these two institutions are removed.

Very shortly we are going to have to vote on this resolution. If you do not remember anything else in my wandering remarks today, I would ask you to bear in mind this as being worthy of your consideration: Once the two checks—the Senate and the Supreme Court—are removed, what is going to stop those constitutional bandits in their future plans?

I am sorry I am going on as long as the previous speaker, but I will attempt to shorten my remarks.

Honourable senators, I cannot leave my notes without referring to the real clincher in Mr. Chrétien's remarks where he said:

> The re-examination of the division of powers in Canada will have to be tackled. Some powers could be delegated to the provinces—

I point out to you that he says "delegated"; in other words, the federal government is deciding what they will give away. And then he says:

> —and, in the best interests of Canada, some powers could be transferred to the national government.

Honourable senators, what powers does Mr. Chrétien plan to transfer from the provinces to the federal government? What responsibility is going to be removed from the Province of New Brunswick? What function will be taken over by the federal government?

The question that we should have uppermost in our minds is: Quo vadis?—Where are we going from here? What happens when this resolution is passed? What type of country will we have in five to ten years?

Let us consider the provincial status. Will we still have 10 provinces? Will the provinces still have the same responsibilities and significance, or will the premiers be considered as puppets of the Prime Minister, and the legislatures as subsidiaries of the federal government?

Mr. Chrétien also stated:

> It is very important also that we strengthen our economic union in Canada.

I am not going to elaborate on that except to say that means one thing, and that is more economic power to the federal government.

● (1540)

Government supporters say that we are going to have federal-provincial conferences or first ministers' conferences. That supposedly is a generous feature on behalf of the federal government. They don't have to do it because if they ring the bells the Liberal majority will vote in favour of them at any time.

I looked about for a situation that would be comparable to a premier coming into a conference. It would be similar to a bank manager calling a client, who has borrowed money on a demand note, and saying, "I want repayment"—and the client doesn't have the money. All the high cards will be held by the federal government, and it will use them.

Equalization payments will be directly tied to the powers the provinces are willing to yield. If honourable senators have any doubt about that fact, I would refer them to the present negotiations for health care grants and university grants. The provinces say that both are being reduced. Look now and in the future for equalization grants to be tied to the yielding of provincial powers.

The oil rich provinces may be able to protect us for a while, but only for a while, until the federal government has complete control of the oil and gas revenues.

Honourable senators, it doesn't matter whether the oil and gas are under the Rockies, the prairies or off the Atlantic coast; the mark of Marc is already on those revenues.

Then, when the first ministers' conference has failed, we will have a referendum. I would point out that a referendum is a very one-sided situation. I will attempt to abbreviate my notes by saying that the Honourable John Turner has stated that a referendum is foreign to our system: it undermines Parliament; it undermines the legislatures; and it is foreign to the compact theory of Confederation.

The federal government, in an effort to persuade the public that a referendum is all right, states that the 10 provinces can appoint one individual to the referendum commission. Do honourable senators honestly expect western Canada to accept someone from the Atlantic provinces? Do they honestly expect Ontario to accept someone from Quebec, or vice versa? Naturally, the provinces would like to be represented individually or even regionally. I would remind honourable senators that we saw evidence of that in this chamber when the joint committee was being established. All of us, representing our various regions, wanted to see our region represented on the joint committee. The same situation will apply with respect to a referendum.

A friend of mine who is a distinguished lawyer in this city, and also Dr. Ruth Gorman of Calgary, whose articles I am sure all honourable senators have read, have expressed concern about the due process of law being omitted from the charter. I will not presume to lecture my distinguished legal colleagues in this chamber, but I would point out that the due process of law was established in Magna Carta; the legal precedents are established, and I believe that at times even a layman understands it. We now find that a new system and new precedents will have to be established. I would like to hear from my distinguished legal colleagues in this chamber on that very point.

The Charter of Rights has received more criticism than most sections of the resolution. The charter provides for the freedom of conscience in religion, but for some unexplained reason it does not mention property rights.

When we are establishing a Constitution, we should anticipate situations that might arise. I would ask honourable senators: What would happen if someone said, "My religion says that I am entitled to own property."? Perhaps the basic reason why the government does not want to put property rights in is the fact that it realizes that Canadians can no longer afford to own their own homes. In most cases the two partners in a marriage must work in order to pay interest rates of 15 and 16 per cent, and monthly interest payments of $1,000.

After having spent a lifetime in the struggle to pay for a home, are we then going to turn around and tell those people, "Fine. You have done well, but you haven't got the right to own your own home."? Millions of Canadians came to our shores because they wanted to own their own home, their own farm, their own business. Will the information that we hand out to possible immigrants in the future say, "You don't have property rights in Canada."? I would like to expand a little more on that, honourable senators, but I realize that I have already taken considerable time. Therefore, I will shorten my remarks in that regard.

Honourable senators, we in this chamber often become annoyed with the House of Commons telling us to pass legislation. In fact, I have often heard Senator Bosa say that we have no right to refuse to pass legislation. It is a rather strange philosophy. But the present government has gone one step further—

Hon. Peter Bosa: Would the honourable senator permit a question? Since he mentioned my name, would he elaborate on what I am supposed to have said?

Senator Phillips: I would be delighted to spend some time with the honourable senator and point out to him the numerous occasions on which he has said the very thing that I have referred to. If he does not mind, in view of the fact that I have had the floor for approximately 40 minutes, although I started out with the intention of taking only 20, I would like to ask the honourable senator to allow me to see him later on this matter.

We in this chamber often complain that we are told to pass something. The present government has gone one step further than that, and has said to the Mother of Parliaments, "You pass this resolution—or else!" Honourable senators, I have a booklet here which I am sure you have all received, entitled, "The Role of the United Kingdom in the Amendment of the Canadian Constitution." It seems that the British Parliament is getting the same instructions as we so often get.

When the Statute of Westminster was passed, the Canadian provinces requested the British Parliament to retain the right to approve amendments. The British Parliament did not insist on it, if my memory serves me correctly. It was, rather, the Provinces of Ontario and British Columbia who at that time were the leading lights in the argument. Now we are telling the British Parliament to ignore the provinces, to forget their moral obligation to hear and consider the arguments of the provinces. It is my view, honourable senators, that the British Parliament should hear the provinces.

Honourable senators, you will be pleased to know that I am about to close my remarks, but I cannot do that without making a few references to quotes. On Monday the Prime Minister quoted a number of distinguished Canadians—Conservatives—and I think it would be only fair if I were to put on the record a few quotations from a mediocre Canadian, one who professes to be a Liberal, and one who has complained that he has been in a straitjacket for 54 years.

I ask honourable senators to have a look at the House of Commons Hansard for January 26, 1970. There we find this Canadian saying:

> I, personally, went on record as saying that of all the urgent problems facing Canada, in my view the constitution had lowest priority.

For some reason, that Canadian became Prime Minister of Canada, and in 1971 Peter Ward, on interviewing the same right honourable gentleman, quoted him as saying:

> "Constitutional reform is something Canada can live without, a fact demonstrated by all the premiers after a series of conferences," said Trudeau. He reminded Toronto newsmen that in 1967, at the Confederation of Tomorrow Conference, he had opposed tackling constitutional reform.

Obviously he did not find the straitjacket too confining a mere 10 years ago.

Later on, honourable senators, we find in House of Commons Hansard for April 9, 1976, the present Prime Minister stating:

> It is for these reasons that I have raised the possibility that Parliament might seek to have "patriation" accomplished without provincial consent if that consent seems impossible to achieve. Clearly it would be a last resort, and clearly it should not be on a basis that could affect the distribution of powers or the position of the provinces. It must not provide any means by which Parliament could act unilaterally in future in any area where it cannot do so today, since that would erode the essence of our federal system.

Honourable senators, this resolution not only erodes our system; it endangers the country. When the bells ring for the final vote I ask you to remember that.

Thank you for your indulgence.

[Translation]

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Honourable senators, allow me to draw your attention to the presence in the gallery of the Italian ambassador to Canada, His Excellency Paolo Fulci, accompanied by his lovely wife, and by his assistant, Dr. Antonio Venturella and his wife.

Mi fà piacere vederle ascoltare il mio discorso.

As I said in Italian, "I am glad to see you came to hear my speech."

[Senator Phillips.]

Honourable senators, first of all I want to commend the members of the joint committee, our colleagues the senators as well as the members from the House of Commons. I also want to express my appreciation for the outstanding work of the two joint-chairmen, Honourable Senator Hays and the honourable member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, Mr. Serge Joyal, who surely did not have an easy task during their term of office.

I thank the Honourable Jean Chrétien for having made amendments to the resolution, particularly to Section 23, which was of special concern to me, as I told you on October 27 last.

As you know, I am one of those who were strongly opposed to the carrying of section 23 as initially set forth in the constitutional package. I therefore put forward an amendment, not without toil and sweat, the essence of which was retained in the form of an amendment by our government.

Moreover, I have been pleasantly surprised by recent rumors which were eventually confirmed that the Quebec Liberal Party had also changed its position on the language rights, as set out in its Beige Book.

At its general assembly two weeks ago, the Quebec Liberal Party agreed to what has been called the "Canada clause". It includes the first paragraph of the proposal I made last October 27. The mother tongue will no longer be the only criterion, but school attendance of the parents will also be considered. This proves that the Quebec Liberal Party has understood that using only the criterion of the mother tongue would have created discrimination against a large part of the Quebec population and that it would have caused substantial implementation problems.

In spite of all the amendments which have been made, several of our colleagues have expressed some reserve in their speeches and some of them have even opposed the resolution. As for me, after listening very carefully to many speeches and following very closely the reactions of provincial leaders and experts, I still have certain concerns.

In my speech of October 12, 1978, I said in this assembly, and I still maintain today, that to obtain positive results we would have to rely on the goodwill of all our political leaders.

So, I would like to tell you about the actions of several premiers who have constantly opposed the resolution from the very beginning.

If only their efforts and their energies had been harnessed for something positive, I firmly believe that they could have suggested an alternative on behalf of all Canadians. However, as each only wants to defend his own interests, they cannot reach a consensus, and it seems impossible for them to relate to Canadians as a nation.

When the federal government wants a province to share its wealth, such as the oil resources of the western provinces, with the rest of Canada, Ontario agrees wholeheartedly. However, if the federal government asks Ontario to protect the rights of its Francophone minority, Ontario unfortunately turns a deaf ear to this suggestion and if too hard-pressed would rather withdraw its support of the federal proposal.

Quebec will not be bound to protect its Anglophone minority, especially since little concern is shown in Ontario for the Francophone minority.

Yet, it would be up to Ontario to lead the way and show the other provinces that it is not only willing to benefit from the rest of Canada, but that it can make sacrifices to meet and especially respect the needs of all Canadians.

I hope the Ontario government will realize the importance of implementing section 133 and that our Ontario colleagues both in the Senate and the House of Commons will make a point of reminding the Government and the people of Ontario that they should also respect their minorities and, at the same time, the minorities within the Canadian entity.

I realize that it is much more rewarding when we return to our respective regions to be perceived as bearers of good tidings, for instance to announce to our western farmers that the government will pay the difference in the prices of wheat, or to our western cattlemen that it will use the Customs Tariff to protect them, or to our Ontario industrialists that it will not dare raise the price of oil to the world level. Yet, the people of western Canada should also be told that they must learn to share their oil resources with the rest of Canada, just as the people of Ontario should be told that they must learn to protect their Francophone minority and thus show that they appreciate what the people of Quebec have always done to protect their Anglophone minority.

Let it be known that it is not easy for us, as Quebec members of the Senate and the House of Commons, to support this resolution which involves the protection of the English-speaking minority within Quebec. We are being attacked from all quarters, and these include a good section of the population, the Quebec government and the French-language media. Yet, we do not shy away from supporting the resolution and we do recognize that it is necessary if not essential, under the present circumstances in Canada, to make sure that our minorities are protected and our wealth is shared, in the best interests of all our fellow-Canadians.

I do not say this because I do not trust our provincial governments, but because I know what political egotism is, and I submit that if we do not entrench in our Constitution certain basic rights, there will always be governments which will be tempted, to gain votes, to favour their majorities at the expense of their minorities.

It is said in several quarters that we should go back to the bargaining table, but I suggest that it would be pointless because we probably would not reach any consensus. I am thus lead to believe that we do not have the slightest indication that we should think there has been a change of attitude on the part of the provinces since the last federal-provincial conference held last summer.

I very well understand the concerns of some of my colleagues, such as my honourable friends, Senators Deschatelets and Thompson who want a negotiated consensus before going to London, and I share their belief that this would be an ideal solution. However, in view of the lack of such a consensus for all the reasons that I have stated earlier, I am convinced that between the "no action" position of some and the determination of the others to patriate the Constitution, it is obviously more logical to go along with the view of the federal government, namely, to go ahead, subject to correcting whatever shortcomings could show up in the future.

This government has shown flexibility and a great deal of goodwill by adopting several of the amendments suggested by the positive elements of the Canadian people who have agreed to contribute in the drafting of the resolution. All these things being considered, I think, honourable senators, that the federal government deserves our support so that the process of patriation may go on, in the sole interest of the Canadian people without any partisan bias.

It will be the last time that we have to turn to the British Parliament in order to get approval for what our own Parliament is going to decide. And even if some people would like us to believe that it is the British government who will decide for us, I still disagree. The only thing that Westminster will have to do will be to approve our resolution and return our Constitution to us so that our country may then become fully independent.

Since October I have been staging meetings with various groups and segments of our society. I see that Senator Flynn does not seem to agree. He seems to find it funny.

Senator Flynn: Go on, my friend.

Senator Rizzuto: The discussions dealt with the Constitution. After the discussions, the vast majority of the participants were showing their impatience and asking: "When will we see an end to all this? Will the Constitution be patriated soon?"

I was reminded of the typical Quebec saying: "When is the baby due?", when one of our colleagues from the other side told us last week that instead of a natural birth, we would have a Caesarean. I agree, and I prefer a Caesarean to the risk of endangering the lives of both mother and child. There are hundreds of thousands of mothers who have had Caesareans and who are now enjoying very good health.

One of the concerns that prompted me to accept my appointment to the Upper Chamber, namely the protection of minorities of all kinds in Canada, has always meant a lot to me. Moreover, I believe it should be one of the priorities of this chamber. And I suggest that the enshrining of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is an additional guarantee that minority rights will be respected.

Honourable senators, I am no specialist in constitutional law, as some senators are, nevertheless, I shall try to contribute to this thorny debate by relying on logic and drawing inspiration from the yearnings, needs and interests of all Canadians.

● (1610)

[English]

Hon. Guy Williams: Honourable senators, it is with much pride, as a first citizen of this great Indian hunting ground known as Canada, that I rise in my place today to participate in this historic debate respecting the new Canadian Constitution package which is presently before the chamber for final decision and/or passage. In common with those honourable members of the Senate who have preceded me in this deliberation, I support patriation of the Constitution. Patriation, with or without the entrenchment of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is the least of my concerns, however, because I have every faith that the procedures of the Mother Parliament in England will be followed conclusively to the satisfaction of the Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada and particularly to the satisfaction of the people of this country.

What I am concerned with, honourable senators, is the complete lack of clarity in the section of the resolution dealing with the aboriginal rights of the native Indians of Canada, whether they be treaty or non-treaty status Indians.

Not too long ago we witnessed on television, and read about in the daily papers, the rejoicing of certain Indian leaders and delegates of certain national and provincial Indian organizations following the announcement by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, on which I had the honour and privilege to sit as a member for five days, that the committee would amend the resolution so that it would in fact recognize aboriginal rights. What they were rejoicing about, I do not know.

In perusing the pertinent section of the Constitution package, I did not find any positive recognition of any aboriginal rights. Neither did I find any basis for Indian land settlements. Rather, I found that the native Indians will still have to go to the courts for recognition of their aboriginal rights, and that the governments of the land will only recognize the decision of the courts regarding aboriginal rights and land claims. That is sort of putting the cart before the horse. On one side of the coin the amendment makes reference only to aboriginal rights of the native peoples of Canada, while on the other side it leaves it up to the federal and provincial courts to interpret the section. Well, that is not good enough. More clarity is required in order to satisfy the native peoples of Canada.

It would appear, moreover, that while the pertinent section may strengthen the existing treaty rights, there is no clear definition with respect to the rights of non-treaty Indians, and I am particularly concerned for those non-treaty Indians in my province of British Columbia.

Ultimately, honourable senators, what the amendment provides is for the courts to define aboriginal rights. The majority of the Indians in this country are critical of the amendment because it leaves to the Canadian judicial system the matter of defining and interpreting native treaty and aboriginal rights.

I want it clearly understood, honourable senators, that I shall be a most reluctant supporter of this resolution owing to its lack of recognition of aboriginal rights and the land claims of my people here in Canada, including the Inuit.

Honourable senators, at this time I wish to read to you a communication that was sent to me by a registered Indian. He does not belong to any Indian organization in the country and he wants to remain anonymous. The reason I want to repeat this communication, honourable senators, is that it brings to the surface the feeling of an Indian who is not a member of an organization or in any way connected with any government or the Department of Indian Affairs, and I think it will be useful to this debate. He states:

> The proposed new constitution of Canada does not contain the right and proper recognition of we First People, the Indians and Inuit.
> The proposed new constitution does not include and does not guarantee the terms of the treaties, the conditions and the legal and moral rights of we aboriginal people in this land.
> The new proposed constitution for Canada to be accepted must show its respect for the past history and how this land came about, and the continuing debt to my people, the Indians and Inuit. This must be in the constitution for the British Parliament to release it and for the Canadian House of Commons and Senate to accept it. If our way of life is not guaranteed in the constitution, how do we Indians and Inuit know that we will not be victims of some television Messiah, some hysterical politicians or some wave of public emotion that may feel that there is no obligation from the past and we may be destroyed by some temporary legal maneuvers.
> The British Parliament should not approve the handing back of Canada's constitution to our elected political powers without a guarantee contained in it for a discharge of the obligations forever of the British to we First People. The debt of the British and of the later nation of Canada was created and is an obligation of the present and coming Canadians. This obligation does not extend to new and other groups of people who seek to be Indians and Inuit, but to those who are designated at the present by the laws of this land as Indian and Inuit and those laws should not be changed as to designation without the full approval of our people. To extend the group to include others to make new legal classifications in itself is a violation of the rights and obligations to the Indians and Inuit. This glorious continent of North America was the land of my ancestors for thousands of years beyond count. Without the benefit of different discoveries my ancestors came to terms with nature. They lived their lives in close harmony with natural life. We Indians and Inuit achieved the ideal balance of life and living so that we did not have to make change for the sake of change, progress for the sake of progress, war for the sake of war or have our lives dictated by profit for others. We lived our lives, we lived for our survival, we lived, which is much more than can be said for many people of this world today.
> Who are you to say that we First People should change or have changed?
> Some centuries ago strangers invaded North America and through the use of the powers of destruction of life our world was changed.

Nature aided our resistance so that the invaders had to come to terms and they made solemn agreements, some in writing, undertakings and moral obligations to we First People. That obligation was the obligation of the British People and entrusted to their Parliament, and the British North America Act, the Royal Proclamation and the subsequent Indian Act which defines what is an Indian was all part of that obligation.

Some of these guarantees were pittances in the light of the uncontrolled inflation of this world today. But none of these terms have changed the deep and moral principle of obligation to we First People.

When that sprawling area of land now Canada was joined into a single nation, the British North America Act and the Indian Act became the laws that governed and isolated our lives. And we have respected them and we have lived by them and now we demand that in the new constitution the security that was guaranteed us once shall be enshrined in that new document. We Indians and Inuit had guarantees of protection for our survival and those guarantees were in the hands of the British people. Their record of faith to their obligations speaks for itself. We have now come to a time when the hand and control of the British people through their government is being removed from our constitution of Canada. All of the laws of all of the people living in this land are now to be entrusted to the elected political groups who will in future govern this land but subject to certain conditions of the new constitution. Before any new constitution can be accepted in principle by the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, it is their obligation to insist and it is the obligation of the House of Commons and Senate of Canada and of the legislatures of the provinces and of all of the citizens in Canada that there must be included in that constitution the guaranteed protection of the rights of Indians and Inuit as there was in the beginning, now and ever shall be.

Honourable senators will note that the last portion of the last line comes from the Bible.

While many of the speeches have been lengthy and repetitive, that is not my intention, and I will not keep honourable senators very long. However, I would like to digress for a moment and refer to some of my own observations and possibly to my conclusions on those observations.

While attempting to answer questions and to explain the constitutional package to an old Indian, he at one point shook his head, pointed his finger at me and said, "Listen, it will not work to our good." He went on to say, "No hunter can slide up a mountain. Many hunters have slid down mountains by accident. The result is usually fatal". At one point in the discussion the old fellow pointed his cane at me and said, "You say the Indians will go to court for recognition of their aboriginal rights. How can Indians win in the courts when the judge is a member of the enemy?" He turns and walks slowly away saying, "The end, the end."

His statements remind me that over 2,000 years ago Aesop said, "Right is on the side of the strongest." Today, I believe that still applies.

The James Bay Crees are 7,000 in number. Their agreement of less than 10 years with the federal government and the Government of Quebec is already falling apart and, according to the press, that is why they are seeking a remedy in the courts. The point is: Who can the Indians trust in this day? How many of their treaties have been ignored in the past?

The Indian finds it difficult to live in this society. He is discriminated against and is only accepted as an equal when in prison, where he receives equal pay and support, or during times of war, when he receives equal pay and training.

Canada's most decorated Indian veteran, Tommy Prince, who was awarded 10 medals, including the Italian Star, the French Star, the German Star, the Defence Medal, the Canadian Volunteer Service Medal and the Canadian Silver Star, spent his final days living in a shelter constructed of boxes and cardboard in an alley in a Canadian city. He died in extreme poverty. He went to the happy hunting grounds in this manner.

Honourable senators, I am trying to relay to you the feelings and the views of the grass roots Indian people who are not involved in any organizations and who are not connected with government in any way.

Honourable senators, I do not want to repeat what has already been said by both sides. At this stage of the debate, it is questionable what "equal rights for every Canadian" means and what it will do for the Indian and the Inuit.

From Bonavista to Vancouver Island, the Territories, the Arctic lands and sea, Canada is a nation of rich resources which are not now enjoyed by the Indian as they were in days long past. Now I say: Let's get on with the job; let's get it over with and recreate the B.N.A. Act. I am of the opinion that when the Constitution is patriated there will be opportunities in the future for a greater voice for the Indian people.

In the tradition of my people from the west coast, the great shoreline of British Columbia, and in the tradition of my ancestors—I have spoken.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1981.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, moved that the report be adopted.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 26, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1980-81

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-62, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending 31st March, 1981.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I take it that the Leader of the Government is asking for leave to have this bill read a second time later today. Perhaps he would explain the reason.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it relates to the available sitting days. We have discussed with the Leader of the Opposition the concept of trying to sit a normal schedule and it was felt that, with leave of the Senate, this would be appropriate action this afternoon. The practice is not without precedent.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps I could ask the Leader of the Government to be a little more specific. Obviously, there may be a deadline, as far as Parliament is concerned, when the passage of this bill becomes urgent—in fact, even necessary.

I feel that we should have a slightly more explicit explanation of the timetable that the government suggests for consideration of this bill at this time.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the deputy leader will be speaking to this bill on second reading, whenever that takes place. I will ask him to give that information.

Senator Grosart: Perhaps he could explain now why leave is requested for second reading of this bill today.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has asked me to second his motion and also to speak to the bill whenever second reading is moved.

This bill, and the following bill for which we will be asking leave to move second reading later today, deal with appropriations. Bill C-62 completes the appropriations for the fiscal year 1980-81 which have been studied by the National Finance Committee. Supplementary estimates (C) were reported by the committee, and the committee's report was adopted yesterday. Our deadline is the end of the fiscal year, namely, March 31 next. For this reason, we should like to have third reading and royal assent next week.

When the Leader of the Opposition and I discussed this matter today, it was suggested that after first reading we should give notice of second reading for Monday. However, we came to the conclusion that we would either have second reading today and third reading on Tuesday, or first reading today and second and third reading on Tuesday—at least, that is our target. We decided to have a go at it today.

• (1410)

It may be that we will have to adjourn the second reading debate today until next week, but I would like the opportunity to introduce the bill today, particularly because there may be some questions to which I could obtain the answers over the weekend and give them during the adjourned second reading debate, or on third reading, on Tuesday.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, that is the explanation I hoped would be given, because it also relates to the procedure by which supplementary estimates (C) have come before us.

It is true that the report of the committee was presented last week and that the chairman of the committee at that time asked that it be taken into consideration on March 25, which was yesterday. Indeed, maybe it was taken into consideration yesterday, but the chairman of the committee was not present and the deputy chairman made no report. It has been our custom, when the National Finance Committee reports on supplementary estimates, that the Senate is given an explanation. That explanation is always comprehensive and is never in the mere form in which it has been given on this occasion—namely, appending the report to Hansard and agreeing to answer questions. What we have had in the past is a clear explanation by the chairman, or the deputy chairman, of the committee.

The reason I consider this matter important is that the Senate has said over and over again that it will not pass an appropriation bill until it has received that kind of explanation from the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. On this occasion we have not had such an explanation. I hope that in future we will not have a repetition of this sort of omission, because it is essential to the proper operation of the Senate that, when the National Finance Committee reports the estimates which will be the basis of an appropriation bill, the Senate receive an explanation at that time.

Honourable senators, I could have made these comments yesterday, but I did not because I had assumed there might be some reason of which I was unaware for not following the normal procedure.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Grosart. I think we should treat this as an exception. I hope the combination of the report, which has been available for some period of time and which was adopted yesterday, together with any explanation I can give on second reading will fill the explanatory gap. I do agree that the normal procedure has always been for the Chairman of the National Finance Committee to give an explanation of the report. The reason for not following the normal procedure at this time is that the chairman is not present. We are therefore trying to substitute, by combining the report with whatever explanation I can give, plus any information I can add arising out of questions asked.

In saying that, however, I am in no way attempting to deny that this should be anything but an exceptional procedure or that the preferred procedure is to receive an explanation from the committee chairman, and then have the introduction of the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1981-82

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-63, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1982.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Hon. Allister Grosart: May we assume that the same explanation applies to this matter as applied to Bill C-62?

Senator Frith: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Grosart.]

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, March 31, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

By way of explanation, honourable senators, I might remind you that this is a follow up in a way to the comments I made yesterday. It is for these very reasons that I suggested we sit next Tuesday evening, at 8 o'clock.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPE LINES—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. Yesterday I directed questions to that honourable minister and I have now found that his answers were evasive. He said that I was, in fact, asking him to comment on matters that were before the National Energy Board. He said that that was improper for him to do. I thought he suggested it was even improper for me to ask him to do so.

I shall repeat the same question today, but before doing so I should like to refer the minister to the statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on October 29, 1980. At that time that minister stated:

As a government we are committed. We will see to it that the Energy Board follows the normal process in terms of making sure that the proper rules and regulations, for instance, with regard to the environment, are respected. But as a matter of national priority, that pipeline will be extended without delay, to be completed by 1983.

That statement was made at a time when the matter, if not then before the National Energy Board, was certainly in the process of being prepared for presentation to the National Energy Board. That minister at that time had no hesitation in saying that he would give assurances, notwithstanding the fact that there had to intervene a hearing by the National Energy Board.

So, if that minister can assume National Energy Board approval, and my honourable friend opposite to whom I direct this question has on other occasions assumed the same thing, then my question is: Is the government going to respond quickly to the request from Trans Quebec & Maritimes Pipe Lines Inc. for funding so that this pipeline can proceed on schedule?

● (1420)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, with all the rhetoric that has just come from Senator Donahoe—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Look at who is talking!

Senator Olson: —which is, of course, completely out of order—

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: The way the question was put has violated more rules that this house has agreed to than any question I know. In citation 357 it says, for example—

Senator Flynn: Is the minister raising a point of order?

Senator Olson: No, I am pointing out that—

Senator Flynn: If the minister is not raising a point of order, then I shall rise on a point of order. The minister, when there is a question, has only the right to answer that question and not to discuss matters concerning the rules or precedents.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: He is out of order when he does that.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Opposition suggesting that I should confine myself to the rules of order?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Olson: Then it would be almost impossible to answer any question that is put, because if you assume that a question is out of order, then you cannot reply at all. Is that what the Leader of the Opposition is suggesting that I do?

Senator Flynn: Yes. If that is your contention, do that.

Senator Olson: In any event, the rhetoric contained in the preamble, which was out of order, to the question raised today, does not change the views I expressed yesterday. They are just as valid today as they were yesterday.

Senator Flynn: It was an empty answer yesterday, and it is of no greater value today.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I rise without much hope in my heart to address a supplementary question, but nevertheless I feel in duty bound to ask the minister if the government expects the pipeline to be completed before the end of 1983? That is a view that has been enunciated on various occasions, even while the application has been before the National Energy Board. Does the government still hold that view, and does it still intend to see that the pipeline is completed by that date?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the government's view has not changed from when those statements were made.

Senator Perrault: Of course not.

Senator Olson: The honourable senator knows as well as I do, because he commented on it, that before the pipeline can go forward an application has to be made to the National Energy Board. The board is required to hold a hearing, which it is doing, and to make a decision and a recommendation—or, in some cases, a decision that is subject to ratification by the Governor in Council.

GRAIN

NEGOTIATIONS RE CROWSNEST RATES

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, I will direct my question to the Leader of the Government. The railways have apparently made a new proposal to the federal government which would serve as an alternative to the renegotiation of the Crow rate—something which the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board has said the government is not prepared to do at this time. Is the Leader of the Government aware of this proposal, and does it constitute a change in policy on the part of the government?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That question will be taken as notice.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

TRANS-BORDER POLLUTION PROBLEMS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. This morning I was disturbed to hear a CBC item to the effect that the administration in the United States, supported by a number of congressmen, is seeking changes to the Clean Air Act of that country, which would, in effect, prevent the provisions of that act from diminishing emissions which cause acid rain.

Could the Leader of the Government indicate whether that particular subject was dealt with in the recent discussions with the President of the United States here in Ottawa, and if intimations were given of such a legislative move, with administrative backing and prompting? Did the Canadians get an indication that this was to take place?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a number of matters were discussed at the meetings involving the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the President of the United States.

● (1425)

Included on that agenda were items pertaining to the matter of pollution and acid rain. However, I will take the question as notice and see if a more formal reply can be provided.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I know the minister need not be reminded that on this particular issue there is great anxiety in the country, and that this is one area where good fellowship should not be the order of the day.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the news report referred to by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie was allegedly broadcast this morning. As yet, I have received nothing from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but an inquiry will go forward to determine whether or not there will be an official reaction.

ENERGY

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have several questions under the general heading of "delayed government decisions" that I would like to put to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

First of all, it has been some weeks now since the government, through its agency, Petro-Canada, decided to purchase Petrofina. Has the government decided how it is going to pay for this purchase, and, in particular, what the incidence will be of the Canadian ownership account tax?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, when a decision is reached on that, in its final stages an announcement will be made by the appropriate minister.

Senator Murray: I take it, then, that the answer is no, and that this matter remains in limbo.

Senator Olson: That is not what I said. I said that an announcement will be made when the matter is finalized. That does not mean that it is in limbo.

Senator Murray: The minister says that an announcement will be made when the matter is finalized, which is to say that a decision has not yet been reached. With regard to this matter, is the government considering the representations of the Canadian Gas Association, to the effect that the proposed Canadian ownership account tax will have the effect of making natural gas even less competitive with other fuels?

Senator Olson: I am sure those representations are being taken seriously, and are being taken into account. This does not mean that we necessarily acquiesce in all of them.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO SYDNEY STEEL CORPORATION

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, also under the heading of "delayed government decisions," will the government say whether it has yet decided where, how and when the $350 million industrial adjustment program that was announced with such fanfare by many of his colleagues weeks ago will be applied, and, in particular, will he tell us whether the approximately $70 million for the first phase of modernization of the Sydney, Nova Scotia steel plant is coming from this fund?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there was a rather detailed press release made public a week or ten days ago—I forget the exact date—with respect to the four centres that have been identified with respect to the utilization of this program. Sydney, Nova Scotia, is one of them.

Before any further details can be taken into account, however, there has to be consultation with local people in the area, with the object of working out the details of the program. That was also referred to in the press release of about ten days ago, and my honourable friend should have read that release a little more carefully.

Senator Murray: It must be the only press release from the federal government in the past two years that I have not received.

Senator Olson: Furthermore, I was asked to table the press release here, and if I recall correctly I did bring it into the chamber. I am not sure whether or not I tabled it, but if I did not, I will make sure a copy is sent to my friend's office today.

Senator Murray: I thank the honourable the minister for that undertaking. I hope the consultations with local people will include consultation with the provincial governments, under whose jurisdiction some of these matters come, particularly in the field of any manpower retraining arrangements that might be envisaged in terms of this program.

GRAIN

EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.—COMPENSATION TO FARMERS

Hon. Lowell Murray: May I ask the minister, or his colleague, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, whether a decision has yet been made on the payment of compensation to western grain growers in respect of the Soviet embargo?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): No decision has yet been made.

Senator Murray: Does the decision that is under consideration by the government relate only to the amount of compensation that would be paid, and when may we expect a decision on this long delayed issue?

● (1430)

Senator Argue: I do not think that I am able to add anything to what I said earlier when this question was asked.

The matter is still under consideration, and I expect a decision will be made in due course. I am sure that my honourable friend will know of that decision soon after it is made.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): As a supplementary to that, has the minister or the government ascertained that there was a definite loss as a result of the embargo?

Senator Argue: The entire question, including that particular aspect, is under consideration.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

TRANS-BORDER POLLUTION PROBLEMS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have requested and received information about the alleged CBC report this morning on the subject of acid rain. I would like to assure honourable senators that we attempt to obtain information as quickly as possible, and some arrives sooner than other—for example, the Irish moss information has been somewhat delayed.

The CBC reported this morning to the effect that the Reagan administration could not support amendment of the Clean Air Act which would make it possible to begin to deal with acid rain, confirming the report brought to the chamber by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie. The government has not been informed of any such decision, so there has been no formal communication. The new administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, known as the EPA, has not yet been appointed. It seems unlikely that any firm proposals will be made before the appointment comes into effect.

The government will be doing everything it can to ensure that the administration and Congress are fully aware of Canada's concerns about the acid rain problem as the review of the Clean Air Act approaches. President Reagan assured the government that the U.S. intends to proceed with the negotiation of an agreement to deal with acid rain. That was the commitment given to Canada during the course of those discussions. The President also told the joint sitting of the Senate and the House of Commons two weeks ago that the United States "wants to continue to work co-operatively to understand and control the air and water pollution that respects no borders."

ENERGY

EFFECT OF SPOT PURCHASES ON OIL PRICING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Austin on November 13, 1980. He asked, in light of the upward pressure on spot oil prices resulting from purchases by western industrial nations, whether the Canadian government is considering, in concert with other industrial nations, the possibilities of limiting purchases as to price except by government agreement.

The Honourable Senator Roblin asked, as a supplementary question, whether the International Energy Agency, known as the IEA, has considered these increases in price and whether it has made any recommendations to the member states with respect to prices. Both of these questions were taken as notice by the Honourable Senator Frith.

Since oil consumption within IEA countries is currently low compared with recent years, resulting in high oil stock levels, and since utilization of spare capacity could contribute to a better world energy balance, on October 1 member countries agreed to undertake certain measures to limit spot market activity through the use of surplus oil inventories by companies in consultation with governments.

Commencing the week of November 17, the effects of these measures were being reviewed by the IEA's standing group on the oil market and the governing board. At the IEA ministerial meeting scheduled for December 8 and 9 this program will be reviewed in relation to the Iran-Iraq situation, and at that time it will be decided whether further action will be required to ensure an orderly international oil market.

● (1435)

PACIFIC COAST SHELF—EXPLORATION ACTIVITY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Austin on January 13 concerning Pacific coastal shelf exploration activity.

The federal government has started to move, with much vigilance, towards making a decision on whether or not to authorize drilling in certain areas off Canada's west coast. A preliminary examination of the environmental implications of renewed drilling is presently under way, and a draft study will not be available until later this spring. This study could lead to a decision later in the year as to whether drilling could again, after a 12-year lapse, be carried out safely and without undue risk to the marine environment.

VANCOUVER ISLAND PIPELINE—REFUSAL OF GOVERNMENT OF BRITISH COLUMBIA TO PERMIT INQUIRY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Austin on February 24 concerning the Vancouver Island pipeline and the alleged refusal of the Government of British Columbia to permit an inquiry as to some of the details of that proposed project.

The federal government, as outlined in the National Energy Program last October, stated that it would set aside $500 million to assist in the construction of gas system extensions to both Vancouver Island and to eastern Canada provided that federal support is required. Therefore, officials from the federal government, in co-operation with B.C. officials, will be studying the economics of the B.C. Hydro proposal in some depth, with a view to determining both the extent and form, if at all, of the federal subsidy.

Although the federal task may have been made easier if an open hearing, which would have reviewed the economics of all possible pipeline routes to service the Îsland, had occurred, the federal government recognizes that all decisions relating to the gas extension rest entirely with the province.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MR. REEVES HAGGAN—ROLE OF PUBLIC SERVANT IN LONDON

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Murray on March 24 concerning the role of Mr. Reeves Haggan in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Reeves Haggan is an assistant deputy minister in the Solicitor General's Department who has been loaned to the Constitutional Secretariat in the Federal-Provincial Relations Office since mid-June, 1980. He participated in intensive constitutional negotiations throughout the summer of 1980, and, subsequently, in staff work associated with the constitutional resolution now before the Senate. He has been temporarily assigned to London as a special adviser to the High Commissioner to assist her and the High Commission in relations with the British government and others in the United Kingdom on the constitutional question.

It was considered that it would be useful to have an official who was fully conversant with the constitutional dossier in the High Commission while the resolution is being considered by the two Parliaments. It is not unusual for public servants with specialized knowledge to do temporary duty in embassies or high commissions abroad. Mr. Haggan's role and conduct in London are perfectly consistent with his status as a public servant.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The same way as the High Commissioner from Britain.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—CONSULTATION WITH OECD

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question asked by Senator Roblin on March 12 which concerned government consultation with the OECD before our National Energy Program was announced.

As I have already indicated, it is not normal to consult outside the government on issues which are budgetary matters, or related to them.

I will be happy to explain to the senator what the "commitment to notify and consult," mentioned by the Honourable J. Allan MacEachen in his statement in 1976, refers to.

Under the provisions of the OECD council decisions, member countries undertook to notify the OECD of measures which would constitute exceptions to national treatment within 30 days after their introduction. This would be within 30 days after the passage of the relevant legislation. Therefore, obviously no notification has yet taken place, although we have indicated in the OECD our intention to do so at the appropriate time.

With respect to "commitment to consult," consultations on issues related to the declaration can be requested by any member country which so wishes. Requests for consultations on matters relating to national treatment contained in the National Energy Program were requested by the United States, the United Kingdom and The Netherlands. These consultations, to which Canada readily agreed, took place on Friday, March 13. I might add that no country questioned Canada's right to take the measures it considered necessary with respect to national treatment of investment issues.

2. Tax credits have not been offered to the Canadian forest industry as an incentive to invest in forest management. Tax credits were among many alternative incentive instruments being examined in the study commissioned by the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers. That study will be completed shortly. The Federal Forestry Sector Strategy Committee has commissioned an investigation of the fundamental issues in funding forest management in Canada, namely the limiting factor to expenditures on forest management by the public and private sectors; the appropriate level of funding, and the strategies that the federal government can assume to overcome impediments to funding forest management. A final report is due by the end of March 1981.

Tax credits for research and development have been in existence for some time. In addition, the Canadian Forestry Service is the scientific authority for the development of a planting machine in British Columbia under the Cooperative Projects with Industry (COPI) program.

The Canadian Forestry Service is preparing a paper regarding strategies to be followed to upgrade the natural resource base, assure adequate mission-oriented federal research, and develop new markets for resources.

3 (a) and 3 (b). A draft discussion paper on the adequacy of federal support for forestry research and development and technical services will be completed soon.

3 (c). A discussion paper on graduate training in Forestry has been completed. It will be made a public document as soon as the necessary approval is obtained and translation is completed.

3 (d). The Department of Transport has submitted a preliminary paper to the Federal Forestry Strategy Committee on the impacts of the transportation policy and hopes to make it part of a more comprehensive paper in the next few months. Consultation with the provinces has taken place.

4. A pre-publication copy of the final report dated July 1979, was reviewed and accepted for publication as Forestry Technical Report 29 by the Canadian Forestry Service Editorial Board on February 22, 1980.

The English version of the manuscript has been printed under DSS contract and is ready for release. The French version has been re-submitted for editing. Publication now awaits final approval.

5 (a). The International Institute for Applied Systems Analysis (IIASA), in a series of explanatory meetings in late 1979 and early 1980, proposed a collaborative forest industry project. One task of the proposed project is the construction of a set of national forest sector models linked to a world trade model of forest products. This model system would be used to support policy analysis at the country level. (Agriculture Canada has been participating in the development of a similar model system with IIASA's Food and Agriculture Program (FAP) Area for some time now. The other three tasks include: First, a state-of-the-art survey of forest sector models, a forest sector model bank and a handbook of systems analysis for forest sector modelling; Second, a study of control, management and information systems in the forest industry and; Third, studies of conflict between forestry, energy and agriculture in less developed countries and, of the dynamics of the forest ecosystem.

The Canadian Forestry Service, on the recommendation of Canadian participants at IIASA's exploratory meetings, convened a meeting of representatives of the provincial and federal governments, industry, labour, universities and forestry associations, in June 1980, to consider the need for a systems study of the forestry sector. It was emphasized that analysis of policy alternatives to improve forestry sector performance could benefit from better understanding of the interrelatedness of its many activities. Three recommendations were made to pursue a holistic approach to forest sector policy analysis. First, a working group would draft a proposal for a forest sector systems study. Second, a steering committee should be established to consider the proposal, manage the project, arrange for its funding and liaise with IIASA. Third, the Canadian Forestry Service would coordinate the establishment of a steering committee, in consultation with government, industry, labour, university and other forest sector interest groups.

The Canadian Forestry Service has acted on these recommendations. The proposed structure of a steering committee has been submitted to various forestry sector interest groups. Responses have generally been favourable. The working group plans to submit a draft proposal shortly.

It is anticipated that the steering committee will make recommendations concerning participation in the IIASA project before March 31, 1981, the date by which IIASA would like to receive final commitments. The scheduled completion date of the IIASA project, not including the fourth task, is December 1983.

5 (b) and 5 (c). Canadian Forestry Service research facilities are being improved as follows: at the Pacific Forest Research Centre, planning is underway for a modest expansion of facilities; planning for expansion of the main laboratory building at the Forest Pest Management Institute with added facilities for application technology and virus research and production; at the Petawawa National Forestry Institute where a major addition has just been completed to house the new amalgamated Institute; in Fredericton, plans are being developed for a new forestry complex to house the Maritimes Forest Research Centre along with both provincial and university forestry groups; and at the Newfoundland Forest

Research Centre, plans are going ahead to improve the research facilities in St. John's, while at the same time a proposed new building is under active study.

Overall, the Canadian Forestry Service is improving its computer capacity to meet the needs of modern research programs.

At a recent meeting, the Canadian Forestry Service senior officials approved action to increase research on forest renewal, thus placing it as the highest priority of the service.

At present, research concerned with the development of an integrated system of forest pest control that entails less reliance on chemical pesticides applies only to the control of the spruce budworm. The Canadian Forestry Service programs on spruce budworm control can be considered under three major categories—(i) research on biological control techniques; (ii) research on chemicals; and (iii) research on application technology.

In the field of biological control techniques the most promising materials currently appear to be the bacterial agent 'Bacillus thuringiensis' (B.t.) and the nuclear polyhedrosis viruses (NPV). During recent years, a promising new oil-based formulation of B.t. has been under investigation. Trials during the spring and summer of 1980 demonstrated that this new formulation is as effective as the older water-based formulations and is easier to apply. The formulation is now conditionally registered and extensive operational field trials are planned for 1981. Field trials using NPV are also contemplated for 1981. Previous experiments indicated that the virus was effective, and the tests for the next field season will be directed towards determining the most effective application rate. This pathogen is very expensive to propagate because to date, it has only been produced in living spruce budworms or living cell cultures. The search for alternative production methods continues. Other pathogens being studied include fungal and protozoan parasites of the budworm. These are all in the early stages of development, with no immediate hope of a viable alternative to chemical pesticides.

A second group of materials being investigated are those of a chemical nature but are either naturally occurring or synthetic analogs of naturally occurring organic materials. These include growth hormones, growth regulators, biological inhibitors, pheromones, and pyrethroids. Several have been field tested extensively, one could be used restrictedly and there is some promise of others achieving success within the medium term (i.e. within the 5-10 year time frame). Even though these are naturally occurring or related to naturally occurring substances, some have certain undesirable characteristics from the environmental aspect.

The third group of materials being studied are the true chemical insecticides. Limited research is underway to identify less hazardous alternatives to the materials in current usage. A few promising candidates are in the final stages of field testing.

Current Canadian Forestry Service research on application technology is applicable to the three groups of materials mentioned. The objectives are to achieve acceptable deposits of the formulations on the target areas and to minimize off-target drift. These programs include work on formulations, atomization and weather effects as they affect the behaviour of spray clouds. Developments during the spring and summer of 1980 indicate that it may be possible to better manipulate spray clouds to increase effective deposit and, at the same time, to reduce off-target drift.

5 (d). The Canadian Forestry Service has awarded a contract to a private consultant to examine the technical and economic feasibility of setting up a Canadian facility to produce materials for biological control of forest pests. The consultant's report is expected early in 1981.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1980-81

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved second reading of Bill C-62, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending 31st March, 1981.

He said: Honourable senators, I believe you have before you copies of proposed Appropriation Act No. 4 which was introduced today as Bill C-62. Honourable senators will note that their copies do not bear the number of the bill, there being a blank space beside the "C".

Appropriation Bill No. 4 provides for the whole of the supplementary estimates (C) for 1980-81. These estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 5, 1981 and were immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

On March 19, they were discussed in committee with officials of Treasury Board, and yesterday the deputy chairman of the committee reported to the house, and the report was adopted.

These are the last appropriations for the 1980-81 fiscal year which ends on March 31, 1981, and they total $1.6 billion. Of that total, $500 million represents the net increase in statutory requirements. Honourable senators will recall that these requirements arise automatically as a result of statutory provisions. The amount of new spending authority which Parliament is being asked to approve is $1.1 billion.

I will comment briefly on the statutory requirements and the parliamentary authority items. First, I shall deal with the major changes in the statutory requirements. They are: $338 million for the purchase of equity in Petro-Canada; $315 million for public debt charges due to higher interest rates; $225 million for fiscal transfer payments to provinces; $72 million in additional payments to provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan; and $46 million for election expenses. These statutory requirements are offset by a reduction of $139 million in payments to the provinces for health-related programs, and an increase in net revenues to the Petroleum Compensation Revolving Fund of $446 million due to the introduction of a blended pricing policy for oil in October 1980.

The major items requiring parliamentary authority are: $692 million to forgive loans and interest due from Atomic Energy of Canada Limited for heavy water plants and inventories—this item being offset by identical loan repayments and thus being included in these estimates for authority purposes only; $162 million for subsidies on imported oil due to increases in the international price of oil and variations in the exchange rate; and $58 million for the agricultural commodities stabilization and support.

The third and final part of my submission deals with the $1 votes. These estimates originally contained 34 $1 votes. However, as a result of a ruling on March 25, 1981 by the Speaker of the House of Commons, six $1 votes requesting authority for the deletion of debts due to the Crown have been removed from the Appropriation Act. In addition, the specific reference to "deletion of debts" has also been removed from the wording of two other votes.

Honourable senators may therefore wish to amend their copies of the printed estimates which would be under that heading and the list of $1 items to reflect the changes. Of course, these changes will be on the record if honourable senators wish to consider them before we give the bill third reading.

The pages and the votes deleted are as follows: Page 8, Agriculture, vote 5c; page 92, National Health and Welfare, vote 30c; page 94, National Revenue—Taxation, vote 5c; page 106, Public Works, vote 20c; page 110, Regional Economic Expansion, vote 1c; and page 130, Supply and Services, vote 5c. These figures, of course, are not found in the bill but in the estimates.

The vote wordings amended are: National Revenue—Customs and Excise, page 94, vote 1c should now read, "Customs and Excise—program expenditures and to provide a further amount of . . . $1,760,805"; and Public Works, page 106, vote 10c should now read, "Accommodation—operating expenditures and the grant listed in the estimates . . . $1."

I believe I have covered most of the important features of this Appropriation Act. Should honourable senators wish further explanation, I will do my best to provide it, either from the additional material I have with me, or, if I do not have the information, I will undertake to get the information for the honourable senator who wishes it before the bill receives either second or third reading. However, honourable senators, I shall be asking that it receive second reading today and third reading next Tuesday evening.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government with regard to the statement he has just made about the change in the $1 items. This is news to me. I am not sure that this information was put before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, because the report of the committee, which was approved by the Senate, states clearly that there were 34 $1 items. I ask the deputy leader to tell us whether that statement in the report of the committee is correct or incorrect.

Senator Frith: Originally, these estimates included 34 $1 items, but, as a result of a ruling in the House of Commons, six of the $1 votes requesting authority for the deletion of debts due to the Crown were removed from the Appropriation Act. Therefore, the 34 items must now be reduced by the six items which were removed. Therefore, the 34 items that were before the committee have to be so changed. The changes that I mentioned today in these items, and which I have given detail, were not before the committee.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, surely this is a most extraordinary situation—one which I do not think we have ever faced before in a request to pass an appropriation bill. Supplementary estimates (C) were before the committee; were discussed in detail with the officials; and the committee reported the estimates on which this bill is based.

We have a long-standing rule in the Senate, which may even be a tradition or a convention, that we will not deal with any matter in an appropriation bill until the matter has been reported by our own committee. We are faced with a situation now where changes have been made in the appropriation bill which are not reflected in the supplementary estimates, and which have not been brought to the attention of our own committee. Perhaps I should ask the deputy leader if I am correct in assuming that this information he is now bringing to the attention of the Senate was not brought to the attention of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

I would add this rider: The deputy leader has told us that the decision is based on a decision made by the Speaker of the House of Commons the other day, but it is my understanding that a decision on the matter was made a long time ago.

Senator Frith: No, it was just the other day.

Senator Grosart: If it is based on a decision made a long time ago, why was it not included in the supplementary estimates, and why was it not brought to the attention of the National Finance Committee?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the chronology is as follows: the estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 5, 1981; referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on March 19, 1981; reported yesterday, which was March 25, 1981; and the ruling that changed the $1 votes was made yesterday in the House of Commons. The reason it did not come to the attention of that committee is that the change in the $1 votes postdated the report of the committee. That, of course, does not mean that it cannot now be discussed in committee, because the bill can be referred to committee.

Senator Grosart: I thank the deputy leader for that explanation. I was not aware of that. The committee discussed the former ruling by the Speaker of the House of Commons, the effect of which was that no statute, other than an appropriation act, could be amended by a $1 vote. A statement was then made by the officials that the department had been instructed by the government that, in future, the estimates and the appropriation bills would not, according to present policy, ever contain an item which was an amendment to a statute other than an appropriation act.

Would the deputy leader inform us about this new ruling which has changed the whole picture before us? Would he give us the gist of the ruling so that we know what we are dealing with?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not have that information, but I am sure I can obtain it. However, I suggest there are two ways we can deal with this matter. I could try to get a satisfactory explanation and give it later today. If it is not satisfactory, we could then refer the subject matter back to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and still have the opportunity for third reading of the bill on Tuesday.

So I suggest that I be given an opportunity to find a satisfactory explanation today which will not require the matter to go before the committee again. If my explanation is unsatisfactory, we could refer the bill to the committee and an explanation could be provided there. We will then still have the possibility of having third reading on Tuesday.

Senator Grosart: I believe that we, on this side, would be prepared to accept that suggestion. Perhaps we might go ahead in the meantime, and have the usual discussion of the bill as it is before us. We could then adjourn the debate until such time as the deputy leader is able to make a subsequent statement, at which time we could decide the issue and, perhaps, pass the bill today.

I understand the urgency since these estimates deal with expenditures in the current fiscal year which ends on March 31 and, therefore, it is important that the Senate complete its consideration of the bill as soon as possible. I will not comment on the other appropriation bill until it comes before us.

As the deputy leader has indicated, this bill will again add considerably to the expenditures of the government on various grounds—budgetary, non-budgetary, statutory and so on—for the fiscal year just ending. He has indicated that the main items are understandably of great concern.

The first item is, of course, the public debt. In this respect, a provision is made in the supplementary estimates for an increase of $315 million. The public debt has increased by alarming proportions, both substantively, in relation to GNP, and as a percentage of total government expenditures.

In 1972-73, we were accustomed to a small budgetary deficit—that is, an increase in the public debt situation—of perhaps 1 per cent of GNP. This year it is up to 5 per cent. It has been steadily increasing. In 1975-76 it was 3.3 per cent; in 1977-78 it was 4.9 per cent; in 1978-79 it was 5.3 per cent; and now, there is a very small drop this year to 5 per cent.

[Senator Frith.]

In the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, the officials were able to tell us that it is government policy, as transmitted to the departmental officials, to contain and lower this very high percentage of deficit, as an addition to public debt, in the years ahead. Perhaps the deputy leader would care to confirm, in general terms, that it is policy to decrease the budgetary deficit, in the years ahead, as a percentage of GNP, to the 1982-83 target figure of 2.9 per cent. I think it is important that we have that as a statement of intended policy in view of the fact that it was during our own committee hearing that the first announcement was made of government policy to contain the increase in government expenditures as a percentage of GNP to a somewhat lower figure than the increase in GNP in any one year.

In spite of the fact that it was made, the government found it not possible to implement that promise this year. I am not going to comment on that at the moment, because what is important is the assurance that this situation will not continue until the country goes bankrupt, as it would, of course, if it kept on increasing at that rate of 1 to 5 per cent as in the last 10 years.

A rather extraordinary aspect of this is that this rapid increase in the budgetary deficit in any one year is not matched exactly by the increase or decrease from year to year in the totality of government outlays as a percentage of GNP. Against that figure of 1 per cent in 1972-73, the percentage of government expenditures related to GNP was 19.8 per cent.

In the present year that has risen to only 21.1 per cent. While the other escalation has been five times, this has only escalated by a fraction. I will recommend to the National Finance Committee that it give careful consideration to this. It is obvious that the GNP has not risen at the same rate every year, but it is a remarkable fact that the deficit has risen five times, from 1 to 5, whereas the total outlays of government as a percentage of GNP have risen from 19.8 per cent only to 21.1 per cent. The government may or may not take comfort in those figures, but I think it would be a good exercise on the part of the National Finance Committee to investigate those figures and report on their significance.

Fiscal transfer payments have been mentioned as another large item in the supplementaries on which this Appropriation Bill is based. Actually, $225 million is not a realistic amount because, as we are all aware, the federal government changed its policy in respect of certain health-related payments, decreasing the payments to the provinces so that that amount reflects a net bottom line rather than an actual situation. Actually, on a straight comparison basis, that figure would be higher. I am not saying what the significance of that is, but it is an indication that we have to be careful when reading the figures that are given to us in a raw state from time to time.

There are other indications here of why that is so. For example, in the present estimates, or in the bill, we are asked to approve, by vote, guarantees to de Havilland in the amount of $45 million, and to Massey Ferguson in the amount of $130 million. Those, it is true, are only guarantees, but they are not recorded as commitments or expenditures. The evidence we had was that they would only be taken into the accounts as items affecting the bottom line, when and if there was a call on the government to meet those guarantees.

As many highly qualified members of the accounting profession here will realize, in an ordinary business sense you would regard those as liabilities. Guarantees are on almost the same basis as loans, and, certainly, in terms of balance sheets they are very much the same. However, I am not quarrelling with that, because I do not see how the government could take them into the official accounts in any more realistic way than that.

There are other examples. There are indications here of projects that were approved in appropriation acts, and which are not being continued. From time to time the government, for various reasons—and I am not saying they are not good reasons—decides not to go ahead with a particular project; but, unless there is a transfer vote, that is never shown in the estimates as a saving. Therefore, in comparative terms, any such items should really be added to the total, because sooner or later that money will be expended, and, on a netting basis, it again makes the figures we have at the bottom line somewhat unrealistic. That, of course, also applies to the general estimate of the totality of expenditures in this year.

The government in the last few years, and I believe at the instigation, or initiative anyway, of our National Finance Committee, has undertaken to make a guess at the amount that might lapse. We all know that as a fiscal year winds to its close sometimes it is not possible to spend money that has been appropriated. I have noticed that the amounts that the government takes into consideration as potential lapsing amounts seem to increase every year. I am not saying that, when the public accounts come out, they will be proved wrong, but I suspect that there is more than sheer arithmetic involved in the increases in the projections of the lapsing.

There are other items that I think should be called to the attention of the Senate. A major item—in fact, the largest single item mentioned by the deputy leader—is the forgiveness of the AECL debt, which, as he indicated, amounts to $692 million. That is more than half the total amount we are asked to appropriate. There is some sensitivity, of course, in this area. The $692 million forgiveness, which is one of the official terms used, requires us to question the whole AECL operation. We asked the officials if they could give us the total commitment of the Canadian government to Atomic Energy of Canada, which is a crown corporation, but they did not have the figures. They have undertaken to let us have them, though. I hasten to say that I am not an AECL witch hunter. I happen to believe that what has happened since the Second World War in the development of our atomic energy capacity has been a great Canadian achievement. The Candu reactor is still probably the best in the world, taking into consideration all factors, both short term and long term.

However, we are entitled to know how much it is costing us to reach this particular point of excellence. We are entitled to know why suddenly, and quite suddenly, in the final supplementary estimates for one year we are asked to write off—which is the phrase used in our own report—close to $700 million. We are told by way of explanation, of course, that that is the result of problems related to heavy water. That is true. There are such problems. But, if there is a silver lining to the cloud, it is the fact that, while this large amount is being written off, the officials, and I am quite sure the government, have some hope that there will be an eventual payoff of the whole AECL operation and that, finally, there will be dividends which will at least decrease, if not eliminate completely, this very large write-off.

The item concerning the chief electoral officer has been mentioned. For that we have been asked for another $46 million. It may interest honourable senators to know, now that all the bills are in, that the total cost of the last election was some $64 million. There are those of us who wonder if it was worth it.

Senator Frith: You bet there are.

Senator Grosart: The usual CBC item is in. That is another $178 million. I put that in my notes for the benefit of Senator Beaubien, who has always been interested in the progress of the CBC and at times has asked some rather searching questions on the financing of the CBC.

The total cost of the consolidated revenue fund this year will be only $536 million.

My final comment is on another netting item mentioned by the deputy leader in connection with the revolving fund. We have a net revenue increase of $445 million to be offset against the total of the additional amounts requested for government expenditures in the year. It has been suggested that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, under the chairmanship of Senator Everett, who has taken such matters under consideration and has achieved excellent results by doing so, take a continuing interest in this new account called the Canadian ownership account. This is a new account with no dollar amounts set against it. It will be interesting to see how this account operates and how it is reported in the estimates from time to time.

Mention was made of the $1 items. I am pleased that the Deputy Leader of the Government has told us that we will have a further report on them, because it is of great interest to the committee and, I am sure, to the Senate. It is a fact that this whole question of the voting of supply through $1 items has been of great concern to all of us who are interested in a more efficient reporting of spending, and more efficient spending itself.

It is true that this matter was raised originally during meetings of the Senate committee. The officials co-operated with us over the years, and for the first time came up with a list of the $1 items so that they could be taken out of the blue books and examined individually. They were then good enough, after we questioned the rationale of the $1 items, to break them down into $1 categories which are shown in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

This, of course, raised the whole question of the use of the $1 items to amend acts of Parliament. As I have already indicated, there was the ruling that this could only be used where the amendment was to an appropriation act. Apparently, there is a new rule and I would expect that we will receive a full explanation of it before we are asked to pass this bill.

The committee's report commented at some length on the $1 items and included, interestingly enough, a document of great importance to this whole business of financing the cost of government. The document is a letter directed to the chairman of the committee, Senator Everett, from a Mr. L. J. O'Toole, Assistant Secretary, Treasury Board. He was most co-operative with the committee. In that letter he discusses this whole question of $1 votes and supplementary estimates. As I said, it is a document of great importance. The letter is dated December 2, 1980, and there should be greater awareness in parliamentary circles of this than there is at the moment. As far as I know, this is the first time that this letter has been published.

In the letter, Mr. O'Toole, speaking of departmental practice as it affects government policy, makes certain various points. There are a few of them the committee may wish to take up. One deals with the question of deletion of debts. The debt of Atomic Energy of Canada is one because we are now in the rather absurd position that wherever there is a deletion of a debt over $5,000, the deletion requires an appropriation act to authorize it. I believe the officials are thinking of a much higher sum than that, and I think the committee would be inclined to support them. A $5,000 forgiveness, deletion or write-off is a small item by itself in the context of the totality of the budget.

The purpose of the letter is to say that $1 votes will continue to be used in certain specific circumstances, one being the transfer of budgetary funds between votes, which we all understand—that is, where the money is available in the vote there may be an extension of the purposes of the vote, or an inclusion of others not originally named. It is merely a transfer of authority within the vote.

The second is new and increased grants. Again, this is a fairly technical item, and I will not go into too much technical detail. However, there is an important distinction between contributions and grants. This is not always recognized. Obviously, this is a legitimate use of $1 votes so that grants can be increased where the money is already available in the vote.

Deletion of debts I have already mentioned, and I also mentioned the amendment of previous appropriation acts. The interesting thing is that this letter states quite categorically—and I am sure Senator Frith wants to comment on this—the following:

> Our position is that the $1 Votes will continue to be used for the following cases.

The implication being that it is in the following cases only. Number 4 is:

> Amendment of Previous Appropriation Acts—to effect changes to previous votes authorized through Appropriation Acts. (eg. increasing limits for Revolving Funds).

[Senator Grosart.]

If there has been a change in that, a limitation or an increase, it would be useful for us to have some detail of it.

Again, we have the following statement:

> The Committee is known to be particularly interested in the following specific instances from among the many situations where the $1 Vote would not be considered acceptable . . .
> 3. Amendment of Existing Legislation (other than Appropriation Acts)—since the relevant Act should normally be amended.

I think what is meant there is "amended normally," but that is not an important point.

Senator Frith: Amended by normal procedures.

Senator Grosart: Yes. Honourable senators, with these comments, and the proviso that we will have a satisfactory explanation later on, as I feel we will, I think we on this side are quite prepared to agree to second reading later this day. Perhaps the deputy leader should move the adjournment of the debate until that time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Grosart for his intervention. I believe I have found an answer to the objection that he raised and the question that he quite properly raised. I found it without having to send out for it. It was under my desk.

However, let me first of all deal with a couple of other points. On the question of the linkage or relationship between the deficit, the expenditures and the GNP, I cannot give that information now. I shall try to get some statement on that in time or, at least, remember that that question was raised by the opposition and that Senator Grosart would like to know what the government's policy is with respect to that linkage.

On the question of AECL, I have nothing to add except to say—and this is not an answer to Senator Grosart's observations—that apparently the item is offset by a repayment. Therefore, it is only the authority that is needed, but it still comes out bottom line at almost $700 million. It is not $1.4 billion; it is $700 million or approximately $700 million.

Senator Grosart: It is a lot of money.

Senator Frith: It is quite a lot of money.

The honourable senator has already explained the background of that. There may be some good news in terms of that amount.

In general, I should like to thank Senator Grosart for drawing to our attention some of the items which were considered by the committee which we may not have known about or may not have read about in the report. That, in turn, brings me to the O'Toole letter and the principal question he raised with reference to the deletion of the $1 items.

It seems, honourable senators, that the very point raised by Senator Grosart was raised before the Speaker in the other place. If I can put it this way, the Speaker upheld the point of order that was raised in the other place, and in so doing, upheld the point raised by Senator Grosart.

• (1520)

What happened will be found at page 8600 of House of Commons Debates of Wednesday, March 25, 1981. The ruling covers approximately three columns and is, in essence, the point raised by Senator Grosart. To summarize it, the Speaker of the House of Commons, as reported at page 8601, said:

> In 1977, on March 22, the Speaker reviewed the previous rulings on the question of the estimates and pointed out that whether it is a one dollar item or not, a vote in the estimates may not "contain legislative content".

I learned today, if I understood Senator Grosart correctly, that the Senate committee originally raised this question but it seems that it has found fruition in the House of Commons on the occasion of a ruling by the Speaker.

The ruling by the Speaker was:

> On the general question, it is my view that the government receives from Parliament the authority to act through the passage of legislation and receives the money to finance such authorized action through the passage by Parliament of an appropriation act. A supply item in my opinion ought not, therefore, to be used to obtain authority which is the proper subject of legislation—

Then, turning to the right-hand column on page 8601, the Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons is reported as saying:

> I have been placed in this present position. It is clear in my mind that the eight items—

Honourable senators will recall that I referred to eight particular items:

> —referred to above which cancel debts are pure legislative items and seek in each case to amend section 18(1) of the Financial Administration Act and I would rule that they should be and are hereby deleted from Supplementary Estimates (C) 1981-82.

So it seems to me that the reason for the deletion is that which Senator Grosart has called to our attention. I hope that I have given a satisfactory explanation as to why those eight items were deleted.

Senator Grosart: I find it quite satisfactory. Perhaps I could suggest to the deputy leader that he read into our record the particular $1 items that are now to be deleted, so that we will be quite sure what we are passing if and when we pass this appropriation bill.

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators. I believe I have already read those in. However, I will certainly see that they are incorporated in the record. The eight items were at pages 8, 92, 94, 106, 110 and 130. I will see that they are entered in full detail.

Senator Grosart: As items, not just as pages.

Senator Frith: Yes; the votes deleted and the vote items.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 1, 1981-82

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved second reading of Bill C-63, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1982.

He said: Honourable senators, Appropriation Bill No. 1, 1981-82, Bill C-63, introduced today, provides interim supply for the 1981-82 main estimates. These estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 2 and were referred immediately to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. They will be subjected to a detailed review by that committee during the interim supply period.

Honourable senators, the basic interim supply period is the first three months of the 1981-82 fiscal year—namely the period that starts on April 1 and continues for three months. Honourable senators will find that some supply periods go for eight months because of special requirements for contract commitments, and I will give details if required.

What we are talking about now is interim supply for three months of the estimates that are before the committee and which will be considered by the committee in detail. The main estimates total $65,583,000,000. Of that amount, $36,673,000,000 is authorized by existing legislation—so we are back to the division between legislation and parliamentary vote—and $28,909,000,000 is to be voted by Parliament.

Appropriation Bill No. 1, 1981-82—which is Bill C-63 and is in the pile of bills beneath honourable senators' desks—provides $8,267,000,000 of the amounts to be voted to meet the expenditure requirements of the government to June 30, 1981. The dates again are April 1 to June 30, 1981. Of the total of approximately $65 billion, we are asking as interim supply—only interim supply—for $8,267,000,000 of the amounts to be voted to meet the expenditure requirements of the government to that date, namely, June 30, 1981.

It contains a general proportion of three-twelfths of all votes—three months of 12 months—plus additional twelfths for 36 votes. There are 36 votes that have more than three-twelfths. Those additional proportions are required due to the seasonal nature of some programs and the need in other instances to make major payments before the end of June. In no case—and I underline that—is Parliament being asked to pass the entire amount for a vote.

Honourable senators, since the purpose of Appropriation Bill No. 1 is to provide interim financing to June 30, and since the main estimates are yet to be reviewed in committee—although they are before the committee—I have purposely kept my remarks brief. I would like to say, however, that these estimates were presented for the first time in two parts. Part I, entitled "The Government Expenditure Plan", contains a statement of the government's spending intentions to 1983-84 and an analysis of those intentions by policy sector and associated resource envelopes. That is what we used to call "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent." This is another version. Part II is the traditional blue book to which those interested in these matters have become accustomed.

I would state also, by way of final underlining, that the proportions requested in the bill—that is, the three-twelfths in most cases and somewhat more than three-twelfths in a few other cases—are intended to provide for all necessary requirements of the Government of Canada to June 30, 1981. In no instance is the total amount of an item being released by the bill.

The form of the bill is the usual one for interim supply bills. The passing of the bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of honourable senators to criticize any item in the estimates when it comes up for consideration in committee, and the usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this bill.

I commend to honourable senators the second reading of this bill.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, this is a very different appropriation bill from the one we have just dealt with, as the Deputy Leader of the Government has made clear. We are not in any way committing ourselves to approval of individual votes, all of which will be and are being discussed in detail in the main estimates. The Deputy Leader of the Government has given what has come to be called the usual assurance which goes always with an interim supply bill, and we on this side of the house are quite happy to see the bill expedited through Parliament as soon as reasonably possible, in normal conformity with our rules, or exceptions as may be necessary.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to what I said before, and nothing to add to what the Honourable Senator Grosart has said, except to thank him for his comments.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, I intend to introduce an amendment to this resolution at the end of my speech.

Honourable senators, in the debate on the proposed resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, on November 3 last year I took a critical stance. In dealing with the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms I charged the government with discrimination against the ethno-cultural groups, including the native peoples, and said that it appeared that the government had repudiated the policy of multiculturalism, since there was no mention of it in the proposed Constitution.

During the hearings of the special joint committee, in which I participated several times as a substitute, there were many representations from the non-Anglo-Celtic, non-French groups, as well as from the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism. As a result, the government and the special joint committee responded favourably to the demands of a large segment, nearly one-third, of Canadian society. A new clause, clause 27, was added, which reads as follows:

> 27. This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

Clause 25 recognizes the aboriginal and treaty rights of the native peoples of Canada, but in a limited way.

In his speech on March 19 Senator Peter Bosa, a former chairman of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism, reiterated his support for the rights of minorities in the interests of the quality, unity and happiness of all Canadians, for which I commend him.

Why, up to this time, had the Liberal government remained reticent on this matter, and why did it accede only under pressure? Was it not this government which instituted the policy of multiculturalism within the framework of bilingualism on October 8, 1971, 10 years ago, with the solid support of all the other parties? Did not this government, in 1972, establish a Ministry of State for Multiculturalism, with Dr. Stanley Haidasz, now Senator Haidasz, as its first minister? Was it not this government that established the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism in 1973? Have not most provinces of Canada adopted a policy of multiculturalism which preserves and perpetuates languages and cultures of various ethnic groups, to be shared by all Canadians? Was it not a previous Liberal government through the Secretary of State at that time, the Honourable Maurice Lamontagne, now Senator Lamontagne, which established the Canadian Folk Arts Council, in 1965, now a prominent body promoting rich cultural activities throughout Canada? Did not the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, of which the Deputy Leader of the Government, Senator Royce Frith, was a prominent member, in the fourth volume of its report tabled in 1971, recommend the recognition of multiculturalism, in addition to bilingualism? Did not the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada, of which the co-chairmen were Senator Gildas Molgat and the Honourable Mark

MacGuigan, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, table a report in 1972, which stated that Canada was an "independent, democratic, officially bilingual, multicultural state"?

After this imposing record, why was the present government reluctant to grant recognition to multiculturalism in the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms of the Constitution until pressure was exerted by various organizations and societies of nearly one-third of the Canadian population? Whatever reasons the government may have had for previously ignoring this matter, the Canadian reality of today is multiculturalism, and I share the happiness of several million Canadian citizens at the fact that general recognition is given to it now in the amended charter. The implementation of multiculturalism, however, is meaningless if the parameters are not defined.

The members of the special joint committee are to be commended for their long hours of dutiful work, dedication, patience and judgment. The charter is good as far as it goes, and on this they are to be congratulated.

The charter, however, does not go far enough and has many shortcomings, with respect to which parliamentarians have been receiving considerable criticism from various quarters. Here are some of the things which have been left out of it and which should be incorporated into the charter:

1. The person's right to property, although recognized by statute law up to now;

2. Recognition of God and the Judeo-Christian ethic, democracy's cornerstone, professed by a large majority of Canadians;

3. Equality of women before the law and removal of certain discriminatory aspects of this matter in some clauses;

4. Reform of the Supreme Court to prevent possible partisanship of judges and assure neutrality, independence and prestige;

5. The right to freedom from political imprisonment—the War Measures Act is made part of the Constitution, making apprehension indictable;

6. The right to life of every living human being from the time of conception to the natural end, including the handicapped and the aged;

7. Rights for the family.

I am mentioning a few important principles that need serious consideration. There are others. Some of the clauses will have to be reconsidered, and the wording of many clauses could be improved for clarity. I believe that the joint committee was in too much of a rush. Although the members considered these matters, they just did not have the time to realize all the implications.

I do not intend to plead the case for these items, but merely present them in order to convey certain inadequacies that are being voiced by many Canadians, both groups and individuals, proving that more time and thought are needed to produce a better charter.

This proposed charter is not the Canadian Constitution; it is only one part of it, though certainly a very important part. I am sure that the people across our vast country would like to see a new, modern Canadian Constitution which would meet present-day needs and be flexible enough to provide the means for the solution of future problems. For this we need more time.

I support the patriation of the B.N.A. Act and a workable amending formula. My pride as a Canadian, however, does not allow me to approve of the enactment of a Canadian Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms by the British Parliament—a friendly but foreign power. This action would indicate that we are still colonials and, in my opinion, it would be a contradiction of our sovereignty and a blot on our integrity as a free nation. I hope that the Parliament of the United Kingdom will approve patriation and an amending formula, but that it will decidedly throw out the constitutional package on the ground that sanction of such a constitutional measure would be tantamount to interference in the internal affairs of a foreign state.

We cannot blame the United Kingdom for the constitutional mess in which we find ourselves. The British North America Act of 1867 was drawn up in Charlottetown and Quebec by delegates from the Canadian provinces, and no British representative was even present. The final consideration of the resolution took place in London, England, again with no British representatives present. Therefore, the B.N.A. Act was made in Canada and passed by the British Parliament at the request of the whole Canadian delegation. My understanding is that Britain has always been willing to return the Constitution to Canada, but it was the Canadian governments who could not find the method to bring it back.

There is a method of enacting a new Canadian Constitution which, in my opinion, would be less painful and less divisive than that which is now being imposed upon us by Prime Minister Trudeau. In my speech on the Constitution of Canada, delivered in 1970, and later when the joint parliamentary committee, of which I was an active member, tabled its report in 1972, I pointed out the fact that most democratic countries of the world drew up their constitutions in constituent or constitutional assemblies.

I give, as an excellent example of this method, the creation of the American Constitution, since the United States of America is a federal state much like Canada. The articles of confederation drawn up by the states in the summer of 1776 provided for a continental congress composed of delegates chosen by each state. There was much quarrelling among the states at the two continental congresses, so the delegates decided to call a constitutional convention in May 1787. The 55 representatives of states, under the leadership of such able men as Washington, Franklin, Madison, Hamilton and others, drafted a constitution in four months, which was then ratified by the states and became the law of the nation two years later, in 1789. In considering this example, I am interested in the method of drafting a constitution rather than in its contents.

As matters now stand in Canada, Prime Minister Trudeau is attempting to establish a new federation without the full consent of the constituent provinces. He cannot claim to speak on behalf of the entire Canadian nation. In his speech on March 18, Senator Manning, the former Premier of Alberta who has constantly voted with the Liberal government in the Senate, strongly opposed the government's arbitrary unilateral action, stating:

> —that the federal government party in the present Parliament is in no sense a representative national government. Over 50 per cent of its members are from one province, Quebec, another 36 per cent are from the other central province, Ontario, leaving only 20 government members from all the rest of Canada, and only one—

And I will correct this; it should be two.

> —from the four western provinces whose six million people account for 25 per cent of Canada's population. For a federal government, with no broad national representation in Parliament, to use its numerical majority concentrated in the two central provinces to impose its will on the entire nation in a matter as vital as the country's Constitution, in the face of strong opposition from all but one of the other eight provinces, is wrong and indefensible.

Even if the Trudeau government railroaded the whole package through Parliament, and even if the Parliament of the United Kingdom approved the whole resolution, we would still not have a modernized Constitution. Therefore, we can profit from the experience in the creation of the Constitution of the United States, which I described earlier.

Several constitutional scholars have recommended the convening of a constitutional assembly. Following the advice of some of these constitutional experts, I make the suggestion that Prime Minister Trudeau call a federal-provincial meeting in the very near future to discuss the formation of a constitutional assembly. This body should consist of, for example, 60 members, 30 of whom should be chosen by the federal government and 30 by the provincial governments. In the words of Professor J. V. Clyne, who appeared before the Special Committee of the Senate on the Constitution of Canada not so long ago, such a body should consist of:

> . . . experts drawn from all walks of life to examine the subject thoroughly in the light of evidence taken in all parts of Canada and to make recommendations to Parliament and to the legislatures as to a new or a revised Constitution.

I would add that these experts should also include representatives of classes, women, minorities and regions. They would be instructed to draft a new Constitution or a revised B.N.A. Act within a period of six months to one year. This draft Constitution would then be submitted to the federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures for adoption and ratification, which was the procedure followed at the time of Canadian Confederation.

[Senator Yuzyk.]

Since the members of such an assembly would not be influenced by political pressures or ambitions—which could have been the case with respect to the first ministers—a constitutional document presented by them would, in all probability, be accepted by the federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures. This does not mean that such a document would satisfy all the political leaders, but they would know that all issues would be reasonably resolved. This would be a complete Constitution delineating the distribution of powers between the federal and provincial governments, setting out the functions of the houses of Parliament, the Charter of Rights, the amending formula and all matters which go into the making of a modern Constitution.

There are many matters which can be more readily resolved by such an assembly, including such important ones as the development of our rich natural resources, the principle of equalization, the entry of new provinces—keeping in mind the Yukon and the Northwest Territories—and secession. There is also the matter of electoral reform. Change of the electoral system has been stymied because members of Parliament are afraid of losing their own seats. A constitutional assembly whose members have no seats to lose in Parliament is in a better position to devise a more representative electoral system.

Honourable senators, I have presented very briefly the idea of a constitutional assembly, which, of course, is not new. Obviously, it will need elaboration. This is a viable, speedy method. If the Americans could produce their constitution in four months 200 years ago, when they had no models to choose from, why cannot Canadians produce an acceptable constitution of their own in six months, when they can study many types of constitution that have been adopted by a large number of democratic countries, and, particularly, when they have at their disposal a considerable amount of material and recommendations made by a joint parliamentary committee, the Pepin-Robarts Task Force, several federal-provincial conferences, a special Senate committee and numerous briefs and testimony by authorities and experts in the past ten years?

If we had applied this method 50 years ago, after the Statute of Westminster, and had immediately enacted a Canadian Constitution, then the Parliament of the United Kingdom would have had no recourse but to repeal the B.N.A. Act. This would have been easier at that time, because Canadians were not faced with the problem of separation in Quebec, the energy issue, and western alienation, as we have today.

All these problems can be reasonably resolved by a constitutional assembly in a short period of time. I am therefore appealing to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Perrault, and the other two ministers in this chamber, Senator Olson and Senator Argue, to present this proposal to Prime Minister Trudeau and the cabinet. Positive action by the government will then allow Parliament to deal with the urgent problems of the economy, inflation, unemployment and energy.

Honourable senators, we cannot ignore what is happening in the other place. There is no doubt that the government is trying to rush the House of Commons to a quick vote on the resolution. The government has its own reasons for doing so. Apparently, Mr. Trudeau wants to have this measure out of Canada before the Quebec election, and have the measure voted on before the Supreme Court of Canada has a chance to rule on its legality. With closure hanging over the heads of members of the House of Commons, it may well be that the measure will be forced through in a way that will foreclose any further amendments initiated in the House of Commons.

We, on this side, are of course opposed to that process. If this resolution is to be sent to Westminster by the government majority, we should at least try to correct one of the more glaring injustices which it contains. The fact remains that there is not an adequate guarantee of equality as between men and women. Because closure is hanging over their heads, the House of Commons may not have a chance to correct this.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the recent Women's Conference on the Constitution, of last February 14, demanded that the resolution should recognize equality of men and women, I move, seconded by Senator Tremblay, that the motion be amended in Schedule B of the resolution by inserting immediately after clause 28 the following:

> 28.1 Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms set out herein are guaranteed equally to men and women.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): May I ask a question of the honourable senator? Is this to replace the present clause 28?

Senator Yuzyk: It would be clause 28.1.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, it is indeed a pleasure and a privilege to take part in this debate, and also to follow our distinguished colleague, Senator Yuzyk, who has presented an amendment to which I am sure all of us will give a great deal of consideration.

However, in reply to Senator Yuzyk, I would like to say that I really do consider myself a member of a truly representative national Parliament. There are many Liberal senators from every province in this house, and in the other place the people of Canada are fully represented from coast to coast. Moreover, as the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada did hear over 100 witnesses from all parts of Canada and from a broad section of Canadian society, I think it is an insult to those Canadians who made the effort to prepare a brief, and to come to Ottawa to testify before the committee, to infer that their views and representations are not enough or worth nothing. It is also an insult to those Canadians who appeared and stated their views before the Pepin-Robarts Task Force on the Constitution, to say that their views and comments are not enough.

I would also like to add my voice to other senators in this place who have spoken so convincingly and sincerely in support of the joint resolution. I am sure there will be other senators following me who will take under consideration, and make their comments on, the amendment just moved by Senator Yuzyk and seconded by Senator Tremblay. I share the concern and strong commitment that Senator Yuzyk and other senators have for a united, strong and independent Canada. I also share some of the honourable senator's views on the proposals which he outlined just a few moments ago, particularly the proposal in his amendment. However, I am unmoved in my conviction that Canada cannot wait any longer. We need a strong and effective national government within our federated structure, more so today than ever before, a government that can speak and act decisively for the good of all Canadians. So it is with a very happy heart and great enthusiasm that I take part in this process of constitutional reform and of renewed federalism which, for the citizens of this great country, is a noble and necessary goal and, in particular, for us as legislators, a very pressing and vital task.

● (1600)

One hundred and fourteen years ago the Fathers of Confederation laid the foundation of a federal structure, forged a nation and created the Dominion of Canada. The British North America Act, passed by the United Kingdom Parliament at Westminster in 1867, became the fundamental law of our country. But the amending power remained at Westminster because the federal and provincial governments failed to agree in this regard. Today, thanks to the courage and wisdom of the federal government and the co-operation and untiring efforts of the members of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, we have the opportunity—indeed, the duty—to reform the Constitution and to break that last colonial link by dealing positively with the resolution with which we have been presented.

Honourable senators, this resolution is the product of very long and painstaking work by the representatives of all the political parties in the house and all the members of the Senate from all parts of this country. There is also the input of the views held by more than 100 national and local organizations from all regions of our country, the representatives of which expressed not only their grievances at the unfair treatment they have received from time to time from some governments, some bureaucrats and some members of the powerful groups in this country, but also their aspirations for a truly just society.

The resolution proposed by the government, and subsequently amended by the special joint committee, can therefore be described as the real beginning of a truly modern Canadian Constitution, made in Canada, shaped by Canadians and meeting the needs of Canadians of today and tomorrow. This is why we should take pride in this outstanding result of the special joint committee's labours and express our appreciation to the joint chairmen, Senator Harry Hays, my seatmate, and the honourable member for Montréal Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, Mr. Serge Joyal, who presided over 106 emotion-charged meetings.

Thanks should also go to the members who worked so patiently and diligently during the four long months of intense hearings, who studied more than 1,200 submissions from Canadians from all across this country, and who considered deeply some 76 amendments to the original draft resolution. We should also be grateful to the Minister of Justice for his exceptional flexibility, sympathy and understanding in allowing so many amendments to be presented.

I served for a short while on this committee. I consider it a real and rare privilege and an opportunity of great educational value. The entire exercise was an example of participatory democracy, and I feel that the unfavourable criticism of this committee's work and achievement is grossly unfair.

Honourable senators, I should like to focus now on the urgency of this resolution. I believe that some of the proposals expressed by Senator Yuzyk would only further delay this constitutional debate. I do not think we can be accused of undue haste. The process of constitutional renewal has been going on for years and, in this past year, very intensely. It is obvious to all who are attuned to the realities of our country that over the past 100 years, and particularly over the past 50 years, Canada has changed socially, demographically, economically and politically.

We have today serious problems in our interprovincial, federal-provincial and inter-regional relationships. As a result, there is a feeling of alienation in many of the regions of Canada today. There is talk of isolation and even attempts at separation in some parts of the country. The recent energy disagreement, which is a pressing problem that must be resolved quickly, is another reason why we should proceed apace with this resolution; otherwise we face a national tragedy.

I am sure that honourable senators will agree that the national policy reflected in the British North America Act of 1867 is obsolete. However, progress constitutionally has been very slow and very little. From time to time over the past 50 years there were efforts to restructure our system in a way that would meet the needs of modern Canada. But superficial, cosmetic surgery is not enough: we need fundamental reforms to meet the challenges of profound change and the urgent needs that are facing our country.

We need, of course, new legal means to solve our burning problems and we must not forget, above all, the promise of constitutional reform or, of federal renewal when we urged the people of Quebec to say "no" to Premier Lévesque's proposal in the referendum of May 20, 1980. In their hour of decision, our fellow countrymen in Quebec chose Canada. They did not choose colonialism, or the status quo, or procrastination, as some people want. Our commitments were made in good faith, and the Parliament of Canada is fully capable of realizing that promise and of honouring that commitment.

The Speech from the Throne, at the opening of the Thirty-second Parliament, had this to say:

> Because my Government wants to strengthen the spirit of Canadian unity and nurture the seeds of renewal, it promises to interpret a vote of "no" to sovereignty-association as a vote for the rebuilding of the Canadian federation. My Government also promises to give effect to a "no" vote by mobilizing all the forces at its command in order to ensure the renewal of the Federation in a spirit of respect and justice for all.

Senator Flynn: And respect for the provinces, I suppose.

• (1610)

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, in recalling this statement, we must realize that we promised constitutional renewal without delay, without excuse and without hesitation. Moreover, the repeated failure of federal-provincial attempts to reform the Constitution is a national shame. The September 1980 First Ministers' Conference was a most bitter disappointment, especially after the exhaustive discussions and negotiations which took place in the early part of last year. Most Canadians are convinced that the provincial premiers' goal of unanimity on a substantive constitutional package is illusory and, as Senator Croll said earlier this week, an impossible dream. Their continual disagreement is an intolerable situation. Time is fast running out. We cannot wait any longer, and that is why we must act now.

Senator Flynn: You mean Mr. Trudeau.

Senator Haidasz: Mr. Trudeau has acted, and now it is time for us to act.

The resolution before us goes a long way towards satisfying our need for constitutional reform. Its major features are patriation, the Victoria amending formula, equalization, and a Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms. What is wrong with that? Are you against it? The desirability for patriation has already been amply explained and supported by the great majority of spokesmen in this place. It is, rather, the legality of the process of patriation that some have questioned.

Honourable senators, it has been clearly demonstrated that the resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons is the only legal way to patriate the Constitution, and the only way that an amendment to our Constitution can be passed.

Furthermore, the United Kingdom Parliament has been recognized as having the legal power to legislate constitutions for Canada ever since 1774, when the Quebec Act was passed. The U.K. Parliament enacted the B.N.A. Act in 1867 and later made 21 amendments. The Statute of Westminster, 1931 specifically preserved the power of the United Kingdom Parliament to amend the B.N.A. Act.

Some senators support the provinces' contention that, on the basis of past practices in connection with the amendment of the Constitution, there should be unanimous consent of the provinces before the Senate and the House of Commons request the amendments set out in this resolution. Some have argued that, in the absence of such unanimous agreement, the present procedure is not only inconsistent with constitutional conventions but is also, for that reason, illegal. In reply to those arguments, it must be said that past practices were not consistent and none dealt with patriation or the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

As I mentioned earlier, 21 amendments were made to the B.N.A. Act by the United Kingdom Parliament, and on three occasions—in 1893, 1927 and 1950—minor amendments, for statute revision purposes, were made on the sole initiative of the United Kingdom Parliament. In all other cases involving more substantial amendments, a request was made by the Government of Canada or by the Canadian Parliament. In no case has the U.K. Parliament refused an amendment because the consent of the provinces had not been obtained, nor has it accepted an amendment upon a provincial request.

As for the conventions, these change with circumstances. Even if one can say there is a convention requiring unanimous provincial agreement in constitutional matters, all attempts to get such agreement over the past 54 years have failed. The record has shown clearly that the objective of unanimity has proven to be impossible to achieve. Furthermore, all honourable senators know that conventions are not rules of law, but rules of politics.

In any event, doubts as to the constitutional propriety of an amendment now being requested by the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada without provincial consent were recently removed by a historic and monumental decision of the Manitoba Court of Appeal. Even the dissenting judges agreed that there is no historical evidence of a convention requiring provincial consultation and consent.

As regards an amending formula, we all know that is necessary once we have patriated the Constitution. The government has chosen the Victoria formula. Although it is not a perfect formula, it is the only one which received the approval of all 11 first ministers in 1971. According to this formula, the provinces will have, from now on, a legal say in the process of amending our Constitution.

Honourable senators, the legitimate interests of all the people in our country, no matter in which place they may reside, should always be the concern of the national government.

The chief Tory spokesman, the Leader of the Opposition in the other place, and some premiers envision Canada to be a country that is a community of communities, a loose association of provinces, free from the ties of a national economic fabric and free from a dedication to sharing. This they should not be entitled to in our Constitution. To reach an agreement on constitutional reform, we should never barter the fundamental rights and freedoms of Canadians.

Honourable senators, when we recall the violations of human rights that have been perpetrated upon humanity during the last 40 years, it is astonishing, indeed shocking, that several provincial governments are today opposed to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms contained in the joint resolution.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in 1948, was the positive expression of mankind's outrage at the atrocities of World War II, especially the attempted genocidal extermination of people in Nazi death camps.

I would recall, at this moment, what two great champions of human rights have said on this important matter. First, I would like to quote from the encyclical of Pope John XXIII, Pacem in Terris, which stated:

> —in the judicial organization of states in our times the first requisite is that a charter of fundamental human rights be drawn up in clear and precise terms and that it be incorporated in its entirety in the constitution.

The present reigning pope, Pope John Paul II, said on a recent visit to the Philippines:

> Nothing can justify a breach of human rights even in exceptional circumstances.
> Governments are there to serve the people and protect their dignity. They cannot pretend to serve the people's interests when they do not respect basic individual rights.
> Human rights are paramount.

Over the past 33 years human rights have become an important cornerstone of Canadian domestic and foreign policies. Abroad, Canada has ratified the major international convenants and protocols on fundamental rights and freedoms. At home, it was in 1947 that the first Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Human Rights was established to study the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights and to see what we could do about it in Canada.

● (1620)

Today, Canadian provinces have enacted statutes on human rights following the good example shown by the government of Tommy Douglas in Saskatchewan. Today, almost all provinces have human rights legislation and have established human rights commissions, and some provinces even have the office of ombudsman in operation.

In the federal sphere, we have the 1960 Bill of Rights promoted by a former Prime Minister, the late John G. Diefenbaker, which was enhanced by a Liberal member of Parliament when he introduced in committee an amendment referring to the supremacy of God.

I distinctly recall also the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, when, as Minister of Justice in 1968 at a federal-provincial conference, he stated that there should be an entrenchment of a Canadian Charter of Human Rights. Since that day I have learned to have great respect for that man.

In 1975 Canada signed the Helsinki Final Act, which embodies human rights principles. In 1977 the government of Mr. Trudeau sponsored the Canadian Human Rights Act and established a privacy commissioner and a Human Rights Commission.

Today, in this joint resolution before us, we seek to improve upon the existing measures of human rights by ensuring that there will be in Canada a constitutional bulwark which will protect all the people of Canada under every jurisdiction against all arbitrary violations of their rights on the part of any government or any body or any company or any organization.

The entrenchment of a Charter of Rights would preclude Parliament, or any provincial legislature, from altering or abolishing constitutionally entrenched rights or provisions unilaterally. Any change to the charter would require a constitutional amendment in accordance with a constitutionally established amending formula. Canadians would therefore be fully protected against arbitrary legislative action.

True, Canadians are a freedom-loving and tolerant people; nevertheless, there have been occasions in Canadian history when various federal and provincial governments have violated the rights of Canadians. I will just mention a few, such as: the expulsion or internment of many Japanese Canadians during World War II; the treatment accorded to the press by the Alberta government of Premier Aberhart in 1937, when he attempted to force the press to print government versions of events; and the infamous padlock law, enacted under Quebec's Premier Duplessis, which provided that buildings could be closed or padlocked if the Quebec attorney general deemed they were being used for undesirable purposes.

Under an entrenched Charter of Rights, such actions would no longer be permissible, and no federal or provincial government could use temporary shifts in public opinion as a guise for justifying the harrassment or arrest of persons considered troublesome by those in authority.

If the provincial governments are sincere in their claim that they would only seek to enhance rights legislation and not detract from it, they should have no logical grounds for opposing entrenchment, for entrenchment would merely provide that their commitment is sanctioned with the guarantee of constitutional certainty.

Furthermore, an important point which opponents of patriation frequently gloss over is that an entrenched Charter of Rights would in no way prevent Parliament or the provincial legislatures from providing forms of protection in addition to those already included in the charter.

Honourable senators, as for the desirability of the role of the courts in the matter of human rights, I would only like to say that, since Canada is a federal state, and the Constitution being the immutable law of the land, the courts do play the role of interpreters of the Constitution and they would also provide, in the future, greater certainty for the people of Canada, once human rights are entrenched in the Constitution.

Another advantage of such an entrenchment is that it would serve as an important means by which Canada could live up to its international obligations. Unfortunately, the Progressive Conservative Party's position on entrenchment is meaningless and unacceptable, as it would allow any province the opportunity of opting out of any constitutional provision, thereby creating inequality throughout Canada. Furthermore, to our dismay, the Conservative Premier of Manitoba, Mr. Sterling Lyon, rejected outright the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms as proposed by Mr. Trudeau. In fact, the September 1980 constitutional conference revealed that seven premiers had stated publicly at one time or another that they could not agree to any form of entrenchment of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The rights included in this charter before us are fundamental. They are a minimum guarantee, and although that may place certain limitations on the powers of both federal and provincial legislatures and governments, these limitations would exist only to protect certain fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual that are recognized as essential in every advanced society.

In the way of a general summary of the desirability of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, I would like to say that the rights and freedoms included in this charter are a statement of the very foundation of our society, and they certainly require clear expression in our Constitution. At present the rights and freedoms vary from place to place in Canada. If there is one overriding element of unity in a federal state, it should be the greatest possible measure of commonality in the recognition and protection of basic rights, so that a person moving from one place to another will be assured equal treatment and protection as well as an equal opportunity for a job, wherever he may come from and wherever he may decide to reside in Canada.

Furthermore, the charter does not have a centralizing effect. As I mentioned, it does not authorize any shift of power from the provincial levels of government. Section 30 of the charter clearly extends the legislative powers of any body or authority.

Specific sections of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms are so laudable and worthy of support that I should like to read them into the record. Dealing with fundamental freedoms, section 2 states:

> Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
> (a) freedom of conscience and religion;
> (b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;
> (c) freedom of peaceful assembly; and
> (d) freedom of association.

I will not read section 15, but it deals with equality rights, and we all know that it will forbid discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

● (1630)

I welcome these two sections because they are so comprehensive and because these fundamental freedoms will be enshrined in a new Constitution. It also shows how much things have changed and how liberal a society we want to be. After this charter has been passed, Canadians—no matter what their creed, race, national or ethnic origin, colour, sex, age or mental or physical disability—should never be discriminated against; they should never be rejected for a job or promotion on the basis of their new rights. Canadians with non-Anglo-Celtic or non-French names should not be obliged to feel they should change their family name or alter its spelling to get a good job or a promotion or high appointment or position or directorship in a bank or some other corporation. My brother was asked to change his name if he expected to be promoted in a big Canadian corporation, just to prove the point.

To illustrate my point further, I should like to relate some interesting episodes in early Canadian history which involved religious and ethnic features. I am doing so only because they are interesting examples and not to demean or criticize any ethnic group or province in Canada.

Around the year 1761, the first Jewish immigrant, Aaron Hart, settled in Trois-Rivières. He and his family and descendants participated in the economic and political life of their community. In 1807 his son, Ezekiel Hart, was elected to the Colonial Legislature of Lower Canada. During one sitting, after he had voted, his oath of office was questioned. Historians state that for religious and political reasons he was removed from the legislature. Ezekiel Hart was re-elected and thrown out a second time. He then ran a third time, but became discouraged and withdrew during the course of the campaign. In disgust, the Governor of Lower Canada dismissed the legislature. Happily, it was the great French-Canadian nationalist, Louis Joseph Papineau, who did a great deal to regularize the Jewish position in 1832 by granting them all the rights of citizens in Lower Canada.

Following this enlightened move, the Legislature of the United Provinces of Canada passed a law in 1851 declaring the equality of all religious groups. I think this was the first historic basis of religious equality in Canadian confederation.

I warmly welcome sections 25, 33 and 35 guaranteeing the rights, freedoms and treaty obligations of our aboriginal peoples. This recognition and affirmation will prevail over the Indian Act and other discriminatory and unfair acts of our legislatures. I think that this is a tremendous achievement. Who can be against that?

As one who has been involved in the multicultural life of our country, I enthusiastically welcome sections 14, 15, 22, 26, 27 and 28, dealing with the right to interpreters, equality rights, preservation of non-official language rights, multiculturalism, minority language education rights and rights respecting denominational and separate schools.

However, it is especially section 27 that I should like to bring to your attention at this time, just as Senator Yuzyk did a few moments ago. Section 27 states:

> This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

True, our country had a multicultural society even before the Italian sailor Giovanni Caboto, referred to as John Cabot in our history books, came to Canadian shores. We had numerous Indian nations and tribes before the arrival of settlers from France, England, Germany, Poland, Italy, the Ukraine, the Scandinavian and other countries of the world. Yes, and even before Confederation, there were Canadians who did not belong to charter groups, or the two founding races, as they are often referred to, who played a prominent role in the development of Canada.

I should like to read into the record some points about men such as Sir Casimir Gzowski who came to London in 1840. He built railways and bridges in Ontario, and even became the founder of a theological school in Toronto. For all of his works he was knighted by Queen Victoria. I should like to mention also Edward Kieszkowski who came from Poland to St. Hyacinthe in 1840. He became a member of the legislature of Lower Canada and in 1867 represented the constituency of St. Hyacinthe as a Liberal in the first Parliament of Canada. I should also like to mention Alexandre Globensky who in 1890 was an independent member of the federal constituency of St. Eustache and Deux Montagnes. Many of these people and those who followed them gave their sweat and tears to develop Canada. Many of them also gave their blood in our wars. I want to mention Andrew Mynarski, of Winnipeg, who served with the RCAF and who was posthumously awarded the Victoria Cross for saving the lives of his fellow air crew.

Honourable senators, I cannot let this moment pass without referring to October 8, 1971, a day I so well remember and, I am sure, is well remembered by honourable senators. That was the day that the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau announced the federal government's official policy of multiculturalism. He stated at that time:

> A policy of multiculturalism within a bilingual framework commends itself to the government as the most suitable means of assuring the cultural freedom of Canadians. Such a policy should help to break down discriminatory attitudes and cultural jealousies. National unity, if it is to mean anything in the deeply personal sense, must be founded on confidence in one's own individual identity; out of this can grow respect for that of others and a willingness to share ideas, attitudes and assumptions. A vigorous policy of multiculturalism will help create this initial confidence. It can form the base of a society which is based on fair play for all.

It was with mixed feelings of humility and joy that I later accepted the responsibility as the first Minister of State for Multiculturalism. Although the leaders of the opposition parties, Robert Stanfield, David Lewis and Réal Caouette, supported the policy and although multiculturalism struck a responsive chord in many Canadians, there was some reluctance and fear on the part of a minority who still either do not understand or refuse to understand the true meaning of that policy. Now that the enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians will be entrenched in the Charter of Rights, those doubts, fears and reluctances should not be entertained in the future.

Section 27, which is an interpretive rule, will serve as a positive guide to the courts whenever our multicultural heritage is questioned. The constitutional entrenchment of multiculturalism should contribute a great deal to giving Canadians a sense of belonging to this great country, cementing our mosaic, and thereby enhancing national identity and strengthening Canadian unity.

Honourable senators, I recognize that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is neither complete nor perfect. Even the Prime Minister stated last Monday in the other place that he wanted to bring in some amendments. I am sure that along with Senator Yuzyk there are others who would like to bring in amendments, too—perhaps myself also, if I had an opportunity: amendments to strengthen women's rights, as Senator Yuzyk wants; amendments to strengthen equality rights and legal rights; words to protect more clearly the rights of the unborn; amendments to add property rights and economic rights; and also to add a preamble which recognizes the supremacy of God.

● (1640)

Honourable senators, either in the Senate or the House of Commons, since 1957 I have participated in the great debates on medicare, the Canada Pension Plan, Canadian citizenship, human rights, environmental protection, the Canadian flag, and the national anthem. However, even though they were milestones in Canadian legislative achievement, which provide pride and security for our people, it is in this debate on the joint resolution that is now before us, in the debate on the new Canadian Constitution, that we are offering Canadians more security, greater pride, and full independence.

The Fathers of Confederation forged a nation. Let us make a more just and free nation. In this resolution we are offering the Canadian people more potential to develop and to grow. We are offering them a greater destiny. The best time to seize this opportunity and challenge is the present. Honourable senators, let us take control of Canada's destiny now.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Bielish, debate adjourned.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

EFFECT OF JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will not be surprised that I have for the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question on the judgment rendered today by the Supreme Court of Newfoundland.

My first question is: Has the government decided to alter its course of action with regard to the constitutional package? More specifically, has the government decided to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had anticipated the question with respect to the decision rendered by the Newfoundland court today.

Senator Flynn: I grant you that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I quote, in part, from remarks which have been made today by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister? I believe they shed some light on the situation as it exists. He said:

> —we are somewhat disappointed by the judgment of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland; but it is certainly a very important one.

He went on to say that two decisions have now been made which are in conflict. One decision, rendered by the Manitoba Court of Appeal, ruled in favour of the federal government.

Senator Flynn: It was a three-to-two decision.

[Senator Hastings.]

Senator Perrault: Yes, three to two, by majority; and the Newfoundland court ruled in favour of the provinces.

This is what the Right Honourable the Prime Minister said:

> These two decisions which are in conflict, and the fact that the Supreme Court of Canada has now decided that it would hear the appeal from Manitoba, and presumably any other appeals which are brought before it on this subject, before the end of April,—

I must say, that is sooner than had been anticipated.

> —leads me to remind the House what some of the judges in the Manitoba case said, including the Chief Justice.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

> They said that as long as the resolution was not out of the House the first question put to the court was hypothetical, indicating that it would prefer to judge not on a hypothetical bill but on a real bill.

● (2015)

> As a result of that, I wonder if we could not agree to pass the resolution and make sure the Supreme Court of Canada is acting, not on a hypothetical case, but on a real case, and agree to respect the decision of the Supreme Court.

However, he went on to say this—

Senator Flynn: A little later.

Senator Perrault: Yes, a little later, but to complete his statement, he said:

> I am prepared to suggest that if we can agree on some form of time allocation which would not only get the resolution approved with the amendment dealing with women's rights—which I believe have been pressed from various sides of the House—and an amendment which has been discussed on aboriginal rights—

Then, after being interrupted, he continued:

> If the honourable members opposite do not want to approve the resolution another way, my offer will still stand, that we get a resolution from the Supreme Court of Canada in return for which the government would certainly undertake not to press the United Kingdom to pass the resolution until it has seen the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada,—

Then the Right Honourable the Prime Minister stated:

> If the Supreme Court renders in favour of the resolution, I take it that it would settle the matter and we could put an end to this debate which has been going on for several months. Of course, if it renders against us, the government would have to admit that it cannot proceed in the United Kingdom with the resolution in this form.

That is where matters stand. There are reports that the Commons house leaders have agreed to meet. I understand that some meetings involving house leaders may have already taken place to discuss the Prime Minister's further proposal which he made today, to have Parliament deal with the resolution by Easter, and to decide whether this suggestion is acceptable to the other parties in the House of Commons.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Notwithstanding the problem of the parliamentary process, with regard to the appeal which the Supreme Court of Canada will hear at the end of April, would the government consider intervening directly and putting its own questions forward in order to cover the entire problem of the constitutional package?

Some views have been expressed to the effect that the Manitoba case does not cover the whole question. My suggestion is that the government should intervene in order to solve the whole problem. Notwithstanding what the Leader of the Government has quoted from the Prime Minister, it seems to me that, despite the fact that it is only a proposal before Parliament, the government's position is exactly the same today as it was with regard to Bill C-60, when reference was made to the Supreme Court on that specific question. I do not see any difference between the situation in which we find ourselves today and that which existed with regard to Bill C-60.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that, particularly in view of the fact that the Honourable Senator Flynn is a former Minister of Justice, consideration will certainly be given to the views he has expressed this evening. It may be that there is a difference of opinion as to whether the Manitoba terms of reference were sufficiently broad, but certainly Senator Flynn's views will be given careful consideration and the suggestion will be taken as notice.

Senator Flynn: May I ask the Leader of the Government whether consideration has been, or will be, given to the alternative of postponing the debate on the resolution until the Supreme Court has ruled in a definite manner? Perhaps then the government can achieve an agreement on an appropriate allocation of time in the other place and in this house.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, consideration appears to have been given to that possibility in recent hours, but there is one concern of the government, and that is that any resolution which is ultimately referred to the Supreme Court of Canada should be as complete as possible.

It is our view that the amendments with respect to women's rights and aboriginal rights should be included in any reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. Thus, the present view of the government is to opt to refer the resolution to the Supreme Court of Canada, in its complete and final form, after Parliament has rendered its judgment on it, rather than refer an incomplete resolution to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Flynn: That is what I was suggesting. I am not trying to limit the scope of any questions that might be put before the Supreme Court of Canada. They should be made as wide as possible, but I suggest that the amendments really do not bear on the essence of the problem which the Supreme Court would have to deal with. In any event, I am not proposing any restriction. On the contrary, I am proposing that the government should intervene to put the question as widely as possible.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I believe we all understand the point which is being advanced by the Leader of the Opposition. However, the government is sensitive to the fact—and I repeat the words that I used earlier this evening—that the Chief Justice of the Manitoba Court of Appeal said that the first question put to the court was hypothetical, to quote his words. He then indicated that the court would prefer to rule on a real bill and not on a hypothetical bill. We want to make sure that the bill which goes to the Supreme Court of Canada is complete, final and reflects the views of the Parliament of Canada.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I suggest that the concern of the Manitoba Court of Appeal would not be the concern of the Supreme Court of Canada, in view of its ruling in the Senate reference.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there again is a differing viewpoint advanced by the Leader of the Opposition. However, some would maintain most vigorously that the two cases are not directly comparable. In any case, surely Parliament can end the impasse and can deal in an orderly way with the constitutional resolution and then get on with the task of dealing with some of the other problems facing the country. I know that honourable senators will be fully co-operative in making sure that this resolution is given fair and complete debate in the Senate.

GRAIN

NEGOTIATIONS RE CROWSNEST RATES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question to direct to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Last week the railways apparently made a new proposal to the federal government which would serve, I assume, as a form of alternative to the renegotiation of the Crowsnest rate, something which the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board has said the government was not anxious to get into too quickly. Is the minister aware of this proposal, and, if so, would he inform the Senate of his views on it?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am aware of the proposal, in the sense that I have read the newspaper reports. I am not otherwise aware of the proposal.

As I recall, what I read in the newspapers would indicate that it is really not much different from the proposal we received in the past. I am certainly willing to make inquiries to see if I can get any proposal that they may have made and make any comments on it that would seem appropriate.

I think the situation with regard to the Crowsnest rate is quite clear. The Prime Minister has said that he and his government would not wish to fiddle with the Crowsnest rate unless and until there appeared to be a consensus in western Canada asking that this be done.

I think that the nub of the question is really something outside the Crowsnest rate, namely, whether or not we shall have a transportation system that will do the job with regard to hauling grain and with regard to hauling other products. I believe that the Government of Canada is fully committed to whatever action is necessary to obtain an efficient transportation system and to making certain that our railway transportation facilities will do the job for grain producers, for coal producers, for potash producers, for the manufacturers of forest products, and for the producers of other commodities that must be hauled by rail. The obtaining of such a modern, efficient rail transportation system, in my view, does not in any way depend on the grain producers of western Canada being prepared to accept a change in the Crow rate.

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question which arises as a result of something which, I believe, the minister has already expressed—his preference that the Crow rate not be touched, but, rather, that there be more equity investment, for instance, in the CNR. Would the minister respond in the positive, were such a proposal to come from the railways?

Senator Argue: I would have to determine whether or not the proposal contained an equity provision for the railways. I will be happy to look into the matter and report back to the Senate.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

WESTERN CANADA—INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, my question is directed either to the Leader of the Government in the Senate or to the Minister of State for Economic Development. I shall let them decide who will respond. My question is simply this: What is the status of the government's election commitment to deploy $4 billion for western Canada industrial development?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, when a more detailed announcement is ready to be made public, it will be done in the usual manner.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have heard that before.

Senator Balfour: My supplementary question is also to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Would it be correct to say that the government is simply awaiting its revenue gains from its confiscatory taxation of western Canadian natural resources to fund its commitment—in other words, to buy western Canada with its own money?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is fair to add to Senator Balfour's comment that a number of matters are under consideration, including the main use of the funds.

[Senator Argue.]

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT

FOREIGN-OWNED FIRMS—PERFORMANCE REVIEW

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, also under the general heading of "delayed government decision," may I ask the Minister of State for Economic Development whether it is still the intention of the government to bring in amendments to the Foreign Investment Review Act to provide for a performance review of foreign-owned firms to see that they meet the test of bringing substantial benefits to Canada, and, if so, when?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I could reply to that question in some detail, but I believe that the honourable senator already knows the answer, because the same topic was covered on page B2 of this morning's Globe and Mail. I believe that story was written on the basis of questions directed to the minister who is directly responsible for this program.

Senator Murray: The purpose of my question was not to learn what was in the Globe and Mail this morning. I want to know whether it is still the intention of the government to bring in amendments to the Foreign Investment Review Act for the purpose which I have already stated.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will take the specific type of amendment suggested by the honourable senator as notice and refer it to the minister for his reply. I will do that because, if I were to reply either in the affirmative or the negative, I anticipate that the honourable senator's next question would be "When?" It seems to me that I should request of the minister his projections for bringing in an amendment of the nature described.

Senator Murray: Naturally, I would like to know when the government intends to bring in such amendments, if it intends to do so at all.

Perhaps I can phrase the question a little differently and ask: Has there been any change in the stated policy of the government to the effect that changes will be made in the Foreign Investment Review Act to provide a performance review of foreign-owned companies to ensure that they meet the test of bringing substantial benefits to Canada? At the same time, will the minister say whether there has been any change in the policy of the government with regard to other amendments providing, for example, for the publication by foreign firms of their intention to take over Canadian firms, to allow Canadians an opportunity to make counter offers? Has there been any change in the policy of the government as stated on those matters?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am unaware that the minister directly responsible has made an announcement which would constitute a statement of having changed from the enunciation of the policy some time in 1980.

Senator Murray: Does the Minister of State for Economic Development state that there has been no change in the policy as previously announced?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what I stated was that I am unaware of any announcement that has been made in that regard.

Senator Murray: The question is not whether or not the minister is aware of an announcement; the question is whether a change has been made—whether a decision has been made by the government to change the policy in regard to those matters. I believe my question is quite clear and requires a simple answer.

Senator Olson: Yes, the question is quite clear to me. I must repeat what I have said a number of times in this chamber, and that is that I am not going to make statements on behalf of other ministers. It, therefore, follows that, unless the minister directly responsible for this policy has made an announcement of this change, there has not been an announcement of the change.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Ask him.

Senator Murray: There may have been a change, whether announced or not.

Senator Flynn: I think the minister should be able to reply that he will inquire and report. If he says this is not his responsibility, then the question will be addressed to the Leader of the Government who can field all questions in all areas.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): And never drop them.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will give an undertaking to refer the question to the minister and ask him if he is ready to make a statement of policy that incorporates the changes my honourable friend has asked for. He may say, no, that he is not ready to give such a statement.

Senator Flynn: Find out.

Senator Olson: I will do that.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As you are probably aware, I have asked several questions pertaining to the Garrison, which affects Manitoba and the southern part of Saskatchewan. Manitobans are still very concerned about this matter, but we do not seem to hear very much about it.

Have any new developments taken place since the President's visit, and would the Leader of the Government make us aware of any developments, if any?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we all appreciate the continuing interest of Senator Guay in this very important national matter.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: I can report that the United States—and this is as of this afternoon—has now informed us that the additional appropriation of $4 million being requested for the Garrison project will be used for project personnel and administrative expenses. That will allay some of the fears expressed here.

We have also received the assurance of President Reagan that the United States will honour the commitments of previous U.S. administrations and that no work potentially affecting Canada will be undertaken until consultations have been completed. That is another important statement from the United States this afternoon.

Nonetheless, Canada continues to oppose the authorization of any new funds for construction or preconstruction activities on the project, as we believe the commitment of additional funds adds momentum to the ultimate completion of the currently authorized project as a whole. We intend to continue our efforts to ensure that the U.S. Congress and administration are aware of our concerns.

We have indicated to the United States our willingness to commence the consultation process, and we anticipate that the first meeting will be held in Washington in April.

INDUSTRY

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on February 24 by Senator Roblin concerning industrial strategy.

I would assure the honourable senator that, of course, there would be consultation with the provincial governments, business and labour, as appropriate, prior to the government bringing forward a series of initiatives that relate to industrial, trade and export policies.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada.

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, that the motion be amended in Schedule B of the resolution by inserting immediately after Clause 28 the following:

28.1 Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms set out herein are guaranteed equally to men and women.—(Honourable Senator Bielish).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Would the Leader of the Government prefer that this item stand until the government has informed us of its decision with regard to the consequences of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland given today?

If the debate is to be adjourned until the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled on the legality of the constitutional package, I think it would be rather inappropriate for this house to continue the debate. I am asking him if we should wait until tomorrow or Thursday to see what the government decides in this matter.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it can be said that the debate in the Senate has proceeded in good spirit and in a co-operative manner, unlike the events of the other chamber.

We have taken the position on this side, that every senator should be given a full opportunity to set forth his or her opinion on this important resolution.

Certainly, it would not offend us to hear Senator Bielish. Indeed, we have been looking forward to her contribution to this debate, and we would welcome that contribution this evening. Therefore, we do not think the debate should be delayed.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Muir.

● (2040)

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I wish it had been outlined—

Senator Frith: Did you bring your music, Senator Muir?

Senator Muir: I sure did. I wish the Leader of the Government in the Senate had been informed that I was going to speak instead of Senator Bielish. He had so many nice things to say about Senator Bielish, and I doubt that he would have said the same things about me.

In any event, honourable senators, I hesitated to take part in this debate as I felt that perhaps just a legal question was involved, and it should be left to the legal people to debate. However, after listening with interest to the legal arguments, in which both those for and those against the resolution seem to have made their points, I came to the conclusion that the legal argument could only be decided in the courts, and I do not understand why the government is unwilling—indeed, afraid—to have it decided by the highest court in Canada before proceeding further with it.

Senator Perrault: Will you vote for it now?

Senator Muir: Since the legality of the proposal is not going to be decided, at least at present—although there have been some rumblings today—I believe it is quite proper for a non-legal person like myself, one who came out of the coal mines of Cape Breton and who makes no claim to having expert knowledge on either legal or constitutional matters, to speak on the resolution from another point of view.

Before I do so, I thought I should make a passing comment. With all due respect to my legal confreres in all parts of this chamber, I say that when your profession is law—I say this in a jocular manner—you are suspect; but when you are both a lawyer and a politician, you are doubly suspect. Here I refer to the brilliant and lengthy dissertation given by Senator Godfrey in this chamber on March 11. From his speech, to which I listened very carefully from beginning to end—it was most interesting; extremely interesting—I could tell that he is an outstanding lawyer. It was a thoughtful and deeply researched presentation that he made. Indeed, he consumed over seven pages of Hansard, and in doing so he outlined point by point why the resolution should not be passed—and you know, honourable senators, he thoroughly convinced me. He built an excellent case, as only a scholarly lawyer could. It was a masterpiece, a masterful presentation—

Senator Frith: He should be on the Bench.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Muir: But, honourable senators, the final few sentences of his remarks brought complete disillusionment. Let me quote my honourable friend. After damning the resolution from one end to the other, and bearing in mind the hours of research that he must have put into it, he finished by saying, in the penultimate paragraph:

> —I have finally come to the conclusion, in spite of my strong reservations about the process, that patriating the Constitution is all important, is long overdue—

Senator Steuart: Hear, hear.

Senator Muir: Now, now, David.

> —and should be done now, even though it includes a Charter of Rights which is completely entrenched, which I do not really think is necessary at this time.

An Hon. Senator: Oh, oh.

Senator Muir: He then goes on to say:

> Let us get this first step over with, so that we can get on with amending the Constitution at home with respect to other important matters such as the division of powers. I am, therefore, going to hold my nose and vote for this resolution.

Senator Perrault: Hold whatever you like.

Senator Muir: How anyone could make such a beautiful, wonderful, fantastic speech against the resolution, and then say that, is beyond me. However, I am not a lawyer, so I don't know how it works.

I would say that Senator Godfrey thoroughly convinced me, and if I were in any difficulty at any time—and please God I am not—I think I would engage him as my lawyer, because he is a very convincing gentleman when he puts his case forward, but I would hope, if I were being charged with a criminal offence, that he would not desert me in the final paragraph.

To get back to what I was going to say before I rudely interrupted myself, in my opinion, in regard to this matter, the people of Canada could be divided into four classes or categories. There are those who support the government's action, those who oppose it, those who have no interest in it or, indeed, no understanding of the issues involved, and those of the fourth class, to which I believe I belong, who feel that there are other and more important matters which should be the concern of the government. I try to speak on behalf of the fourth class.

I believe the first concern of the government at this time should be the economic situation. I believe the first concern of the government should be the great problem of unemployment, the great problem of inflation, the great need of new incentives in those regions of Canada which suffer from even higher unemployment than the national average. I believe the first concern of a concerned government should be the relief of those in need—and of first importance now is the relief of homeowners, and those who want to be homeowners, from abnormally high mortgage interest rates due to the inaction of the government.

It appears obvious that this government has placed its constitutional obsession above human needs. It has no consideration and no sense of compassion for those who suffer on account of low incomes and high prices. It has no consideration and no sense of compassion for all those who ask only for employment, who ask only for economic security so they can support their families without the constant threat of unemployment, with all its evil results, hanging over them.

Honourable senators, as you are aware, it is estimated that one million people in Canada are unemployed. I truly do not believe that those people put a high priority on patriating the Constitution. They have to live, and they want to provide for their families above the poverty line. When the homeowner has to renegotiate the mortgage on his house at a higher rate of interest, when he must try to balance the cost of food, the cost of fuel, light and power, and all the other necessary items, with a severely reduced income, he can be forgiven if his interest in the Constitution is so slight as to be almost non-existent.

I say to all honourable senators that the government has lost whatever sense of proportion it ever had—and, believe me, I do not think it has had very much in regard to this matter.

Let us face facts. The first concern of the government should be the economic welfare of the people of Canada, and yet we see the majority of the supporters of the government so concerned with the Constitution that they do not realize, or understand, or appreciate the attitude toward it of the ordinary people of Canada.

I want to make my own position very clear. I do not think that patriation of the Constitution, with a Charter of Rights attached, is a matter of urgent importance, and after hearing the speeches on the resolution given here, and also reading and hearing some delivered in the House of Commons, I believe I understand the position of those in favour of, and of those opposed to, the resolution. I wholly agree with those who state that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be made in Canada by Canadians.

Although I was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, I was brought to Canada at an early age, and consider myself a true Canadian. I resent the fact that our government should be begging and pleading the British Parliament to legislate on what is a wholly Canadian matter.

I understand, of course, that the United Kingdom Parliament must amend the B.N.A. Act by including an amending formula to make it a Canadian statute, because the B.N.A. act is a statute of that Parliament. I cannot go along with the proposal of having a Canadian Charter of Rights given to us by the Parliament of the United Kindgon.

The excuse for this strange and, indeed, abnormal, procedure is that it would not be passed in Canada under any formula. I cannot accept this as a valid excuse. It should be remembered that those who oppose the government are also Canadians who are absolutely sincere in their beliefs. We have proclaimed for years that we have come of age. We have cut the umbilical ties, and so on. We have cut our colonial ties, and we are a sovereign nation. Now we plead with the parliament of a foreign country, practically on bended knees, to pass a law which would be binding on Canadians.

Honourable senators, in my view, that is an incredible situation. It is like an adolescent who is constantly at odds with his parents. "I have this problem; you solve it." I find the whole process extremely humiliating. Here we are supposed to be writing history. We are supposed to be committing to paper the fundamental rights of Canadians. So far, we have only succeeded in dividing our country, and antagonizing most of our provinces.

A Charter of Rights should be a uniting force, to my mind, and yet by its high-handed actions, and by its assumption of superiority, the government is creating a division in this country which possibly would remain for years.

Honourable senators, being a political realist, and having been a member of the House of Commons for 22 years before coming here, I know this resolution will pass either in its present form or with a few non-controversial amendments. I do not think it should pass until we have had, at least, an opportunity to give the proposed Constitution a clause-by-clause examination. I know the special joint committee gave it such a study, and the members are to be commended for their work. However, a committee study on such an important piece of legislation—we don't do this every year or every few months—cannot take the place of a clause-by-clause examination by a Committee of the Whole in the Senate. Certainly there is not time for an ordinary member of the Senate to speak on all the clauses.

Any Charter of Rights should be written so that it protects the rights of citizens, especially against the tendency of big governments to whittle away the rights of the people in the name of efficiency. I do not think the proposed Constitution gives the ordinary citizen sufficient protection.

Someone once said that to give a man his life but to deny him his liberty is to take from him all that makes life worth living. To give him his liberty but not to guarantee him his property, which is the fruit of that liberty, is to still leave him a slave. I do not suggest that the proposed Constitution goes as far as that, but I simply do not understand why it does not guarantee the property rights of our citizens.

I do not understand why there is no reference in the proposed Constitution to the fact, which I think is beyond dispute, that Canada as a nation acknowledges the supremacy of God. I recall this was mentioned by my colleague from Cape Breton, Senator Macdonald. Like him, I cannot understand why an amendment to that effect made in committee was opposed by the Liberal members of the joint committee. I would not have expected such an amendment to be considered as a partisan measure. Yet, while the Conservatives and NDP members voted for it, Liberal members, including six Liberal senators, voted it down.

While Senator Stanbury was speaking, I raised that question with him, and he gave me a reply—well, he really didn't say very much in his response because he had not read the preamble, which is really good. It reads:

> We, the people of Canada, proudly proclaim that we are and shall always be, with the help of God, a free and self-governing people.

In his earlier remarks, he said it was the provinces who did not want it and who did not agree with it. When he responded to my question, he stated that he had made an error, that, in fact, the provinces did not want to talk about the preamble until the whole Constitution was put together. He said:

> Perhaps I should correct something which may have been misleading because of lack of information . . . I was wrong in saying it was a rejection—

Honourable senators, what I could not understand—

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Muir would mind reading the excerpt in full instead of mumbling it quietly and incompletely.

Senator Muir: I beg your pardon? Would you repeat that, please?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Would you be influenced if the whole thing were read?

Senator Muir: Would Senator Stanbury please repeat that?

Senator Stanbury: I am asking that the honourable senator read the full quote because what he was doing was mumbling the quote and not giving it completely. I think that in fairness he should read the full quote.

Senator Muir: Wonderful, wonderful! Far be it from me to mumble in this place or any other place at any time. I would never do that.

Senator Phillips: A Cape Bretoner never mumbles.

Senator Muir: You are right.

I had posed the question as follows:

> Honourable senators, I wonder if my honourable colleague, Senator Stanbury, would permit a question. It is a very sincere question, with no partisanship about it at all.

I am quoting myself now. I love to quote myself.

Senator Flynn: You are not the only one.

Senator Muir: I went on to say:

> I know Senator Stanbury's background, and the work he has done with regard to the church, the Deity, and so on. He quoted from the preamble that was previously presented. In the course of that preamble reference is made to the Deity. Would the honourable senator kindly advise me—

Can you hear me, Senator Stanbury?

Senator Stanbury: It is difficult.

Senator Muir: I will go on:

> Would the honourable senator kindly advise me why, in the recent Constitution hearings, the Liberal members of that committee, along with the New Democratic Party, said, "Away with the Deity, and away with references to the Deity. We will have nothing to do with the Deity"? I just wonder if he would explain that to me—and I say this sincerely—in the light of his important background in church work, and things of that nature.

Senator Stanbury's reply was—and I am quoting Senator Stanbury, that great worker from one of the very great churches of Canada:

> I am sure that individuals in every party have their own points of view. What I was giving you was the proposal of a preamble given by the Government of Canada to the provincial premiers. Perhaps I should correct something which may have been misleading because of lack of information. My understanding—

I am still quoting Senator Richard J. Stanbury.

> —of what happened was that the premiers said, "We do not want to talk about the preamble until we have the whole Constitution put together." I was wrong in saying it was a rejection, but it was not accepted at that time as the preamble for the Constitution. If it had been, it would have referred to these matters which I regard as important.

Senator Stanbury: Thank you very much.

Senator Muir: You are most welcome. I am only too happy to accommodate you.

Honourable senators, I hope Senator Stanbury will say I am quite welcome when I bring up this other point. That was no answer at all to the question I posed—no answer whatsoever. I asked him why the Liberal senators had opposed the Deity, the mention of God, or anything about this preamble. He did not answer it at all.

Senator Phillips: He did not understand.

• (2100)

Senator Muir: To get back to what I was saying before I was so rudely interrupted by the Presbyterian Pope, I would not have expected that such an amendment would be considered a partisan measure. Yet, while the Conservative and NDP members voted for it, the Liberal members, including the six Liberal senators, voted it down.

I am sure that Senator Stanbury must have received these letters, one of them from a town called Toronto which was signed by a Reverend Leonard Self. I am sure that the honourable senator must have received that letter from the Westminster Presbyterian Church. I hope that he personally answered the letter from Reverend Self and explained the situation to him.

Senator Stanbury: I did.

Senator Muir: I am sure that he did not get much of an explanation, if he got an answer to this question that was anything like the answer I got to mine.

I would have thought that the proposed amendment was non-controversial. If you look at the Minutes of the Proceedings of the joint committee of January 22, 1981, you will see the following:

> The Committee resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp, That clause 1 of the proposed Constitution Act, 1980 be amended by striking out line 1 on page 3 and substituting the following:

"1. Affirming that

(a) the Canadian nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free individuals and free institutions, and

(b) individuals and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law, the Canadian Charter of Rights and"

After debate, the question being put on the amendment, it was negatived on the following division—

I would like to put on the record the result of the vote, and I mention only the Senate members because we are in this chamber at the moment. Yeas: Asselin, Nurgitz, Roblin. Nays: Austin, Cottreau, Goldenberg, Lucier, Petten and Rousseau.

Honourable senators, it would be interesting to learn from any of these honourable senators the reason they opposed what I would consider a non-controversial and non-partisan amendment. It seems unusual that they would oppose it. Indeed, if the objection was merely that it was proposed by the Conservatives, I can only say that the members on this side would support it if it were brought in by a government supporter. I hope that Senator Stanbury will bring in that amendment, and I can assure him that we will all support it very strongly.

Senator Thériault: What side are you speaking from?

Senator Muir: Oh, yes, I had forgotten that you are overflowing into this side of the chamber. We will have to find a seat for you on the other side.

Honourable senators, I know that we are debating the amendment proposed by Senator Yuzyk, and I certainly support it. Indeed, I think it strengthens my contention that we should have a clause-by-clause examination of the proposed Constitution in this chamber before voting on it. As it now stands, I support the amendment, but, even with the amendment, the resolution is so lacking in the protection and guaranteeing of fundamental rights that I cannot support it.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the Academy Awards are being presented in Hollywood tonight, and in view of the fact that two Cape Breton senators are speaking back to back here in Ottawa, I can only observe that it is quite a night in North America.

I congratulate my friend and colleague, Senator Muir, for the concerns he has expressed with respect to the unemployed and the needy in Canada. I am sure that he would want me to mention that the Government of Canada has indeed recognized those needs in a most magnificent way: the announcement in the last few weeks that our own native Cape Breton will receive hundreds of millions of dollars to aid the steel and coal industries of our area.

With respect to the subject at hand, this is the second time that I have had the privilege of participating in the debate on the Canadian Constitution. In my first effort, when the resolution was originally introduced last fall, I spoke primarily about my views as a Canadian living in Nova Scotia. I dealt with mobility rights, the principle of equalization, ownership of resources, language rights and the historic significance of what has been proposed. Since that time, the resolution has undergone major changes by way of the amendment process and has attracted both fervent support and vehement opposition. I believe that most Canadians support the substance of the resolution, but they are sometimes confused by and, in the case of the majority of the provincial premiers and the official opposition, opposed to the process. So let me speak about that process.

Senator Flynn: Good idea!

Senator Graham: Almost without exception, speakers who have reflected on the process have expressed concern. Even supporters of the proposed resolution have said that it is unfortunate that there is not greater acceptance on the part of the provinces and the official opposition. However, they argue that the time is right and that the momentum for change, which started with the Quebec referendum, should not be lost. If the current attempt at reform is lost, as have been attempts so many times in the past, there is no telling when, if ever, the process could be brought to a successful conclusion.

I believe there has been a great deal of movement towards the reform position taken by the federal government since the introduction of the proposed resolution on October 6, 1980. It seems to me that this movement has been the result of favourable public reaction to the content of the resolution, notably the desire for patriation and the entrenchment of rights. That is not to say that the public has been enamoured of the unilateral process. This, I believe, is the result of much misunderstanding.

At the beginning of October 1980 there were two almost equally controversial aspects with respect to the process: the first was unilateralism; the second was the entrenchment of rights in the Constitution. The entrenchment of rights appears to have won over many converts. Jake Epp, the constitutional spokesman for the Progressive Conservative Party, on January 20, 1981, when introducing his party's amendments to the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, said:

> It is the popular will that we have a Charter of Rights and Freedoms for the Canadian people embedded in the Constitution.

Prior to January 20, the issue within the Conservative Party seemed to be very much open to debate, some members supporting entrenchment and others opposing it. This ambivalence was perhaps understandable, in light of the positions taken by the Conservative provincial premiers. Throughout the summer of 1980, Premier Lyon of Manitoba led a vigorous attack against entrenching a Charter of Rights. He was supported by Premiers Buchanan, Lougheed and MacLean. Premier Peckford indicated that he would support the limited entrenchment of rights. Several premiers made statements connecting the entrenchment of rights with the settlement of other constitutional issues. Premiers Davis and Hatfield, on the other hand, have supported the entrenchment of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is also worth noting that opinion polls conducted on this subject have been overwhelmingly supportive of the general concept of an entrenched Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I will return later to the charter and its contents.

The unilateral nature of the process has been subjected to a great deal of emotional rhetoric, particularly when it has been labelled "colonialist". It would perhaps be helpful to set out some of the basic facts.

In the first place, the British North America Act, although not the entire Constitution of Canada, is our basic constitutional document. As all such documents are and must be, it is amendable and it has, in fact, been amended many times since 1867. Reference has been made to these amendments by other honourable senators. The amending formula, although somewhat vague, does exist. It requires that a joint resolution from the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada be sent to the monarch to request enactment by the British Parliament. In 1931, the Parliament of Canada, by way of a Joint Address, asked that this process continue. Unless we wish to proceed with a unilateral declaration of independence—and the government clearly does not—the Parliament of Canada has no option but to request that the British enact each and every amendment that is sought. I repeat, there is no option but to use the auspices of the British Parliament, unless we in Canada wish to ignore entirely our legal responsibility under the British North America Act and the Statute of Westminster.

Furthermore, every amendment is, in one sense, unilateral in that, for it to be put into effect, it must first be requested in a Joint Address from the Parliament of Canada. No other legislature outside the Parliament of Canada has any official role to play in the passage of the Joint Address. The process is not un-Canadian, because the essence and the details of the resolution have been conceived, written and amended in Canada by Canadians. The British North America Act itself is just such a creation. It was written in Canada by Canadians for Canadians. It is the basic constitutional document for Canada. The 20 or so amendments to this act are Canadian creations, as is the proposed resolution. So, one sometimes wonders what the fuss is all about.

In 1867, the British North America Act created the Dominion of Canada, the first such dominion within the British Empire that would henceforth be in complete control of its domestic affairs. However, Canada was still in a semi-colonial position; its independence was not complete. This was reflected by the fact that the British North America Act did not contain a domestic amending formula.

In 1931, when the Statute of Westminster confirmed Canadian sovereignty with respect to its external relations, the development of Canadian sovereignty was almost complete.

However, Prime Minister R. B. Bennett decided that, in the absence of agreement on an amending formula, it would be better to leave that process in the hands of the British government. This does not mean that it would not be in our own interest and for our self-esteem, not to mention our international reputation to bring this outdated amending process to an end. The government is saying today that this is not 1931, and in spite of continued disagreement on an amending formula, the time is right and we should remove this last vestige of colonialism. There is widespread popular support for this proposition. Indeed, I can again quote Jake Epp who, on January 20, 1981, declared:

> It is the popular will of Canadians that our Constitution rest in this country.

Does anyone seriously question the need for patriation, per se? The answer is a clear: No. But patriation without an amending formula would place this country in a most ambiguous position. It is unclear, at least to me, just what the procedure for amendment might be. Perhaps it would require the unanimous consent of all the provinces and the federal government. If this were the case, we would be left with a Constitution that would be almost impossible to change, in my view. Always, there would be at least one province that would refuse to give up its protective veto for something less substantial. That one objection would rule the day. Canada would have the world's most rigid federal constitution. No other federal country insists on unanimity by its constituent parts.

The federal government has suggested one way to escape the tyranny of the rule of unanimity. It has admitted that its preferred formula may not be the most acceptable one, and has, therefore, provided a two-year period for further negotiations on the subject of the amending formula. If the federal and provincial governments emerge from these negotiations with opposite conclusions, the people of Canada will have the opportunity to cast the deciding vote in a referendum. I am not a champion of referenda, but I am convinced that in a matter so fundamentally important to the future of our country, a deadlock-breaking mechanism is absolutely essential.

I believe that the stand of the official opposition, although expressed with emotion and great moral indignation, is not so very different from that of the government. They would ask for immediate patriation of the British North America Act with an amending formula of their choice. Their choice of an amending formula is their own particular version of the so-called Vancouver consensus. It is worth making the point that the Conservative choice for the formula is simply one political option. In fact, it is one that I believe they acknowledge is really incomplete. They would permit only one year for their formula to be revised. The consensus required would be federal concurrence, with seven provinces having 50 per cent of the Canadian population. The government, on the other hand, has chosen a different formula, one regarding which, at one time, at the meeting in Victoria in 1971, there was unanimous agreement among the 11 first ministers. The government will continue to encourage negotiations towards a more acceptable formula. If an accord between the federal government and the provinces is not possible, then the Canadian people will choose.

I suggest that, on the face of it, the process which the government proposes is even more flexible and permissive than that suggested by the Conservative Party. The difficulty with patriation, plus an amending formula, is not so much a question of process but a question of detail: Which formula do you like, Vancouver or Victoria? The essential point is that never before has there been such widespread agreement and support for patriation than now. To do so, without an amending formula and a deadlock-breaking mechanism, would simply lead to years, even decades, of stagnation and hopeless frustration.

The main issue, then, has become: Why include a Charter of Rights and Freedoms? Here we have an interesting conundrum. The inclusion of some kind of amending formula is not a matter of dispute among most people. What is in dispute is the content of the formula. Here it is fair to say that the content of the charter is not much disputed among Canadians, with the exception that the opposition argues for the inclusion of other rights. There is all-party agreement that the entrenchment of rights is worthwhile. The complaint is as to the process, having the necessary amendments enacted by the British Parliament prior to patriation.

It has already been pointed out that the British Parliament must at this time play a role in making amendments to the Canadian Constitution. The role is the same whether the amendment be for an amending formula, a charter of rights, equalization or resources. It is no more colonial for one than for the other, as both are substantive amendments to the Constitution, and both lack unanimous provincial consent.

One may ask whether there is any difference between the two. In the sense that each is an amendment, there is no difference; the process is the same. However, as indicated earlier, it would be tragic to patriate the Constitution without an amending formula. It could produce a constitutional straitjacket. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms could, with substantial provincial agreement, be implemented under the Victoria formula, but many of the opposition have argued, "Why not wait?"

Essentially, the government offers two answers to this question. In the first place, the government feels that it, along with the provincial premiers, promised the people of Quebec, in the referendum campaign, significant constitutional change. The federal government is attempting to live up to its promise with the proposed resolution. The resolution contains an acknowledgement of fundamental freedoms and rights to equality before the law, to equal protection of the law, and to political and legal rights. Multicultural rights are recognized and aboriginal and treaty rights are affirmed. The right to move throughout the country to accept employment is affirmed and established.

The provincial "best efforts" draft respecting equalization payments to provincial governments is enshrined. Provincial control is established with respect to the management, development and conservation of non-renewable resources, forestry and hydro-electric resources. For the first time the provinces are given entry into the field of indirect taxation with respect to these resources. These changes are important; they are very substantial.

With the exception of the enshrinement of the principle of equalization and the addition of provincial management and taxation of natural resources—both items, by the way, offer substantial new concessions to the provinces—there is no effect on the division of powers. Sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act have not been altered to the detriment of either level of government.

I want to emphasize, as others have before me, that the government does not claim that constitutional change will cease with the present resolution. This, it acknowledges, is only a beginning. However, it is a necessary beginning because, without it, meaningful constitutional change will continue to be sacrificed on the altar of unanimous consent.

The proposed resolution does two things which make future change of the division of powers possible. It provides for a formula by which agreements may be formalized. It removes, from the debate on political changes, bartering over the inclusion of human rights. The second reason for including a Charter of Rights now is precisely because, as I mentioned earlier, it would be almost impossible to achieve the necessary provincial accord in the near future. Negotiations over human rights will either have to be dropped altogether or they will continue to be mixed up in negotiations over fishing boundaries, or natural resource taxation, or whatever.

The official opposition proclaims that, to proceed with entrenching rights in the Constitution by way of the traditional route of going to Great Britain, is dangerous and threatening to the continued well-being of the country. On the surface, this proclamation would appear doubtful. If, however, by some stretch of the imagination it is true, I believe there is a remedy. If the nation is imperilled by this action of the Liberal government, one might logically expect the public to rally around Mr. Clark and his confrères in the House of Commons. One might expect the country to survive to the next election, in which, given the hypothetical crisis of confidence, Mr. Clark would be returned to power with a majority government.

Senator Grosart: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: That is the way to get their attention.

Senator Graham: In this event, the new prime minister, who is undoubtedly a humane man and one who is very sensitive to the aspirations of the provinces, will be able to reach an accord on constitutional change. This change will be possible under the amending formula. Certainly, the Victoria formula would not be too much of an obstacle for a federal government bent on saving the nation, particularly since the new prime minister would not then require the unanimity which the present government is being asked to achieve.

Senator Flynn: But Mr. Davis would object.

Senator Graham: A new federal government with provincial support could replace the Victoria formula with the Vancouver consensus. It could rewrite the Charter of Rights so that provincial sensitivities would not be offended. All that would be required would be popular provincial support which, it is claimed, can be achieved by an accommodating manner and political will. Already the official opposition claims that the popular will is behind it and that the provinces are in accord with their position. So, one might ask whether they will be prepared to accept the challenge and campaign on revising the charter and replacing the amending formula at their next electoral opportunity.

As has just been mentioned, one can argue that the position of the Progressive Conservative Party is to leave the settlement of constitutional issues like the amending formula to governments acting in the traditional-style federal-provincial conference. It is true that from time to time there have been suggestions for some sort of constituent assembly, but such a process would seem to require provincial consent, and this would not appear to be possible.

Let me acknowledge that the Charter of Rights which was presented in October 1980 was, by most accounts, deficient: the wording was too vague; there were too many loopholes through which government legislation could escape. This is a prime example of a document inspired almost totally within government, and it reflected the federal government's desire to accommodate, where possible, its provincial colleagues. The special joint committee opened up the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to the public, for which they are to be commended. Besides four provincial governments, the two territorial governments and four provincial political parties, 100 groups and individuals appeared before the committee. Fifty-one senators and 132 members of the House of Commons participated on the committee, and other members and senators were recognized and allowed to voice their concerns.

There would be no doubt that the special joint committee presented the opportunity for widespread, meaningful participation by parliamentarians from both houses and by the major, and not so major, interests within Canadian society. There can be no doubt that the committee and the government listened attentively to the various representations, and that they acted in a sensitive fashion in responding to those requests.

I want to congratulate all members of this chamber on their leadership, participation and very positive work which culminated in the positive results of that committee. The original documents, which some critics called inadequate, even insipid, left the committee hearings with a Charter of Rights in which all Canadians can take great pride. But, honourable senators, to send such a document back to intergovernmental meetings could undo all of the progress which the committee and the public have achieved.

It is also worth noting that there has been very little criticism by provincial governments of the substance of the charter. No premier has come out against the entrenchment of aboriginal or treaty rights. No premier has criticized the legal and political rights, although there is some reason to believe that some would prefer to see them returned to the previously more limited state where the legal rights were tied to the phrase "in accordance with procedures established by law."

The point to be emphasized is that the Canadian government, the members of the special joint committee of all political parties and the participating public worked diligently to improve the proposed Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Those who object to its substance should explain just which rights would threaten either the authority of their government or the structure of parliamentary democracy.

The opposition response is two-fold. The official opposition does not criticize the charter for what it contains; they ask that more rights be added, and they ask that those rights be interpreted in light of the supremacy of God, the family and moral and spiritual values. This point was raised earlier by Senator Muir and Senator Macdonald, my colleagues from Cape Breton. The government recognizes the supremacy of God, the family, and moral and spiritual values. The government argues that this is not the right place to note the supremacy of God et al. The government had included the reference to God in the preamble proposed at last year's spring meeting of first ministers, but the first minsters rejected the entire preamble at that particular time.

The second response, which comes from some provincial governments and from some honourable senators in this chamber, is that the charter is unnecessary; rights in Canada are well protected, they argue, and it is destructive of parliamentary supremacy. There has been little or no compromise on this position, and there is no evidence to suggest that any charter would be acceptable to the provinces which take this view now.

To respond to the "charter is unnecessary" proposition, one need only examine the hearings of the special joint committee. Not only was entrenchment supported by the Human Rights Commission and the Civil Liberties Association, but by organizations representing handicapped Canadians, children, ethnic groups and others.

Some of the most poignant testimony came from the Japanese Canadians. They made a dramatic and moving plea for the "inviolate entrenchment" of a charter of rights when they stated:

> We are a people who were undermined, who were overridden, who were the victims of a political process when such a basic and fundamental thing as rights were not guaranteed, and today they are still not.

I quote further:

> The Japanese Americans were able to return to their homes a full nine months prior to the termination of the Pacific war, while Canadian Japanese languished in the internment camps and were being deported, sent back to Japan most likely and dispersed, for almost four full years after the unconditional surrender of Japan when the presumed reasons for their confinement had vanished.

Senator Donahoe: By a Liberal government.

Senator Flynn: Under the War Measures Act.

Senator Graham: We are trying to provide against such injustices in the future. Can anyone, conscientiously, ignore such appeals so rooted in bitter experience? The committee hearings were overwhelmed with similar testimony in support of the entrenchment of rights in the Constitution.

On January 12, 1981 the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, presented to the committee a series of possible amendments to the resolution on behalf of the Canadian government. They were designed, mainly, to improve the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the light of representations received by the committee. They also provided a clearer definition of the principle of equalization. Further, they guaranteed that the referendum procedure would be used only as a deadlock-breaking mechanism and that its rules would be established, initially, by a federal-provincial commission.

Although the committee did not hear evidence on these proposed amendments, it is fair to say that they were generally well received by those who had submitted their criticisms of the first draft of the resolution, although, according to some, they still did not go far enough.

For example, Gordon Fairweather, of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, announced that he was "delighted" with the "substantive changes" proposed by the minister. With regard to the reformulation of the limitations clause, he felt that the minister had gone to "extraordinary lengths" to meet the concerns of the commission.

Max Yalden, the Commissioner of Official Languages, was pleased that official bilingualism was to be extended to New Brunswick, although it must be acknowledged that he was dissatisfied with the fact that the same language rights would not be granted within Ontario. I, personally, share his concern and hope that this deficiency will be corrected as soon as possible in the future.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Graham: Doris Anderson, former president of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, called the amendments "major step forward," adding, "the government's come a very long way toward meeting the concerns of Canadians, including women."

A letter from the Select Committee on the Canadian Constitution of the Canadian Jewish Congress to the special joint committee expressed the view that amendments to the resolution:

> —reflect a substantial adoption of the many constructive ideas coming out of the hearings and from the submissions made by a large number of organizations that appeared before your committee.

Even more enthusiastic was the response of Walter Tarnopolsky, president of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, when he said:

> They've responded to just about everything that we in the Civil Liberties Association asked for. It's very difficult to see how one can criticize it.

Lawrence Decore, the outgoing chairman of the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism, expressed genuine pleasure at the acceptance of the provision recognizing significance for western Canada, where half the population is neither of English nor French origin.

Jim Derkson, national co-ordinator of the Coalition of Provincial Organization for the Handicapped, congratulated the government after the acceptance of the inclusion of "physical and mental disability" in the equality rights clause, clause 15.

The leaders of the National Indian Brotherhood, the Native Council of Canada, and the Inuit Committee on National Issues were convinced that the amendments of January 12 had not secured their aboriginal rights and that they would not withdraw their efforts to prevent the patriation of the British North America Act. A dramatic reversal in this attitude occurred following the negotiations which culminated on January 30, 1981, in which a new Part II, clause 33, was added to the Constitution Act, 1981 which recognized and affirmed both aboriginal and treaty rights for the aboriginal groups.

The members of the three political parties on the committee all agreed to a package of amendments which met many of the concerns of the Indians, the Metis, and the Inuit of Canada. The amendments were passed unanimously. The Indian, Metis and Inuit leaders declared that they would not only support patriation of the Canadian Constitution, but that they would now actively work, both in Canada and in the United Kingdom, for the accomplishment of this fact. It was termed an "historic moment" marking "a new beginning for Indian people in Canada."

Honourable senators, I believe this resolution provides a new beginning for all the people in Canada, and for Canada itself. Its passage will open the door to an era of even greater freedom and rights for our people, and more complete independence and sovereignty for our country.

For these reasons, the resolution is worthy of Canada's future, it is worthy of its people, and it is worthy of our support.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: The honourable senator stated that in 1931 Prime Minister Bennett decided to leave the process of amendment in the hands of the British government. Is it not true that the provinces also decided, as a result of an agreement between Prime Minister Bennett, for the federal government, and the provinces, that this should be left in the hands of the British Parliament?

● (2140)

Senator Graham: Originally I had that as part of my text, but I could not establish whether the provinces had pressured Prime Minister Bennett to do that, so I excluded it. I could not find the proper reference. I was told that, as you had obviously been, honourable senator, but since I could not establish it as a fact I decided to delete it from my text.

On motion of Senator Thériault, debate adjourned.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HASTINGS

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I regretfully do so as my question of privilege pertains to certain allegations and innuendoes in remarks made last evening in the other place by the honourable member for Edmonton-Strathcona. I submit that they are accusations and innuendoes that reflect on my personal integrity and my integrity as a member of this chamber and as a member of the Parliament of Canada.

The honourable member, in an alleged question of privilege, dragged into the record an exchange of correspondence that we had over the period of the past three weeks.

It commenced with a letter to me on March 12 from the honourable member in which he wrote:

> It has been suggested that shortly after any contract for federal government work is awarded within our province you call the successful party and ask for a donation to the federal Liberal party.
> Would you be prepared to reply to this allegation in order that I can perhaps correct the person who informed me of the matter?

I responded by letter to Mr. Kilgour on March 17 in which I thanked him for his letter, and advised him that if he would let me have the name and the address of the person making the allegation I would be more than happy to respond. I said:

> You will appreciate that one should not be obliged to answer vague charges made by a person or persons unknown.

I do not think it was an unreasonable request to make with respect to a basic element of justice, which I would have thought would have been understood by one allegedly skilled in jurisprudence and a former crown prosecutor, as the honourable member is.

He replied to me on March 26, as follows:

> In reply to yours of March 17, you doubtless know that my informant is one of those unhappy souls who, while thoroughly disgusted by your party's conduct in dealing with the public trust you daily abuse, is not prepared for now to jeopardize his prospects for future federal government work.
> Knowing that Mr. Trudeau appears to use the Criminal Code as his only guide in matters ethical, permit me to suggest that you look at the sections in it dealing with secret commissions and the like.

That is a direct innuendo of criminal conduct on my part.

Honourable senators, I am very conscious of the public trust and responsibility that is vested in me, and I am cognizant of the privilege and the immunity that is given to me as a member of this chamber. I do not think I need any advice from the honourable member for Edmonton-Strathcona in respect to these matters by way of innuendo.

To clarify the record, I am in no way involved in, and I therefore have no knowledge whatever of, the financial or administrative affairs of the Liberal Party of Canada in Alberta. As an ordinary member and supporter, my only financial involvement is that of a modest contributor, which is on public record with the Chief Electoral Officer. In the past six or seven years I have at no time sought contributions for the Liberal Party in any manner whatever. In 1974 and 1975 my principal activity in connection with financing of the party related to the organization of fund-raising dinners. I have never, never engaged in the conduct related by the honourable member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

The allegations contained in his letters of March 12 and 26, and his slurring remarks last night in the other place, are totally false and devoid of substance. As a member of the Parliament of Canada, I am conscious of the duties and responsibilities relating to the public office I hold. I can only hope that, as a member of the same Parliament, the honourable member for Edmonton-Strathcona is aware of his duties and responsibilities.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF NEWFOUNDLAND—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, April 2, I shall move:

That in view of the decision rendered by the Supreme Court of Newfoundland on the legality of the constitutional resolution now being debated in Parliament and the fact that the Supreme Court of Canada has agreed to hear an appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal of Manitoba on the same matter, and further that the Prime Minister has indicated that he would not ask the Parliament at Westminster to consider the resolution before the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled as to its legality, the Senate considers that the debate on the motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada and the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, is inappropriate and should be adjourned until after the Supreme Court of Canada has rendered a final decision on the legality of the contents of the Address.

By way of explanation, I gave warning to Senator Frith of my intention to give this notice. It is subject, of course, to whatever answers we get during Question Period or whatever agreement we can reach as to the way in which we should eventually deal with this problem.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

EFFECT OF JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government. I asked him yesterday whether the government has taken a decision in consequence of the judgment rendered by the Supreme Court of Newfoundland. I also asked him whether a decision has been made to appeal this judgment to the Supreme Court of Canada, and, if so, in what form? What are the intentions of the government with respect to the continuation of the debate on the resolution in Parliament?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the debate in the other place is continuing today. The government's position is that a decision of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland should in no way dissuade any member of Parliament from continuing to debate the resolution which is before the other place. I stated yesterday that the government believes it unwise to refer a hypothetical resolution to the Supreme Court of Canada. The government believes that the resolution in its final form should be referred to the Supreme Court, and that is the position of the government.

I must say, honourable senators, that the debate in the other place is costing the Canadian taxpayer $300,000 a day.

An Hon. Senator: And it's well worth it!

Senator Perrault: The members of the opposition in the other place are engaged in what can only be described as a parliamentary hijack. That is what it has become—a hijack of procedures and a hijack of the Canadian people.

Senator Balfour: A constitutional coup d'état.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that in this place we have had a good debate. We have heard excellent speeches from both sides of the chamber, and I hope that we can continue the debate in this place. However, it may be that the Senate will wish to debate the motion which has been proposed by the Leader of the Opposition. I am sure that a number of interesting points will be made at that time. But certainly at present the debate will continue in the other place and, hopefully, in this place as well.

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Government has replied to the notice of motion that I have given, but not to the questions that I have put to him. I have asked him whether the government has decided to appeal the judgment of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland. He has not given any reply to that question. I have asked what form the intervention of the government would take in the Supreme Court of Canada on April 28 when that court considers the appeal from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Manitoba. Will these two judgments be considered at the same time? Is the government ready to submit to the Supreme Court of Canada all of the questions related to the constitutional package? That is really my question.

With regard to my notice of motion, I think that we can debate it in due course unless, of course, the Leader of the Government wants us to discuss that motion right away. I am prepared.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. No decision has been taken as yet with respect to a number of the questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

At the present time, the government is considering the statement which was made by Chief Justice Freedman of the Manitoba Court of Appeal. It is a short paragraph and it may be of some value to quote it.

> We therefore face a real likelihood that the amendments sought in the Proposed Resolution may be altered, deleted, or supplanted by other amendments before the Resolution is deemed ready for transmission to Her Majesty. In this situation there is a danger that if we answer Question 1, with the proposed amendments in their present form, we may later find that we have answered matters no longer before us and have not answered matters that emerged in their stead. The Court should not be exposed to the risk of such an adventure in futility.

Senator Flynn: That is why the judgment of the Manitoba court does not mean much in comparison to the judgment of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Everyone has his favourites in this race.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, somehow there is a double standard in operation here. Perhaps I am the only one who believes that there is a double standard. We have a situation where, quite righteously, the official opposition demands that the debate be halted because the Supreme Court of Newfoundland ruled against the federal government in favour of the provinces.

• (1415)

When the ruling went the other way in Manitoba, there was no inclination on the part of the opposition then to say, "We will end our obstruction. Let's move ahead. Let's take a vote on this matter." In other words, it has been a classic case—not by all of the opposition members in this place, but by the Conservative Party, generally—of telling Parliament and the country, "Heads we win; tails you lose."

Senator Flynn: Nonsense.

Senator Perrault: May I share some additional thinking with honourable senators? Since Parliament is now dealing with a very important amendment presented by the leader of the constitutional group for the Conservative Party in the other place, and since the New Democratic Party would like to present other amendments in the other place, we believe the Supreme Court would be placed in the same position as the Manitoba court, if Parliament does not complete its work. Surely, the courts should not be expected to make presumptions as to how Parliament might vote on matters before it. That is the question faced by the government, and certainly by all parliamentarians.

In the past, the Supreme Court has frequently objected to receiving references because of their hypothetical nature. I have received some information from the Department of Justice relating to its decision as to the best way to proceed. The following quotation from Mr. Justice Laskin in the Supreme Court of Canada in the Manitoba Egg Marketing Reference in 1971 may be appropriate. This is what the Chief Justice said at that time:

> The utility of the Reference as a vehicle for determining whether actual or proposed legislation is competent under the allocations of power made by the British North America Act is seriously affected in the present case because there is no factual underpinning for the issues that are raised by the Order of Reference.

Clearly, it would be preferable for the Supreme Court to deal with a concrete factual and final resolution. So the government is proceeding with ample precedents as it continues the debate in Parliament and urges that the debate be continued until the resolution is dealt with in its final form.

I feel sure that most honourable senators share the reasoning of the government on this essential point. With respect to the specifics of the other questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition, I will obtain that information as quickly as possible.

Senator Flynn: I would certainly expect the honourable Leader of the Government to share the viewpoint of the government. For him to do otherwise would be rather surprising.

Let me recall what happened in the case of Bill C-60. The precedent deals with a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in reference to a proposed bill.

If the present government were to go before the Supreme Court and, under the federal legislation, were to ask the court to deal with the proposal as it is before the Parliament of Canada, the Supreme Court, if it adopted the same position as it did with respect to Bill C-60, would rule on all aspects of the legality of the matter. That would be most helpful to the members of both houses of Parliament.

I am simply asking why the government would not take that course at this time. It seems to me that the Leader of the Government is saying that the government will not do that, and I am asking him why the government won't consider doing that in order to obtain a final decision of the Supreme Court on that very important problem. This would be helpful not only for the members of Parliament—and, of course, it is a most unusual problem for us—but it would be helpful to the Canadian people at large.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am sure there is an honest difference of opinion on this point. To reply to the Honourable Leader of the Opposition it may be useful to quote from the words of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister yesterday in the other place. He was asked a question on that very point, and said:

> I remind the hon. member that Bill C-60 was referred to the Supreme Court, not to know whether the federal government was acting against some constitution or convention; the case was were we acting within the authority of section 91(1) of the British North America Act.

That was a very much narrower kind of reference.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Flynn: That is my point. I don't want the Supreme Court to be restricted. I want the government to free it and to put the whole question before the Supreme Court of Canada. I would like to see the government come clean on the matter and place the entire question before the Supreme Court of Canada.

● (1420)

I have a supplementary question. I understand that representations have been made by the Chief Justice of Canada to counsel representing the Attorney General with respect to the debate on this resolution continuing when the Supreme Court has agreed to review the matter on the basis of the appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court of Manitoba. As a result of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada to review the matter, it automatically becomes sub judice. Has Parliament given any consideration to the fact that they may be in contempt of court if they continue to discuss this matter?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have heard of no such report. Also, if this information came from the Conservative Party research bureau, then perhaps the source should be questioned.

Senator Flynn: I read it somewhere.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. It is one which has been hinted at already by the Leader of the Opposition. The discussion is coming very close to covering some of the aspects of the notice of motion given by the Leader of the Opposition. Many of the issues which have at least been hinted at or raised in the exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government I hope will be brought forth during the debate on the motion. I refer to such questions, for example, as the analagous effect of the Senate reference, the fact that it was concerned with section 91(1), and whether it makes a difference; the question of whether or not Parliament is in contempt of the Supreme Court of Canada; the ruling by the Speaker in the other place on the sub judice point; the relationship between Parliament and the judiciary on the doctrine of separation of powers; and so on.

The Leader of the Opposition has raised many interesting questions in his notice of motion. Perhaps it would be best if we took the opportunity to research and reflect on the matter, and then to engage these points in the debate on Senator Flynn's motion.

Senator Flynn: I agree with the point raised by Senator Frith. If the Leader of the Government agrees that we will not discuss this matter until we have resolved the question on the motion which I will move tomorrow, then I would be happy to leave it at that.

Senator Frith: I do not want to leave honourable senators with the impression that, for example, a question respecting whether the government had made a decision on this matter would be inappropriate.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Frith: Such questions would be quite appropriate during Question Period. However, in light of Senator Flynn's motion, perhaps it would be best to deal with the academic and ensuing practical questions during the debate on his motion.

Senator Flynn: I was merely suggesting that we suspend the debate until, let us say, Tuesday, when we could make a decision on the motion which I have just indicated I will move tomorrow.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, on the same point of order and with regard to the question of sub judice, I looked into the matter very carefully before I gave my speech on the Constitution resolution to determine whether it was proper for me to discuss the judgment of the Supreme Court of Manitoba. I came to the conclusion that it was completely proper, and there are also the precedent and the report of the committee to the Speaker of the House of Commons. At that point, I was satisfied that I was completely in order.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would point out to Senator Godfrey that when he spoke in the debate on the Constitution resolution the matter was not before the Supreme Court of Canada. According to Mr. Maxwell Cohen, who appeared before the special joint committee, Parliament is not prevented from debating any question which is before a provincial court of appeal simply because it could easily prevent Parliament from acting. However, it is quite a different situation when the matter is before the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that point was ruled on yesterday by the Speaker of the other place.

Senator Flynn: I do not know anything about a ruling by the Speaker of the other place.

Senator Frith: While that ruling in no way binds the Senate, it is a reference that is available to us during our debate.

• (1425)

Also, I do not want to indicate that we might not have a point of order to raise on whether or not the motion of the Leader of the Opposition is in order. He and I have discussed that and all of those things will be, if I may use the phrase, "in play" when we come to his motion.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Leader of the Government on this point we have been discussing. It relates, particularly, to his expression of the fear—which is a hypothetical one—of the government that it would be unwelcome to the Supreme Court of Canada if it submitted a question, which it may eventually have to consider, that was not full and complete in all aspects.

My question is: In coming to that fear, real or hypothetical, did the government consider the provisions of section 55 of the Supreme Court Act, part of which reads as follows:

> (1) Important questions of law or fact concerning . . .
> (d) the powers of the Parliament of Canada, or of the legislatures of the provinces, or of the respective governments thereof, whether or not the particular power in question has been or is proposed to be exercised—

I emphasize those last words.

> —whether or not the particular power in question has been or is proposed to be exercised—

I cannot think of anything more hypothetical than a question which it has not even been proposed to exercise.

Section 55(1) further states:

> —may be referred by the Governor in Council to the Supreme Court for hearing and consideration; and any question concerning any of the matters aforesaid, so referred by the Governor in Council, shall be conclusively deemed to be an important question.
> (2) Where a reference is made to the Court under subsection (1) it is the duty of the Court to hear and consider it, and to answer each question so referred—

My question is: Has the government considered the effect of this section upon its view of whether or not hypothetical questions may be referred to the court?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government has considered many options. I have quoted from Mr. Justice Bora Laskin, and I presume the distinguished Chief Justice also knows something about section 55 and a great deal about the operation of the court, the type of references which should be considered by that court, and the form in which those references are most welcomed by the court.

I have great respect for the Chief Justice, as do other honourable senators. I suggest that I have quoted from a very reputable source.

Honourable senators, I think we have to consider—and I know this will be debated more fully in the debate on Senator Flynn's motion—the rather interesting precedent which would be created were it necessary for Parliament to halt debate on all matters which were before the courts, whether provincial courts or the Supreme Court of Canada. This would create all sorts of interesting, and, perhaps, even dangerous precedents. As a former Minister of Justice, I am sure Senator Flynn is aware of some of the dangers in a process of that kind.

Senator Flynn: I am more aware than the present Minister of Justice.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman for his irrelevant dissertation, but I am unable to thank him for giving me an answer to my question, because he did not give one. The question is very simple: Was this section considered by the government in coming to its conclusion as to the desirability of submitting a hypothetical question?

Senator Perrault: I can only say, honourable senators, that the government has acted throughout according to the highest parliamentary and legal standards, and it will continue to do so.

Senator Smith: Obviously, the honourable gentleman is afraid or reluctant to answer the question. I am sure the legal opinion of my honourable friend, the Minister of State for Economic Development, would be of great value to us when we debate the motion tomorrow. However, I repeat, it is perfectly clear that the Leader of the Government has not answered my simple question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the government is aware of the provisions contained in the Supreme Court Act. I am certain that the Chief Justice is aware of those provisions, as are members of that court.

• (1430)

Senator Smith: I am not talking about the Chief Justice.

Senator Frith: He quoted Chief Justice Laskin.

Senator Perrault: I quoted Chief Justice Laskin and Chief Justice Freedman of the Manitoba Court of Appeal. The Chief Justice of Canada and the Chief Justice of the Manitoba Court of Appeal have stated that they want a resolution in exact form, and that they do not want to deal with a hypothetical resolution, an imperfect resolution.

Senator Flynn: I disagree with that.

Senator Perrault: Surely, there is also the danger, if we refer a hypothetical resolution to the court and it is changed later by Parliament, that the opposition will demand that the complete resolution be brought before the courts again. This could be employed as yet another delaying tactic—tactics which really bring little credit to Parliament.

Senator Smith: It has brought as much credit to Parliament as the honourable gentleman's refusal to answer a simple question brings to him.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government the following question: In view of the fact that he quotes Chief Justice Laskin in a decision which was rendered about 10 years ago—

Hon. Andrew Thompson: It was rendered in 1971.

Senator Flynn: So, 10 years ago. I should like to ask him whether he can reconcile that opinion with the one expressed in the Senate reference, which was hypothetical also. That dealt with Bill C-60 which was before Parliament. That was a unanimous decision of the Supreme Court. No member of that court signed the judgment. It was a judgment of the court itself. How can he reconcile the contention or opinion he has given me of Chief Justice Laskin with the opinion of the court? That is more important, and was rendered in the Senate reference.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we seem to be well involved in debating the honourable senator's motion which has been placed on the order paper. We shall answer that matter tomorrow in the course of the debate. The government believes that it is acting properly in this instance—

Senator Tremblay: No.

Senator Perrault: —and a number of decisions have yet to be made with respect to the Supreme Court referral. So, I ask the official opposition to wait as the universe unfolds.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order arising out of the statement the Leader of the Government made a moment ago to the effect that the opposition would say that the Supreme Court decision in the Manitoba case would not cover the whole ground.

I can inform the Leader of the Government that the Prime Minister just a few moments ago in the other place said that he would like the Supreme Court of Canada to adjudicate on all cases brought before the provincial courts—in other words, on all the questions. The Leader of the Government knows very well that I said last night that I thought it was the duty of the government—despite the grumbling of Senator Guay at the other end of the chamber—to put the whole question before the Supreme Court of Canada, and that the government should not hesitate one moment to do that to clear the air and to help members of Parliament to make a proper decision in the circumstances.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I just said, and I will repeat, that the Leader of the Opposition is not quoting the Prime Minister correctly. I have been watching the proceedings on television, and I know that is not what he said.

Senator Flynn: Quote him, then.

Senator Guay: That is not what he said.

Senator Flynn: If you know what he said, tell us.

Senator Guay: You can do as I did, and listen yourself.

Senator Flynn: That is what I did. If I am not correct, then you correct me.

Senator Guay: I said that you can do as I did, and see it yourself, instead of misquoting him.

Senator Flynn: In what way did I misquote him? I rise on a question of privilege. You said that I misquoted him. Prove your point.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, my point is just as good as the Leader of the Opposition's. He is always making statements and laughing at his own jokes.

Senator Flynn: I would rather laugh at my jokes than at yours, for sure.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, perhaps we need more light and less heat at this particular moment.

Senator Marshall: Bring the television set in here.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not believe it would be fair for anyone in this chamber to comment on a statement which has been made this afternoon by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. Obviously, we will have the complete text tomorrow, and it may be possible then to answer any relevant questions. As well, I hope to bring a statement to the Senate tomorrow afternoon with respect to some of the points raised by Senator Flynn. Surely that is a reasonable proposal.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question related to this general subject, but relating particularly to the decision of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland to the effect that the proposed action in the resolution is unconstitutional. Would the honourable gentleman agree that that is the law in Newfoundland at this time?

Senator Olson: We do not give legal opinions here.

Senator Flynn: Certainly not. Only the Minister of Justice, and he always gives the wrong opinion—that is, the present Minister of Justice.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

Senator Frith: The question is not in order.

Senator Perrault: The question is not in order. It is asking for an opinion.

Senator Frith: A legal opinion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I do not want to intervene at this stage, but I have before me two or three questions of privilege. I think the debate should take place tomorrow when we will have the text of the Prime Minister's remarks.

Senator Smith: I am not on a question of privilege. I am not arguing with Your Honour at all. I am only saying that I accept your ruling on the issue dealing with the statement of the Prime Minister. My question had nothing to do with the statement made by the Prime Minister. I was merely asking the Leader of the Government if he agreed that the decision of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland was now the law in Newfoundland.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if I may make an observation, it seems to me that there are two problems with the question.

Senator Grosart: The question was directed to the Leader of the Government.

Senator Frith: I have asked the Leader of the Government for his permission to speak to the question.

Senator Grosart: You should ask His Honour the Speaker.

Senatoe Frith: I would be glad to do that, and I will even ask Senator Grosart.

Would you satisfy Senator Grosart, Your Honour, that I am entitled to refer to the question, or make an observation on the question, raised by Senator Smith?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I hope that you are going to keep the Question Period within the limits provided for in our rules.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in essence, my reply stands. The question is out of order. It asks for a legal opinion, and I am not prepared to give that opinion. The question is not in order.

Senator Smith: I think it is not only in order, but a very basic question as to the validity of the decision this government has made and one which we are entitled to know. Further, I would ask the honourable gentleman, if it is the law of Newfoundland, how he can ask, particularly senators from Newfoundland, to vote in a contrary way.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is a very nice legal point as to whether or not that decision is the law of Newfoundland. I say that because I can provide plenty of precedents, particularly for Senator Smith, because the same point was raised in the British Columbia Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights that we were talking about a few weeks ago. They were asking whether there was any difference in legal effect between a judgment on a lis between parties and an opinion on a reference.

So, I am not going to take sides now whether it is one or the other. I am saying that the question raised is a very important and rather esoteric legal question as to whether an opinion on a reference has the same validity as a judgment. I know Senator Smith knows that.

That is the reason I think it is unfair during Question Period to ask for a legal opinion. The question not only asks for a legal opinion, but it asks for a legal opinion on a very subtle legal question. The question is not in order.

Senator Smith: There is nothing very esoteric about it, because if it is the law in Newfoundland then, by pressing on with this resolution, the government is asking senators to vote against something which is the law in a province. I believe that would put the senators from Newfoundland in a particularly difficult position, and put all of us in the position of saying we do not care what the law is in the province; we are going ahead anyway.

• (1440)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am sure the Honourable Senator Smith may wish to participate in the forthcoming debate on this point. At that time he may be able to make a valuable contribution.

But may I quote from Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms with regard to oral questions:

(1) Such questions should:

(a) be asked only in respect of matters of sufficient urgency and importance as to require an immediate answer;

Does it pass that test?

Senator Smith: It sure does.

Senator Perrault: It goes on:

(b) not inquire whether statements made in a newspaper are correct;—

Or on television or the radio.

Senator Flynn: Forget that.

Senator Perrault: The Honourable Leader of the Opposition has just done that.

(c) not require an answer involving a legal opinion;

The Honourable Senator Smith has just asked this:

(d) not be asked in respect of a matter that is sub judice;

That is, a matter that is before the courts. Perhaps honourable senators have also done that.

Senator Smith: Be careful what you read.

Senator Perrault: It continues:

(e) not be of a nature requiring a lengthy and detailed answer;

(f) not raise a matter of policy—

Senator Flynn: That is for you, too.

Senator Perrault: I think it is worthwhile to remind ourselves of some of the rules:

(f) not raise a matter of policy too large to be dealt with as an answer to a question.

Senator Flynn: That last point is for Senator Argue.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

INTEREST RATE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board more in his capacity as an agricultural expert. What is the new rate of interest being charged by the Farm Credit Corporation?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I cannot give a definitive answer, but I believe it has risen in excess of 14 per cent, but I have to check whether it is 14¼ or 14½ per cent.

Senator Phillips: I believe the honourable senator is correct in his reply. Could he tell this chamber what representations he made to the corporation in regard to the rather exorbitant rate increase?

Senator Argue: On the Farm Credit Corporation rate, I made no representations. I believe there is a rule as to how it relates to Government of Canada treasury bills or other financial instruments, but I made no representations on that point.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

CEREALS—DECLINE IN EXPORTS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. The trade surplus for the month of February has dropped, according to Statistics Canada, to $536 million, from $793 million in January and $723 million in February of last year. The drop in exports was led by cereals which were down $120 million from January. Could the minister indicate if this substantial decline in cereal exports suggests, perhaps, a worsening of the transportation problems?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, certainly there was no decline in exports of Canadian Wheat Board grain, and, I do not believe, in any other grains. I quoted those figures the other day, and the total figures are up for the year. I would have to take that question as notice in order to get a detailed reply, but certainly for this crop year, exports of Wheat Board grains are in excess of last year. The Wheat Board does not believe that it will be able, in this crop year, to reach the targets that were obtained last year, solely because there is not the volume of grain available for export that there was a year ago.

AIR CANADA

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I have a question to direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have an information bulletin issued by the Minister of Transport under date of March 26, 1981, dealing with Air Canada board of directors appointments. It details that there are two new appointments to the board and four re-appointments. With those, the make-up of the board is now: one for the province of British Columbia; one for the province of Alberta; one for the province of Saskatchewan; one for the province of Manitoba; four for the province of Ontario; and four for the province of Quebec. Thus far, that makes four for each of the regions. There is none for the province of New Brunswick; one for the province of Nova Scotia; none for the province of Prince Edward Island; and one for the province of Newfoundland—which makes two for the Atlantic region.

Referring to the Air Canada Act, 1977, section 7.(1) reads as follows:

> The Corporation shall be under the management of a Board of Directors comprised of the Chairman and the President appointed pursuant to subsection (6) and not more than thirteen other directors.

With these new appointments, the total, aside from the chairman and the president and chief executive officer, is 12, whereas 13 are provided for.

My question to the leader is: Would he make representations to the government to bring the number up to the maximum provided for, by the inclusion of one more director from the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, certainly Senator McElman's concerns will be communicated to the appropriate minister.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): D'accord!

GRAIN

EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.—LOSS TO FARMERS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. As the Department of Agriculture has now completed a study, which, I understand, is in the hands of the government, seeking to find the actual loss to farmers that could be attributable to the grains embargo against the U.S.S.R., would the minister state what the amount of that loss is as determined by the department?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am not in a position to give that information to the honourable senator. That is a confidential document, I believe, at the present time. I do not believe it has been produced anywhere, and I am certainly not going to endeavour to produce a document in the Senate on behalf of the Department of Agriculture. The whole question of compensation on the grain embargo is under active consideration, and that document and other representations are before ministers for their consideration.

Senator Murray: I am not asking that the cabinet document, as such, be released, although I understand that, in the spirit of freedom of information or, as it is called now, access to information, we are supposed to have access to background material of this kind. I would ask the minister to take that into consideration and to make the necessary inquiries in the Privy Council Office or of the proper authorities. I am not asking that the document be tabled today, but I am asking him whether the Department of Agriculture has found that there is a loss to prairie farmers attributable to the grains embargo against the U.S.S.R.

Senator Argue: A number of studies have been made. One was made by the Department of Agriculture, and it was before the cabinet for consideration. I believe it is fair to say that all of the studies I have seen, and have had any access to, indicate that there is a loss that has been calculated, but I am not going to endeavour to say what that precise figure may be.

I am very pleased that Senator Murray has an interest in this question and that he keeps on asking about it. Really, all I can say, apart from the reply to the specific question, is that I do not intend to divulge any figures that may be in that document. The whole question is under active consideration.

Senator Murray: Let me not subtract at all from the minister's pleasure, and let me try to add to it by asking another question, if I may. The minister referred to other studies in addition to the study made by the Department of Agriculture. What other studies is he referring to?

Senator Argue: A couple of university professors, who, I believe, were commissioned by the Province of Saskatchewan, made a study and they came up with certain figures or recommendations. I believe the Library of Parliament, with its facilities, has made a study for a member of the House of Commons. There are other people who have figures. I am not sure how great their study has been or in what depth, but there are many recommendations being made.

Senator Flynn: Not very convincing.

Senator Murray: Are all those studies now before the cabinet, or is the cabinet considering only the study made by the Department of Agriculture? Is the report of the Department of Agriculture included in the general statement made by the minister that all the reports he has seen do acknowledge that there has been a loss to prairie farmers attributable to the grains embargo against the U.S.S.R.?

• (1450)

Senator Argue: The studies are based on assumptions. They are made by the people who are making the studies; and based on their suppositions and propositions, all of the studies have indicated a loss because of the embargo.

Senator Murray: Then, as my final question, may we take it that, as the government now acknowledges that there has been a loss to prairie farmers, there will be financial compensation paid to them in respect of the grains embargo?

Senator Argue: I am not able to add anything more to what I said a moment ago, or a few weeks ago, or a few months ago. The whole question is under active consideration. I continue to be an optimist—

Senator Flynn: In what sense?

Senator Argue: I feel that from the standpoint of the prairie producers the decision will be in their interest.

THE ESTIMATES

INCREASE IN GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to respond to a question raised on March 2 by Senator Flynn concerning the government's estimates.

I am informed by my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, that the cost of amortization and servicing of the public debt, as outlined in the 1981-82 main estimates is $12,350 million. Revenue Canada projects the number of filers of T1 tax forms for this same period to be in the order of 15,925,000. Based on this assumption, the cost for each filer of a T1 form would be about $800.

I would point out, however, that approximately 90 per cent of the debt is financed with Canadian funds. In fact, the interest paid on the debt is a source of income to Canadians.

THE CONSTITUTION

EFFECT OF PROPOSED CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS ON EXISTING LEGISLATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on March 12 Senator Tremblay asked whether the Minister of Justice or the department had prepared a study concerning the effect of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms on federal laws; if so, could the study be tabled in the Senate; and if such a study had not yet been made, did the Department of Justice intend to make such a study shortly?

A study concerning the effect of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms has not yet been prepared, but work is now being undertaken by the Department of Justice, in co-operation with other departments and agencies of the government, to examine laws, regulations and practices with a view to identifying those which may be inconsistent with provisions of the charter.

Given the volume of legislation and regulations that exist, this task will take a considerable time, and it will likely be several months before the review and assessment are completed.

Since the purpose of this study is to identify legislative and regulatory measures that may require modifications, rather than tabling the study, the more likely course will be for the government to introduce amending legislation where necessary, or to adopt appropriate modifications to regulations and administrative practices.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PRODUCTION OF IRISH MOSS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on March 18 Senator Macquarrie asked a question concerning Irish moss.

Senator Flynn: No!

Senator Perrault: I must repeat what I told the honourable senator on March 17, St. Patrick's Day, that the confidentiality clauses of the Statistics Act preclude the release of any information concerning the value of tonnage of Irish moss produced in the Atlantic provinces. The Statistics Act would, therefore, have to be amended in order to furnish the information that the honourable senator seeks.

[Later:]

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government a supplementary question on his delayed answer in reply to Senator Macquarrie's question concerning Irish moss? I am not quite clear from the reply—that is probably my fault and no one else's—whether the question referred to the total production of Irish moss in the Atlantic provinces or whether it referred to individual amounts of production by individual producers.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I recall, the question asked for statistics involving individual producers. I do not have the honourable senator's original question before me. The answer, however, was that the confidentiality clauses of the Statistics Act preclude the release of any information concerning the value of tonnage of Irish moss produced in the Atlantic provinces. But the other information has also been sought. A number of questions, successively, have been directed to the office of the Minister of Supply and Services to obtain the information, and I regret that for the reasons stated I am unable to provide further information.

Senator Smith: I thank the Leader of the Government for his reply. Since he is seeking further information on the question, would he be prepared to seek sufficient information to let us know what provisions of the Statistics Act prevent the production of the information requested, to which he referred today?

[Senator Perrault.]

PETITION FROM SOLIDARITÉ QUÉBEC

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on March 19 Senator Flynn asked a question concerning correspondence allegedly received by the Prime Minister from Solidarité Québec.

Honourable senators, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister did indeed receive a copy of the petition referred to by Senator Flynn. The Prime Minister has no intention of tabling the document in light of the fact that no one in the House of Commons has asked him to do so.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as a supplementary question in connection with that reply, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he would obtain from the Prime Minister a copy of that petition and table it in this house? Or, possibly, His Honour the Speaker, who had indicated that he had received a copy, could make it available to the Senate.

APPROPRIATION ACTS

GOVERNMENT POLICY RE BUDGETARY DEFICIT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in connection with the debate on Appropriation Bills C-62 and C-63. Senator Grosart asked whether, in general terms, it was the policy of the government to decrease the budgetary deficit in the years ahead, as a percentage of GNP, to the 1982-83 target figure of 2.9 per cent. I undertook at that time to try to obtain an answer, or get some information from the government as to its policy on that point.

In obtaining the answer, I have assumed that the specific relationship between the budgetary deficit and the GNP that was mentioned by Senator Grosart was obtained from the Minister of Finance's budget speech of October 28, 1980. The budgetary deficits for future years, contained on page 43 of that document, are projections and, as such, the data and the specific percentage relationships to the gross national product will be subject to some variation.

The general intentions expressed in this same document by the Minister of Finance on the relative size of the deficit are perhaps quite relevant, and I quote:

> One of my main tasks as Minister of Finance will be to reduce the very large deficits in the government's accounts to more manageable proportions. This is important not only to restore our flexibility to meet future needs and to slow growth of our interest payments. It is also essential if the rate of inflation is to be brought down. Otherwise we will run the risk of a new outbreak of inflationary pressure. The immediate outlook is for rather slow growth and I, therefore, judge that only a modest reduction in the deficit is needed next year. But larger declines in the deficit will be required as growth speeds up.

So to summarize, I believe that the very specific forecast figure of the deficit, representing only 2.9 per cent of GNP in 1983-84, is not a policy target, but the government's intention to reduce the overall size of the deficit in future years certainly is.

● (1500)

Hon. Allister Grosart: I have a supplementary question relating to the delayed answer that was given. I presume that, under our rules, I must direct it to the Leader of the Government. Though the answer may come from someone else, my understanding of rule 20 is that any question asked during Question Period must be directed either to the Leader of the Government or a cabinet minister. I do not know whether we intend to keep that rule; it is immaterial to me. The delayed answer was given by the Deputy Leader of the Government with, I presume, the assumption of leave, since leave was not requested.

My understanding of the answer is that it is the government's intention to decrease the deficit, presumably in absolute terms, but certainly as a percentage of GNP, or GDP, to use the phrase contained in the answer. It seemed to me that, at the same time, the Deputy Leader of the Government said that this was not to be taken as government policy. I would like to know the difference between a statement of government intention and a statement of government policy. This is important, because originally the government's intention to keep the increase in government spending in any one year below the increase in GNP was stated as policy. It was apparently policy until this year when, for reasons which I will not go into now, the government decided that it was no longer policy. However, it would be interesting to know the length of time it takes for government intention to become government policy.

In other words, what I am asking is: Will the government decrease the deficit next year? Will it keep the increase in government spending below the increase in the GNP? Those are specific questions and they have to be policy questions. The government has to decide to do it or not to do it; therefore, it is policy.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I would like to deal with the first part of the question, since the delayed answer was given by me. I ought to have given Senator Grosart a copy of the answer, since it was necessary for him to take notes to try to see the point I was making. I did not intend to say that the relationship between government spending and GNP is a matter of policy while something else is not a matter of policy. The point I thought I was making, and that which I tried to make, was that the intention to reduce the deficit is a matter of policy as distinct from matters directly linked. I agree with Senator Grosart; if it is a statement of intention, it is a statement of policy.

Senator Grosart: Thank you.

Senator Frith: However, with regard to the second part of Senator Grosart's question, for reasons that he anticipated, I hand that over to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, and on the motion in amendment thereto of Senator Yuzyk.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, it is with mixed feelings that I endeavour to bring some of my thoughts on the constitutional resolution to the attention of this house. It is probably fitting, honourable senators, that I do so on April 1—April Fool's Day.

In trying to decide on the approach that I would take to make my contribution—as minor as it may be—to this very important debate, I have, over the past few weeks and months, read and reread statements made by so-called constitutional experts: law professors, legal advisers and legislators. I have come to the conclusion that my contribution would be more genuine if I expressed it from the point of view of one who was a member of the New Brunswick Legislature for 20 years; of one who served as a member of the government under the able leadership of my former boss, the then Premier, now Senator Robichaud; and of one who has had the privilege, on two or three occasions, to attend federal-provincial conferences, the last of which was the one held in 1978. At that time I was the interim leader of the Liberal Party of New Brunswick and attended the conference at the invitation of Premier Hatfield.

Possibly because I am not a lawyer, I have strongly felt all along that the Constitution question that is being debated now is a political and not a legal one. I recall quite clearly the appearance of the Premier of New Brunswick before the Committee on the Constitution. Mr. Hatfield said to the members of the committee, "You are the experts. You have to make the decision. You can seek advice, but what happens ultimately to this resolution depends on the decision made by the elected members of the House of Commons and the appointed members of the Senate."

[Translation]

I have much difficulty in understanding the position of the French-speaking members of this house who, according to me, give their political party precedence over the advancement which is proposed in the present resolution for French-speaking minorities outside Quebec.

[English]

As a member of a minority group in the province of New Brunswick, I have watched with some interest the progress made by the Francophone minority of that province over the last 25 or 30 years. It is with some satisfaction that I have seen measures taken by the government of which I was a member in the sixties and the seventies, and it is with pleasure that I have seen the progress that has continued to take place in New Brunswick under the leadership of Premier Hatfield. Honourable senators, I am sorry that there are not more Progressive Conservatives like Richard Hatfield in this country at the present time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Especially on certain points.

Senator Thériault: I would also like to say, honourable senators, that from my point of view the present position taken by the Conservative Party in the other place and in this place takes away its right to bear the name "Progressive."

● (1510)

According to what the Prime Minister said yesterday as a result of the decision taken by the Supreme Court of Newfoundland in this matter, the government is prepared to compromise, saying to the opposition, "Let's pass this resolution so that it can go to the Supreme Court of Canada." But in listening to the Leader of the Opposition again today I have to agree with the Leader of the Government in the Senate when he says that the members in both houses representing the Conservative Party seem to have a double standard, because a few weeks back, when the Manitoba court rendered its decision on constitutional matters, a decision which was favourable to the federal government, I, for one, certainly did not hear the Leader of the Opposition here asking the Leader of the Government if that was, in fact, the law in Manitoba. But today he is proposing a motion that will prevent Parliament from dealing with this question that has been before Parliament for the last six months.

Honourable senators, like so many others, I have for a number of years watched how the powers of the provinces have evolved; and, coming from the Atlantic region, I have often asked myself where it would all end. Indeed, I had hoped that after the proposed resolution had been accepted there would be a long period of discussion which would settle, on the one hand, the powers of the provincial governments and, on the other, the powers of the federal government.

I seriously believe that part of the constitutional difficulties we are in at the moment stem from the fact that over the last 20 to 25 years all of the provinces have been becoming stronger and stronger. Not that that is bad; there is nothing wrong with that in itself. Indeed, it is good for the country to have strong provincial governments, but when provincial governments are strong, that does raise questions concerning their jurisdiction, in the sense that one might ask one's self where the power lies and where the jurisdiction of a particular government commences and where it ends.

There is no doubt in my mind that all the provincial premiers are jealous of their rights in the field of education, for instance. Just three or four weeks ago, following a meeting in Fredericton between the provincial ministers of education and the Secretary of State, there was a headline in the papers the next day saying that all the provincial ministers of education were highly concerned at the possibility of a cutback in federal funds for post-secondary education. But, you know, when you look at the situation of education in Canada today, you have to wonder at the way people think, because there is Alberta, for instance, with its Heritage Fund amounting to, according to yesterday's press, about $8 billion as of the end of last December; and here is the federal government, in its financial situation, showing a deficit of about $14 billion, and yet the truth of the matter is that the federal government is paying almost 60 per cent of all of the costs of post-secondary education in the province of Alberta.

Are they really worried about being cut off? In fact, my concern is that they might ask the federal government to get out of that field. As one coming from a so-called "have not" province, I am indeed concerned that before long the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan may well say to the federal government, "Get out of post-secondary education, financially. Get out of financing health services. Those fields come under provincial jurisdiction."

That might be all right for the people of Alberta and the other western provinces, but what would happen to those services in New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia? What would happen to them in the province of Quebec and perhaps even in the province of Ontario, if the federal government were to withdraw? Is that what this country is all about? Could it be that five years from now we might find ourselves with a standard of services in one part of the country that another part of the country could not afford? And, if so, is that what Canada is all about?

I recall vividly with what deep interest I followed the referendum question last spring. As an interested spectator, I felt proud of the statements being made at that time by the Premier of Ontario and by the Premier of Alberta, and by all of the other premiers of the provinces of Canada apart from Quebec. They were asking Quebec to stay in the country. They said to Quebec: "This is a good country. We want you. Stay in." And yet, at the last federal-provincial conference it was obvious that any sense of unity that had been created by the referendum was now over, because all of a sudden the whole picture had changed. Like many other Canadians watching that conference, I saw a spectacle that hurt my feelings as a Canadian. I saw certain premiers almost holding hands with René Lévesque—and, as everyone knows, his main ambition as premier of that province is nothing more than to break up this country. So I ask myself if provincial power is really that important. Is it so important for the provinces to secure all of the power they require that they are prepared to break up the country in order to get it?

I listened with great interest to Senator Manning's speech. I listened with interest to many of the other speeches that have been made in this debate in this place. I have read some of the speeches that were made in the other place. You know, I get concerned as a Canadian, and I get concerned as a French-speaking Canadian. Indeed, if my contribution to this debate today is mostly in English, that is because I am the product of a minority and, when I was growing up, I was not given the opportunity to have in my language the kind of teachers or the kind of schools I should have had—things I should have had by right because my ancestors came to this country 375 years ago, and came to stay.

I can recall that when I started out as a member of the New Brunswick Legislature, there was no simultaneous interpretation in the chamber, although Acadians at that time made up 35 per cent of the population of that province. If a member wanted to say something and be understood by his colleagues, he or she had to use the English language. As I have said, we have made progress, but I wish there were more political leaders, particularly English-speaking political leaders, in Canada at this point in time who had the same philosophy as Richard Hatfield. I repeat part of the statement he made before the special joint committee, as he pointed his finger at his Progressive Conservative confrères: "I challenge you to have the rights of the French-speaking minority entrenched so that their rights will be protected from one end of the country to the other." He said that if the government fails to include these rights, it will not have to worry about a Constitution or a country within the next 25 or 50 years.

I would like to relate to honourable senators an experience I had just last summer. While flying home from Montreal to Moncton I was seated with a man and a woman. Naturally, as is my habit, I spoke to them in English, and the man answered me in English with a heavy French accent. I would like to relate to my colleagues the message these people left with me. From our discussion I learned that they were brother and sister, ordinary French-speaking Quebecers from the north of Montreal. The man held the position of personnel manager for one of the largest food distributing companies in Quebec. He told me that he was responsible for some 1,700 people in northern Montreal and northern Quebec. His sister told me that she worked for another brother north of Montreal who owned his own insurance business.

After we switched the discussion to French, they told me that they were worried because their father, who had just retired at the age of 65 and who was supposed to be on vacation with their mother visiting, for the first time, the Atlantic provinces, had had a heart attack in Antigonish, Nova Scotia. They told me they were flying down to be with their parents because neither their father nor their mother could speak English, and they were worried that their parents would be unable to communicate. I told them not to worry, that there were a few Acadians in Nova Scotia, which they were pleasantly surprised to learn.

The topic of the discussion eventually changed to the referendum in Quebec. They both told me that they felt that they were not at home in this country outside their province. I am not saying that if we pass this resolution French-speaking Canadians across this country will feel at home the next day. I would like to paraphrase what Richard Hatfield said to the special joint committee when he appeared as Premier of New Brunswick. He told the committee that if New Brunswick had not passed its Official Languages Act, the government there would not have been able to make the progress it has made. I am talking about the entrenchment of linguistic rights within the Charter of Rights. Premier Hatfield went on to say that he wanted these linguistic rights entrenched in the Constitution because, regardless of the goodwill of politicians, when they are elected they are often-times submitted to the will of the majority.

Let me give an example. Although there is the Official Languages Act, although 35 per cent of the population of New Brunswick are Francophone, and in spite of all the progress made there in the past years, today in the city of Saint John approximately 12,000 Francophones, not all of whom speak French, had to gang up to fight for one classroom where their children could be educated in French. I am sure that honourable senators cannot picture a town or city in Quebec which contains 12,000 Anglophones not having an English-speaking school.

In my humble opinion, a charter of rights should be entrenched in the Constitution of this country, and that charter should include linguistic rights.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Thériault: I have heard honourable senators and members of the other place say that Russia has the best charter of rights of any country in the world included in their constitution. I am not for one moment suggesting that the entrenchment of rights will automatically provide those rights the next day. I am suggesting that such entrenchment will give people the confidence to demand those rights. I have also heard people who are against the entrenchment of rights say that in the United States, in spite of the fact that that country's Constitution includes an entrenchment of rights, there are many problems with, for example, the treatment of the black population and other minorities. I put the question to honourable senators in reverse. Ask yourselves how they would have been treated if those rights had not been entrenched in their Constitution. That is what we must ask ourselves.

I fail to understand, honourable senators, why the provincial governments are so concerned over the entrenchment of rights in the Constitution. Why is the Premier of New Brunswick so anxious to have those rights included in the Constitution? It is because he has lived in that province and because he knows, as I know and as any person from New Brunswick knows, that even in 1981 it is possible in the province of New Brunswick, at any given time, to elect a government that, under public pressure, may even be called upon to go so far as to withdraw or to withhold some of the rights which are now taken for granted by the Francophones of the province.

I ask my colleagues: What is there in this resolution that takes away from the provinces and gives to the federal government? Can honourable senators single out one item in the resolution that takes away a provincial power and makes it a federal power? In my humble opinion, the resolution says that it will take away from politicians the right to trample on human and other rights.

● (1530)

If I may, honourable senators, I would quote from an article which I came across the other day written by one Joan Wallace of Vancouver, B.C., who is described as follows:

> —founding member and first president of the Vancouver Status of Women, member for four years of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, and general manager of the B.C. division of the Retail Merchants Association of Canada. She is one of a panel that serves on human rights tribunals for the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

The article quotes Joan Wallace as saying:

> As a member of one of Canada's disadvantaged minorities I am getting sick of the provincial premiers' hysterical opposition to the entrenchment of a charter of rights in a patriated Canadian constitution.

The article quotes her further as saying:

> The extremely spotty record of provincial governments in protecting their own citizens against discrimination on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, marital status, and physical handicap makes it imperative that Canadians be given the protection of a strong charter of rights that is binding on all levels of government and that takes precedence over all other laws passed by those governments.

Honourable senators, I could not agree more.

What is the situation now as far as this resolution is concerned? Honourable senators, let me quote from The Telegraph-Journal of Saint John, New Brunswick, of Monday, March 30, 1981. The article states:

> Where are the government proposals now? After an exhaustive three-month study by a special joint Commons-Senate committee, they have been under a final round of debate in the two houses of Parliament for six consecutive weeks.
> What is the problem? The Commons has been bogged down since the first day of that debate—Feb. 17—on a Tory amendment to remove the provision for referendums. The Conservatives have refused repeated overtures to limit the discussion or allow other amendments to be moved.

The article goes on to state:

> And, to complicate the situation, the Tories tied up the Commons for three days last week on procedural wrangling, preventing debate on the motion and at least temporarily forestalling any attempt to close off debate on it.

Honourable senators, who opposes this resolution in the Parliament of Canada? All of the Tory members, to the best of my information, that is, 101, minus one, oppose the resolution; 145 Liberal members, minus 1, support the resolution; and 32 NDP members, minus 4, support the resolution. Have you ever stopped to think what percentage of the Canadian populations' representatives are opposing this resolution, are bogging down Parliament and, as a matter of fact, are threatening the breakdown of our system? They represent less than 35 per cent of the population of Canada.

What is that 35 per cent composed of? Generally speaking, they are good, Canadian citizens—but secure Canadian citizens. They are secure in their language rights, in their economic rights and in their working rights. Have we reached the stage in Parliament where a minority of people can prevent our legally elected government, supported by 28 members of another party, also legally elected, proceeding with the running of the affairs of this country? They say, "Oh, yes, we will permit you to deal with the other urgent business of the country such as the economy, inflation, unemployment, energy and all the rest, but on our conditions and when we tell you to do so."

I ask myself and my colleagues: What is so unreasonable in the proposition that was put by the Prime Minister yesterday? It is true that two provincial courts have rendered opposite decisions. It is true, I suppose, without being a lawyer, that the government could refer the question as it stands now to the Supreme Court of Canada, but does it make sense after the majority of the members legally elected to run this country have spent six months debating this resolution?

What does this resolution do? It brings home the Constitution and nobody seems to oppose that. It proposes an amending formula that will be discussed among the 10 premiers and the federal government in the next two years. It provides that, if an agreement cannot be reached, the people will decide which, if any, amending formula they will choose. It also entrenches a Charter of Rights and Freedoms for the protection of minority groups such as the handicapped, the native peoples and women.

I find myself at a loss. I had the good fortune of being a replacement member of the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution for seven or eight of its meetings. At times I heard members of the Conservative Party suggesting amendments, and some of them were accepted. They now, supposedly, have an amendment before the house. In the meantime, the whole country knows that there is only one elected Conservative member in the other place who will stand up and vote for the end result of that resolution; and, to my knowledge, not one Conservative senator in this place will do so. So who are they kidding? What do they want? I cannot understand people wanting to improve or amend something they oppose. It just does not make sense. Finally, the truth came out last week when the Conservative house leader said, "We will stall. We will prevent Parliament from working."

What is wrong with passing this resolution and then sending it to the Supreme Court? If the Supreme Court says that it is beyond the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, so be it; that will be the end of it. I ask all those who are now insisting that the resolution go to the Supreme Court of Canada: What of your position if the Supreme Court of Canada decides that it is within the jurisdiction of Parliament to deal with this resolution?

• (1540)

Hon. Lowell Murray: Do you wish an answer now?

Senator Thériault: I would love one.

Senator Murray: Our opposition to this resolution was not based only on the fact that we thought it might be illegal—

Senator Frith: Let him speak.

Senator Murray: Our opposition was based not only on the fact that we thought it might be illegal, but because we believe firmly that it is a negation of federalism, that it is wrong for the country, and that it will have bad effects on the country.

Senator Frith: So you are still opposed to it?

Senator Murray: Yes. We said that our argument was not confined to the illegality of it.

Senator Thériault: I will deal with that question. I could not expect anything else from you.

So, you are now saying that if the Supreme Court decides that it is legal you will not support it. You are saying that because it is not your view of federalism. I want to know whether your view of federalism is the Joe Clark view of a community of communities?

Senator Murray: I will get to that.

Senator Thériault: Is it your view that in this country we should not share the wealth? Is it your view that in this country the minority and native peoples should not have guaranteed rights?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the events of the other place have overtaken my colleague. The members of the various parties are meeting to discuss whether or not to send the matter to the Supreme Court, and under what conditions, before further discussion takes place in the other place. He can continue, but I would only urge him to quit while he is ahead.

Senator Smith: You mean, while he is not too far behind.

Senator Frith: He is well ahead. Don't quit while you are ahead.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I believe that any Canadian, in the true spirit of Canadianism, is always ahead; not only ahead now but ahead of his time if he is a true Liberal.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Thériault: Some of you may recall an organization by the name of Dada. If I recall correctly, it started in Zurich in 1917. That organization was composed of people who were opposed to everything: they were opposed to government; they were opposed to business; they were opposed to art; and they were opposed to science. They were opposed to everything that was going on in the world. I thought that organization had died with the fellow who started it, who, I believe, was called Jacques Rigaud. He died in 1939, but I think they have resurrected him.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Thériault: Why cannot the Conservative Party be on the right side of the issue at any time in this country?

Senator Steuart: They are like lemmings.

Senator Thériault: As I read my political history, when this country came into being in 1867, the Conservative Party, under Sir John A. Macdonald, was very avant-garde and made a great contribution to this country. I do not know if I recall the quote correctly, but Sir John A. Macdonald said at one time, in one of his better speeches, that he could see the day when Canada would be to the provinces what the mother country, Britain, then was to Canada. It is too bad that some of these reactionary Tories would not read the speeches of Sir John A. Macdonald before making some of the speeches they are making on this resolution.

I have hope for this country. I have hope because there are members of the Liberal Party, members of the NDP, and members of the Conservative Party—namely, Premiers Davis and Hatfield—who believe in this country. I do not say "Aye, Aye" to all Liberal leaders. I can honestly tell you that I was very disappointed during the last provincial election in Ontario that the Liberal leader did not stand up for section 133 of the B.N.A. Act as it applies to New Brunswick so that it could apply to Ontario.

I dare say this to you, honourable senators. If any of the leaders of the three parties running in Ontario had taken that stand, I am convinced that the people of Ontario would have supported them. That is the sad part of it. We have to depend on politicians, and we are afraid, as politicians, to offend people. I know what I am talking about because I was one for 20 years.

Senator Murray: You are now a statesman?

Senator Thériault: No. As a matter of fact, I am not concerned with the constitutional problems in New Brunswick, because we have a leader of the Conservative Party who sees 20 years ahead of you. I am concerned that I might be tempted to go back to the provincial legislature.

Senator Phillips: And campaign for Hatfield?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Thériault: No. However, I will tell you something. If I had to make a choice, I would sooner campaign for Hatfield than for any Tory I know sitting in the other place or, for that matter, sitting in this place.

Is it not strange that these people never learn? Their one representative from the province of Quebec has been sent home to organize, under a different name, the Conservative Party of Quebec.

An Hon. Senator: What do they call it?

Senator Thériault: I think it is the Union Nationale for the next two or three weeks. We will see how well it will do.

I say to the French-speaking senators here, and particularly to the young Conservative senators: Look ahead. Put your country ahead of your party for once. Be on the right side of the issue when history is written.

There are at least four or five Liberal senators in this place who, because of strong conviction, have decided that they cannot support the resolution.

Senator Deschatelets: The gang of four.

Senator Thériault: That's normal in a gang of 72. By the same average, it would be normal that one senator from the centrepiece here would have enough conviction to support the resolution. I am really looking at Senator Murray, because I have had occasion to see him at work. I saw him at work in New Brunswick, and I thought he was progressive, but he has changed since living there.

I say to you, my colleagues in the Conservative party, for God's sake go speak to your friends in the other place tonight. Take them out to dinner; buy them a bottle of wine; do something; but try to talk some sense into them. They are, in fact, in the process of destroying the system.

Senator Grosart: That is not so.

Senator Thériault: They are; and I am concerned, as are other Canadians. Otherwise, your party will be destroyed for the next 25 years.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR LAWSON

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. My concern is two-fold. First, it has been drawn to my attention by an honourable senator that a personal attack was made on me by Senator Godfrey on March 17. His remarks suggest that I was out of order when I rose to interrupt another honourable senator, who had the floor, to speak on the Judges Act. Senator Godfrey's remarks have been picked up by the press, which is the second reason why I wish to raise the matter. The press article reads in part:

> Liberal Senator John Godfrey of Ontario took a swipe at Lawson in the Senate recently for hopping up out of turn to speak on a bill increasing salaries for judges.

The suggestion is that I have no respect for, or understanding of, the rules of this chamber.

My first concern is with regard to personal attacks on individual senators. My second concern is that the allegation is false. I had been monitoring the Judges Bill for many weeks—as a matter of fact, for some years, as Senator Flynn and others know; and when I was advised it was coming before the chamber that afternoon, I contacted His Honour the Speaker to inquire if I could speak that afternoon. He gave me a message indicating when it would be in order for me to speak.

• (1405)

As a matter of courtesy, I spoke with the government whip so that the Deputy Leader of the Government would not be taken by surprise. I also obtained from the government whip, Senator Petten, his assurance that the Leader of the Opposition would be advised of my desire to speak for two or three minutes. I think my conduct in dealing with it was in order, as far as following the normal rules of courtesy is concerned. Perhaps I owe an apology to Senator Frith, because at one point he paused when he was making his presentation and I thought he had finished. I knew the urgency of having the debate concluded speedily, so I rose to speak. When he drew to my attention that he had not finished, I sat down.

I regret having to make these comments in Senator Godfrey's absence, but since he did not do me the courtesy of making his attack on me in my presence, I do not feel quite so badly about it.

I then attempted to speak, taking my guidance from His Honour who was giving me the nod as to when I might be in order to speak, and that is when Senator Godfrey moved very hastily and attempted to deny me my right to speak by moving the adjournment of the debate. At the urging of Senator Frith, he withdrew, and I was allowed to speak.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I think the honourable senator should wait until Senator Godfrey is in the chamber.

Senator Lawson: I would be quite prepared to do so, if I would not be out of order in making these remarks at some other time.

My further concern is the remarks contained in Hansard which were reported in The Citizen of yesterday's date. The reference is:

> Senator Lawson happened to be making that day one of his infrequent, lightning-like descents on the Senate—here today and usually gone before tomorrow.

Senator Godfrey also said:

> Senator Lawson only graced this chamber with his presence on nine different occasions last year and, as we all know, he is not a member of any committees.

Well, the two issues, of attendance in this chamber and being a member of all or none of the committees, quite frankly, are none of Senator Godfrey's business. It so happens that I do not owe any explanation to this chamber as to why I was leaving the following day, but, as a matter of information, the reason I left the following day was to speak on a panel in Vancouver where the key speaker was talking, among other things, about abolishing the Senate. I took the opposite view. In addition, I had to deal with a very serious labour dispute that was affecting the economy of the country, and I thought that quite important.

• (1410)

But the real concern that I have is that Senator Godfrey, while he may attempt to have this chamber believe he has a superior knowledge of the rules, obviously is not aware of the rules of courtesy and the long-standing rule in this chamber, and every other similar chamber, that an honourable senator does not make personal attacks on other honourable senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lawson: I think Senator Godfrey owes me a personal apology. More important than that, I think Senator Godfrey owes this chamber an apology for violating the long-standing rule against making personal attacks on other honourable senators, which is an important rule and should be observed. That is why I have risen on this question of privilege.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Godfrey will probably read what you have said, Senator Lawson, and he may respond to it.

Senator Flynn: At the next sitting!

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board) tabled:

Report of the Canadian Wheat Board for the crop year ended July 31, 1980, including its financial statements certified by the Auditors, pursuant to section 7(2) of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, Chapter C-12, R.S.C., 1970.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the third report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, entitled, "Enhanced Oil Recovery in Canada," and ask that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day to form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix p. 2229.)

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, I move that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, April 7, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

I will explain or make some observations on the schedule for next week, if leave is granted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the suggestion we are making is that we sit next week in what has become the usual way during the debate on the Constitution—that is, so long as that item remains on our order paper. We plan to sit on Tuesday evening, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon. In the event of developments in the other place, and in view of the understanding that we are going to reserve a certain number of days, up to five days following the disposition of that resolution in the other place, we should prepare ourselves to sit on Friday of next week.

I suppose it is fair to assume that another event that might take place is that some agreement might be reached in the other place as to the disposition of the motion, the amendment, any other amendments, the proposal by the Prime Minister with reference to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the counterproposals put forth by the Leader of the Opposition and by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. If some agreement is reached, we will probably ask the Senate to conform to whatever arrangement is made in the other place for the disposition, or delay in disposition, of the motion pending reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. That, of course, could result in our having to sit on Friday in order to bring that about. I think that that is less likely than the first reason for sitting on Friday.

So, in summary, honourable senators, we shall sit on Tuesday evening, Wednesday afternoon, Thursday afternoon and, if necessary, on Friday. We shall try to give you ample warning of that eventuality, but I do ask honourable senators to at least be prepared to sit next Friday, if necessary.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will recall, or will have noticed, that the Honourable Senator Argue, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, tabled earlier this day the Annual Report of the Canadian Wheat Board for the crop year 1979-80.

Therefore, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), that the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be authorized to examine and report upon the Annual Report of the Canadian Wheat Board for the crop year 1979-80, tabled in the Senate on April 2, 1981.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Could we have an explanation?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the motion, it seems to me, explains why leave is being asked. Insofar as leave being asked today as opposed to next Tuesday is concerned, I cannot give any substantial reason. There will not be any crop failures in the meantime, but since the document was tabled in the Senate today, and since it is normal to refer such reports to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, it seemed to me that we should dispose of it when it is on our minds.

Senator Grosart: That is a good reason.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

EFFECT OF JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday a number of questions were asked on the subject of the Constitution, and I undertook to inquire of the appropriate sources in the government and to obtain certain information requested by the Leader of the Opposition. I suggest that it may be useful for this statement to be made at the outset of the Question Period.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Indeed, it may remove the need to ask some of the questions that might have been anticipated.

Senator Asselin: Is it a statement?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Asselin: Do you have a copy of it?

Senator Perrault: It is a reply to a question; it is not an official government statement.

Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition raised several points during the Question Period relating to our consideration of the constitutional resolution before us, and reference of that resolution to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Flynn, the Leader of the Opposition, asked whether the government has taken a decision in consequence of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, whether a decision has been made to appeal this judgment to the Supreme Court of Canada, and, if so, in what form. He also asked about the intentions of the government with respect to the continuation of the debate on the resolution in Parliament.

Honourable senators, the position the government has taken—after hearing the decision rendered by the court in Newfoundland and after learning at the end of last week that the Supreme Court of Canada had decided to hear the constitutional case before the end of this month—has been to express the hope that these two cases will be brought before the Supreme Court of Canada, as well as the judgment of the Quebec Court of Appeal, if it is rendered in time. In other words, the government would like to have the Supreme Court of Canada adjudicate all the cases which were brought before the courts by the provinces.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask at this point if Senator Guay is listening?

Senator Guay: A good point.

Senator Frith: Explain.

Senator Perrault: I have found that Senator Guay always listens intently.

Senator Flynn: He doesn't understand it the same way as I do.

Senator Perrault: How that will be done has not been decided at this stage.

With respect to the continuation of the debate on the resolution in Parliament, the government views it as desirable that the resolution should be in its final form for the court to be able to give a proper opinion. This is indeed what Chief Justice Freedman of the Manitoba Court of Appeal said in his judgment, and I quote:

> We therefore face a real likelihood that the amendments sought on the proposed resolution may be altered, deleted, or supplanted by other amendments before the resolution is deemed ready for transmission to Her Majesty. In this situation there is a danger that if we answer question . . . 1 we may later find that we have answered matters no longer before us and have not answered matters that emerged in their stead. The court should not be exposed to the risk of such an adventure in futility.

The Supreme Court of Canada, in the past has also frequently objected to receiving matters referred to it because of their hypothetical nature.

As I stated yesterday, Mr. Justice Bora Laskin stated in 1971 that:

> The utility of the reference as a vehicule for determining whether actual or proposed legislation is competent under the allocations of power made by the British North America Act is seriously affected in the present case because there is no factual underpinning for the issues that are raised by the order of reference.

As the Prime Minister said in the other place yesterday, the government's > —proposal has the advantage of going to the courts with something certain and final. If it is legal, that settles the matter; if not, it also settles the matter.

• (1425)

The Honourable Senator Flynn brought up the point that Parliament may be in contempt of court if it continues to discuss the matter. May I quote from the March 31 ruling of the Honourable the Speaker of the other place on that matter, in which Madam Speaker said:

> With regard to the sub judice aspect, at the outset it should be made quite clear that any practice or convention of the House to discontinue or not initiate discussion on a matter for the reason that it was then before the courts would have to be a voluntary or self-imposed practice or convention because the Bill of Rights of 1688, which is part of the law of the Parliament of Canada, provides that:
> > —freedom of speech and debate and proceedings in Parliament may not be questioned . . . in any court or place out of Parliament.

Sub judice is such a practice or convention. It is one that the House has imposed on itself to avoid discussing matters which are then under judicial consideration or before the courts.

Sir Robert Peel probably best summed up the essence of the convention when he said in 1844:

> —that the right of Parliament as the highest court in this land to discuss what it will cannot be limited, but that good taste and sense of fair play should in some circumstances limit the exercise of that right.

The purpose of the practice is to avoid any discussion in the House which might have a prejudicial effect on an accused or on the parties to a civil action, since it might influence a jury or witness when they read of it in the newspapers or see it on television. It is rightly doubtful that judges are liable to be influenced by anything spoken in the House.

In respect of criminal matters it is clear both here and in the United Kingdom that once a person has been charged in the courts in a criminal matter, it is the correct practice not to permit the matter to be raised in the House.

In respect of civil litigation matters the United Kingdom House in 1963 laid down a rule that once the case is set down for trial, the issues should not be raised in the House.

The position of the Canadian House in this respect appears to provide more latitude. In 1976 the Speaker said, and I quote:

> —in any event no restriction ought to exist on the right of any member to put questions respecting any matter before the courts, particularly those relating to a civil matter, unless and until that matter is at least at trial.

In 1971 the United Kingdom House resolved to allow references to be made to matters awaiting or under jurisdiction in all civil courts, subject to the discretion of the Chair and provided that there is no real and substantial danger of prejudice to the proceedings. This seems to provide even more and wider latitude.

In this context, in the same year, 1971, the Speaker of the Canadian House felt that the traditional position that a member while speaking must not refer to any matters upon which a judicial decision is pending, as set out in Beauchesne:

> —should be interpreted as narrowly as possible. I doubt very much if the Chair should be called upon to intervene whenever a Member refers to a matter which is before the Courts.

Furthermore, whatever self-imposed practice exists both in the United Kingdom and Canadian chambers in respect of matters that are before the courts, it is settled both here and in the United Kingdom that the practice would not be applied in the case of a bill, that is, while the House is involved in the legislative process—and I insist on that word. In other words, the House will not for any reason stop discussing outside events while embarked on the legislative process. Otherwise, it would mean that the courts could bring parliamentary proceedings to a halt, whereas one of the corporate rights of the House is to manage its internal affairs without their interference.

The proceedings in Parliament relating to the proposed Address to the Queen contained in the proposal presently before the House is not only a parliamentary procedure in Canada but is also part of the legislative process in respect of constitutional amendment. The address contains the proposed bill and the process being undergone comes within the exception referred to by Erskine May, in that the practice of sub judice is not applied to the legislative process.

With respect to issues beyond those relating to Criminal Code offences or traditional Civil litigation, the present rule in the U.K. House is that subject to the discretion of the Chair, reference may be made in the House to matters awaiting or under adjudication in all civil courts in so far as such matters concern issues of national importance, such as the national economy, public order or the essentials of life. Of course, if the matter is before the courts by virtue of a resolution of the House of Commons, the sub judice convention would no doubt be invoked, but only then. It is trite to say that the subject matter of the minister's resolution is an issue of national importance.

It is hoped that this statement has responded to some of the concerns of the Leader of the Opposition and other honourable senators.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I think the Leader of the Government has provided us with some ammunition which can be used one way or the other on the motion that I indicated yesterday I will move—perhaps I will not, but that is all right. I ask the question, really, in an effort to find out from the Leader of the Government the exact intention of the government in referring this resolution to the Supreme Court.

From what the Leader of the Government has said, I gather that the government is prepared to refer to the Supreme Court, under section 55 of the Supreme Court Act, the so-called constitutional package as it would be passed by the House of Commons and the Senate, but that the government is not prepared at this time to submit the package as it is presently before the house, possibly with some suggested amendments by the opposition parties. I was wondering what difference the Leader of the Government sees between the two positions.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would like to clarify the situation. No decision has been made with respect to a reference of the package as a whole under the Supreme Court Act. The words I employed related to the Quebec Court of Appeal, the Supreme Court of Manitoba and the Supreme Court of Newfoundland. However, let me say, honourable senators, that I understand that discussions and negotiations involving the house leaders and the parties in Parliament are under way this afternoon. Perhaps a course of action will be adopted ultimately which may meet the needs of all of the parties. I think that some honourable senators are also aware of that fact.

Senator Flynn: That is fine. Though I do not want to press the Leader of the Government, I would like to be told exactly what the government's intentions are. I am sorry that Senator Guay has left the chamber, but I think that the Leader of the Government has just confirmed what I understood the Prime Minister to say yesterday, which is that he would rather have the Supreme Court deal with all of the cases which were before the provincial courts of appeal. Is that correct?

Senator Perrault: That is the present position of the government.

Senator Flynn: Thank you.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: May I ask a supplementary question in that regard? If it is only the resolution which has been submitted to the appeal court, if I am correct, it is the resolution in its first draft. I am referring to the draft resolution which was referred to the joint committee last fall for consideration, and not the draft which resulted from the committee's consideration, including the 67 amendments introduced by the members of the committee.

● (1435)

Taking into account that the Manitoba Court of Appeal rendered its decision before the committee had concluded its consideration of this resolution, it seems clear that a decision was based on the October draft of the resolution, in which case, the amendments introduced by the committee, and those suggested by the House of Commons and the Senate, which form a significant part of the resolution as it is now, will not be under consideration by the Supreme Court.

My interpretation is that the Newfoundland Supreme Court and the Quebec Court of Appeal will both be making a decision on the same subject matter, that is, the first draft of the resolution, not on the draft which is now before us.

Will there be a way, other than by a reference from the Governor in Council, to have the amendments of the committee put to the Supreme Court because, surely, the idea is that all of the package, including the amendments of the committee and other possible amendments, should be put to the court.

Senator Perrault: I repeat what I said earlier: negotiations are under way involving the parties represented in Parliament. The position that I have outlined is the position presently held by the government.

The government is aware of some of the concerns which have been expressed by the opposition. The government is concerned with obtaining the view of the Supreme Court, and methods are being considered to achieve the goal which has been delineated by the honourable senator and the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Supplementary to the question which has been raised, did I correctly understand the deputy leader, in his earlier comment, to say that certain arrangements would be pending "reference to the Supreme Court"? I believe that was the phrase the deputy leader used. Was he indicating to us that the government had decided to refer the "package", as it is called, to the Supreme Court, or was he using the phrase in a very loose sense to suggest that the reference might also include an appeal? He did use, I believe, the phrase, "reference to the Supreme Court." Was he indicating that the government has decided that there will be a reference to the Supreme Court?

Senator Frith: I was not using the word "reference" in the narrow sense.

Hon. Lowell Murray: May I ask the Leader or the Deputy Leader of the Government if the government has considered what its position would be if, once Parliament had passed the resolution, it were found, in some aspects, to be ultra vires or faulty by the Supreme Court of Canada and the government wished to correct those aspects? Would it not have to start all over again?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, at least the first sentence of the question posed by the honourable senator is clearly hypothetical. However, the Prime Minister stated yesterday, or the day before, that, of course, the government would certainly examine its position should such an eventuality occur, and other courses of action would then be considered. This is clearly a hypothetical question.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, on a supplementary. Before referring to the Supreme Court for a declaratory judgment the whole matter now before both Houses, would it not be more proper, and perhaps more courageous on the part of the government, to consult the provinces beforehand and find out whether agreement could not be reached at least on an amending formula? I feel that if the federal government were to do that, it would prove to the Supreme Court at least the legitimacy of its action.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, many efforts have been made over a number of years to develop an amending formula that has the support of all the Canadian provinces. I am sure you are all aware of the recent meetings, involving, I believe, six provinces, which were held to agree on a wording for an amending formula. Obviously, agreement was not achieved because, certainly, a press conference would have been held and the information provided to an awaiting Canada. But Canada has been waiting for many years for an amending formula. Just three weeks ago I spoke to one of the provincial premiers who advised me that two provinces were still unable to agree on the type of amending formula that would be satisfactory to the other provinces.

The record clearly shows that the federal government has made strenuous efforts to develop an amending formula in co-operation with the provinces. Honourable senators will recall the conference held in Victoria in 1971. At one point during the course of the conference all the provinces agreed to an amending formula.

Senator Asselin: That was a long time ago.

Senator Perrault: That formula, which came to be called the Victoria formula, is under strenuous attack by the western provinces today, whereas in 1971 it was held up as the protector of western rights and was enthusiastically supported by the Honourable W. A. C. Bennett, the then premier of British Columbia, the Premier of Alberta, the Premier of Saskatchewan and the Premier of Manitoba.

Senator Asselin: Times have changed.

Senator Perrault: The search for an amending formula seems to be more elusive than the search for the Holy Grail.

Senator Frith: Under this proposal, there are still two more years.

Senator Asselin: Don't talk about two years; we want a decision now.

Senator Perrault: The deputy leader has reminded me that this proposal provides for a veto for all the provinces for a full two years after the Constitution is brought home. The provinces and the federal government will have two years to negotiate and agree to an amending formula. There is also the provision for a referendum to allow the people to decide, should that become necessary. Surely, there could not be a more forthcoming attitude by any national government than that demonstrated by this government.

Senator Asselin: I am talking about now.

Senator Frith: Then vote for the proposal, and you can have it right now.

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE—MAINLAND TO VANCOUVER ISLAND PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. In the submission of the Nova Scotia government to the National Energy Board, during the hearing of the application of the Trans Quebec & Maritimes Pipe Lines, there was included a statement to the effect that the federal government had indicated that it would provide $101 million to help build a natural gas distribution system in Nova Scotia. While I am prone to accept statements made on the authority of the Government of Nova Scotia, would the minister say whether it is his understanding that this is a correct statement and, if so, would the minister be prepared to confirm that commitment?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I will look into the matter, honourable senators.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. The government, through the National Energy Program, committed $500 million in support of both the eastern Canada system extension and the new line to Vancouver Island. While the minister is looking into the question of whether the government is, indeed, prepared to put up $101 million, which the Province of Nova Scotia says it has committed, will he also ascertain whether that amount of $101 million is part of the eastern Canada system extension and, if so, whether it is part of the commitment of $500 million or is an additional commitment?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will look into that question as well.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary question. Has the government received an indication, similar to the one given last week by Trans Quebec & Maritimes Pipe Lines, from either B.C. Hydro or Westcoast Transmission Company Limited as to how much money they will require from the federal government in order to proceed with the construction of the line to Vancouver Island once it is approved by the National Energy Board?

Senator Olson: I believe that at least two proposals based on studies have been made with regard to the construction of a gas pipe line from the mainland to Vancouver Island. If those proposals or studies are available, I will provide them to the honourable senator.

OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION LICENCES—PROVINCIAL REVENUES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It relates to a delayed answer provided by the minister to a question of mine. The delayed answer can be found on page 1641 of the proceedings of this house for February 11, 1981, and it reads, in part as follows:

> Honourable senators, I have another delayed answer I should like to give in response to a number of questions raised on December 16 by Senator Smith. His questions concerned oil and gas exploration licences.

Then the minister made a reference to British Columbia land sales which were held on January 21. The ending of the delayed answer reads:

> In Alberta no official estimate has been made by that province regarding revenue expectations from land sales for the year 1981.

Would the minister tell me whether it is correct to say that figures are now available for Alberta government revenues from sales of land for oil and gas drilling exploration for the first quarter of 1981? If so, is it correct to say that these revenues amounted to approximately $62 million, as compared to $280 million for the same period in 1980, which amounts to a decrease of about 78 per cent?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I understand that certain figures are now available. I shall take the honourable senator's question as notice, and in the meantime I shall try to determine whether those figures can be reconciled with what has been the position of Alberta. Of course, my honourable friend will realize that in addition to the factors to which he has referred, many other factors are involved.

Senator Smith: I do not wish to press the honourable gentleman, but am I to understand that he is taking the question as notice?

Senator Olson: Yes.

PETRO-CANADA—PURCHASE OF PETROFINA CANADA INC.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. It deals with the bid by Petro-Canada for shares of Petrofina. It is now my understanding that it has been decided that the bid of $120 per share made by Petro-Canada will remain open for another two years, and that Petrofina will have until 1983 to decide how many shares it will sell to Petro-Canada. Would the minister give us some information on this rather unusual situation?

Perhaps the minister would also indicate whether a decision has been reached as to how Petro-Canada will pay for this purchase of what is now an indeterminate number of shares, whether the Canadian ownership charge will be invoked, and, if so, when? Also, would the minister indicate to what extent the Government of Canada, through its crown agency, Petro-Canada, intends to go in retiring the debt it has incurred. I understand that this price of $120 per share—which, in my opinion, is exorbitant—will be indexed upward to keep pace with inflation. As a result, when the shares are finally purchased, the price of each could be a great deal more than $120. Would the minister tell us over what period of time that debt will be retired and by what methods?

● (1450)

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the answer that I gave the honourable senator the other day is probably more valid now than it was then, and that was that until there is a completion of the deal, and the number of shares, the amount of money, and the time frame required for the making of payments are known, it would be premature to speculate. I can give my honourable friend an undertaking that, as soon as that information is available and an announcement can be made, I will convey it to this chamber as quickly as possible.

Senator Doody: Is the minister telling us that we may have to wait until 1983?

Senator Olson: No, I did not say that. I said that as soon as a decision has been made respecting the number of things that I described, I would obtain, and provide him with, that information.

Senator Doody: Would the minister undertake, then, to provide us with a copy of the document which justifies the payment of $120-plus for these shares?

Senator Olson: When that is available, yes.

TRANSPORT

GOVERNMENT POLICY RE INTERNATIONAL AND DOMESTIC AIR ROUTES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In a speech made in Vancouver by the president of Air Canada, Mr. Claude Taylor, he indicated that, in his view, Canada should be represented on international air routes by a single carrier.

My question is: Could the Leader of the Government ascertain, and advise this chamber as to, the government's view of that statement and, indeed, what the government policy is with respect to international carriers, and as to whether there is still a competitive system in this country?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take the question as notice, but it should be observed that the Honourable Donald Mazankowski, speaking for the Conservative Party, advocated that Canada should have only one international carrier. He said, during the time of the Conservative government, that we should have a monopoly situation abroad. I have not read the reasons given by him. The rationale behind them may be excellent. I do think that Canada is well served today by its airlines and the international carriers that we have. Air Canada and Canadian Pacific stand second to none in the services they offer the travelling public.

Senator Nurgitz: It was with that in mind that I asked the question. In view of CP Air and Air Canada providing such excellent service, I wonder why one would want to eliminate CP Air and, frankly, eliminate the competitive system. After hearing the historical explanation by the Leader of the Government—and that may well have been the policy of the former government—I would like to know what the policy of this government is.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice. To express a personal view, however, if both operations are economically viable, there is nothing better than competition, whether it is domestic or abroad.

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question. Mr. Taylor cited, as evidence for his case, that more comprehensive coverage of routes could be offered under this single airline scheme. He noted that an airline would not necessarily have to drop an unprofitable route because it could be blended in with a profitable route to make it worthwhile carrying the two. Could the leader inform himself and advise the Senate of any details of applications over the last three or four years where Air Canada has requested that it divest itself of less profitable routes?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, an attempt will be made to obtain that information. However, both Air Canada and CP Air have excellent management. I believe there has been a noticeable improvement over the past few years, but certainly that information will be requested.

Senator Nurgitz: I have one final supplementary question. Mr. Taylor went on to indicate that, in his view, deregulation of air transport in Canada would be detrimental to the system, and particularly detrimental to Air Canada. My question to the Leader of the Government is: Would he determine for us if the Minister of Transport has any plans for deregulation, and, for example, to what degree government policy on potential deregulation would be dictated by Air Canada or its officers?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the information sought in the supplementary question also will be taken as notice.

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION—GOVERNMENT PRICING POLICY RE CANADA LANDS

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In order that companies intending to explore on Canada lands can make sound investment decisions, would the minister indicate when the government expects to state its pricing policy with respect to Canada lands discoveries?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot give a definitive answer to that question, either as to amount or date, but I believe the government is cognizant of the fact that this should be known as soon as possible, which may facilitate some budgetary expenditure with that in mind.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—CANADIANIZATION OF OIL INDUSTRY

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, from my ever-growing file of delayed government decisions, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. It has now been some four months since the minister and his colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, announced that $100 million had been set aside to assist in the Canadianization of the oil industry through joint ventures of the federal government and co-operative movements, credit unions and caisses populaires. My question is: What is the status of this matter now, and when may we expect some decisions to be announced?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, this commitment was made and the commitment stands. There is a very active committee of representatives of the co-operative movement, including credit unions, certain wheat pool organizations, the federated co-operatives of western Canada and other co-operatives engaged in a study of this whole question. Many meetings have been held. The co-operative leaders have been engaged in continued discussions with their own organizations. Important progress is being made towards going forward with a co-operative investment in the energy field, and with the support of the Government of Canada to the extent of a commitment of $100 million, to which Senator Murray has referred.

[Senator Perrault.]

As to when specific action will be taken by way of investment, I think Senator Murray will realize that that is not something that I could venture a guess on. This is an important business venture that is being considered, and I can tell him that, in my judgment, important progress is being made, and this is a view shared by the co-operative leaders who themselves are taking the lead in this proposed venture.

Senator Murray should change the level on his file because it is not a "delayed decision."

INTEREST RATE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in his capacity as an agricultural expert. Yesterday he indicated, in reply to a question of mine, that the Farm Credit Corporation had increased considerably the interest rate charged on loans to Canadian farmers. Today I received an announcement from the Farm Credit Corporation saying that the rate has been increased, and it says "the current interest rate may seem high from an historical perspective."

• (1500)

I should like to ask the Honourable Senator Argue if, having gone through the struggles involved in farming, as have many other Canadian farmers through ten years, he would today undertake the purchase of a farm, knowing that he would have to borrow the money at an interest rate of 14 per cent?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I appreciate the question and I appreciate the honourable senator referring to me as an expert. His question, however, obviously has nothing to do with the Department of Agriculture or any connection I might have with it, because it is a personal question.

If one were endeavouring to purchase a farm today, at least in western Canada, I do not think that the single greatest impediment to doing so would be the Farm Credit Corporation's interest rate of some 14 per cent. Incidentally, I was high in my guess yesterday. No, that would not be the chief impediment. Indeed, that is the best possible interest rate available to any prospective farm purchaser anywhere in Canada.

The great impediment to purchasing a western farm is the high price of land there, brought about, in the main, by the prosperous conditions in the west and because the grain market is very buoyant, the prices are good and the Wheat Board is doing a great job.

Senator Flynn: So is the minister in charge.

Senator Phillips: One thing I always enjoy about the Honourable Senator Argue is his modesty. I was glad to hear him say it is the Wheat Board that is doing a good job, rather than his ministry. I appreciate that very much.

The honourable senator referred to the 14 per cent interest rate as being the best available. I would point out that the average interest rate for a home or any other real estate purchased in Ottawa, for example, is 15 per cent. So 14 per cent is really not much of a break for the farmer. One percentage point does not really help the individual out.

I am sure that with his staff the honourable senator has far more research capability than we have.

Senator Flynn: It doesn't show.

Senator Phillips: I would ask him to prepare a research paper indicating how much more per acre a farmer would have to receive in net profit in order to pay the extra interest on a $150,000 loan.

Senator Argue: I can tell my honourable friend that I do not have a research staff. I probably have a smaller but more competent staff—

Senator Flynn: That's the idea.

Senator Argue: —than most ministers—

Senator Olson: Except mine. I have the smallest.

Senator Asselin: Is that a complaint?

Senator Argue: It's a great staff.

Senator Flynn: Is that a reflection on your ministry?

Senator Argue: Well, I would not want to get into a comparison.

Senator Frith: You didn't let him finish his answer: ". . . than most ministers had in the last administration."

Senator Argue: I can tell the Honourable Senator Phillips that the Library of Parliament has large research facilities available to both him and me. At any rate, his question suggested that a saving of 1 per cent was not much of a saving, and then he asked how much the extra interest would cost on a $150,000 loan.

Senator Phillips: The increase.

Senator Argue: I guess if a saving of 1 per cent is 1 per cent, then on a $150,000 loan that should be a saving of $1,500 every year the loan is in effect. If you take that over the amortization of a Farm Credit Corporation loan of 29 years, that is a lot of money.

Senator Phillips: I agree that that is a considerable amount of money, but, on the other hand, isn't it unfortunate that the individual farmer is required to pay an extra two points on the Farm Credit Corporation loan? That is costing him twice as much as your theoretical saving.

Senator Steuart: Look at all we are getting for free.

Senator Olson: It's still 3½ per cent below prime.

THE ESTIMATES

PUBLIC SERVICE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to respond to a question raised on March 17 by Senator Donahoe concerning the size of the public service. I am sorry he is not present, because he would be interested in the answer.

In 1975-76 our government set out to reduce the growth in person-year requirements in the public service. I would emphasize that we did not announce a policy of reducing the size of the public service but rather of reducing the growth.

Nevertheless, for the past two years there has been an actual reduction in the size of the public service. Thus, the 1 per cent increase outlined in the 1981-82 main estimates is the first in three years and was made necessary by increased service requirements. The identification of those requirements I spelled out to the honourable senator the other day.

ENERGY

OIL—ATLANTIC PROVINCES—SECURITY OF SUPPLY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on March 17 by Senator Muir. His question concerned the security of oil supplies to the Atlantic provinces.

My information is that the damage caused by severe storms to Mexico's crude production and export capability has been repaired. Pemex has therefore advised Petro-Canada that it will receive full contract volumes of 50,000 barrels per day in March shipments and should continue to receive a similar amount in future months, as agreed.

I wish to assure honourable senators that potential interruptions such as that experienced by Mexico are not uncommon, and allowances are made by refiners in their supply planning. Furthermore, it is indicative of our refiners' capabilities that Canada did not experience difficulties in adjusting to the Mexican crude interruption.

With regard to Senator Muir's request for a forecast of the oil supply-demand situation, as we know, such forecasts are always difficult to make. Early in January, forecasters were predicting a supply squeeze in mid-to-late 1981, but, immediately upon their release, the new estimates were revised upwards in the face of shrinking world oil demand and improved exports from Iran and Iraq. World demand continues to decline because of a lagging world economy and higher prices.

At the present time there appears to be a surplus of 1.5 million to 2 million barrels per day of available producing capacity building up as the world demand falls and the Iran-Iraq exports increase. Anticipated cutbacks in OPEC production are therefore expected to drop toward a balance of supply and demand.

Indications are that demand will continue to drop in the major consuming areas and that the supply is more than adequate, as indicated by the depressed crude oil spot market. Inventories of crude oil also remain high, and Iran and Iraq continue to escalate production. On this basis, the unconfirmed report that Saudi Arabia has taken steps to reduce its oil production by up to 600,000 barrels per day, as of April 1, is not likely to have a severe impact on the world supply and demand balance. The reduction of this "war relief" crude is expected to return Saudi output to the pre-war level of 9.5 million barrels per day. I can only add that Canada should not be affected by the cutback in Saudi production.

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PRODUCTION OF IRISH MOSS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, in reference to a delayed answer given yesterday by Senator Perrault on the question of Irish moss, on which this is my first opportunity to comment, I would ask the honourable deputy leader if he would carry this message to the leader and perhaps to those most excellent research people referred to by Senator Argue.

I promised the house, and particularly Senator Frith, that if I received the information I would not talk about the subject any more in this Parliament. He was kind enough to say, "Say it isn't so." Now I am carrying through on his prayerful wish.

Yesterday, in an exchange between Senator Smith and Senator Perrault, Senator Smith, kindly acting on my behalf, I presume, asked if the question of the volume and the value of Irish moss in the Atlantic provinces referred to individual producers or to the total Atlantic provinces production. Senator Perrault, as set out at page 2208 of yesterday's Hansard, said that he believed that it had to do with individual producers.

I would ask Senator Frith to look carefully at the first question, which asked the total volume and value of Irish moss landings in each of the Atlantic provinces for the last ten fiscal years. That question was put down on May 16, 1980, and if the geniuses who provide these inane and vacuous, insulting and condescending answers to honourable senators, like Senator Perrault, will read or consult the bright men in Senator Argue's department, we might have that question answered.

I can read in the Canada Year Book all the values and volumes of every species of fish in Canada, from buffalofish to smallhead bass and bighead bass and medium-size bass, electric eels and red eels and black eels, but why can they not make the same information available as used to be available until 1978, when some genius, because he could not find the answer and thought it would be clever, I presume, decided to suggest that I was asking for confidential information?

That is not the problem at all. I don't grow moss. I don't own any moss. I personally don't have anything to do with moss. My old dad told me years ago that grass doesn't grow on a busy street and that moss does not grow on the sunny side. One look at me and you will know that I listened to my father, and I would like to tell Senator Frith, who is a very able man, to listen to me and sharpen up, if I may say so, these people so that we will have no more of these silly replies taking up the time of this hard-working chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not familiar with all of the statistics that Senator Macquarrie says were available on certain species, but I am bound to say that in Lanark County we refer to them as smallmouth and largemouth bass rather than smallhead and largehead bass. But that is an irrelevant or irreverent comment, in any event.

Senator Flynn: There is no problem with that.

Senator Frith: I understand that the difficulty in obtaining the figures and the information does not lie in an inability to find them. We are told that what is at stake is the principle of confidentiality. When Statistics Canada asks an industry to provide figures, the general principle is that an individual company's figures are kept confidential because they are concerned about giving a competitive advantage to others in the industry. We are told that this is the principle at stake.

• (1510)

I do, however, share with Senator Macquarrie an inability to understand the precise application of that principle to the specific question he is asking. I do recognize that his question asked for a provincial breakdown. So, I will bring his question and his remarks to the attention of those concerned so we can see whether his observations and mine meet the test of the principle that they seem to be trying to apply.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORTS APPROVING COMMITTEE BUDGETS TABLED

Leave having been granted to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled reports approving budgets of the following committees:

Banking, Trade and Commerce

Foreign Affairs

Northern Pipeline (Special)

(For texts of reports, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

RULES OF THE SENATE

RULE 20—PROPOSED AMENDMENT

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise on two points of order. The first is with reference to rule 20 of the Rules of the Senate. I only raise the point of order to make a suggestion which I think would be helpful to those responsible for the management of the affairs of the Senate. Rule 20 states:

> (1) When the Speaker calls the question period, a senator may, without notice, address an oral question to
> (a) the Leader of the Government in the Senate, if it is a question relating to public affairs,
> (b) a senator who is a Minister of the Crown, if it is a question relating to his ministerial responsibility, or

(c) the chairman of a committee, if it is a question relating to the activities of that committee.

The Deputy Leader of the Government is not included in that rule. I think, because he has distinguished himself so well in responding to questions, it should be suggested to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders that this rule be changed to regularize the useful intervention of the Deputy Leader of the Government from time to time.

Senator Flynn: Yes, he has been very helpful to the Leader of the Government.

Senator Frith: What can I say?

Senator Murray: Nothing until we change the rule.

The Hon. the Speaker: In order to clarify the point in my mind, how do you reconcile rule 20 with rule 5(d)?

Senator Grosart: That is a very interesting question, Your Honour. This refers to a senator acting for the leader on a more or less permanent basis when he is not here for an extended period of time. This matter has been discussed before. The impression I have is that this additional qualification of the Leader of the Government would refer to such occasions when he is not in his seat, just as is the case when Your Honour leaves the Chair and another honourable senator takes your place as Acting Speaker.

I merely suggest that it would be useful to have this matter made quite clear. Rule 5(d) can, of course, be interpreted that way. In previous discussions, the tendency was not to interpret it that way.

RULE 19—ORDER OF BUSINESS

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, my second point of order arises out of the order of business as it is laid down in rule 19. At the present time, we would, in due course, go to Order No. 4, which is, of course, the resumption of the debate on the amendment to what we can call the constitutional question. On the other hand, the motion of Senator Flynn would seem to have the effect, if it were adopted by the Senate, of making it unnecessary to proceed with the debate as indicated in Order No. 4. I therefore suggest to the leadership in the house that they might seek leave of the Senate, notwithstanding rule 19, to bring forward Motion No. 2 so that we could dispose of it one way or the other, and then proceed with the debate which is brought into question by the motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in speaking to the point of order raised by the Honourable Senator Grosart, I have two observations to make. First of all, the effect of in any way impeding debate on Order No. 4, as a result of Motion No. 2, would be to carry Motion No. 2.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: I say that because the motion states:

> —that the debate on the motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada . . . be adjourned until after the Supreme Court of Canada has rendered a final decision on the legality of the contents of that Address.

Therefore, if we do not proceed with Order No. 4 because of Motion No. 2 we will have, in effect, agreed to Motion No. 2, or at least part of it. That is one observation.

Of course, the essence of Senator Grosart's point is that what we should do is, in fact, bring it forward so that we can debate it and dispose of it one way or the other. My difficulty is that I have a point of order to raise on whether or not that motion is in order. Of course, I could bring that forward at that time, too.

In the circumstances, I suggest, honourable senators, that we proceed with Order No. 4, notwithstanding the point raised by Senator Grosart, for the reason that, as far as I am aware, only Senator Lawson, in whose name the order stands, intends to speak on that motion today. We can then either hear the point of order and the motion, and have the point raised by Senator Grosart apply the next time the order is called. We could then hear my point of order, or we could stand the whole thing, including my point of order, until Tuesday.

It was our informal intent to deal with it next Tuesday, in any event. As far as I know, no one on this side is counting on speaking on Tuesday. I know that no one on the other side is counting on speaking on Tuesday. While that solution may not be absolutely and technically justified, it might be a way of meeting the principles involved to the satisfaction of all honourable senators.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in view of what has been said by the Deputy Leader of the Government as to what may be done or agreed upon in the other place, I think the suggestion is a valid one. I would only question his idea that by standing Order No. 4 today we would, in effect, be agreeing to my motion. I do not think that is valid. The idea is that we would simply stand it until the Senate makes a decision as to the propriety of continuing the debate.

If Senator Lawson wants to be here next week—and we always welcome his presence—I am quite sure he would not mind waiting, but I think we should let him speak today, with the understanding that the motion will be moved next week, at which time the deputy leader or any other honourable senator can raise a point of order as to its validity.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline on Bill C-60, to amend the National Energy Board Act, which was presented yesterday.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

In addressing myself to the report of the committee on Bill C-60, to amend the National Energy Board Act, I would say it seems that this bill, or its predecessor, Bill S-12, has been with us for some time; but once again it demonstrates the very useful work that can be done by committees of this house, because it was under the chairmanship of Senator Olson that an inequity was found to exist with respect to the acquisitions of rights-of-way by pipeline companies. At that time the committee undertook to formulate the legislation, Bill S-12, which later died on the order paper. The committee continued its efforts, and, as a result, Bill C-60 comes to us as a government bill introduced in the other place by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Essentially Bill C-60 provides for updating the procedures for the acquisitions of pipeline rights-of-way under federal legislation. It provides notice to a landowner in advance of the exact route of the right-of-way—advance notice to people who may be affected by the right-of-way, so that they can make representations. It provides for a hearing for anyone who wishes to object to the proposed right-of-way with respect to the acquisition of the actual right-of-way, or to agreement between the landowner and the company. It provides for the first time payment, at the option of the landowner, of a lump sum or annual or periodic payments. All of those are at the option of the landowner and they apply both to the acquisition costs and any damages that may be assessed by the pipeline company in the construction of the pipeline.

It provides for simple negotiation between the two parties if there is not agreement. Finally, it provides for arbitration by an arbitration committee, which replaces the costly and expensive legal procedures presently invoked by the Railway Act of 1917. So it places arbitration within reach of every landowner at reasonable cost.

In considering the bill, the committee held three meetings and heard from nine witnesses, including the Alberta Surface Rights Federation, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Gas Association, the Canadian Petroleum Association, Foothills Pipe Line (Yukon) Ltd., Interprovincial Pipe-Line Limited, TransCanada PipeLines Ltd. and Trans Quebec and Maritimes Pipeline Inc.

All of the witnesses appearing before the committee were in general agreement with the provisions and the spirit of the act, but they did recommend certain modifications or amendments to clarify those areas which were not clear or which gave them some concern. In that respect, we have introduced six amendments to the bill, as set out in our report, which were designated primarily to reflect, as I have said, the intent and spirit of the bill.

The first amendment will permit acquisition when there is nothing in dispute between the landowner and the company. The acquisition may proceed without awaiting the approval of the National Energy Board.

The second amendment substitutes certain lines to include compensation payable in respect of annual or periodic payments.

The third amendment adds the word "gross" to read "gross negligence" on the part of the landowner in connection with the pipeline. As I understand it, this is normal legal terminology.

The fourth amendment provides that in the consideration of any award the arbitration committee may take into account any changes in market value which may have occurred since the time of the last award or the time of acquisition.

The fifth amendment provides that the compensation or such part thereof as is specified be made by one lump sum; and, finally, the sixth amendment provides for annual or periodic payments and a review of those payments.

Honourable senators, I should like to draw to the attention of the government the representations made by Trans Quebec and Maritimes Pipeline Inc. and Foothills Pipe Line (Yukon) Ltd. with respect to the date of the proclamation of this bill. They indicated very strongly that early proclamation could hinder their 1981 construction program, and they asked that the government take that into consideration when making a decision with respect to the proclamation of this bill. I pass that information on to the government in the hope that consideration will be given to their representations in that regard.

With those remarks, honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators may I ask Senator Hastings a question?

Does the bill deal with the question of the right-of-way acquired by the company terminating at some point, on the termination of its use, or the expiry of the useful life of the pipeline which is built on the right-of-way, rather than the right-of-way being acquired in perpetuity; and/or additional compensation being given to the landowner if looping takes place, or if another quite separate pipeline is put down on the same right-of-way at a later date?

Senator Hastings: As to the first part of the question, what happens at the termination of the pipeline is not provided for in this bill. However, it is provided in the National Energy Board Act that on the termination of the useful life of a pipeline the National Energy Board authorizes the evacuation and removal of the pipeline or anything buried under the ground at that time, and the termination, I presume, of the easement that was granted.

With respect to the second part of the senator's question, the first easements that were signed provided for a pipeline or pipelines. The easements granted now provide for only one pipeline. So if they wished to loop, they would have to have another agreement for the second pipeline.

Senator van Roggen: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

• (1530)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Hastings moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, and on the motion in amendment thereto of Senator Yuzyk.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, I want to say at the outset that I appreciate Senator Flynn's intervention to allow me to speak. By way of reciprocation, I should like to say that I shall be very brief in my comments. I was starting to get a complex, first of all on account of the sunshine coming in, and secondly because of all the points of order that appear to disallow my right to speak. I was just going to ask, "Where is Senator Godfrey when I need him?"

Here are just a few passing remarks by someone from British Columbia on the Constitution and the proposed amendments.

I think the first thing I should mention, very briefly, is this. We hear all kinds of talk about western separation, as if it were some kind of orderly group that is ready to pack up and leave. As a British Columbian, I can tell you unequivocally that that is not in the minds of the overwhelming majority of British Columbians. There is a small handful in the west of, I think, misguided persons who feel that way, and have sincere beliefs about it, but it is certainly not in the minds of the people I talk to and associate with on a regular basis. I do not think you can even talk about western separation, because there are some very strong views in British Columbia that are significantly different from the views of Alberta. In particular, with regard to the concerns that are expressed by Premier Lougheed in his opposition to the federal government's energy policy, I am satisfied, from listening to the people I have talked to, that there are just as many British Columbians who are unhappy about Peter Lougheed's arbitrary act of cutting off oil to the east as there are easterners who are upset about it; because whatever we are in British Columbia, we are bright enough to understand that it costs us just as much, as individual British Columbians, to pay the extra prices that people are being subjected to here in the east as it does in any other part of the country; so there are just as many British Columbians who are angry at Peter Lougheed as there are Canadians anywhere else in Canada. As a matter of fact, many of the people I associate with in trade unions are asking, "If Peter Lougheed can get away with simply shutting off the rest of the country and forcing us to spend millions and millions of dollars more, how come the trade unions haven't tried that?" This is a new idea, a novel idea, as to how to deal with problems and find solutions to them. They are looking at the situation very carefully, to see if he gets away with it, and then they feel that perhaps the unions should be more imaginative and try to get away with such actions themselves. We know that if they tried anything like that themselves, and they have certainly been involved in many disputes—

Senator Flynn: They have been doing pretty well.

Senator Lawson: Well, in the many disputes that they have been involved in, they have not been able to do that, and if they were to try something quite as drastic as that, then, without question, they would be before the courts or they would be legislated against; but it is something they are watching very carefully.

In British Columbia my friend, Premier Bennett, expresses his concerns about the Constitution, about the unfairness of it, and so on, and I do not quarrel with his right to try to use his bargaining leverage, which is something that I, and the people I associate with and know something about and represent, understand. But what troubles me most is Premier Bennett saying that one of the things he wants in particular is a House of the Provinces. "We must scrap the Senate and get it changed, "he says." We must have a House of the Provinces, because regional interests are not being properly represented in the Senate."

Senator Flynn: Occasionally they are.

Senator Lawson: I asked Premier Bennett, "When was the last time you called all the B.C. senators together, regardless of party, and said, 'This is the position of the Province of British Columbia. Can you support it in the Senate'?" Any of the B.C. senators will tell you that on no single occasion has Premier Bennett ever utilized the federal senators from his province to represent the geographical interests of British Columbia. What they do they do as individuals, on their own, based on their sincere belief that what they are doing is in the best interests of British Columbia.

I say to Premier Bennett, and to any other provincial premier who wants to talk about restructuring this body or changing it, "If you have not utilized the federal representatives in your area who are members of the Senate so that they can represent your provincial interests, you have forfeited your right to complain, and you have forfeited your right to tear down this place."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lawson: Out of the respect I have for Senator Flynn, I will not cover all the other provinces that I might ordinarily have covered. But I want to talk about the concerns that I hear being expressed more and more in talking to many ordinary working people across the country, both men and women. I ask them about their position with regard to the Constitution, patriation, the Charter of Rights, and so on, and it seems that before they respond to that they want to talk about, for example, house prices in Vancouver. They say,

"What about not being able to buy even a lot in a dormitory city like Burnaby, near Vancouver, for less than $100,000? What about ordinary working people not being able to rent an apartment for less than $1,000 or $1,200 a month?" They want to know what we are going to do about those things.

"Where are your priorities?", they say to me. Because of this inflated, run-away market we have in British Columbia, in housing, with houses increasing in value at 100 per cent, 200 per cent, 300 per cent, a thousand per cent in a relatively short period of time, it seems that there are two beneficiaries: the mortgage companies and the land wheelers and dealers. The only other beneficiaries, it now appears, are going to be some of the maritime provinces.

There was a special feature in the media just last week indicating that many people are saying, "We invested in these older homes years ago. Now we find we can't afford to live in British Columbia, so we are going to sell these homes, take our money, buy a house at 20 or 25 per cent of the B.C. cost in the maritimes, and use the surplus to live on." There is therefore going to be a migration from west to east, which is going to turn the country upside down as a result of what is taking place. They say, "Perhaps it will be in the best long-range interests of the country if we do that."

Then they ask me, "What about interest rates, with regard to mortgages, that are running at 14, 15, 16, and on up to 20 per cent?" They say, "How can we do this? How do we buy a home? How do we pay for it?" We try to explain the need for this war on inflation that is being generalled by some of the leaders in the government, but they find great difficulty in understanding it all.

Then they read in the newspapers that the lowest increase in profits by the major chartered banks was obtained by the poor old Bank of Nova Scotia, that only got a 24 per cent increase over last year—I guess we are going to have to send CARE packages to them—the highest increase being in the case of the Royal, at something like 79 per cent. Ordinary Canadians are finding great difficulty in understanding how, on the one hand, we have these huge inflated interest rates, and high costs, and, on the other hand, these exorbitant, almost usurious profits being taken down by the banks.

They want to know about those kinds of concerns. They ask, "What about energy prices? What about inflation? What about unemployment in many areas across the country?" They are saying that they understand, to some degree, the concern about the Constitution, and the need for a Charter of Rights to protect equal rights for men and women, women's rights, aboriginal rights and language rights; but after all the discussions and meetings I have had with various people from various walks of life right across the country, and particularly in the west, they say, "Let us get on with this, let us get it done with, and let us then get to more important economic matters affecting the people and the country as a whole."

I have to ask myself: Would we be better off with the Constitution patriated? Would we be better off with it here, with a Charter of Rights included in it? Would we be better off with an amending formula? When I examine all of that, and the views that have been expressed, I come to the conclusion that, yes, we would be better off.

In concluding my brief remarks, however, let me say that what we need, in my view, is to have this whole matter concluded as rapidly as possible, having regard to all the rights of those involved. We should have the proposed resolution and the amendments adopted and referred to the Supreme Court, to have the matter tested, so that we do not have to go through a duplication of the whole action again, and then refer it to Westminster in order to bring it to Canada. Then let us get on with the very important concerns that have been expressed by the many ordinary Canadians I have talked to, who say that there are many important matters that need to be addressed.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should simply like to direct one remark to Senator Lawson. I have to express some skepticism about the likelihood of many British Columbians moving to the Atlantic provinces, for the reasons that Senator Lawson gave, or, indeed, for any other reason. It would be very confusing for British Columbians to do so because in the Atlantic provinces, as Senator Lawson obviously knows, the ocean is on the wrong side.

Senator McElman: But the people are on the right side!

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 7, 1981, at 8 p.m.

NORTHERN PIPELINE
THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

ENHANCED OIL RECOVERY IN CANADA

The Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline has the honour to present its Third Report as follows:

The Committee was authorized by the Senate, as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of July 10, 1980, "to examine and report upon the enhanced recovery technology of petroleum and natural gas and matters related thereto."

Your Committee, in accordance with the terms of reference, has examined enhanced methods of recovering oil and offers this report on its potential for augmenting Canadian oil supplies.

The Committee in fulfilling its mandate, held seven public hearings in Ottawa. See Appendix A for Witnesses. In addition, a Subcommittee travelled to Alberta to view projects and heavy oil production facilities at Lloydminster and meet with industry officials in Calgary.

The Committee, in its meetings with government, industry and association officials, endeavoured to extract a full and frank disclosure of the issues and problems affecting enhanced oil recovery. The Committee appreciated the forthright way in which the evidence and information was presented, which in turn facilitated the task of making recommendations aimed at optimizing the exploitation of indigenous oil reserves.

The Committee expresses its appreciation to those who appeared at our meetings both in Ottawa and Alberta and to those who otherwise provided information. Their co-operation was most helpful.

We are particularly indebted to Ms. Sonya Dakers, Library of Parliament, for her valuable contribution to our research, study and report. Able technical assistance was provided by Dr. John Dawson of the Canadian Energy Research Institute. To Aline Pritchard, Clerk of the Committee and Daniel Amireault, Administrative Assistant, we express our sincere thanks.

SUMMARY AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Four billion barrels (636 million cubic metres) of recoverable oil in known reservoirs in the Western Canada sedimentary basin could become available if there were adequate economic incentives.

Innovative recovery technologies allow the extraction of oil previously inaccessible by conventional recovery methods.

These non-conventional methods, termed enhanced oil recovery or tertiary recovery (EOR) offer the promise of increasing and extending production in reservoirs where conventional output has been dropping and will continue to decline sharply under primary and secondary recovery methods.

The potential for enhanced recovery cannot be ignored since this oil would add more than 50% to Canada's remaining established conventional reserves of six billion barrels (1 billion cubic metres).

Time is of the essence. It is essential that these methods be put in place within the next few years if maximum potential is to be achieved.

Enhanced or tertiary recovery:

- extends conventional production and the useful life of existing facilities
- reduces Canada's petroleum shortfall until new supplies from the frontier and oil sands become available
- contributes technology to Canada, with direct and spin-off benefits

The Committee recognizes that a stated objective of the National Energy Program (NEP) of October 1980 was to encourage security of supply and energy independence, and to this end $30.00/barrel was proposed as a reference price for tertiary oil.

We commend the initiative as a recognition of the part enhanced recovery can play in meeting NEP goals. On the basis of evidence presented to the Committee, we doubt, however, that the reference price when combined with other features in the NEP will encourage a substantial increase in EOR activity.

Enhanced oil recovery is a high-risk venture which requires a favourable business climate and adequate producer revenues to realize its potential. The present federal-provincial deadlock over resources creates uncertainty and impedes EOR development.

Evidence placed before the Committee has led members to conclude that the risks associated with enhanced recovery are comparable with those in oil sands development, particularly in the early years when costs are high and the success of recovery schemes is in question.

The weight of evidence strongly suggests that further action is warranted at this time to encourage EOR development. The Committee believes that a re-examination of the costs and economic factors will support this view. Your Committee therefore recommends:

- The reference price for incremental oil produced from approved EOR projects be the same as the oil sands reference price having regard to quality differential.

or

- Incremental oil produced from approved EOR projects be exempt from the proposed Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax until capital costs are recovered.
- The tertiary supplement, used to achieve the EOR reference price, be paid through a method which allows producers an earlier return on investment. This presumably would be the fixed proportion method.

Injection materials represent a substantial portion of operating cost in enhanced oil recovery. Your Committee endorses the removal of the excise tax on natural gas and natural gas liquids injected into reservoirs in pressure maintenance and miscible flood schemes, and further recommends:

- That natural gas and natural gas liquids used in approved enhanced recovery projects be exempt from the proposed Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax.

With respect to very heavy oil below 15° to 16° API where primary and secondary production is low:

- Consideration should be given to applying the EOR reference price to the entire production.

Your Committee also notes that marketing problems will continue until adequate upgrading facilities are established in Canada. In the interim, in order to assure continued EOR development, we suggest that adequate export markets be maintained. This would be encouraged by the issue of export permits on a quarterly basis.

In conclusion, the Committee believes that if the economic constraints are alleviated, we have the technological and human resources available in Canada to proceed expeditiously with enhanced oil recovery.

INTRODUCTION

On average, Canadian oil reservoirs containing light and medium oil yield perhaps one-third of the oil-in-place when produced using natural reservoir pressure (primary recovery) or by artificial injection of water or gas (secondary recovery). For heavy oil reservoirs the proportion of the oil recovered by these conventional methods is less than 10 per cent. Currently available technologies, however, now provide the means to recover a further 10 to 15 per cent of the oil remaining in many of the reservoirs. The recovery methods that are utilized to extract this oil are termed enhanced oil recovery or tertiary recovery (EOR). See Appendix B on Definitions and Appendix C for EOR Processes.

EOR could extend the recovery from Canada's established reserves of conventional oil by an estimated 4 billion barrels (636 million cubic metres) and thus make a significant contribution to this country meeting its own requirements for oil. The extent to which this potential is exploited, however, will depend upon the economic climate over the next few years, the critical period for capitalizing on this resource.

THE POTENTIAL OF EOR IN CANADA

1. Projections

In Canada, of the original oil-in-place discovered to date, excluding frontier regions and oil sands, a total of 9 billion barrels (1.4 billion cubic metres) has been produced and another 6 billion (1.0 billion cubic metres) is considered recoverable by primary and secondary recovery methods. Depending on the reservoir, about one-third to two-thirds of the light and medium oil and 90 per cent of the heavy oil originally in the reservoirs will not be recoverable with these conventional methods. It is to this large residual that enhanced oil recovery methods are directed. At the present time, the development of EOR in this country is in its infancy. See Appendix D for History and Status of EOR.

Evidence before the National Energy Board (NEB), which is currently revising its projections of future Canadian energy demand and supply, suggests that the potential for EOR has increased since its 1978 review. This optimism has been attributed to improvements in recovery technology and the prospects of higher oil prices, which have increased the number of oil reservoirs suitable for enhanced recovery. In 1978 the NEB, based on its analysis and on submissions by industry, projected a recovery of 2.7 billion barrels (434 million cubic metres) with some 60 or 70 per cent coming from deposits containing heavy crudes. In the preliminary figures available to the Board in its present study, estimates fall into a range depending on how the reserves base is calculated by individual companies and on assumptions concerning the timing of bringing economic projects into production. This time frame will depend on the financial outlook of individual EOR projects and on the availability of equipment, materials and manpower. The rate of technological advancement will also have an impact. Seven years is about the average time required to bring on-stream a large-scale project.

The NEB preliminary projections give a range of estimated reserves additions for each major EOR technique. As many pools are suitable for the application of more than one technique and because the economics of various techniques can change significantly with time, potential EOR reserves can readily shift from one EOR category to another. However, such changes should not affect the total EOR potential. Figures for total EOR potential are thus more meaningful than numbers on the potential of individual EOR techniques.

When enumerating total EOR potential it can be seen from Table 1 that the 1978 expected case for light crude oil of 1.0 billion barrels (156 million cubic metres) falls in the lower part of the range of the recent Board studies. The upper limit of 2.6 billion barrels (410 million cubic metres) is significantly higher than the 1978 high case of 1.6 billion barrels (259 million cubic metres), not shown here. The escalation for heavy oil is less dramatic. The 1978 expected case of 1.7 billion barrels (278 million cubic metres) falls only slightly above the middle of the new EOR potential of from 0.9 to 2.3 billion barrels (137 to 365 million cubic metres).

Other estimates presented to the Committee, some of which are also reflected in the NEB estimates, confirm the substantial potential that exists for enhanced oil recovery. They also confirm the sensitivity in the amount of oil that may actually be realized from enhanced oil recovery to the economic returns that oil producers may expect to realize. For example, IPAC, which speaks for independent Canadian producers, presented evidence from an analysis of 169 pools accounting for 60 per cent of Western Canada's conventional oil in place. It indicated a tripling of projected EOR production as the producers' total share of the wellhead price increased from $12 to $24, in 1980 dollars. An earlier study by J.P. Prince for the Canadian Energy Research Institute, in which all Alberta reservoirs were analyzed, obtained a similar response as the wellhead price, in 1978 dollars, increased from $15 to $25. At the high end of these ranges in each case, the estimate of the total amount that would be recovered through enhanced recovery methods in Canada was in the order of 4 billion barrels (636 million cubic metres).

The NEB preliminary estimates were made before details of the implementation of the incentives in the National Energy Program (NEP) for enhanced oil recovery had been clarified. The program proposed a tertiary reference price of $30.0/barrel in 1981. While certain companies believe that the new reference price is a move in the right direction, others assert that the Canadianization aspects and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax (PGRT) of 8 per cent detract from the favourable price provisions. As a consequence, many companies have reduced their estimates of the amount of oil that will be recovered through enhanced recovery. IPAC has stated that only 29 per cent of the technological EOR potential will be reached under the existing regulatory regime.

2. Constraints on EOR Development

(1) Technical Risks

While there is a large resource base to which EOR methods can be applied, enhanced recovery projects are difficult and costly, and the results do not become apparent until after most of the money has been invested. As a first step in examining potential EOR development, reservoirs are screened to determine which projects might be technically feasible and what EOR processes might be appropriate. Specific candidates are then evaluated as to the amount of oil that will be left after primary and secondary recovery, and the particular characteristics of the reservoir that will influence the amount of tertiary oil recovered. Because no two petroleum reservoirs are identical and the engineering data base is not complete until a pool is abandoned, there are many uncertainties in proceeding with reservoir development.

Technical risk arises from this complexity and uncertainty. Even though pool performance and recovery can now be estimated by computer modelling, the application of computer simulation and the process of scaling-up laboratory tests still result in large errors because of inadequate knowledge of the reservoir. Consequently, successful implementation of EOR schemes is by no means assured.

Pool performance must be promising to warrant the very large investment in wells, equipment and injection fluids for an EOR program. A large-scale tertiary recovery project may well entail two years for pilot design, testing and analysis, and up to five years from start to fluid injection, with production beginning in the seventh year.

The heavy "front-end" investment must be made before incremental oil begins to flow. This long lead time before knowledge begins to accumulate concerning reservoir response holds additional risk related to loss of injection fluids, well damage or adverse chemical reactions associated with certain EOR methods.

Companies will not invest in such technically risky and uncertain ventures unless the economics of the situation promise an adequate return on investment. For heavy oil, the technical risks have a special impact because the economics of exploration and primary and secondary development have always been more marginal than for light oil. The special concerns in enhanced recovery of heavy oil include lack of thickness in most of the reservoirs, as well as the technical problems associated with handling viscous crude.

(2) Economic Constraints

As stated above, investment in EOR ventures depends on the investor believing that he will recover his investment in enhanced recovery within a reasonable number of years. The price of the oil is only one of the factors influencing the investment decision. It is the netback—defined as the flow of revenue to the producer after the deduction of all government taxes and royalties, both provincial and federal, as well as operating expenses—which governs the inclination of the investor to proceed. In Canada, the low netbacks to the industry have up to now precluded all but the most attractive enhanced recovery projects.

This is why royalty and tax regimes, in addition to prospective prices, can play such an important part in influencing decisions to undertake what the oil industry considers to be high-risk investments. In EOR, because a return on investment is realized only after several years, a stable royalty, tax and pricing regime is essential. If the rules of the game are changed, a project that was economical when begun could turn uneconomical before the incremental oil begins to flow. Thus changes in revenue sharing and in government regulations can affect the business climate to such an extent that companies are not willing to take the risks involved in proceeding with EOR.

Not only must the investor face very high front-end costs but also the considerable uncertainty as to annual operating and additional capital costs during the life of the project. When coupled with the risks involved in accurately matching the process to suit the reservoir and in estimating the amount of oil that will be recovered, financing may also prove to be a considerable obstacle to EOR development, especially for the small independent operator.

Even with viable economics in an EOR project, producers must also have assured markets. One of the major problems in developing heavy oil is availability of markets. For the next few years continued access to export markets is essential. For the longer term, a combination of upgrading facilities in Western Canada and changes in refining facilities in Eastern Canada are required to make effective use of heavy oil in Canada.

(3) Other Obstacles to Accelerated EOR Development

There is general agreement that in the near term, miscible flooding offers the greatest potential for EOR in Canada in light oil reservoirs, as shown in Table 1. Our relatively more plentiful supply of natural gas and natural gas liquids would lend itself to a natural emphasis on hydrocarbon miscible processes. Nevertheless, there remains the possibility of using CO_2 as an injection fluid. In the latter case, CO_2 supply could be a constraint in the near term. This is because Western Canada does not have as ready access to CO_2 as does the U.S., where some major natural sources occur in relatively close proximity to oil reservoirs that are amenable to CO_2 flooding. Even if Canada does follow suit in the use of CO_2 as an injection fluid, its availability is not expected to present a constraint once heavy oil upgrading plants, oil sands plants and new fertilizer plants come on-stream since one of their by-products happens to be CO_2. The pipelining of CO_2 from the source to the oil field represents, however, a major investment.

The need for continued research and development could be a determining factor in the rate of implementation of large-scale commercial projects. While there is a considerable amount of industry and government-sponsored R&D going on in Canada relating to EOR technology, there is little evidence of long-range basic research being conducted through universities and research agencies at a level commensurate with Canada's EOR opportunities. For the research to be relevant and timely, it must be carried out to take account of Canadian reservoir conditions. Thus while U.S. technology is transferable, it may not always be appropriate. Some of the methods applicable, for instance, to the thick reservoirs typical of parts of California may not be transferable without adaptation to the thin reservoirs of certain fields of Saskatchewan.

The most critical constraining influence, however, is likely to be skilled manpower, especially in view of concurrent energy projects. EOR projects require significantly more engineering expertise than conventional oil recovery methods. Reservoir engineers and technicians require special training and experience in tertiary methods. Research chemists and chemical engineers with training in petroleum upgrading are also required. Full-scale initiation of enhanced recovery projects will increase the demand for people trained in these areas though the increase is difficult to quantify.

A significant amount of the required training is likely to be provided in-house by operators themselves. However, the level of activity envisaged by the Committee implies a need for a more substantial training effort. The lag in introducing formal training at the university level is likely to cause some delays in implementing projects. At the present time, only one university in Canada offers a degree in petroleum engineering. Universities and technical schools need to be alerted to this problem to prevent costly delays caused by skilled manpower shortages.

FINDINGS

1. The Business Climate

A foregoing section has outlined the potential offered by accelerated EOR development if the hindrances posed by technical and economic risks can be overcome. The Committee is convinced that certain conditions must exist before companies will turn increased attention to enhanced oil recovery.

A low price for oil works against EOR development and, although domestic crude oil prices have increased substantially in recent years, so have the costs of goods and services in the petroleum sector. The industry maintains that potential profitability remains poor when account is taken of the risks involved and the large investments required. The industry considers EOR development to be more of a risk in some ways than oil sands extraction or frontier development. Conditions in each reservoir vary so greatly that years of work may be required to design the right recovery technique. In such circumstances, the willingness to proceed depends in the final analysis on the anticipated netback. Producers have indicated that the average netback that existed before the National Energy Program would have to double for a significant fraction of the EOR potential to be realized.

Current tertiary production of light and heavy oils at about 14 thousand barrels/day (2 thousand cubic metres/day) contrasts with the estimate that such output could reach 283 thousand barrels/day (45 thousand cubic metres/day) in 1990 under optimum conditions. This represents a rapid implementation of EOR projects; however, the output by 1990 might only be one-quarter of this potential. The level of activity is clearly related to the extent to which the business climate fosters such activity. From the interest in enhanced recovery demonstrated by companies in their submissions to this Committee and to the National Energy Board, the Committee is led to conclude that the time is opportune for accelerated EOR activity.

Spurred on by the need for oil self-sufficiency, the attractiveness of exploiting a known resource, and the expectation of higher returns, companies are considering whether to push ahead with such schemes today. This new willingness is seen in the expert teams assembled to plan and develop projects such as Judy Creek and in the number of pilot projects ready to commence. Many of the reservoirs, however, are operated by multinationals who stand to lose under the NEP unless they can increase their Canadian content and thus benefit to the maximum from incentive payments. In the present uncertainty, momentum may be lost.

2. The Role of Incentives

Even though EOR promises to increase Canada's indigenous oil supplies, it is evident that enhanced recovery will only be attempted if the economic climate is favourable. It is the Committee's view that government policy sets the tone for development. Consequently, pricing policy must recognize the risks involved and must help to create the rewards necessary to encourage these risky ventures. There is no doubt the National Energy Program offers certain incentives—as outlined along with fiscal measures provided by the provinces in Appendix E—thereby recognizing the part EOR can play in Canada's energy goals.

Before the NEP, as has been noted, there was little sustained EOR development except for the most economically attractive projects; at that time, planning had started on a number of additional projects. Economic projections for these schemes were based on a variety of expectations as to how rapidly wellhead prices would rise from the then current $16.75 per barrel. The $30.00 tertiary oil reference price (with projected escalation at the rate of increase of the Consumer Price Index) by itself would have encouraged a significant boost in EOR activity. Analysis of prospective costs and netbacks presented to the Committee, however, indicate that when coupled with other measures in the NEP—such as the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax, changes in the depletion allowance, and the Canadianization program—it is questionable whether the $30.00 tertiary oil reference price will be sufficient to encourage a substantial increase in EOR in view of the risks in extracting oil by these relatively new methods. To match the risks that accompany enhanced oil recovery, the Committee believes that tertiary oil must be treated in the same manner as that from the oil sands and be accorded the same price. Another alternative would be to remove the PGRT on incremental oil from approved EOR projects until capital costs have been recovered. In addition, the producing provinces could further adjust their royalty rates and provide other incentives to stimulate tertiary recovery.

It is realized that a tertiary supplement is an appropriate vehicle to achieve the tertiary oil reference price. The Committee also considers that the method of application of the tertiary reference price is of utmost importance since it should allow producers an earlier return on investment for projects with long lead times, high initial capital expenditures and technical risk. If the supplement is only paid as the incremental barrels are produced—which may be a number of years after the project is initiated—companies will not be able to benefit from the favourable price at the time they most need it. In contrast, the fixed proportion method assigns a factor to the oil produced from a tertiary project based on the ratio of the tertiary recoverable reserves to the total recoverable reserves. The factor is fixed under usual provincial practice for the life of the project but could be reviewed on the basis of production performance. This method thus provides an earlier return on investments. For heavy oil below 15° to 16° API, where there is little primary and secondary production, it would benefit the economics and administration of EOR projects for the entire production to qualify for the tertiary oil reference price.

One of the highest costs in many EOR projects is expenditure on hydrocarbon injection materials. It is the Committee's view that the PGRT should not be applicable to natural gas or natural gas liquids used as injection materials in EOR projects.

BENEFITS TO CANADA

Enhanced recovery offers a means of reducing Canada's dependence on insecure offshore supplies of increasingly expensive oil. If action is not taken soon, some of these incremental oil supplies may be lost forever as the costs of extraction escalate; enhanced recovery cannot be initiated too late in a reservoir's producing life. Furthermore, EOR may be less expensive at the present time than some of the energy alternatives being considered in Canada. It certainly can be brought into the market more quickly than a number of these alternatives.

Since the energy crisis of late 1973 and Canada's subsequent emphasis on self-sufficiency in energy resources, a lot of attention has been directed to new sources of oil and gas, not only from the oil sands but also from the Arctic and offshore. With escalating development and production costs, and difficulties in transportation, however, these sources are less accessible and probably more costly than relying on augmented conventional supplies.

The technical expertise arising from research activities and special training can be transferred in substantial measure from EOR development to, for example, oil sands development. The earlier this specialized knowledge is made available, the better Canada's energy future will be.

Primary and secondary recovery efficiencies are not good enough in the oil business today. Detailed reservoir studies often reveal the opportunity to boost recovery efficiency through enhanced production schemes. These improved recovery techniques can also be applied in developing production strategies for newly-discovered pools to increase the recovery rate at an earlier stage. Similarly, these techniques should improve future recoverability in frontier applications and certain types of EOR technology have relevance for oil sands development. As the understanding of these complex recovery processes increases and more detailed engineering information on reservoirs is collected, a range of applications not anticipated originally may become apparent.

In summary, enhanced oil recovery can augment Canada's energy supplies until such time as alternative supplies such as oil sands or frontier petroleum resources are available. Its accessibility and known quantity should not be ignored and it is essential that measures be taken to achieve its ultimate potential.

DEFINITIONS

Oil reservoirs are volumes of porous rock holding water, oil and gas under pressure. Drilling a well into an oil reservoir releases the pressure so that initially the oil comes to the surface by means of this natural pressure inherent in the oil reservoir. Sometimes pumps are used to supplement the natural reservoir pressure in lifting the oil to the surface. The average recovery factor, that is, the percentage of the original oil-in-place that is produced at this primary stage, is roughly 22 per cent.

Secondary recovery entails maintaining reservoir pressure by artificial means, such as the injection of water or gas into the reservoir. This acts to displace the oil towards the producing wells and can add about 50 per cent to recoverable oil reserves, bringing the average recovery factor up to some 33 per cent. This average recovery factor pertains to light and medium oil reservoirs. It is much lower in heavy oil reservoirs.

Tertiary recovery is directed at the two-thirds of the initial oil still in place, termed residual oil. This recovery method improves the overall displacement process, first of all, by contacting more of the reservoir and, secondly, by improving the efficiency of the displacement process by which the oil is captured out of the pores of the rock. Tertiary methods work by improving the sweep efficiency and by altering the properties of the oil itself, thereby increasing its recoverability.

The term "enhanced recovery" is used to differentiate the process from a conventional one whether this process is used at the primary, secondary or tertiary phase so that the definition accepted by the industry is "the additional recovery of oil from a petroleum reservoir over that which can be economically recovered by conventional primary and secondary methods."

APPENDIX C

ENHANCED OIL RECOVERY (EOR) PROCESSES

(1) Thermal Processes

Steam injection is the most widely employed EOR process and is mainly applied in heavy oil recovery where it is used in California and Venezuela. Its use on a major scale is also planned in Canada's Cold Lake and Peace River oil sands deposits, and in approximately 10 per cent of the heavy oil reservoirs of the Lloydminster region. The conventional heavy oil reserves of Alberta and Saskatchewan have a limited potential for steam processes as most of the oil occurs in thin deposits. Heat loss to the over and underlying formations makes steam injection impractical in thin oil deposits.

Steam injection reduces the viscosity of the oil through heating and facilitates production either by the method of steam stimulation or by steam drive. In steam stimulation, the same well is used for both injection and production, on a cyclic basis. Steam is injected for a period of time followed by a "soaking period" after which the less viscous oil is produced. This process is called cyclic steam injection or "huff and puff". Where a pattern of wells is used in which steam is injected in one or more wells, displacing the heated oil to adjacent producing wells, the process is called steam drive or steam flooding.

Fireflooding or in situ combustion is a process whereby the oil in the reservoir is ignited and the fire is sustained by air injection. The unburnt portion of the oil becomes less viscous, is partially vapourized, and is driven towards a production well by a combination of steam, hot water and gas drive. In a modified method, air and water are injected alternately or concurrently, improving the efficiency of the operation. It is therefore the preferred method if the formation at the injection wells is sufficiently permeable to permit the combined injection of water and air.

The in situ combustion process has also been extensively field tested; however, it is technically complex and difficult both to predict and to control. Of the 26 active field tests operating in the U.S. in 1976, eight were termed successful, nine unsuccessful, and the remainder were under evaluation. Fireflooding is frequently assumed to be the only method applicable to Alberta and Saskatchewan conventional heavy oil reserves as it is the only known process that will recover heavy oil in these deposits. About 90 per cent of Lloydminster heavy oil is in deposits less than seven metres thick.

(2) Miscible Processes

Miscible processes are those in which an injected fluid dissolves in the oil it contacts, forming a single oil-like liquid that can flow through the reservoir more easily than the original crude oil. The miscible displacement process overcomes the capillary forces that otherwise retain oil in pores of the rock. A variety of fluids can be injected depending upon reservoir characteristics, the nature of the crude oil-in-place and the availability of fluids. Carbon dioxide and liquid petroleum gases (LPGs) such as ethane, propane and butane are the most widely used. In this process a "slug" of the injection fluid, which varies from 5 to 20 per cent of the reservoir pore volume, is often displaced through the reservoir by gas (natural gas or nitrogen) or water. The injected fluids are partially recoverable from the produced crude oil and may be reinjected to decrease the injection fluid requirements of the project.

A number of hydrocarbon miscible flood projects are operating in Alberta and a CO_2 miscible flood has been proposed by Imperial Oil for the Judy Creek A pool. It has been estimated that CO_2 miscible flooding will account for 40 per cent of future tertiary produced oil in the U.S.

Limiting factors are the availability and cost of injection fluids. In Alberta and Saskatchewan, however, a large supply of natural gas liquids is still available which, coupled with limited availability of pure and cheap CO_2, may encourage hydrocarbon miscible flooding in future projects. Larger volumes of CO_2 will be available from new synthetic oil plants and other sources in the late 1980s.

(3) Chemical Processes

Three main chemical flooding methods are currently under investigation: surfactant/polymer, polymer and alkaline flooding. These processes are the least proven of the three general classes of EOR methods. They rely on an ability to control the propagation of one or more chemical slugs through the reservoir without their becoming excessively diluted and ineffective. The high-cost chemical slug must therefore be precisely designed to be compatible with the particular reservoir oil-water-rock system and formulating the right chemical flood is a very complex process.

A number of major pilot tests of surfactant/polymer flooding are underway in the U.S. to assess their technical and economic feasibility. Seven of these tests are joint industry-government efforts, in which a total of $122 million is being spent. Surfactant/polymer flooding (also known as micro-emulsion and micellar flooding) is a process in which detergent-like materials are injected as a slug of fluid to lower the interfacial tension between the reservoir oil and water. The process emulsifies or otherwise dissolves the oil within the formation. It is a one-pass process where irregular movement of the polymer/water drive can greatly reduce recovery. Polymers have also been used simply to augment waterflooding, a method employed commercially on a limited basis in both the United States and Canada.

Only a few field tests have been reported on caustic or alkaline flooding. There are currently two large pilot tests of alkaline flooding for tertiary oil being conducted in California under joint sponsorship of the field operator and the U.S. Department of Energy. Caustic or alkaline flooding relies on the presence of certain constituents in the crude oil which react with injected caustic solutions to produce detergent-like materials and improve oil mobility. It has an advantage over surfactant floods in that the chemicals required are not expensive. It is a high risk process, however, which is only applicable where the crude oil has suitable chemical properties.

APPENDIX D

HISTORY AND STATUS OF EOR IN CANADA

EOR in Canada dates to a time when crude oil productive capacity far surpassed domestic and export demand. Oversupply led to a system of allocating producing volumes according to identified reserves, which encouraged supplementing reserves by means of secondary and tertiary recovery schemes.

Some of the early schemes were miscible flood schemes. One was commenced in 1963 by Imperial in the Golden Spike reef and another by Mobil and Amoco in the same year in the Pembina Cardium sandstones. The Pembina horizontal flood was prematurely abandoned in 1969 because of early breakthrough of the miscible slug into the producing wells. However, the success of Imperial Oil's LPG vertical miscible displacement, which continued at Golden Spike reef until 1978, encouraged the same method in the first Rainbow reef in 1968, and there are presently 13 commercial-scale Rainbow EOR projects operating.

A large LPG miscible flood was commenced in 1970 in the Wizard Lake D-3 reef and injection in this pool continues. Wizard Lake is a commercial-scale operation. An even larger miscible flood is being conducted in the Swan Hills South pool where injection started in 1973. The latter flood is of the horizontal type which proved less successful in Pembina. However, to prevent premature breakthrough of injected hydrocarbons, LPG injection is alternated with injection of water and this appears to be successful. It is one of the larger commercial-scale projects presently operating in Canada.

More recently, in 1977, a large-scale miscible flood using ethane was implemented in the Willesden Green Cardium A pool. Initial production performance indicates that this project has responded favourably to the injection of ethane. Subsequent injection of nitrogen will help recover most of the ethane.

The project of Esso Resources to implement a CO_2 flood in the Judy Creek field, which has been approved by the Alberta Energy Resources Conservation Board (AERCB), is presently being re-evaluated by its sponsor.

While the main economic targets for EOR have been light and medium oil pools suited to miscible flooding, some progress has been made with respect to heavy oil. Thermal techniques are the most successful in heavy oil pools. Mobil Oil has effectively improved heavy oil recovery through in situ combustion with air injection. The first project was started in the Battrum field in Saskatchewan in 1965 and injection is continuing. The air supplies oxygen for burning part of the oil in place. Since 1978, injecting water in conjuction with the combustion process has improved production performance. The experience gained in Mobil's commercial-scale fireflood projects at Battrum in Saskatchewan will no doubt benefit similar projects currently being considered for heavy oil pools in the Lloydminster area. The method is suitable for heavy crudes found in eastern Alberta and western Saskatchewan, and indeed in situ combustion pilots in the Lloydminster area have already yielded a range of results.

In addition to these commercial-scale schemes, there are a number of field pilots operating in Canada. Most of the emphasis has been on heavy oil pilot tests where steam processes have been tested under a variety of conditions. Mechanical problems have prevented sustained rates of high volume production for the relatively thin oil deposits in Canada. The success of steam injection techniques in California has led to technological advances in the design of steam generators. A downhole steam generator currently under development has the potential to open up deeper reservoirs for steam flooding by reducing heat losses.

This historical outline has concentrated on a description of commercial-scale EOR developments. There are also a number of experimental-scale projects in operation in Alberta and Saskatchewan evaluating various tertiary recovery processes. Table 1 indicates the numbers and types of EOR projects in Canada.

APPENDIX E

FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL FISCAL MEASURES AFFECTING EOR*

(1) Federal Measures

The National Energy Program was presented to Parliament on October 28, 1980. It specifies a wellhead oil price schedule which is dependent on the source of the oil as shown in Table 1. A special incentive price is provided for oil produced using approved tertiary enhanced recovery methods. A "tertiary supplement" which is additional to the conventional oil wellhead price will be paid by the Government of Canada to qualifying producers. For example, as of January 1, 1981 the supplement will be approximately $14.00/barrel, applied equally to all qualities of crude oil. For a company producing a representative 15° API gravity crude oil through approved tertiary methods, the total wellhead price (the tertiary reference price) as of January 1, 1981 is approximately $30.00/barrel. The tertiary reference price will be adjusted annually by the Consumer Price Index.

Implementation of this tertiary recovery incentive depends upon agreement with the oil-producing provinces. The Federal Government has stated that in order to ensure that the incentive has the intended stimulative effect it will be offered only in provinces that maintain, or preferably, enrich existing fiscal incentives for tertiary production.

Prior to the National Energy Program, the income tax system allowed taxpayers to claim a deduction, called the depletion allowance, equal to 33 1/3 per cent of oil and gas exploration and development expenditures. Expenditures on enhanced oil recovery equipment earned depletion at a rate of 50 per cent of those expenditures. The National Energy Program modified the depletion allowances and introduced the Petroleum Incentives Progam which is summarized in Table 2.

* Appendix E draws mainly on the Brief presented by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to the Special Senate Committee on January 20, 1981.

* Subject to cap of international price.

 In later years, the price for tertiary recovery oil will depend upon the price for conventional oil. As the price for conventional oil approaches that for tertiary recovery, price differentials will develop to reflect quality differences, i.e., the cost of upgrading. The price of tertiary recovery oil will never be less than the price for conventional oil of a similar quality.

A modification to the Canadian ownership rules pertaining to the new incentive payments was announced on February 16, 1981.

A new Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax is to be imposed with the rate set initially at 8 per cent of net operating revenues related to the production of oil and gas, including income from oil and gas royalty interests. Deductions for exploration and development expenditures, capital cost allowances, royalties, and interest will not be allowed. Operating costs, including the cost of materials injected into a reservoir for oil recovery enhancement will, however, be an allowable deduction. The tax will not be deductible for income tax purposes and will be applicable to net operating revenues earned in 1981 and thereafter.

A new Excise Tax on Gas and Natural Gas Liquids of 30¢/Mcf (thousand cubic feet) was instituted effective November 1, 1980 except for export sales, which become subject to the tax on February 1, 1981. It will increase by a further 15¢/Mcf on July 1, 1981 and by 15¢/Mcf on January 1, 1982 and January 1, 1983. Gas reinjected into a natural reservoir in Canada for purposes other than storage, would not be subject to the tax. Gas injected into a reservoir to displace a solvent bank in a miscible flood project, for example, would not be subject to the tax. Natural gas liquids (ethane, propane and butane) will be taxed, when they are first removed from a gas processing or reprocessing facility, initially at a rate equivalent to 30¢/Mcf of natural gas. This tax rate will rise to the equivalent of 75¢/Mcf by January 1, 1983. An exemption from this tax for NGLs used in a miscible flood project was announced on January 22, 1981.

(2) Provincial Fiscal Systems

Alberta

Alberta crown production of oil is subject to two royalty schemes, for 'old' and 'new' production, with lower royalty rates applying to new production. New production is essentially that portion of production from a pool developed after the beginning of 1974. Additional production from an enhanced recovery scheme approved after January 1, 1974 qualifies as new oil.

Where an enhanced recovery scheme has been approved by the Alberta Energy Resources Conservation Board and if the Minister of Energy and Natural Resources is satisfied that the cost attributable to the implementation and operation of the enhanced recovery scheme exceeds the cost of a waterflood scheme in the same field or pool, further royalty relief may be granted. This relief takes two forms. A royalty rebate may be allowed for the cost of natural gas liquids injected for oil recovery enhancement in a field subject to a maximum in any month of 5 per cent of the royalty payable on petroleum produced from the field in that month. In addition, a deduction is allowed from gross oil revenue otherwise subject to royalty in respect of the cost of incremental capital, injected materials, other incremental costs of operating the enhanced recovery project and on overhead allowance equal to 10 per cent of the incremental costs to allow for overhead and interest expense during construction.

Saskatchewan

The Saskatchewan fiscal system consists of two parts: A Crown Oil Royalty payable on Crown lands, and an Oil Well Income Tax payable on both Crown and freehold production.

Saskatchewan also differentiates between old oil and new oil in determining the royalty payable to the Crown. 'Incremetal oil' is the incremental oil produced after the year 1973 from an oil pool with respect to a new or expanded waterflood project, thermal recovery project or other enhanced recovery project and is considered as new oil for purposes of royalty calculations. The royalty rate on incremental oil from enhanced oil recovery projects is 70 per cent of the royalty rate on old oil.

All oil well income is also subject to the oil well income tax with the exception of royalty revenues to mineral owners of producing tracts aggregating 1,280 acres or less. The oil well income tax rate is presently 59 per cent. The amount of royalty paid to the Crown is deducted from the oil well tax otherwise payable. Deductions for the purpose of determining the income subject to the tax are permitted under the system for several classes of expense. One of these classes is the 'new oil allowance' which is based on the proportion of the person's revenues from new oil production relative to revenue from all oil production, subject to a maximum of 30 per cent of total oil well income. This deduction provides an incentive for increased production of new oil.

Every barrel of oil a producer generates in Saskatchewan is credited with 80¢ in an approved expenditure grant account. For each dollar expended on qualified activities, one of which is the drilling of tertiary recovery wells, 75¢ is remitted to the investor from the Saskatchewan Heritage Fund.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, April 7, 1981

The Senate met at 8 p.m., the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C., Speaker pro tem, in the Chair.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR GODFREY

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege.

On Thursday, April 2, Senator Lawson stated in this chamber:

> I think Senator Godfrey owes me a personal apology. More important than that, I think Senator Godfrey owes this chamber an apology for violating the long-standing rule against making personal attacks on other honourable senators, which is an important rule and should be observed.

My reference to Senator Lawson having only graced this chamber with his presence on nine different occasions last year, and not being a member of any committee, was a simple statement of fact about the performance of his duties as a senator. That is no more a breach of the rules of the Senate than Senator Flynn's drawing to the attention of the chamber from time to time that some minister is, or has been, absent.

Senator Lawson says that attendance in this chamber is none of my business. Well, I think I had better advise Senator Lawson that it is very much the business of every member of this chamber, which he will find out when we resume the debate on the report and recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the reform of the Senate.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1981-82

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-59 to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Allister Grosart: Leave is not granted, as far as I am concerned, until a reason is given.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance conducted a pre-study of this bill, and reported to the chamber in March. In light of the business on the order paper tonight, we are hoping it can be given second reading this evening. Honourable senators have had some notice of the existence of the bill; it is not exactly being sprung on the house this evening. That is the reason why we are asking leave.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—NEGOTIATIONS RE PROCEDURE IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if my understanding is correct that in the other place they are negotiating an agreement as to the method of dealing with the Constitution debate.

If such is the case, would it be the view of the Leader of the Government that we should wait until those negotiations are completed before continuing with the debate on the motion for an Address.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is my understanding that peace may break out at any time.

Seriously, I understand that there have been useful conversations this afternoon. I have not as yet heard that any final agreement has been achieved, but I would agree with the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition that perhaps, under the circumstances, we should proceed to other business until we find out what has transpired in the all-party negotiations and discussions.

Senator Flynn: I would suggest that my motion also stand.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

WESTERN CANADA—IMPROVEMENT OF TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development.

The Premier of Alberta has reaffirmed his offer of last July to the Prime Minister, namely, that Alberta is prepared to spend $2 billion on western transportation improvements, but only if an agreement on energy is reached.

The questions that arise out of that, in no particular order, are, first, as to whether the government has decided that it will assume responsibility for this spending, should it be unable to reach an agreement with Alberta. Secondly, would the funds, if the government did pick up all or a portion of that sum, come from the Western Development Fund? Thirdly, what other prospective Western Development Fund projects would be sacrificed if the government in fact did that?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, those are rather hypothetical questions, but I think my honourable friend cannot help knowing that the government intends to see that there is an adequate transportation system in western Canada, whether or not there is a western initiative fund or any other revenue that he has specifically identified for that purpose.

Senator Nurgitz: I do not think that was much of an answer.

Senator Olson: It was not much of a question either.

Senator Nurgitz: What I am after, specifically, is this. People in western Canada are anxious to have such things as improved transportation. There is an offer on the table of $2 billion from the Province of Alberta, which will not be acted on by that province unless and until an agreement is reached. Are we to assume that pending the reaching of an agreement no development projects will be taken up at all by the federal government?

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators, it is not fair to reach that conclusion, because it is not only contrary to the indications that have been put out but is also contrary to the facts. There is very significant development taking place right now. Construction is under way, with the objective of significantly increasing the capability of the railway line running west of Edmonton to Prince Rupert and to the lower mainland ports. There is also significant construction under way in many sectors on the southern railway line through the mountains. It is therefore not fair to say that these things are not under way right now.

There are some commitments that should be made soon with respect to the twinning of the Connaught Tunnel by what I think is going to be called the Beaver Tunnel. Commitments to begin construction should be made soon. In my opinion, it is erroneous for the honourable senator or anyone else to contend that there is no construction going on or no action being taken. As a matter of fact, the construction that is already under way on the northern route will lead, within a reasonable time, to an almost 100 per cent increase in the capability of that transportation system.

Senator Nurgitz: I have a supplementary question. Is it fair to say that none of those particular projects are ones that would have been earmarked by the Province of Alberta for inclusion in its $2 billion expenditure?

Senator Olson: I guess my honourable friend can identify them as being separate, but in those areas where the federal government has the responsibility to maintain, and to increase the capability of, the transportation system it is my view that the federal government should continue to assume that responsibility.

Senator Nurgitz: May I ask one final supplementary question? Has the government undertaken any form of study to determine what impact, if any, there would be in the western provinces if Alberta did not invest any of that proposed amount of $2 billion in the event of an energy agreement not being reached?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would expect that the Province of Alberta will continue to undertake transportation requirements for both maintaining and increasing the capacity of those areas that are within provincial jurisdiction. We have no reason to expect that they are not going to do that.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a precise and concise question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning a matter of great importance in the bilateral relationships between Canada and the United States. We learned today that the one existing member of the International Joint Commission went to a place in Canada for a meeting of that commission. Since there was only one out of six members available, and one is not a quorum, the meeting did not take place. Can the leader advise—and this follows a question I raised some days ago—as to whether the Government of Canada is giving any thought to the completion of its section of the International Joint Commission. Further, are there any discussions between the government and the Government of the United States as to that government's making its appointments so that the many difficult and challenging problems facing our two countries along that much-heralded border may be dealt with by this important body?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the matter of the composition of the International Joint Commission is the subject of a great deal of governmental attention these days. There may be an announcement shortly with respect to Canadian representation on that body.

QUEBEC

PARTICIPATION OF CABINET MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT IN ELECTION CAMPAIGN

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government.

It has been announced that the Prime Minister of Canada as well as other personalities of the federal government would attend this evening the premiere of "Les Plouffe", by Roger Lemelin. Can the Leader of the Government tell us if this is how the Prime Minister of Canada has chosen to participate in the election campaign in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister is a long-time patron of the arts whether it be music, drama, painting or films. I am sure that the mission is—

Senator Flynn: What is her name?

Senator Perrault: —purely cultural, to advance the cause of the arts in this country.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a supplementary. Since several federal ministers and members of Parliament took part in the election campaign in Quebec last week, does the Leader of the Government know—or must I tell him—that this participation will promote the cause of the Parti Québécois instead of helping Mr. Ryan get elected because the people of Quebec are suspicious of the promises made by the federal government during the referendum campaign?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the ministers from the province of Quebec who serve with this government travel very frequently to that province in the fulfillment of their responsibilities as ministers. I find it rather unworthy that the Honourable Senator Asselin would read into these visits anything which is not to the total benefit of the province and the country. Like the Prime Minister, many of them are very interested in demonstrating their strong support, as well, for the arts in Canada.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I have another supplementary. Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether it has been decided that the federal government will get involved as a government in the election campaign in Quebec?

• (2020)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have seen no evidence which would support that contention.

Senator Flynn: Nobody has.

Senator Smith: Nobody wants to.

THE ECONOMY

STATUS OF ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. On January 15 I asked the minister for some information regarding the Atlantic Development Council. At that time the minister took the question as notice. In his reply on January 21 he agreed that a meeting had not been held since September 1979, that there was no chairman, and that the number of board members had diminished to, I believe, five.

I understand that to date no meeting has been held. The staff is still sitting in the offices in St. John's without direction because a chairman has not yet been appointed and the vacancies on the board have not been filled. Can the minister tell us of the government's intentions with regard to that particular agency?

The function of this agency is to advise DREE on the programs and policies of that department as they relate to Atlantic Canada. It is difficult for the agency to fulfill this function when there is no chairman and no meetings have been held.

I certainly agree with the point raised by Senator McElman concerning the appointment of Atlantic Canadians to national boards, when the government is not even capable of finding a chairman and members of the board for the Atlantic Development Council.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, discounting the comments that are not relevant to the question—

Senator Perrault: There is nothing left.

Senator Olson: —there is not much left, but I will take the question as notice and make some inquiries.

THE SENATE

USE OF DESIGNATION "M.P." BY SENATORS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I notice in communications from the minister's office which I received the other day—and, in fact, it has been drawn to my attention by several members of the other place—that the minister has taken to using the initials "M.P." after his name. I, of course, realize that senators are members of one of the houses of Parliament, and in that sense I suppose the initials "M.P.", standing for Member of Parliament, are not incorrect. However, it has always been my impression that, in our country, those initials are used exclusively by members of the House of Commons. The minister, who is such a stickler for the rules if not for parliamentary etiquette, I presume, has come armed with a long list of precedents for his action.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am really not so concerned about the matter that I would come armed with a long list of precedents. I do know that section 17 of the British North America Act says:

> There shall be One Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

That section makes no distinction between a member of Parliament who is a member of the House of Commons and a member of Parliament who is a member of the Senate. I am trying to correct an anomaly which has existed in this country—

Senator Flynn: You mean, in Alberta.

Senator Olson: —for many years, and that is the distinction between the designation "senator" and the designation "M.P.". If the members of the other place wish to be distinct, perhaps they could call themselves members of the House of Commons, just as we call ourselves members of the Senate.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator Asselin: They call themselves Members of Parliament.

Senator Olson: There should be no distinction, in terms of designation, between senators and M.P.'s. For that reason, I intend to call myself a Member of Parliament, which I am. The initials "M.P." stand for Member of Parliament. Therefore, I have no confusion whatever on this matter. If my honourable friend or the complainants in the other place contend that according to tradition the use of the initials "M.P." is to be confined to members of Parliament of the House of Commons, they are wrong, in my view. I intend to begin a campaign to correct this anomaly, and I invite other members of Parliament of this chamber to follow my lead.

Senator Asselin: This is a matter for the Constitution.

Senator Murray: I gather, then, that your initiative is supported and will be imitated by a great number of senators.

Senator Olson: I hope so.

Senator Murray: Is the minister aware of any other instances in which senators have actually used the initials "M.P." in the past?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not aware of such instances. I can research the matter, but my honourable friend can also do that, if he wishes. To me, it is not important. What is important is the fact that senators have always been and will continue to be members of Parliament. The distinction has arisen because of the failure of members of the Senate to use the initials "M.P." My action is a way of correcting the situation.

• (2025)

Senator Murray: With great respect, the title "Senator" indicates that a person is a member of the Senate and, therefore, a member of one of the houses of Parliament. Can the minister say whether in the United Kingdom, for example, members of the House of Lords use the initials "M.P." after their names and if not, whether he knows why not?

Senator Olson: I cannot see any relationship between the practice there and the practice here.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I know that there is a precise distinction that the members of the other house may use, and that is members of the House of Commons. We are members of the Senate, but we, the members of both houses, are all members of Parliament.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: That is the point I am trying to make.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): As a supplementary, would the minister tell us when he started using the initials "M.P."?

Senator Olson: I started using them after June 10, 1957.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: No; I mean since the minister came to the Senate.

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I cannot give you the precise date, but I can tell you that I did use those initials long before I was in the ministry.

Senator Flynn: Oh no.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, can the minister tell us whether the Prime Minister places the same value upon a person who is a member of this house and one who is a member of the House of Commons, so that he would believe that they should be designated in the same manner and appear to be equal?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend can address his question to the Prime Minister. What he is seeking is the Prime Minister's opinion on a matter that is not really related to government business. I suggest that he write him a letter.

Senator Donahoe: It would be a good opportunity, but it is very difficult to get the Prime Minister to stay still on the same question for very long.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—NEGOTIATIONS RE PROCEDURE IN HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. Is he in a position to inform the members of this chamber as to whether, at the meeting that took place this afternoon in the other place among the house leaders, any progress was made towards relieving the procedural impasse regarding the Constitution?

An Hon. Senator: You are late.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was in the gallery in the other place when the first meeting was called, and I was there when the bells rang. Mr. Pinard, Mr. Baker and Mr. Knowles all said that they were making real progress and that they were going to meet again this evening. The Leader of the Government has been in communication with them this evening, so he can tell us whether they are continuing to make progress.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a few minutes ago I had a telephone call from the Honourable Yvon Pinard, and we discussed the situation. I can report that there were friendly and constructive meetings held today. No final arrangements have been made, but the talks have been useful and constructive.

Senator Asselin: It is a retreat.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—NORTH SYDNEY TO ARGENTIA FERRY SERVICE

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. During the past few days in Newfoundland there has been quite a lot of concern expressed by various groups, such as the St. John's Tourist Commission, the Brotherhood of Railway Clerks and others, over the report that the east coast ferry service running from North Sydney to Argentia will be discontinued after this year. Were this to happen, it would indeed be a tragic occurrence. Can the minister put those fears to rest and say that it is not so?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question must be taken as notice, as I do not have the information immediately to hand.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE SINAI—CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN U.N. PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government advise the Senate whether the government knows if one of the purposes of the visit of Secretary of State Haig to the Middle East was to discuss the establishment of a peacekeeping force in the Middle East to be located in the Sinai? Has the Government of Canada in any way been approached by the United Nations, the United States, Israel or Egypt to contribute a presence to a possible peacekeeping force in the Sinai?

• (2030)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we are aware that discussions are taking place between the parties to the Camp David Accords concerning the proposed multinational peacekeeping force for the Sinai.

As we understand it, no firm decisions on the organization and functions of the force have yet been taken. The force is still in the planning stage. It will only begin to function in April 1982, when Israel is scheduled to complete its evacuation of the Sinai.

I can report that Canada has not been involved in discussions concerning planning for the force. This is the responsibility of the United States, Israel and Egypt. As yet, Canada has not been requested to participate in the force. If and when we do receive such a request, it will be given careful consideration.

As for the other information requested by Senator Austin with respect to the visit by the U.S. Secretary of State, General Haig, to the Middle East, that will be taken as notice and, hopefully, there will be a reply available later this week.

POLAND—THREAT OF RUSSIAN INVASION

Hon. Martial Asselin: Is the Leader of the Government in a position to report to the Senate any up-to-date information concerning the situation in Poland? Would he also address himself to the question: What is the possibility of the Soviet army invading Poland?

Would he also tell this Chamber whether anything has transpired as a result of the meeting between officials of the Soviet Union and officials of the satellite country, Czechoslovakia?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information about the situation in Poland which I would be pleased to relay to honourable senators. I do not have an official reaction from the Government of Canada with respect to statements attributed to Mr. Brezhnev at the meeting in Czechoslovakia.

However, I can say that we have noted the statements by Secretary Weinberger of the United States that the situation regarding Poland has worsened. Although Soviet media criticism of events in Poland has increased, in our view a military intervention by the Soviet Union is neither imminent nor inevitable.

The military exercises presently being conducted in the countries bordering on Poland have increased Soviet intervention capabilities, although all of the measures that would need to be taken for any major intervention have not been observed. The exercises would appear to be designed to serve the dual purpose of exerting psychological pressure and advancing military preparedness. Evidence does not suggest, however, that the number of troops involved exceeds the ceiling for prior notification under the Helsinki Final Act, nor has there been any solid indication that a political decision to intervene has been taken.

We do not think that western statements or actions which suggest the imminence or inevitability of a Soviet military intervention in Poland are particularly useful. They not only needlessly contribute to the escalation of tension levels, but are inimical to Poland's sovereignty and independence by suggesting that Polish events pose such a threat to the interests of the Soviet Union that that country is compelled to intervene.

We are not interested in offering to the Soviet Union rationales for an invasion, nor do we see the need to convene emergency sessions of NATO for the sake of appearances.

NATO continues to monitor developments closely and to advise capitals accordingly; East-West diplomatic channels remain open and are used to relay our position to the East European leadership—and in this connection I would mention Mr. Genscher's talks in Moscow, the recent discussions in Budapest involving the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister's meeting with the Soviet Ambassador here in Ottawa; and western states proceed with economic assistance for Poland. It is through these pragmatic actions that Canada and other western states can best contribute to a peaceful evolution of Polish events.

I have further information about the possible convening of a NATO meeting, if honourable senators would like a report on that situation.

We are concerned with the escalation of tension in Poland, as I have said, but we expect that the government and the labour unions will continue to find peaceful and pragmatic solutions to their differences.

We must reiterate that, in our view, the events in Poland are an internal matter for the Poles to settle freely themselves without external interference on coercion. The convening of emergency sessions of NATO or, for that matter, the Warsaw Pact at this stage, detracts from the essential domestic nature of Polish developments and the sovereign right of the Polish people to conduct their own affairs. Consequently, we do not think that such meetings are appropriate at this time.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. It was reported yesterday that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had told newsmen that Canada was ready to use economic pressures against the USSR, that economic sanctions would be taken without delay in case of military action against Poland, and also that the USSR ambassador to Canada would be summoned by the Secretary of State for External Affairs who would advise him of such sanctions.

Could the minister find out what economic sanctions Canada might take should the Soviet Union invade Poland? If I raise this question, it is because at the time we were forming the government of this country, we had called for economic sanctions against the USSR following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and those sanctions were merely cancelled by the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board shortly after he took office.

Therefore, if his government is really sincere, would the minister advise us tomorrow of the economic sanctions which are now being considered by them against the USSR, should that country invade Poland?

• (2035)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, obviously it would not be of value to comment at this time on a hypothetical situation. There is no indication that there will be a Russian invasion of Poland. For that reason, I do not believe that it would be useful for me to speculate as to the type of Canadian action which would follow an invasion, which everyone hopes will not occur.

The question will be taken as notice and referred to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In terms of economics, however, throughout the crisis we have been in constant touch with our allies to monitor the political and economic aspect of this question, and we have taken action to provide financial relief to Poland. In fact, the department has announced that the Canadian government has agreed to permit Poland to defer approximately $21 million of repayments between March 15 and June 30 on official credit. Canada will also continue to be a major source of grain for Poland under the provisions of a long-term agreement covering the period 1980 to 1982. We are participating in discussions between Poland and western creditors to consider what can be done about the problem of Poland's debt over the longer term.

In addition, we have worked with the Canadian Polish Congress in facilitating their efforts to send needed foodstuffs and medicine to Poland.

As honourable senators may be aware, the Canadian Polish Congress is sponsoring a campaign to send foodstuffs and medicines to Poland. The Department of External Affairs has welcomed this initiative on the part of the private sector, and officials have been in contact with the organizers to see how the department might facilitate this effort.

I can report to honourable senators that an officer in our embassy in Warsaw has been designated as the contact official for this operation and will intervene, where necessary, with the Polish authorities to expedite eventual shipments by the Canadian Polish Congress. The President of the Canadian Polish Congress has expressed his appreciation of the department's assistance.

[Later:]

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the Polish situation. I was trying to follow the statement just given by the Leader of the Government. My understanding is—and I wonder if the leader could give me some assurance on this—that the rather pessimistic statement made by Secretary Weinberger was made prior to the speech which Mr. Brezhnev gave in Prague last evening. Am I correct in that?

Senator Perrault: That is correct. As yet, we have not received an official text of the speech attributed to Mr. Brezhnev. Consequently, I do not have, as yet, any official Canadian reaction, which may or may not be forthcoming.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. The question has to do with the announcement today that mortgage rates will increase by one-half of one per cent. Because this creates a problem for young people trying to buy homes, and because those who own homes are paying exorbitant interest rates, is the Minister of Finance going to do anything to make banks and other financial institutions justify the latest increase?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice. I will ask the Minister of Finance if he has a statement that he wishes to make at this time to deal with this problem. This has been drawn to his attention on a number of occasions and he has replied that he has no intention at this time, or at any time, for that matter, of intervening in that market.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

POLAND—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us any information on whether the Polish government has approached the Canadian government for any form of assistance?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I did make reference to the fact that certain economic action had been taken by the Canadian government. We announced on March 23 that the government had agreed to permit Poland to defer $21 million of repayments due between March 15 and June 30 on official credits. I understand that the process involved negotiation with the Polish authorities and initiatives on their part to discuss their problem. We were pleased to accommodate them to the best of our ability.

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE—MAINLAND TO VANCOUVER ISLAND PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to several questions raised on April 2 by Senator Donahoe concerning the Trans Quebec and Maritimes Pipeline. I am informed that, to date, the federal government has made no financial commitments to any of the provincial governments concerned with the development of the Trans Quebec and Maritimes Pipeline. Discussions, however, are continuing.

With regard to the construction of a pipeline to Vancouver Island, my information is that the discussions concerning this project are at the preliminary stage and that no further details are available.

OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION LICENCES—PROVINCIAL REVENUES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on April 2 by Senator Smith concerning oil and gas exploration licences.

I am informed that the figures available from the sales of Alberta land for oil and gas drilling were indeed down for the first quarter of 1981. This was not unexpected. Indeed, the industry had been predicting a decrease in land activity. There are a number of factors involved. One reason for the decrease in sales is that we are now in a post-peak period, and a slow-down in activity is quite normal. A second reason relates to the poor quality of land being offered for sale.

I should add, however, that it is a distortion of the facts to conclude that the decrease in activity is a result of the National Energy Program.

Senator Smith: Who says so?

Senator Olson: That is my view. Because it was your view that it did have something to do with the National Energy Program—

Senator Roblin: And everybody else in the country agrees with him.

Senator Olson: —I had to respond to that part of your question.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT

FOREIGN OWNED FIRMS—PERFORMANCE REVIEW

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I wish to respond to a question raised on March 31 by Senator Murray concerning changes to the Foreign Investment Review Act.

I have conferred with my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and he has confirmed that the government is planning no policy changes respecting the Foreign Investment Review Act in addition to those outlined in the Speech from the Throne at the beginning of this session. Therefore, the answer I gave the honourable senator last week to this effect stands.

TRANSPORT

VIA RAIL—REPRESENTATION OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES ON BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator McElman on March 11 regarding what the honourable senator alleged to be the apparent under-representation on the board of directors of VIA Rail.

The Minister of Transport has been pleased to advise me that there is a vacancy on the Board of Directors of VIA Rail. He hopes to be in a position to announce the appointment of an additional director representing Atlantic Canada in the very near future.

Senator Asselin: Will it be a Conservative?

Senator Perrault: The person appointed will be appointed on the basis of competence.

Senator Marshall: It won't be McElman.

Senator Asselin: Sorry, Charlie; you won't get a new job now.

Senator McElman: We will both miss that vacancy.

Senator Perrault: I can assure honourable senators that there will be no "railroading" of the appointment.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

GOVERNMENT FUNDING OF RESEARCH COUNCILS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie on March 11. He said he was concerned about a particular and important group in Canada which might well come into the category of being victimized by what he said was an inequity. He made the following statement:

> I understand that the government has advised the three important research councils of our country that two of them will receive an increase in their budget, but the other one, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada, will have its budget frozen.

[Senator Olson.]

I should like to assure Senator Macquarrie and another honourable senator that the information he received is not a "trial balloon" and that it was never the intention of the government to cut the budget of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

The research council is indeed regarded as "an important national gathering of our leading scholars in the humanities and the social sciences, upon which the educational development of the whole country depends to a considerable degree."

The government views the programs of the three research councils, namely, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, the Medical Research Council and the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, as important scholarly contributions. Equally, the government takes seriously the funding of these research councils. However, as these research councils deal with distinct and separate areas for research, it would be inappropriate to apply an across-the-board increase to them. Each one must be considered individually.

I can assure honourable senators that the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council received $45,061,000 in 1981-82. That is an increase of $3,896,000 from the 1980-81 main estimates, and represents an inflation factor of 9.34 per cent to maintain current levels of funding. To the extent of providing future funding to the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, proposals are presently under consideration by the government, and I hope that we will be in a position in a couple of months to speak to the application of the funding proposals.

Honourable senators can rest assured that the issues of provincial participation in the funding of higher education and research and the status of the research councils, particularly the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, are separate, and that the status of this council shall not be diminished.

THE LATE HERBERT NORMAN

FORMER AMBASSADOR TO EGYPT—STATEMENT BY LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to make a statement regarding reports circulating in the country about the late Herbert Norman, former Canadian Ambassador to Egypt, who committed suicide in 1957. The question has been raised whether Mr. Norman was an agent of the KGB.

This recent allegation about Herbert Norman is as false as it is astonishing, after all that has been said about him publicly over the years. As the late Mr. Diefenbaker said in the House of Commons on April 4, 1957, as reported at page 3059 of Hansard of that date:

> I think all of us in this house cannot but feel a sense of deep sorrow that this man's good name was filched from him by indiscriminately branding him as an enemy, trying him by suspicion and, in the public mind to a great extent, convicting him by innuendo. I think every member of this house will agree that the terrible results in the lives of those subjected to such indiscriminate attacks as were made on this man cannot but lead each of us to determine that we shall not ourselves engage in words which can only destroy the heart and soul of those attacked.

This man was a devoted public servant; he is a victim of witch-hunting proclivities—

It is astonishing that, years later, these false accusations should arise again. Mr. Norman was never, in any way, disloyal to Canada. There is nothing more to be said about this case but to express the hope that the present campaign of slander will cease.

Senator Balfour: On a point of order, who posed the question?

Senator Perrault: There have been reports in the country about this matter, and the statement was provided by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I therefore put it on the record.

Senator Balfour: But was the question raised in this chamber?

Senator Perrault: No, honourable senators. I simply made a statement for information, as I do from time to time about matters of current interest.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

HONOURABLE GIUSEPPE LA LOGGIA, ITALIAN MINISTER OF BUDGET, MRS. LA LOGGIA, AND HIS EXCELLENCY THE ITALIAN AMBASSADOR

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: If I may, I would like to invite honourable senators to join me in greeting the Honourable Giuseppe La Loggia, Minister of Budget in the Italian Government and his wife, accompanied by His Excellency, the Italian Ambassador. We are happy to welcome them to Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

PRIVILEGE

SENATOR HASTINGS—RETRACTION OF REMARKS BY MR. DAVID KILGOUR, M.P.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, on April 1 our colleague, Senator Hastings, raised a question of personal privilege concerning some remarks that had been made with regard to him by a member of the other place. We on this side think that the record should show that the next day, April 2, the member of the House of Commons in question, Mr. Kilgour, retracted any unfortunate inferences that might have been drawn from his remarks with regard to Senator Hastings, and apologized to him, as reported at page 8899 of the Commons Hansard of that date.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: On the same point, the member of Parliament in question also sent us a copy of his comments which were made in the House of Commons. In my opinion, he ought to be thanked for doing so. I think that he is a man of courage and that he should be recognized as such.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development) moved the third reading of Bill C-60, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1981-82

SECOND READING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-59 was very recently included in the stack of bills before you. If honourable senators are interested in following the remarks I wish to make in support of this bill, they can best do so by following the bill itself. Though this bill does not require a great deal of reading, it does require a certain amount of explanation.

The bill consists of two clauses. The first clause simply refers to the short title of the proposed act. and states that it "may be cited as the Borrowing Authority Act, 1981-82. Clause 2 is the operative clause, which contains three basic principles. I intend to make my remarks in the context of those three principles. I would like to deal, first, with what the bill proposes; secondly, with why it is proposed; and thirdly, with the study made by our committee.

As I have said, honourable senators, clause 2 is the operative clause, the purpose of which is to seek borrowing authority to a limit of $14 billion for the 1981-82 fiscal year. Subclause 2(2) provides that all outstanding and unused borrowing authority provided by the new act, to the extent that it exceeds $3 billion, will expire on March 31, 1982. The bill also seeks explicit authorization for the government to borrow in foreign currencies as well as in Canadian dollars. Those are the three basic provisions of this bill.

I would like to take this opportunity to explain the reason the government is seeking $14 billion of new borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1981-82 at this time. All unused borrowing authority for fiscal 1980-81 provided by the Borrowing Authority Act, 1980-81 expired on March 31, 1981. Without new borrowing powers, the government will be unable to implement its debt program for 1981-82. As honourable senators are aware, the size of the borrowing authority is related to the size of the government's financial requirements. These were clearly outlined in the budget which the government introduced to Parliament last October, which indicated that programmed budgetary and non-budgetary cash requirements for the 1981-82 fiscal year were expected to be about $11 billion. The basis for the request for $14 billion of new borrowing authority for the next fiscal year is, therefore, this cash requirement of $11 billion, along with a $3 billion margin for such contingencies as the possible need to borrow in foreign currencies.

If I may make a reference to the deficit, as honourable senators will recall, the budget of last October set out the government's intention of reducing the deficit through restraint in the rate of growth of expenditures. The budgetary deficit is expected to decline from $14.2 billion this fiscal year to $13.7 billion next year and to $11.8 billion by 1983-84. Throughout this period, helping to finance the deficit, non-budgetary sources of funds are expected to rise. Non-budgetary sources, of course, are essentially comprised of annuity insurance and pension funds.

As a result of these rising sources of funds from non-budgetary accounts, financial requirements decline more rapidly than the budgetary deficit, falling from $12.2 billion this year, meaning the immediate past year, to $11 billion next year, which in this sense is the present year, and $7.2 billion in 1983-84, which would be the next year. Expressed as a percentage of GNP, this decline is impressive because cash requirements, as a proportion of GNP, are expected to fall from 4.3 per cent in 1980-81, the immediate past year, to 3.5 per cent in 1981-82, the present year, and to 1.8 per cent in 1983-84, which will be the following year, and that is the lowest level since 1974-75.

On the question of contingencies, honourable senators will recall that I mentioned that the total of $14 billion consists of $11 billion deficit, for which the borrowing authority is requested, and $3 billion for contingencies. Therefore, the government is requesting this $3 billion margin for contingencies in line with the margin that has been provided in recent years. The financial requirements for 1981-82, referred to earlier, provide for domestic needs and exclude requirements for foreign exchange transactions. The transactions can be large and volatile and can have a substantial impact on the borrowing requirement. Either a major weakening or a major strengthening of the value of the dollar would have an impact on the borrowing requirement. A strengthening Canadian dollar gives rise to purchases of foreign exchange and a consequent need to raise Canadian dollars in the domestic market for this purpose. A weakening Canadian dollar, on the other hand, could give rise to the need to borrow foreign currencies to replenish official holdings of foreign exchange which are depleted through foreign exchange operations.

Honourable senators, those, essentially, are my remarks on subclause (1) of clause 2, namely, the way in which the $14 billion is built up: the $11 billion deficit, the $3 billion contingency.

Now a word about subclause (2) of clause 2, which is the proposal in the legislation that $3 billion of the borrowing authority provided for 1981-82, or whatever amount remains unused if it is less than $3 billion—and this is the key—be exempt from automatic cancellation at the end of the fiscal year 1981-82.

In recent years most borrowing authority has carried a clause which automatically cancels any unused authority at the end of each fiscal year, whether or not new authority has been obtained. In the past, when this occurred and new borrowing authority had not yet been passed by Parliament, the government was able to continue with its borrowing program on unused authority obtained in earlier years, which was not subject to automatic cancellation, thereby providing a useful degree of flexibility. In other words, there was often a certain amount of unused authority floating around from previous years that they were able to use for those reasons of flexibility. During the first four months of the current fiscal year, however, almost all of this non-lapsed, unused borrowing authority was used up, so to provide a similar degree of flexibility in the future the legislation in subclause (2) proposes that all unused borrowing authority provided under the new act, only to the extent that it exceeds $3 billion, will expire on March 31, 1982.

To give an example, supposing that only $10 billion of the $11 billion were actually used—that is, that it were only necessary to use the borrowing authority, which could happen for a number of totally objective reasons—then, that would leave, if subclause (1) is passed, $4 billion, and then, by reason of subclause (2), still only $3 billion would not be cancelled, and anything exceeding the $3 billion would be automatically cancelled.

Moving to subclause (3) of clause 2—and this is the clause referring to the ability of the government to borrow and repay loans in foreign currencies—that is essentially a technical provision. It is similar to a clause that was first included in a borrowing authority bill introduced by the former government in 1979. Over the years Canada has borrowed and repaid funds in a number of currencies. However, in 1978 Canada made a number of large foreign loans and established stand-by lines of credit with a number of foreign banks; and so the clause was added to confirm Canada's right to borrow in foreign currencies. The Financial Administration Act is currently under review, and a clause clarifying the government's ability to borrow and repay in foreign currencies would be included with any amendments to that act. Once such an amendment had been passed, there would no longer be a need to include this clause in borrowing authority bills. So if the Financial Administration Act comes to us in due course, perhaps we will remember that the purpose of this clause is to avoid the necessity of including, as we have in the act before us, a provision for clear statutory authority to borrow in foreign funds.

For the information of honourable senators, I will now set out the government's debt program in the last fiscal year, and the amount of borrowing authority that has been used. In 1980-81, in domestic markets, the government had borrowed a total of $11.2 billion—$7.9 billion through the issue of marketable bonds, and $5.5 billion through the issue of treasury bills, while net Canada savings bonds reduce the amount borrowed by $2.2 billion. In foreign markets, on balance, the government is in a flat position.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps I may ask my friend a question in clarification. It was $11.2 billion net in Canada last year?

Senator Frith: Yes, that is why I added the point that it was net after the redemption. Does that answer the point raised?

Senator Roblin: Yes.

Senator Frith: I did not mention how they were reduced, but it was by redemption, yes.

In foreign markets, on balance, the government is in a flat position with respect to drawings on its stand-by lines of credit with Canadian and foreign banks. This amount comprises $0.3 billion—that is, $300 million—repayment on these lines earlier in the fiscal year, $1.1 billion drawn in December, and $0.8 billion repayment in January 1981. As of March 31, 1981 there was $0.3 billion outstanding on these drawings. No other foreign loans were made.

Since borrowing authority for fiscal 1980-81 was not obtained until July 17, 1980, borrowing up until that date was charged to $2.9 billion of non-lapsing borrowing authority obtained earlier, and carried forward from the previous years that we have already referred to. This non-lapsing authority was reduced to just under $100 million by July 17, when $12 billion in additional authority became available under the Borrowing Authority Act, 1980-1981. As at March 31 the amount still available under this act, and which expired on that date, was $3.6 billion. That was because of unexpired borrowings; and, of course, in this present bill there will be no unexpired borrowings over that $3 billion figure. They will be automatically cut off, but the $3 billion will remain and will not be automatically cut off.

Honourable senators, the bill that I have just described is in the exact form that it had when it was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, and on March 19 last that committee tabled its report on this exact bill. Its report, which is found at page 2108 of Debates of the Senate, was as follows:

> The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which was referred the subject matter of Bill C-59, "An Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority", has in obedience to the order of reference of Thursday, March 12, 1981, examined the said subject matter and reports that no suggested changes be made to the Bill at this time.
> Respectfully submitted,

Honourable senators, I will try to answer any additional questions, but I ask honourable senators to support second reading and passage of this bill on the basis of the provisions it contains. I hope that the explanations I have given will help honourable senators to decide to do so.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, may I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if it is the intention, if second reading is given to the bill, to refer the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it was hoped that the reference for pre-study to that committee would obviate that necessity. That is the reason I did not specifically propose that after second reading the bill go to committee.

Senator Grosart: May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if he thinks this is a proper procedure, in view of the well-established principle here that we do not deal with this kind of bill until it has been reported by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance? I point out to him that the bill itself has not been before the National Finance Committee, but merely the substance or the contents of it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I have just read it from Debates of the Senate, the reference was of the subject matter and not the actual bill. In this case the subject matter of the bill consists of the three subclauses of clause 2.

I totally agree with the Honourable Senator Grosart that where the subject matter of a bill has been referred to committee, and then the bill finally comes before us and it consists of enough variety in clauses and principles and is more complicated and has more facets to it than the pure subject matter had, then it should be referred to committee in its more detailed form.

My respectful submission to honourable senators is that in this case, in effect, the bill is short and it deals with just those three principles—namely, the amount, which incudes the question of the deficit and the contingency, the added provisions for non-automatic cancellation, and the ability to borrow in foreign currencies. Those were really the three subject matters referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for pre-study and, therefore, their pre-study and report virtually amount to a report on the bill itself.

Senator Grosart: Would the Deputy Leader of the Government admit that there might be some disagreement with the last statement he made, in view of the fact that since March 19 the bill that we have before us has been under thorough scrutiny in the other place and much additional information has been brought to the attention of one house of Parliament that was not before the committee and is not before this house of Parliament?

Therefore, I would ask him, if we, on this side, insist that we should follow our normal procedure and make sure that our committee examines the bill, as it has been commented on and as ministers have given additional information which was not before the committee, will he reconsider the suggestion that this bill, if necessary, go before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will certainly consider anything that is raised definitely to indicate why the information that may have been forthcoming on the other side should lead us to study the bill and the principles behind it and change any of the observations that I made in asking honourable senators to support the bill. I cannot say that I will change my mind simply on the basis of an insistence, but I would certainly be prepared to listen to such observations, and we can make our decision then.

Senator Grosart: Would the Deputy Leader of the Government not consider it sufficient reason for a further examination of the bill by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance that the government found it necessary to introduce closure to get the bill through the other place?

Senator Frith: No, I would not.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am not sure whether we are discussing a point of order here, but if we are, I would like to support the contention made by my friend, Senator Grosart. The idea of pre-study is a very useful one and has proved to be valuable, but I would be concerned if, in any way, we allowed the use of that short-cut procedure, which we have developed, to interfere with the regular usages of the house, and in any way to prevent the suggestion being adopted that a bill should be referred to committee regardless of whether its subject matter has been pre-studied. I do not think it is really necessary for anyone to suggest a reason why, except that that is the regular, established, accustomed procedure with respect to bills that go to committee, and the pre-study notion is something new that has been introduced, usefully, in the more recent past and that we will continue to use in the future. But the minute we accept, as a matter of routine or without any detailed consideration, the notion that this makes it unnecessary to send bills to committee in the formal sense, then I would become disturbed about it.

Without wishing to prolong the discussion, because I believe the point has been well covered, I think that the government ought to consider its position on this matter. I believe Senator Grosart will be speaking on this bill later in the debate, and perhaps when second reading is concluded we might have some word as to whether or not it should be referred to committee. I do not like the idea of introducing novel procedures, no matter how valuable they are, if there is a tendency thereby to short-cut or forget about our customary way of doing business. I merely make that observation in the hope that it will be a seed planted in fertile ground.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I support the position taken by Senator Roblin and impliedly by Senator Grosart. I do not wish to advance this in any way as a precedent for establishing an idea that if we pre-study a bill we will not then refer that bill to committee. I think that would be putting the rule and the exception totally in the wrong order. The rule should be that if a bill receives pre-study, that might help the committee in its eventual study, and the general rule would be to refer it to committee. In this case, I am suggesting that this should not be the rule, but that it is a good and meritorious case for an exception to that rule because of the fact that what we are concerned with here is the borrowing authority, and the principles of the borrowing authority were studied by the committee and there is really nothing more to the bill than those principles.

While I agree with what Senator Grosart and Senator Roblin have said, that generally our procedure should be to refer these bills to committee, even if they have received pre-study, in this case I suggest we make that exception, for the reasons I have mentioned.

Senator Roblin: I must express my disappointment in that statement, because the purpose of second reading is the discussion of principle. If we were to follow our rules with any degree of fidelity, we would be barred from discussing the bill paragraph by paragraph. Second reading is a discussion of the principle of a bill. If we want to go behind those principles and get into detail, that is when we have to use the committee procedure, either Committee of the Whole or a committee of the house.

Senator Grosart has advanced a reason, which certainly appeals to me, as to why it may be necessary—I do not say it is—to have a further discussion on this bill in committee in order that matters of detail may be discussed. I do not think we should pre-judge the issue here. Perhaps it is unnecessary, but I do not see any reason for abrogating our general principle on this occasion, or on any other, on the grounds that the bill is so simple that it does not require committee study, which is the way the views expressed by my honourable friend came across to me.

I repeat my position, and I hope he will not dig himself in so firmly that he will not feel disposed to yield to persuasion. Perhaps he will let the matter rest now, and we might, after hearing Senator Grosart speak, make a decision on the matter.

Senator Frith: I certainly would not dig myself in so deeply that I would not yield to persuasion. I think I made that comment in reference to what Senator Grosart said. I am waiting to hear what aspects of the bill require study.

On motion of Senator Grosart, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

MR. AND MRS. PRIMO DI LUCA

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I would like to draw your attention to the presence, in the south gallery, of Mr. Primo Di Luca and his wife. Tonight Mr. Di Luca is being invested in the Order of Canada at Government House for the valuable contribution that he has made to the Italian community and, more particularly, for his great efforts in organizing assistance for the earthquake victims of northern Italy in 1976.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Report of the Department of Communications for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1980, pursuant to section 6 of the Department of Communications Act, Chapter C-24, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow I will move:

That when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 14, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

I would be glad to give an explanation as to why I will be moving that motion tomorrow. It may save us the time involved in discussing the question of leave.

Senator Flynn: Go ahead.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators are probably aware that there have been negotiations between the house leaders in the other place to establish a procedure for dealing with the motion concerning the Constitution. It is likely that within the hour there will be an announcement by the house leaders of the other place that an agreement has been reached on how they wish to deal with that motion.

I am sure honourable senators will also remember that attempts have been made in the Senate to come to an understanding on the number of days of debate we will require to deal with the motion. A basic principle of that understanding is that we will not dispose of the motion until sometime after it has been disposed of in the other place. If this agreement is reached—and it seems imminent—there will be no need for us to sit on Friday of this week, and I think that we should sit normal hours next week. It is possible that later today the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate will have something to add to what I have just said.

I appreciate that honourable senators accepted my request last week that they be in a state of readiness to sit on Friday of this week. I am pleased to say that at this point it does not seem necessary for us to sit this Friday. That is why tomorrow I shall propose normal sitting hours for next week.

Unless something changes regarding the events in the other place, I believe that will be our schedule, and honourable senators can make plans accordingly.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

CANADA OIL AND GAS LEGISLATION—PROPOSED STUDY OF SUBJECT MATTER BY SENATE COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question which I was going to direct to the Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline but, in his absence, I shall address it to the Leader of the Government. It relates to Bill C-48, an act to regulate oil and gas interests in Canada Lands and to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act.

The minister will be aware that the industry has already expressed a number of concerns about this bill on an economic basis; that the Canadian Arctic Resources Committee has expressed considerable concern from an environmental point of view; and, most importantly, that the northern peoples', the aboriginal peoples', representatives and the territorial governments are united in opposition to this bill and have expressed very serious concerns about it, supported, most recently, by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Procedural problems seem to have arisen in the other place in that after these groups had made representations to the House of Commons Committee on National Resources and Public Works, that committee decided, at the request of the northern peoples, to travel to the north to take evidence. Several days later, the committee rescinded that decision and decided not to go north to take evidence.

The question I wanted to ask Senator Hastings, in his capacity as Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline, and that I now put to the Leader of the Government, is whether, by the device of pre-study, for example, the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline, or even some other committee of the Senate, could take up this bill now and travel to the north to take evidence which, apparently, the House of Commons committee is unable to do.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Hastings is absent from the chamber this afternoon because of his responsibilities as chairman of that particular committee. He is absent on official business.

However, the idea which has been advanced by Senator Murray will certainly be made known to Senator Hastings. It is an idea that may well have merit.

Senator Murray: By way of supplementary, may I put this question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate? The minister will be aware that the Senate has already authorized the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline, under its terms of reference, to travel fairly extensively in the north. Would the government agree to widen the terms of reference of that committee so that it could take up the matters I referred to in my opening question?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that suggestion will also be placed before Senator Hastings.

Senator Murray: It is a government matter.

Senator Perrault: The terms of reference which have been established for that committee would not encompass the concerns expressed by Senator Murray, but the idea will certainly be considered.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It is a very serious precedent.

Senator Murray: The Minister of State for Economic Development says it is a very serious precedent. If he wishes to elaborate on that statement, I shall be yielding to him in about 15 seconds.

My point to the Leader of the Government is that I would think the widening of the terms of reference of the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline would be a matter for a government initiative in this house.

However, I invite the Minister of State for Economic Development, who tried to get his two cents' worth in, to do so now.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, whether it is worth two cents or any other amount, there is a very serious matter of precedent involved and it relates to what the committee in the other place is now studying and what the committee here will be studying if the matter is referred to that committee. However, it may not be referred to the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline, but to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The subject matter is not confined to pipelines or the other areas over which the Northern Pipeline Committee has been given jurisdiction by this house. That question has yet to be decided.

The fact of the matter is that this would be asking a committee to deal with a bill in respect of which a matter of policy has already been decided by the House of Commons by giving it second reading, and then referring it to a committee for study.

• (1410)

It is quite normal for matters to be referred to a committee so that the kind of study and travel that my honourable friend has alluded to is done. It is not normal, nor the common practice of either house, to send committees out across the country to obtain evidence on matters that either one house or the other has already decided on in principle by giving second reading to bills.

Senator Murray: Let me simply say that I raised the possibility in my original question that some other committee of the Senate might well be seized of the subject matter of this bill. I am not insisting that it be one committee or another.

The Minister of State for Economic Development is something of a procedural expert.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator Argue: That is correct.

Senator Smith: Don't forget that he is an M.P.

Senator Murray: He is also an M.P., he says. I invite the minister, as someone who is at least interested in procedure, to find the procedure that will enable the northern peoples, the aboriginal peoples, the representatives from the territorial governments, to express their views to a committee of this Parliament. I ask that because they have taken the position, supported most recently by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, who have some experience individually in the north, that Bill C-48 would extinguish aboriginal rights, would extinguish aboriginal land claims, both on the surface and subsurface—there is no mention of these in the bill—at the same time that the government is purporting to entrench these rights in the Constitution.

This is a giant step backwards from self-government in the north and will also create serious environmental problems. I suggest to the minister that, rather than trying to ram the legislation through both houses of Parliament, he ought to be sensitive to a situation which has arisen wherein a committee of the other place has decided, for whatever reason, that it will not travel to the north to receive evidence. I suggest to him that the Senate find a way to accommodate the legitimate concerns of those people who have said to us—and they have waited on a number of senators sitting on both sides of this house—that there is more protection given to the offshore fisheries in this legislation than there is to the human beings living north of the 60th parallel.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Murray has given his opinions as facts, and that is nothing new. They are not facts, no matter whose opinions they are. They are opinions and, as such, are very distinct from facts. He has also added to that by putting his interpretation on someone else's opinion. In this respect, he indentified a number of people.

Of course, we have been aware of those interpretations or misinterpretations of opinion—take your choice—and we do not agree there is anything in that bill that would have the result he has indicated as being fact, which is really his opinion, and, I suggest, a rather misguided opinion at that.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—SAFETY OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Honourable senators, a demonstration conducted on Parliament Hill today by the Lebanese community of Ottawa seems to indicate the trouble that is developing in that country. In that respect, I would ask the Leader of the Government whether there are any Canadians resident in that country, and, if so, what steps the government is taking to provide for their safety.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is my understanding that there are approximately 1,100 Canadians resident in Lebanon who are registered with our embassy in Beirut. About one-third of them are located in the capital area. The remainder, including nearly 100 in Zahle, live in smaller centres throughout the country. Roughly 90 per cent are also Lebanese citizens who have strong ties in Lebanon and, as a consequence, have been reluctant to leave. According to our latest reports, the airport in Beirut remains open.

I realize that that is not a total reply to the question raised by Senator Bosa, but that is the latest available information.

I have another report for honourable senators. In Zahle, the shelling of the centre of the city continues and the city is cut off from the rest of the country. It is reported that there is little potable water, and hospitals have been damaged by shelling. There are 100 Canadians in that centre which is cut off, because of these military operations. In Beirut a ceasefire has held since mid-day Monday, although some clashes have occurred overnight.

We are monitoring the situation closely through daily reports from our embassy in Beirut. The embassy continues to function without difficulty. It is situated in a part of west Beirut which is relatively quiet.

• (1415)

This outbreak of violence, for whatever reason or motivation, concerns us deeply. The deaths of innocent civilians and material destruction must not be allowed to continue. We hope that those involved will refrain from further hostilities and that stability will be restored. We call upon all parties to the fighting to respect the duly constituted authorities, to agree to a ceasefire, and to negotiate an end to their differences.

Although we have received no request, we would be prepared to consider sympathetically an appeal for assistance from an internationally recognized humanitarian organization.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

RECOMMENDED GRAIN AND OIL SEED ACREAGES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board? It has to do with a statement he made in Saskatoon last month and repeated later in this chamber, on March 18, respecting the advice that was offered to farmers for planting in the current crop year. I believe in his statement in Saskatoon, and certainly in what he said here, the minister gave a very optimistic review of the situation—

Senator Asselin: As usual.

Senator Roblin: —and said:

> So the challenge to grain producers in western Canada is to produce all of the grain they can possibly produce this crop year.

Parenthetically, may I say that that was music to my ears?

If the minister is still of the same opinion, perhaps he could tell us the source of his information that prompted him to give this advice, and would he give that advice again today?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, yes, I would certainly give that advice. For some years the demand for grain, particularly for wheat, has been rising at a more rapid rate than the production of grain. Therefore, in recent years, there has been an indication that there is a growing demand for grain.

The Canadian Wheat Board, on whose advice I rely to a great extent, believes very sincerely that it can sell all the grain farmers can produce this year even under the most favourable circumstances. In recent weeks and months, the Canadian Wheat Board has had to turn down sales because of its inability to supply grain because all the available grain has already been committed. I think this is an excellent position to be in, and I am pleased to agree with the Canadian Wheat Board that that kind of overall demand exists, and that the challenge to the grain producers of western Canada today is to produce all the grain they can, with the assurance that there are likely to be ready markets for that grain.

Of course, it is possible that we could run into periods of temporary surplus brought about by a bumper crop in North America, the Soviet Union or in other countries. The general trend in the world, in the view of the Wheat Board—and I agree with it—is that the demand for grain is going up much more rapidly than is production.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I note that the minister has stuck to his original position on this matter, and what gives me some cause for concern is the fact that the chairman of the Canada Grains Council, speaking in Winnipeg yesterday, I believe, gave a somewhat different appreciation of the situation. He pointed out that the expected plantings around the world, when combined with the weather forecasts insofar as they can be made at this time, gave reason to believe there might be a glut of wheat in spite of the fact that we have had trouble filling this market recently from Canadian supplies. The substance of his observation was that Canadian farmers should be very careful not to over-produce wheat because the world may soon have the largest supply since 1960.

The position is that we have two very contradictory pieces of advice here. I must confess that I am not in a position to form any judgment as to which is the more reliable, but it seems to me that it might be advisable to see if there is some way of reconciling those statements with a view to eliminating any confusion or ambiguity which might be left in the minds of producers in western Canada. It is extremely important that, if possible, we should have a considered view on this matter which takes into account both the minister's statement and the possibility of the wheat surpluses referred to.

We have seen recently a decline in the price of wheat on the world market, I suspect precisely because some people in the grains trade consider the advice of the Canada Grains Council to be nearer to the mark than the minister's. I do not want to get into that argument, because I am not qualified to decide it, but I think I am qualified to ask the minister if he can help resolve this problem in the interests of western producers.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I do not really see it as a problem, although Senator Roblin does. I would doubt very much that Mr. Bruce MacMillan, the president of the Pioneer Grain Company, was speaking on behalf of the Canada Grains Council and that that was the considered opinion of the Canada Grains Council. Rather, I would guess that he was making a speech in which he was giving his own opinion—which is an important opinion because he is an important person in the grains business; and, of course, if I found that he was speaking on behalf of the Canada Grains Council, and the council had made an in-depth study and had come up with recommendations that were opposed to the recommendations of the Wheat Board, I suppose that would have to be looked at rather carefully.

I speak for myself, as a person with some experience in the production of grain, when I say that the great problem in the west, generally speaking, over a period of years has been not to market the grain but to produce the grain; and every farmer you talk to tells you that is the problem.

The bins will be empty in July, and let us hope that the farmers can produce a big crop. I anticipate that the market will be there for all of the crop that our transportation facilities can handle. The transportation facilities might not be able to handle easily a large bumper crop, but it could handle a good sized crop.

[Senator Argue.]

So, if we should be so fortunate as to have a bumper crop, and to have a problem with a temporary surplus, that would be an advantageous position in which to find ourselves. I would hope that would happen. Then the MAP program, that we have heard so much about, would probably quickly become popular.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, taking for granted that everything the minister says is right—and I hope it is—we are still up against the question that we have an important person making a statement with respect to future activities on the part of the farming public which would not lead to this abundance of grain that the minister seeks.

I do not know whether or not Mr. MacMillan was speaking in a personal capacity. The press report advertises him as chairman of the Canada Grains Council and says that he is also president of the Pioneer Grain Co. Ltd., which no doubt most of us know. Perhaps the minister would clarify the situation for us, because I think it is important that, if we really believe we have this market, we should be prepared to fill it and meet the orders when they come; and any information that is spread abroad which would limit our capacity to do so is worthy of consideration here.

I also suggest to the minister that, while he is looking into this matter, he should also take a look at the transportation system, because we know that that has been the bottleneck in recent history. The minister expresses some confidence that it will be all right now, and I hope that it will be, but he had better get in touch with his colleague, because the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the Honourable Pierre De Bané, in the Western Region: Strategic Regional Development Overview, makes the point that, in the opinion of his department, the problem of the inefficient transportation system is limiting the sales of our grain abroad.

While I am frank to admit that there have been improvements in the recent past—and I am glad of them—I am concerned as to whether we have gone far enough to move that big crop my honourable friend is working for and which he and I are both hoping for.

Senator Argue: I am glad to hear Senator Roblin's concerns, and I am happy to respond to them. I think that one of the things Mr. MacMillan had in mind—and with regard to this point I am not in disagreement—was that farmers might happen to reduce unduly their acreage of rapeseed. I think that part of his statement was because of that particular view. Statistics Canada reports that on March 15, in a survey, producers indicated that they would reduce their rapeseed acreage by 22 per cent. My own recommendation was that rapeseed acreage should not be changed. Now, the prospect of reduction in rapeseed, of course, reflects market difficulties during the current year and a very substantial reduction in exports of rapeseed; but I do agree with Mr. MacMillan that this would likely be a much more drastic reduction in rapeseed acreage than would be justified.

• (1425)

As far as our transportation facilities are concerned, I think they are working very well. Both railway companies are doing an outstanding job. Part of the reason they are able to do an outstanding job, of course, is the large number of hopper cars now in the system: 10,000 federal hopper cars, 2,000 Canadian Wheat Board hopper cars, 1,000 from Saskatchewan, and the blue hopper cars from Alberta. I have said that the federal hopper cars do not seem so noticeable because they are painted in rather drab colours; but when the Alberta hopper cars are out there they are very impressive because they are painted a picturesque blue. But I hear that Alberta, in spite of its differences with other provinces, is going to let some of them go beyond the boundaries of Alberta, out to the west coast, once in a while, as long as they are sure they will be brought back. In any case, the railways are doing an excellent job. The deliveries and the exports, to date, show that that kind of job is being done.

Senator Olson: It was a record-breaking year.

Senator Argue: Well, so far it is ahead of last year, but it may not equal last year because they may run out of grain, and you cannot move what you have not got. At any rate, the grain there is being moved at a very rapid rate. The Government of Canada is determined that we will have an efficient railway transportation system, and I believe that whatever action is necessary, in its various aspects, will be taken by the government and by the railway companies to make certain that this efficient transportation system is maintained and expanded, as required.

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that in his reported statement Mr. MacMillan did advise that, in his opinion, an increase in barley acreage was warranted, and that the decrease in rapeseed, or Canola, I think is now the appropriate expression, should not be an extreme one. He did say that even with average weather conditions in major producing areas, we could be moving in the next few months to a wheat supply unparallelled in 20 years. That underlines the whole thrust of our discussion here, both with respect to planting advice and transportation; so, if the minister could reconcile this position that Mr. MacMillan has taken with his own statements, it might be of some use in guiding the farmers in the west.

Senator Argue: Well, I am glad to make those inquiries. I wonder, however, whether Mr. MacMillan was speaking on behalf of the Canada Grains Council or whether he was really putting forward his own particular opinion.

I am not concerned about overproduction in western Canada, as though it were a dread thing. A couple of days ago we had perhaps the greatest dust storm in western Canada in the last 40 years. If the climate turns against the farmers we will not have to worry, even under ordinary circumstances, about overproduction. I think, as far as western Canada is concerned, that at the present time the outlook is not all that bright; but the outlook for sales is excellent, and I stand by the advice I have already given, in spite of learned advice from others. However, I will be happy to make those inquiries.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board.

I would like to ask the minister whether there is any government policy or Canadian Wheat Board policy as to a definite reserve of the various grains for emergency purposes.

Senator Argue: Well, that question is being considered, and there are various submissions being made as to whether or not we should try to earmark a particular quantity of grain for a reserve, and if we did, who would pay for it and on what basis this reserve would be maintained. I think that in the normal operations of the Canadian Wheat Board, and the grain marketing system—and I am not trying to avoid the question—there is some reserve. There is an endeavour made to have a reasonable carry-over. If there were an emergency demand for wheat, due to starvation in a particular country, we could not make astronomically large quantities of wheat available, but there is a continuing reserve, in the normal operation of the board, designed to meet foreseeable circumstances.

• (1430)

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question. Has the government, or the minister, received any request from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to feed some of the starving millions of refugees in Africa?

Senator Argue: There has been a submission to that effect which is being considered, but not particularly by my department.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question has to do with my concern, and the concern of most Manitobans, about the Garrison diversion. In view of the fact that Governor Olson of North Dakota met with the provincial government yesterday and today, and since I do not have any details of this particular meeting, I am asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate to provide us with any such details he may have. Also, in view of the discussion of a possible meeting with the Americans soon, does the Leader of the Government have any information to give us in this regard?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there have been a number of public reports in recent hours to the effect that North Dakota Governor Olson has promised that the United States government will not proceed with any part of the Garrison project without Canada's permission, and that any diversion of water into Canada will have to be contingent on some technological breakthrough which would prevent the transfer of pollutants and new fish species.

I can report to the Senate that we have discussed the matter with the Government of Manitoba and this report is substantially correct. I can verify that this has been the nature of the statement made by Governor Olson to provincial authorities.

On behalf of the national government, I can say that, while we are very encouraged by Governor Olson's comments, we look forward to having this position clarified and confirmed at the consultations to be held later this month. We expect that the meeting will take place on April 23 in Washington, D.C. This has yet to be confirmed by the State Department, but we think this will probably be the date.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think that what the Governor of the State of North Dakota said was that he would make a recommendation to the federal authorities. Obviously, he has no power to bind them. I understood my honourable friend to say, in his explanation, that the governor was giving assurances that the United States government would not do so-and-so. What the governor is doing, in effect, is recommending. I must say that it is a mighty powerful recommendation, and I am very glad to hear it.

I might also pay a word of tribute to the talent of the Premier of Manitoba in the art and science of persuasion, because apparently he has been able to convince the rather recalcitrant government of North Dakota of the merits of the Manitoba position. While he is not, perhaps, an expert in international or diplomatic affairs, I think that Premier Lyon, on this occasion—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Or on constitutional affairs!

Senator Roblin: On constitutional affairs, I think he is quite an expert. I think you will find that he will have something rather interesting to say to you before long, and I would not be surprised if you did not sit up and take notice.

However, in respect of the Garrison situation, I think the picture is much brighter. I am glad that my honourable colleague, the senator from St. Boniface, raised the matter.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, again I direct my comments to the Leader of the Government. In view of the fact that Senator Roblin might not have received the answer given me about a week ago, it might be quite informative to him if he looked at the report that was given at that time. That report indicates that, long before Governor Olson of North Dakota said he was coming to Manitoba, Washington issued a report telling us what the intentions were and expressing their concern about the Garrison diversion with respect to Manitoba and Canada. Possibly, the Leader of the Government might add to what he has already said by making reference to the answer that he gave me a week ago.

Senator Perrault: I can confirm the fact that the Honourable Senator Guay has been most persistent and helpful, during the course of the Garrison issue, in pursuing this important matter. His helpful recommendations to the government have been studied very carefully.

In reply to the Honourable Senator Roblin, however, I will say that to give credit for this development to the Premier of Manitoba seems to me to stretch the bounds of political credibility beyond all measure. The national government, of course, has made the strongest possible representations on this matter over a period of months, assisted by representations from Senator Guay and others within caucus. We have listened with interest to the statements made by the Honourable Senator Roblin. I am sure that any governor of any state in the United States would not make a statement in a foreign country without being carefully briefed by his own national government before he went abroad, as would be the case with any other government representative speaking abroad.

Senator Roblin: That report says that he "recommends".

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

AFRICA—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and it follows the perhaps more general question put earlier by Senator Haidasz. I am referring to the issue of the starving millions in Africa.

I think I can say that any compassionate Canadian—and I believe that adjective describes most Canadians—has a bleeding heart for what is going on in some of those unfortunate countries. I had the privilege of being in Somalia, along with a small Canadian delegation, last fall. I visited refugee camps and I saw those starving children. As I have already said, it is something that must make every Canadian feel that he has a moral responsibility. This very day, in Geneva, a world conference is being held on how to assist these unfortunate people, especially the children. The Honourable Mark MacGuigan is attending and representing Canada.

I would like to ask the minister whether Canada is prepared to do more to ease this situation. Will the minister be prepared to extend a helping hand to these unfortunate people?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I would like to thank the Honourable Senator Buckwold for that question. Perhaps the Canadian people, including honourable senators on both sides of this chamber, are beginning to grasp the magnitude of this unfolding tragedy. Last night there was information on television which indicates that, indeed, millions of people may be starving to death in Africa. This issue goes beyond party. I think that Canadians of all political parties are very concerned about this dreadful situation.

The official dates of the conference are April 9 and 10, but the minister is in Geneva now. I can say that Canada supports the main conference objectives to mobilize additional resources for humanitarian assistance programs for refugees in Africa. I am very pleased to say that, at the conference, Canada will announce a substantial increase in its contribution to African humanitarian assistance programs related to refugees, primarily through food aid and grants to UNHCR and other international programs for refugees.

In the fiscal year 1980-81, Canada contributed $8.5 million in food aid to refugees and displaced persons in Ethiopia, Somalia and the Sudan. We have also made contributions of approximately $3 million to UNHCR and other relief agency programs in Uganda, Sudan, Cameroon, Ethiopia and to the ICRC All-Africa Appeal.

THE SENATE

REFERENCES TO COMMITTEES

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I rise at this time on a point of privilege. I am wondering if we could revert for a moment to Senator Murray's question with regard to the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline. I am a little concerned, because this afternoon we seem to be giving the impression that we in this honourable house do not in fact direct what our committees do, whether they be special committees or standing committees.

● (1440)

It seems to me that if we in this chamber have outlined the terms of reference of a certain committee to conduct a certain inquiry, then we certainly have a right to amend the terms of reference of that committee. Because we do not have a standing committee on national resources, we are labouring under a terrific handicap. Many of us have wanted such a committee for a long time. We do not have a special committee on energy, in spite of the best efforts of the Minister of State for Economic Development to establish one. Even while the minister was the Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline, he was trying to develop a committee that would study our energy problems.

There is not even a subcommittee on natural resources of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. Such a subcommittee in developing its expertise would provide a service to the people of Canada in helping the Senate deal with the various pieces of legislation which it receives, such as Bill C-48, Bill C-57, the various amendments to the Excise Tax Act relating to energy, and so on.

Perhaps the most appropriate way to deal with these matters is to enlarge the terms of reference of the Special Senate Committee on the Northern Pipeline to deal with Bill C-48. Surely, we have the privilege to direct our committees in their terms of reference. That is simply my point of privilege.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the chairman of the committee is not in the Senate today, and he is not in the city. Surely, it is appropriate, before we widen the terms of reference of the committee, that we at least extend to him the basic courtesy of conferring with him. The proposal was not rejected.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Not by you.

Senator Perrault: I stated that the concept outlined in the proposal would be discussed with the chairman of the committee. Surely, that is a reasonable proposal.

Senator Flynn: We were concerned with the comments made by the Minister of State for Economic Development who does not share the open-minded position of the Leader of the Government.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The Minister of State for Economic Development stated very clearly that there is a very significant difference between undertaking an investigatory study and dealing with a bill that has been referred after this chamber or the other place has debated it in principle on second reading.

Senator Murray: Tell that to the Indians in the north.

Senator Olson: The Leader of the Opposition knows very well the precedent and the tradition about which we are talking.

Senator Flynn: Not at all.

Senator Olson: You should know.

Senator Flynn: The Senate is entirely free to do what it wishes with any bill that comes from the other place.

Senator Olson: That is correct. And the Senate, in taking its responsibility, usually adheres to the traditional practices which have proven to be successful. It is not the practice of this chamber to have committees travel while they are considering a bill.

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator knows that this committee is considering legislation.

Senator Flynn: Where did you find that?

Senator Roblin: He makes up his own rules as he finds the laws.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, while I am interested in listening to these remarks, I do not believe they constitute a question of privilege, nor are they related to the Question Period. I would ask honourable senators to make an effort to follow the order paper.

THE ECONOMY

FEDERAL DEFICIT

Hon. G. I. Smith: Following His Honour's advice, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Is it true that the federal deficit widened in February 1981, as compared with February 1980, to $1.57 billion which, if multiplied by 12, would give an annual rate of $18.84 billion?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): The honourable senator's figure for February may be true, but the rest of his projections are completely erroneous simply because deficit spending does not follow a uniform pattern for each month of the year. Therefore, one cannot multiply the deficit of any month by 12.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That is Tory budgeting, Tory economics.

Senator Olson: It is reasoning such as this that usually leads to the wrong conclusions. In fact, it is possible, if one were to take the figures which make up the total deficit for the better-than-expected-performance of the last quarter of last year and of the first quarter of this year, and multiply them by 12, to arrive at a figure which would be less than the projected deficit.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman for his lecture on accuracy. It would have been much more impressive had he been accurate himself because I made no predictions or said nothing with regard to—

Senator Olson: You said something about multiplying by 12.

Senator Smith: I said that if the deficit figure for February were multiplied by 12, it would amount to $18.84 billion. That is a mathematical fact. If the honourable gentleman does not believe that it is so, then let him make his own calculations on his calculator or by pencil, whichever suits him best. Is the government satisfied with the widening of the deficit for this February as compared with last February, or is it relying somewhat on the rather vague projection which the minister made with respect to what happened in the last quarter of 1980?

Senator Perrault: The "Bad News Bears."

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if one were to use that kind of distorted or contorted reasoning, one could take the deficit for January—which can be found in the same article to which the honourable gentleman is referring—of $1.04 billion, multiply it by 12, and arrive at the amount of $12.48 billion, which is under the projection. If the honourable senator wishes to use this type of argument, then he must face the same kind of argument using figures from other months. On the other hand, if the honourable senator would use my reasoned, sound argument of adding up the total of the previous 12 months, then he would arrive at an accurate figure.

Senator Smith: We have not reached the end of 1981 yet.

Senator Flynn: The totality.

Senator Smith: We will deal with the total deficit when we know what it is. I shall be delighted if the honourable gentleman can point to it at that time and say that the total for the 12-month period stayed within the projection. What I am talking about now is the deficit for 1981-82, and in that regard the only information we have on which to assess the fiscal year is what has been projected by the Minister of Finance, and perhaps others, and what has occurred most recently in the fiscal year just ended.

What I am asking the minister to comment upon is what one can observe from what happened last February in the fiscal year which just ended, and then relate that to what may happen with regard to the projected deficit for the year 1981-82. I can assure the minister that if he is not able to do that, then he is not able to respond to my question at all.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I had not intended to raise all this steam, so I will simply say that, since we are only eight days into the fiscal year 1981-82, I do not think the honourable senator has any basis on which to make a projection and, therefore, I have nothing to add to what he has said.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Smith: As one who for a good many years had to make that kind of projection, I say to the honourable gentleman that if he is not prepared to take note of what happened in the latter part of the last fiscal year he is likely to be a very poor custodian of the finances of this country.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

AFRICA—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to that directed by Senator Buckwold to the Leader of the Government. It is in reference to the Geneva meeting. I notice that the leader used the expression "substantial" in reference to the increased Canadian contribution, whereas he gave specific figures in reference to our previous contributions. Considering the time zone, I do not think he has to worry about scooping the people in Geneva.

● (1450)

Could he indicate to us what is the additional contribution made by Canada in the face of this situation, which is so terrible in its consequences?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not been advised whether the Honourable the Secretary of State for External Affairs has yet made his speech in Geneva. For that reason, I am unable to comply with the request of the honourable senator. The figures are not yet publicly available. Hopefully, some information will be available tomorrow.

THE SENATE

USE OF THE INITIALS "M.P." BY SENATORS—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I do not know whether I should ask a question or rise on a point of order.

Yesterday, the Minister of State for Economic Development made a statement which I found extremely surprising. To a question asked by Senator Murray as to why he was using the initials M.P. for "member of Parliament" after his title of senator, the minister implied that the Constitution allowed him to use these initials. I quickly checked on the matter and was informed that the Constitution designates members of the Upper Chamber, that is members of the Senate, as senators and not as "M.P.'s". What I find even more puzzling is that I wonder how I should designate myself in French because, in French, "member of Parliament" is translated by "député", and in the mind of the public, this designates a member of the other Chamber, someone who has been elected.

Can Senator Olson tell me whether, if he were writing this designation in French, he would put down "honorable sénateur Bud Olson, député du Parlement"? I believe that the fact that Senator Olson is using the designation "M.P.—member of Parliament" creates confusion because, in the minds of Canadians, a "member of Parliament" is someone who has been elected and who sits in the House of Commons. I would even go so far as to say that by using the initials "M.P." after his title of minister and senator, Senator Olson is usurping a title which, according to my interpretation of the Constitution and the law, belongs only to members of the House of Commons. Senator Olson told me yesterday: "I am going on a crusade and you should follow my example; all senators should put the initials 'M.P.' after their names."

This is not a factious argument, Mr. Speaker. I believe that it is a legal and constitutional argument which deserves our consideration. I am not saying that I would call my honourable friend tomorrow morning to the bar of the House of Commons because he is using, illegally in my opinion, the initials "M.P." after his name.

[English]

Senator Haidasz: This is the Question Period.

Senator Asselin: I said that I was not sure whether I was going to raise a point of order, a question of privilege, or a question. I am almost finished; I will not be long.

[Translation]

Considering that all this matter is confusing, Mr. Speaker, I suggest you should consider it and make a ruling. I understand you were not in the house yesterday, for some good reason, but I shall refer you to yesterday's Hansard in which you will find the beginning of this debate on page 2244. I should like to know if I would also be allowed, under the Constitution or pursuant to the Senate and House of Commons Act, to use the words "Member of Parliament" after my name whenever I designate myself as a senator?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Speaking to the question of privilege—

The Hon. the Speaker: It is a point of order.

Senator Olson: Speaking only briefly to the point of order, I think it would help Senator Asselin a great deal if he read section 17 of the B.N.A. Act.

Senator Asselin: I have read it.

Senator Olson: If he has already read it, then he knows that it says:

> There shall be One Parliament for Canada—

Senator Flynn: Composed of?

Senator Asselin: Composed of the Queen—

Senator Olson: Section 17 goes on to say:

> —consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

Senator Walker: Good for you.

Senator Olson: They are all members of Parliament.

Senator Asselin: If you were the Queen, would you be, "Senator Bud Olson, the Queen, M.P.?"

Senator Olson: There are three components. Honourable senators can look at that section and make any interpretation they like. We are talking about who is a member of Parliament.

Senator Flynn: The Queen?

Senator Olson: And the members of the House of Commons and the members of the Senate. They make up Parliament.

Senator Roblin: Queen Elizabeth, M.P.

Senator Olson: In connection with the other matter raised on the point of order, I am not quite sure what the honourable senator wants to do when he makes his designation in French. It may be that "Député" is all that is used to designate a member of Parliament, but I think it may be "Député, Chambre des Communes." It is abbreviated, and if the connotation is that only a member of the House of Commons is a member of Parliament, then, in my opinion, that is wrong in that language, too.

Senator Asselin: Are you saying that I have the right to write after my name "Député" or "Senator, Député"?

Senator Olson: You have the right to use whatever abbreviation is appropriate to designate you as a member of Parliament.

Senator Roblin: What do you use if you are bilingual?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I cannot accept the point of order because I cannot give a legal opinion on what may be a serious matter. Honourable senators may discuss it, but I hope they do not expect me to give a legal opinion.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. All I asked was that you study the rules and consult your advisors to establish whether we can do that. I think it is more serious than some people would lead us to believe. It is a question of knowing if I have the right to add "député" after my name, or if Senator Olson has the right to add "member of Parliament" after his. Mr. Speaker, I suggest it is more serious than you think.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I did not say it was not serious. I simply said that you were asking me for a legal opinion and that it is not normal to expect me to give a legal opinion in this or any other case.

Senator Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I would simply urge you to ask your advisors for a legal opinion which you could then convey to the Senate.

FISHERIES

OVER-THE-SIDE SALES—ALLOCATION OF QUOTAS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if we could get back to fish. I would pose my question to the Leader of the Government. It has to do with the impending announcement of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans in regard to over-the-side sales, which is an important subject in the Province of Newfoundland.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate extract from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans information as to when he is going to make a decision on the allocation of the quotas which in-shore fishermen will be able to sell to the foreign trawlers and draggers in respect of over-the-side sales? Is the minister reconciling the problems this poses to the processors, who are also interested in the in-shore and off-shore catch in order to protect their overseas markets and to create employment for people on shore?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator's question is a detailed one. I do not have the information immediately at hand. The question will be directed to the Honourable the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Speaking of fisheries on the east coast, honourable senators, of interest is the fact that, as of March 21, the Canadian scallop catches on Georges Bank were about 35 per cent higher than for the same time in 1980. In the area of fisheries competition, Canadian fisheries are doing very well.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Tell the Senate committee to put that on their rice and eat it.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1981-82

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Frith for the second reading of Bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Bill C-59 has had a long, involved and rather unfortunate passage through the House of Commons and, to some extent, through the Senate in the short time it has been before us.

I say "long" because this bill was introduced for first reading in the other place on January 25; the discussion at the report stage started on February 16; and a vote was finally taken on April 7—which is an extraordinarily long time for a bill of this kind which has, inherent in it, a good deal of urgency as far as the manner in which it should be handled by the Parliament of Canada is concerned.

It is "involved" because the government found it necessary to introduce a form of closure in order to cut off the debate on an amendment so that the final vote could be speeded up. Instead of detracting from the problems that had already arisen, this caused new problems, particularly as far as time and additional delays are concerned. I say that because there immediately ensued a long procedural discussion on the closure motion itself.

I say it is "unfortunate" because this bill somehow got locked in with the constitutional amendment resolution debate, which is about the worst thing that could happen to any bill at this particular time in parliamentary history. It became, as it were, a hostage to whatever fate there may be for the constitutional amendment resolution.

[Senator Marshall.]

The bill was delayed in the Senate in a similar fashion, but the delay was created for different reasons. The "contents" of the bill, which is the phrase used, was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on March 12. The subject matter of the bill was considered by that committee on March 19, on which date that committee tabled its report.

The bill did not come before the Senate until yesterday, April 7. This has caused some problems of principle in the way we handle bills of this kind.

Last evening I asked the Deputy Leader of the Government whether it was the intention of the government to refer this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I gave him some reasons for that request. I think it is fair to say that his reply was negative, but not definitively or categorically so. Some subsequent discussions took place, after which, I believe, the Deputy Leader of the Government, for the management of the Senate, indicated that he may be prepared to accept the suggestion that it be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I am sure that we will hear from the Deputy Leader of the Government on that.

The reason I suggest that it be referred to that committee is because it has become the usual practice—one might say custom, convention or tradition—of the Senate that any bill dealing with finance be reported to the Senate by the committee before the Senate deals with it. There is good historical reason for that. At one time the Senate was seriously criticized because when appropriation bills of various kinds came to us it was said we simply rubber-stamped them. The Senate decided that such bills should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and reported on by that committee before the Senate dealt with them. In this particular case an exception was made, and I will deal with some reasons why I think that is something we should avoid in the future.

In the present context, I shall deal first of all, if I may, with the bill itself. The Deputy Leader of the Government told us that it was a short bill, which is quite correct. It is not much more than one page with three paragraphs, each of which is a clause. The Deputy Leader of the Government felt—and I don't disagree with him—that it contained three main principles: the question of the deficit, which we were discussing a few minutes ago; the added provisions providing for non-automatic cancellation; and the authorization to borrow in currencies other than Canadian.

However, it is my view that it is not quite that simple. Last evening Senator Frith stated:

> —where the subject matter of a bill . . . has more facets to it than the pure subject matter had, then it should be referred to committee in its more detailed form.

I agree with him on that. I believe that this is that kind of bill. Even though on the surface it may look simple, when one looks below the surface one will see that it is far from simple. On the surface, this is a normal request made year after year for borrowing authorization from Parliament. The bill before us includes the authority to carry over some part of the authorized borrowing sum, and also authorization to the government to borrow in currencies other than Canadian. That figure is an anticipated $11 billion deficit, based on the main estimates, as we have them, with an additional contingency request for $3 billion, making a total of $14 billion. That is the figure Parliament is asked to authorize. Questions have arisen about the propriety, particularly of the carry over, which I will mention in a moment.

Why the bill is not as simple as it may appear on the surface is that immediately we have the disclosure of a deficit, in this case an anticipated deficit, that calls for immediate criticism of government spending intentions and some careful analysis of those intentions, both gross and in detail. Some serious questions are inevitably raised about certain specific expenditures in the past or intended expenditures in the year ahead.

The concern, of course, is because deficit is debt—in this case, a substantial increase in the public debt of Canada. Debt, of course, has to be paid—has to be serviced; and the size of the annual deficit becomes an important item in the whole structure of government intentions, spending and otherwise.

At the present time, for example, the cost of servicing this debt may be somewhere between 17 and 25 per cent of the budget. I say "between 17 and 25 per cent of the budget" because it depends on what you call the budget—perhaps budgetary items, excluding statutory items, perhaps only the main estimates, not taking into account possible supplementaries, and so forth. Somewhere in that high level is the enormous cost of servicing the public debt. It is so high that the Minister of Finance admits it to be a burden which is:

> —a constraint on the government's ability to respond to various needs of national economic management.

That is how serious the problem is.

I do not think the facts are in dispute. In 1970 the federal budget was in balance. A year later the deficit was $400 million; the next year it was $700 million. By 1973 the deficit had increased to $1 billion; in 1976, $5.3 billion; in 1977, $6.1 billion; in 1978, $10 billion; in 1979, $12 billion. Today it has reached somewhere between $14 billion and $16 billion. I add the extra $2 billion because there is considerable evidence that there may be expenditures other than those provided by the $3 billion contingency. This is very normal in the working out of the relationship between the original projections in the main estimates and the public accounts at the end of the financial term.

● (1510)

We know that the public debt at the moment is a major constraint on the carrying out of all the desires of the Canadian public for benefits that should and can accrue to them from federal government and also provincial government expenditures.

It is because of the tremendous importance of the debt to such things as the general state of the economy, its relation to inflation and to the whole problem of fiscal management by the government, that I suggest that this bill now go to our National Finance Committee.

This is not a question of partisanship, as I believe the Deputy Leader of the Government will agree. I have to thank him for what I believe to be a reasonable accommodation between the views on this side and those on the other. No doubt he will speak to that. It is not for me to suggest what might be in his mind at this particular time.

It is an important principle that not only the contents of a bill such as this be referred to committee and reported on but also that the bill itself be considered. The present situation is a perfect case in point of the dangers that can follow when an attempt is made to short-cut our normal procedures. And for this reason. The report came to the Senate on March 19. That was when an important part of the serious discussion of the bill was beginning in the other place. Two and a half weeks of debate in the House of Commons ensued before a report was given to the Senate, perhaps on the assumption at that time that would be all we would need to have to deal intelligently with the bill.

In the meantime, what has happened has considerably changed the whole complexion of the bill since we had this report tabled here. A statement has been made that, in certain of the government borrowings, the rate it is paying is 17 per cent. That has not been discussed in our committee. I do not know whether it is true or not, but it is a statement that was made.

The question has arisen about what are called "current cash balances." Some have said that the true figure is not just $11 billion plus $3 billion, but goes to $14 billion plus $4.8 billion, which is a current cash carry-over which our committee has not yet—because it was not studying the bill—related to the borrowing authority we were asked to approve. The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance admitted, since this matter was discussed in our committee, that it was a "temporary aberration"—to use his own phrase—and it is "abnormally high." Surely our committee will want to have an explanation of that. No doubt there is a good explanation, but the committee does not have it and the Senate does not have it.

Some amendments were made by the opposition, debated and, to some extent, supported by both opposition parties, which would have the effect of cutting down the $11 billion to $8 billion, and cutting out entirely, for the time being at least, the $3 billion carry-over. This suggestion was not before our committee either. The motion was defeated, but not overwhelmingly. The reasons behind it—and some of them may have been good reasons—have not been considered by the committee and have not been reported to the Senate.

There was a suggestion that even if the $11 billion is the projected anticipated deficit for the year, why vote it all at once at the start of the year; why not wait and take $8 billion and come back and have the government subject itself to the discipline of explaining why the $8 billion was spent and why it needs the additional $3 billion to add up to the $11 billion?

The amendment also suggested that the government be denied the $3 billion carry-over. Here again, no important reason was given. Particularly, it is a bad principle, in the control of supply by Parliament, to grant money to the government or borrowing authority to the government—which, in the long run, is much the same thing—for which the government cannot give any explanation except that it may be a contingency. I am not saying that there may not be a contingency and that I do agree with that position, but I am merely making the point here that this is the kind of thing our committee should discuss and report to the Senate.

There is also a device in here to get around the Financial Administration Act. It may be necessary again, but it is a very serious thing when the government proposes, in effect, to amend the Financial Administration Act, which is the key act of Parliament's control of executive expenditures. It is very serious to say it is necessary, in effect, to amend the Financial Administration Act for another purpose. Surely, the proper way is to amend the Financial Administration Act itself, and put this kind of suggestion in the context of the Financial Administration Act and not in the context of a borrowing bill.

Another important reason why I believe the Deputy Leader of the Government will agree, I hope, to send this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance is that the committee itself expected to get the bill before it. All one has to do is look at the transcript of the hearings where, over and over again, senators say, "Well, of course, we will get this before us as a bill." Senator Hicks suggested that the committee report with "no comments to make concerning changes at this stage." The chairman himself said that the committee would be setting a very dangerous precedent to suggest that it had dealt with the bill, but rather should report that it was not suggesting any amendment at this stage. He said that the committee should do this in order to retain the right, when it receives the bill, to make an amendment. Senator Manning said that the tabling of the report did not prevent the committee from making any amendments in the future. The report, itself, as it came to the Senate, stated that:

> no suggested changes be made to the Bill at this time.

Surely, it is clear that the committee anticipated it would have the bill before it so that it could make a much more thorough report to the Senate.

● (1520)

Indeed, if honourable senators will look at our own Hansard, when the report came before us on March 19, the second heading is "Borrowing Authority," which merely says the chairman tabled his report. Then, if we go back to our own practice, later on in the same proceedings we find a complete and full report of the National Finance Committee appended to our proceedings. It is rather interesting, because there is always criticism when the opposition holds up a bill—which is what happened in this case in the other place—or it is held up here for other reasons. I find it very interesting that a distinguished parliamentarian, who is the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Trade), Mr. Claude-André Lachance, intervened in the debate at a fairly late stage on April 3 and said:

> I had not planned on taking part in this debate, but what has happened in the House in recent weeks and the repeated delays responsible for the fact that we are only now studying a bill which should normally have been passed several days ago, have perhaps made me more aware of the issue concerning the borrowing authority of the government and the related question of successive budgetary deficits of the Canadian government.

In other words, he said it had been a good thing that there had been this delay and further opportunity to study the bill as it was before the house. The distinguished parliamentarian said it was a very good thing, and that now he began to realize how important is the relationship of deficit financing to borrowing.

Honourable senators, that is pretty well the case that I have made through the usual channels, and I merely say now that we on this side of the house fully appreciate the urgency of expediting the passage of the bill. There is no purpose to be gained, that we can see, in holding it up and delaying it any longer. There are advantages in perhaps expediting its passage so that, if necessary, royal assent might even be given today. The Leader for the Government may have some reaction to that.

We are aware, of course, that the government at the moment has not the borrowing authority it obviously requires. It may even be put in the position of being in breach of the Financial Administration Act if it needs the kind of borrowing that it does not have the authority to make at the present moment.

With that, honourable senators, I renew the suggestion that the bill should go to the National Finance Committee. I do not think that under these constrained circumstances we need to insist on a long written report. It would satisfy me, at least, if there were a discussion, if some of the questions I have suggested—and there may be others—could be asked, and a verbal report could be made in this case by the deputy chairman of the committee.

I renew the suggestion and pay my compliments to the Deputy Leader of the Government for the excellent and very full description of the content of the bill that he gave us, and also for his courtesy in the corridors.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as Senator Grosart has pointed out, I believe we have reached what could accurately be described as a consensus. I listened carefully to what both he and Senator Roblin said last evening and to what Senator Grosart has said today. I believe his position is well taken, on principle, that we should not encourage the view that pre-study of the principle of a bill is going to be taken as an excuse to short-circuit it by the committee when the bill itself arrives before us.

Among the many arguments that he has advanced in favour of referring this to the committee, one of the most cogent was his citations from the proceedings before the committee when it gave the subject matter of the bill pre-study. Members of the committee clearly expected they would have an opportunity to see the actual bill, ask questions about it, and consider the bill when it came before the Senate for adoption.

Honourable senators, on the three basic principles raised, I appreciate and agree with the honourable senator's position that the deficit plays an extremely important role in all aspects of government and operates, as he said, as a constraint on many programs. But it is also an inevitable corollary to acceptance of a budget that shows a deficit, since if there is a deficit one must have some way of getting the money for that deficit. However, that is also a subject which, as he said, could properly be discussed in committee.

With regard to the other two points, Senator Grosart is quite right that the carry-over provision is an attempt to solve the previous problem, and also the authority in subclause (3) to borrow in foreign currencies. These are items that should properly be established in the Financial Administration Act. As I said in my comments in support of the bill, the intention is to do just that. In that sense, this is a purely temporary measure, and we hope that Senator Grosart's suggestion will, in fact, find its expression in an amendment to the Financial Administration Act.

So, the consensus we have reached is that clearly it is advisable and desirable in principle, and in this particular case, for the committee to study the bill. The consensus that was reached with the other side with regard to our exigencies on this side related to the urgency in obtaining passage of this bill. The compromise we have reached is that we shall ask the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to meet immediately, and I shall ask leave that the committee be permitted to sit while the Senate is sitting and convene immediately. The committee would meet in Room 356-S.

I have, at the suggestion of and with the agreement of the spokesman for the opposition on the bill, Senator Grosart, arranged for the attendance of someone from the department. Senator Grosart pointed out that we would be under some pressure to get such attendance, and he particularly mentioned an official of the Department of Finance who, he thought, could probably give information on a number of questions that were concerning him.

With that, I will be asking leave that the committee be permitted to sit while the Senate is sitting. If permission is given, I will then move that the bill be referred to committee for consideration forthwith, in the hope that the committee will have the opportunity to report it today. If that is done, we will take the steps that follow for Royal Assent.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think the normal procedure would be to give second reading to the bill, and then move that the bill be referred to committee. We would then give leave for the committee to sit.

Senator Frith: I merely wanted to make clear what elements we would need to bring about this consensus. The sequence is exactly as described by the Leader of the Opposition.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

SPECIAL INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT—CONCEPT AND DESIGN OF PROGRAM

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Murray calling the attention of the Senate to the government's Special Investment Tax Credit Program for areas of greatest disparity, announced in the Budget address of October 28th, 1980, and to inter-ministerial confusion in the concept and design of the program.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, just before we stand or do anything with that order, which stands in my name—and I am prepared to make an intervention on that subject at this time, to huzzas from Senator Murray, I am sure—we can proceed with that order, if it is agreeable, while we wait to see if the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance will have a report for us.

I also suggest, even before we do that, that the Leader of the Government tell us if he has anything to say with regard to any agreement that may have been reached in the other place on the subject of the resolution on the Constitution.

[Later:]

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, since this was my inquiry, I just want to say that I have been waiting since February 11 for a reply. In light of this fact, I can wait another day and this will give me an opportunity to read the speech that I delivered on that long-ago date and to prepare for Senator Frith's reply.

THE CONSTITUTION—MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—ALL-PARTY AGREEMENT IN HOUSE OF COMMONS—STATEMENT BY LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am pleased to report that an agreement has been reached in the other place. By House Order, all three parties have agreed on the method by which the other place will deal with the Constitution proposals. I think it is a rather encouraging agreement, having, as it does, the consent and support of all parties.

I would certainly appreciate an opportunity to meet with the Leader of the Opposition this afternoon to discuss the events in the other place, and the procedures which could possibly be agreed upon for this chamber.

Perhaps I could now describe, in capsule form, the agreement reached in the other place.

There will be a three-day debate, during which it has been agreed that each party, through its house leader, will move omnibus amendment proposals, if they choose to do so. Those will be debated during that three-day period. There will be a vote at the end of the three days.

Senator Asselin: On what?

Senator Perrault: On the amendments to the Constitution.

Then the proposals on the Constitution, as amended, will be available for the Supreme Court to study. We will then await the opinion of the court, and, following that determination by the court, at some point in the future—and the date of that event has yet, of course, to be determined—there will be a two-day debate for the purpose of discussing the proposals in light of the court's decisions and a final vote taken on the proposals.

It may be of value now to discuss in the Senate how we should proceed, and that is why I seek a meeting with the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think, as a matter of interest, that the Leader of the Government should mention when the House of Commons would be sitting in order to consider the amendments. My understanding is that they have set the dates of April 21, 22 and 23. Is that correct?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, would it be helpful to read some of the details of the motion?

Senator Flynn: I think that for the information of senators it would be.

Senator Perrault: The document reads as follows:

[Senator Frith.]

That the motion of the Minister of Justice for an Address to Her Majesty concerning the Constitution of Canada (Government Orders, Government Business, Number 36) shall be disposed of as follows:

1. The motion and any amendments proposed thereto shall be the business considered on Tuesday, April 21, 1981, Wednesday, April 22, 1981 and Thursday, April 23, 1981 and on those days no Member shall speak for more than thirty minutes.

May I point out that the house will consider these amendments after the premiers have had their conference, so that these debating days on the amendments will take place during the week following Easter.

2. No later than 6:00 p.m. on April 21, 1981, the House Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party and the House Leader of the New Democratic Party, and no later than 10:00 p.m., on April 21, 1981, the Government House Leader may give notice of one amendment to the said motion affecting one or more provisions of the motion and any such amendments shall be printed on the Notice Paper until disposed of.

That may be an omnibus resolution, encompassing all of the proposals of the parties in the other place.

3. No amendments or sub-amendments may be proposed to the said motion except as provided in the preceding paragraph.

4. At 9:45 p.m. on April 23, 1981 the Speaker shall put without further debate or amendment every question necessary to dispose of any proposed amendment an any amendment put on notice pursuant to paragraph numbered 2 of this Order which shall be deemed to have been proposed for the purpose of this Order. No Member shall rise to speak after this hour, but all such questions as must be decided in order to comply with this Order shall be decided forthwith before the House adjourns.

5. The Government shall not designate any days on which the said motion shall be dealt with until the first sitting day following the rendering of the decision by the Supreme Court of Canada on the appeals concerning the opinions of the Manitoba Court of Appeal rendered on February 3, 1981 and the Newfoundland Court of Appeal rendered on March 31, 1981 on the questions put to the said Courts concerning the amendment of the Constitution of Canada.

6. On any day that is designated for dealing with the said motion as may have been amended the hours of sitting shall be as follows:

On Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays: From 10:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m. and from 2:00 p.m. to 11:59 p.m.

On Wednesdays: From 2:00 p.m. to 11:59 p.m.

On Fridays: From 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m. and from 2:00 p.m. to 7:00 p.m.

Provided that on any such day no private members business or proceeding pursuant to Standing Order 40 shall be taken up.

6(a) A designated day for the purposes of this Order is a day appointed by a Minister of the Crown by written notice to the Clerk at least twenty-four hours in advance and, if necessary, such notice shall be published in a special notice paper. A day shall be deemed a designated day for the purpose of this Order regardless of whatever proceedings are before the House at any time during that day.

7. On any day designated by the Government pursuant to the preceding paragraph no Member shall speak for more than twenty minutes and no amendments shall be proposed.

Honourable senators, I am providing all of the details because I think it is important to have this in our record, whether or not it is relevant to our own proceedings here.

Senator Flynn: It is important to know.

Senator Perrault: The order continues as follows:

8. At fifteen minutes before the time of adjournment on the second day designated by the Government pursuant to the paragraph numbered 6 and 6(a) of this Order the Speaker shall at that hour put the motion as may have been amended. No Member shall rise to speak for any purpose after that time and all questions necessary to dispose of the said motion of the Minister of Justice shall be put forthwith without further debate.

Provided that nothing in this Order shall be considered to affect in any manner or to any degree the separation of the legislative and judicial powers, a fundamental principle of our Constitution.

That is the house order that has been adopted by all the parties in the House of Commons this afternoon.

Honourable senators, it may be useful, I think, to have a meeting involving the house leaders this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: I would just like to say that we should have meetings today. We could then probably be in a position to prepare some kind of understanding for tomorrow, before we adjourn, as to how the Senate should deal with this matter, in light of the developments in the other place.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in light of that, I think we could probably do more service to the Senate by adjourning to await the call of the bell on a report from the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Then, perhaps, after that we might adjourn for royal assent, if that becomes appropriate. I think the Senate would be better served by a meeting between the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition on the constitutional matter rather than by listening to Senator Murray and myself discussing the tax credit items.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether any determination has been made as to how all the questions are to be determined by the Supreme Court of Canada? Is it by appeal from the Court of Appeal of Newfoundland, or will there be an entirely new set of questions from the dominion government?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice. Perhaps I will be able to bring a statement to the chamber on this matter when we reconvene later this day. I understand that meetings are taking place with the legal officials now to determine a number of questions.

Senator Walker: That is very important.

Senator Perrault: I shall endeavour to make a statement to the Senate as soon as possible.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us—and I probably could have figured this out for myself if I had been able to follow carefully what he stated—the date on which the whole resolution must leave the House of Commons under this agreement or this order.

Senator Perrault: The dates which have been allocated and agreed upon as a house order in the other place are Tuesday, April 21, Wednesday, April 22 and Thursday, April 23. Those are the dates when all the amendments will be dealt with so that the court will be in a position to know, at least insofar as is possible, the final shape of the resolution on the Constitution.

Senator Smith: I take it, then, that April 23 is the date when the matter must be settled pursuant to the order of that house.

Senator Perrault: Yes, in the other place.

Senator Frith: When the form has to be settled for the court.

• (1550)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it may well be, in view of points made by a number of honourable senators, that the Senate should have a period following that to debate this issue. Perhaps we should consider dates such as April 22, April 23 and 24 to consider the matter in this place. In any case, it seems to me it would be appropriate to have the Senate discuss these proposals further.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1981-82

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, because of the urgency recognized by the house this afternoon and the recommendation that the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance hold a sitting, we have proceeded as requested and have examined bill C-59, to provide supplementary borrowing authority.

[English]

Honourable senators, the following witnesses appeared: Mr. John Evans, M.P., Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance; Mr. S. J. Handfield-Jones, Assistant Deputy Minister, Fiscal Policy and Economic Analysis Branch, Department of Finance; and Mr. Gordon W. King, Director, Capital Markets Division, Department of Finance. There was a good turn-out of members of the committee, and the following are some of the questions that were answered by the witnesses: the relation of current cash balances to the requested borrowing authority; amendments proposed in the other place; the effect of the Financial Administration Act on foreign currency borrowing; provincial and municipal input into fiscal and monetary decision-making at the federal level; the nature of the authority requested in the contingency item of $3 billion; and other related matters.

Honourable senators, as deputy chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, I now wish to present the following report:

April 8, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which was referred Bill C-59, "An Act to provide supplementary borrowing authority," has in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, April 8, 1981, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

F. LEBLANC,
Deputy Chairman.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time, and passed.

PRIVILEGE

THE SENATE—TIME OF SITTING

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of privilege which, perhaps, is also a point of order.

I know that today the leaders on both sides of this house met to make mutually satisfactory arrangements for the conduct of affairs in this chamber. That is quite proper and encouraging, and it should be the case. I believe, however, when we adjourn to 2 o'clock, or to any other time, that at that hour the bell should be rung and the members of the Senate should be able to come to their places in the chamber. If, at that point, there is some urgent business that requires the leaders to hold discussions elsewhere, the house could then be adjourned and the members fully informed as to the reason for the adjournment. What happened today, when the members of this chamber did not know what was occurring until an hour and five minutes after the time to which the Senate was adjourned, in my opinion, is not right.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree totally with what Senator Molson has said, and since, in practice, it is my responsibility to say when the bell shall be rung, I apologize to all honourable senators. To the extent that it is within my power to do so, I will not let this happen again.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I join with the Deputy Leader of the Government in expressing my regrets to Senator Molson, because I was a party to that decision. We thought that the delay would last only 15 minutes—as has happened previously—but we found that we could not work as fast as we had anticipated. As far as I am concerned, I think the point is well taken. Perhaps we should leave to His Honour the Speaker the responsibility of the bell.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators will no doubt expect me to rule on this matter. When I am asked to order that the Senate meet "tomorrow at 2 p.m.," it is, of course, normal for honourable senators to expect to be present in the chamber at that time. I believe the procedure that has been suggested is the right one. It does not give me more power than I already have; honourable senators should not be concerned about that.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, because recently it has been our custom on Thursdays, under Notices of Motion, to discuss the program for the ensuing week or weeks, I ask honourable senators for the opportunity to explain the subject of the meeting which delayed our sitting this afternoon. The meeting was held in an attempt to work out an arrangement for the Senate to deal with the resolution on the Constitution in response to the house order adopted unanimously in a three-party agreement in the other place.

I do not have anything concrete to report to you today on that subject, except that we are discussing a draft proposal which we intend to present to honourable senators for their approval, the exact terms of which we have not yet been able to settle. Therefore, the proposal is to consider the matter over the weekend; to meet next Tuesday before our sitting in the evening; and to have something for honourable senators to consider when we sit on Tuesday evening.

I gave notice of a motion for an adjournment until Tuesday next, at 8 o'clock in the evening, and I will, therefore, be making that motion.

I anticipate that we will sit on Tuesday next at 8 o'clock in the evening and on Wednesday next at 2 o'clock in the afternoon. I suggest that we aim to adjourn next Wednesday afternoon, since I do not think we will be required to sit on Thursday. I realize that this may create some problems for committees, but I do not know if that is the case.

I wish to inform honourable senators that I believe it will be in order for them to make plans for next Thursday on, since I do not believe that we will be sitting on Wednesday evening or on Thursday.

Senator Asselin: Until when?

Senator Frith: Then we would not sit until Wednesday of the ensuing week because, pursuant to its order, the House of Commons will begin its debate on the Tuesday of that week.

In compliance with the order in the other place, the House of Commons will commence the first stage of the amending procedure on Tuesday. According to the order, amendments have to be moved in the other place by the close of business on Tuesday.

As it looks now, we will probably agree to an order here, to respond to the order in the other place, under which the Senate will sit on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of that week.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I think it would be useful to advise the Senate, if it is known, as to what plans the House of Commons may have concerning Easter recess. I have heard that after they have disposed of the amendments on April 23, as is provided in the order which deals with the Constitution package, they may adjourn until May 11 or 12, which is two full weeks. Assuming that that is what will happen in the other place, would the deputy leader tell us what his plans are for the Senate?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, my understanding is the same as that of the Leader of the Opposition. However, the Leader of the Government in the Senate may have some clarifying comments as to whether that is what is going to take place.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that matter is under negotiation at the present time. As of this morning, there was discussion about the possibility of a two-week recess until approximately May 11 or 12. However, no decisions have yet been made. It is a subject of discussion with the opposition house leaders in the other place.

Senator Flynn: Assuming these circumstances, is it expected that the Senate will return at the same time as the House of Commons, or a week later?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it really depends on the work which is before us. This is a matter we will discuss with the Leader of the Opposition, and I am sure that a satisfactory arrangement can be achieved.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN— REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe this question was put yesterday to the Leader of the Government, and I am repeating it in the hope he might have a reply today. In the other place the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada seems to be on the appeal from the judgments of both the Manitoba Court of Appeal and the Newfoundland Court of Appeal. There is no indication that, if the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal is rendered before the hearing of those other appeals by the Supreme Court of Canada, it will be included, or if the Government of Canada is to submit questions to the Supreme Court of Canada which might not be included in the references by the Government of Newfoundland and the Government of Manitoba.

In case a decision is rendered by the Quebec Court of Appeal, is it the intention to try to have a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which would solve all the problems related to the constitutional package?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I stated yesterday, I hope to bring a detailed statement on the subject to the chamber as soon as possible. However, it is my understanding that the distinguished Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada will be meeting with counsel to discuss the issues that the court should deal with. It is also my understanding that it will be the intention to have considered as wide a range of subjects as possible. However, it is not the intention of the government to proceed, under section 55 of the Supreme Court Act, to refer the proposals on the Constitution to the Supreme Court.

Senator Flynn: It may not be necessary, but suppose the Supreme Court is in a position to deal with all the problems that could be dealt with by way of a reference under section 55 of the Supreme Court Act?

FISHERIES

GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—CLOSURE OF HERRING FISHERY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which has to do with the disturbing news that the herring fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence has been closed just a few days before the official opening of the season. Could the Leader of the Government find out on what basis this decision was made, and what scientific knowledge was advanced, since scientists take a long time to decide on the stocks?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Marshall: In view of the fact that just a month ago, at a seminar in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, the most important topic of discussion had do with the future of the herring fishery, would the leader also find out why, after that discussion, the scientific knowledge was not known a month before the season was supposed to open and they are taking away the livelihood of one-third of herring seiners in Atlantic Canada, particularly in New Brunswick?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that supplementary information will be sought. I do not have the requested information today.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL—VOLUME OF SHIPMENTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question to address to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board in respect of the Port of Churchill. I suspect he is aware of the problem that appears to have arisen there regarding the volume of wheat available for shipment through that port, and the opinion expressed by the National Harbours Board that, unless the volume of wheat is increased, it might be advisable to consider the future of that port, and certainly its temporary closing. Could the minister report any progress on the development of such volume of grain to be moved through Churchill to avoid the difficulty that the National Harbours Board has made reference to?

● (1515)

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, the question raised by Senator Roblin is an important one.

Last year the volume of grain shipped through the Port of Churchill was less than that hoped for. This year the outlook is certainly for a large shipment of grain to go through that port. I do not have the figures, but I believe that the Canadian Wheat Board has stated it is able to assure that between 200,000 and 300,000 tons of grain will be shipped out of that port this year. I have held talks with the Canadian Wheat Board, and I am very much in favour of supporting the Port of Churchill in every practical way, including having the Canadian Wheat Board do everything it can, within good business practices, to see that the largest possible volume of grain goes through that port.

The Canadian Wheat Board wishes to use that port to the maximum in keeping with its duty, as the representative of the producers, to sell into markets that bring the producers the greatest possible return for their grain.

This question is being actively looked at. However, I am unable to say right now that additional grain will be shipped through that port. It is hoped that it may be possible to increase the stated amount, and to make such an announcement in a reasonable time, if it is practical.

As I understand it, the prospects for a midsummer's crop in western Canada are, in fact, excellent, and the Canadian Wheat Board is hopeful that at that time it might be able to arrange for additional shipments of grain to go through the Port of Churchill. Until there is some indication of the kind of supply that may come from this year's crop, it is not certain just how far, if at all, it may go to increase shipments through that port. That is based on the public information that it has made available.

The National Harbours Board—in other words, the Government of Canada—and the Canadian Wheat Board are really the only people who are currently standing behind the Port of Churchill. Representatives from the Government of Saskatchewan and the Government of Manitoba make many comments about the value of the Port of Churchill, but, you know, one looks for action and not only words. There should be some commitment from the provincial governments to ship products other than grain through that port. I have in mind particularly potash.

In any event, that is the Canadian Wheat Board's shipping program. The matter is under active consideration. The Canadian Wheat Board will do everything practical from a business standpoint to use that port to the fullest extent.

As far as I am concerned, as the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, and as a farmer, I do not want to be a fair-weather friend of Churchill. Usually, grain shipped through the Port of Churchill has returned a higher price to the producers than has grain shipped through the Port of Thunder Bay. In certain circumstances, it may be more expensive to ship grain through the Port of Churchill—and it has been more expensive to ship grain through the Port of Churchill—but I feel that that port should be supported even though on some occasions it might mean a net cost to the producers; in other words, a lower final payment.

As I have stated, I believe that the Port of Churchill is good for the grain industry and is good for Canada over the long period. I hope that circumstances develop that make it possible for the Canadian Wheat Board to ship larger quantities of grain through that port this year.

• (1520)

Senator Roblin: I suppose I have to continue my questioning, in view of the minister's reference to the attitude of the province toward Churchill. Up to that point I was with him, but he quickly lost me when he began to trespass on that particular area.

I asked the minister if he could possibly find out for me what quantities of grain are estimated to be available for shipment through Churchill in its natural tributary territory in northern Saskatchewan. Because the future of the port is not only a function of the grain that can be made available to go through it, but also a function of whether the customer will take delivery through Churchill, I also asked whether the minister will ascertain from the members of the Canadian Wheat Board their opinion about the prospects of obtaining sufficient sales for delivery through Churchill that will match both the supply of grain and the capacity of the port.

With regard to the question of the Port of Churchill itself, in the interests of accuracy, I must inform the minister that the Province of Manitoba has spent millions of dollars—I repeat, millions of dollars—on the infrastructure and on other facilities and amenities in the Churchill district. I think it unfair to indicate that the province is a fair-weather friend or is uninterested in the future of that port. The Province of Manitoba has always supported the On-To-The-Bay Association, as I am sure my honourable friend is aware.

The fact of the matter is that, with regard to the Province of Manitoba—Saskatchewan can speak for itself—the only volume commodity that is available to justify the use of the port is grain. If grain cannot move through it, any other commodity will have difficulty. Studies have been made with regard to the possibility of pulp and other natural products going through that port. I must tell my honourable friend that, as compared to the movement of grain, no other product is remotely as economic. Potash may be another matter. Manitoba has no potash mines at the present time, so I will reserve any comments on that. However, I think it is unfair of the minister to indicate that the Province of Manitoba, for one, is not interested in this topic.

Senator Argue: I receive a lot of advice from the government out there, but I think the proof of the pudding is in the eating. It would be nice to see some real action undertaken to help move other commodities through that port. Although the figures I have given to Senator Roblin are approximate, they are accurate. With respect to the use of the Port of Churchill for the shipment of grain this year, as I understand it, there is no problem with the sales end. It is a question of supplies and of encouraging prospects for a good crop this summer and, for that matter, the entire year. With good prospects, the farmers would be much more likely to commit the amounts of grain that are necessary for the use of the port.

Senator Roblin: I hope that is the case. However, I must tell the minister that the basis of my concern is the statement reported by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and alleged to have been made by the Chairman of the National Harbours Board, to the effect that, with respect to this year, the port should remain closed unless the Wheat Board can increase the 250,000 tonnes of grain presently marked for export through Churchill.

I suppose my principal question is: Will the minister report to the house as to the prospect of increasing this quantity of 250,000 tonnes to be exported through Churchill? Will he emphasize, with all concern, the desirability of making sure that happens?

Senator Argue: I think I have answered that question accurately. There is no dispute about the amount of 250,000 tonnes. The Wheat Board is hopeful that it may be possible to increase that slightly, even under present circumstances. If, by June, a good crop is indicated, the Wheat Board feels that it can look at the entire situation with some hope of having a further quantity of grain committed through the Port of Churchill for the fall.

With regard to the statement by the Chairman of the National Harbours Board, or anybody else, to the effect that the Port of Churchill should be closed, I think that is incorrect advice. Closure of the port should be resisted, and I do not think anybody should agree with that proposal. I certainly do not agree with it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: In my opinion, that kind of idle threat is of no help to the Port of Churchill.

• (1525)

Senator Roblin: Of course, that is what my honourable friend ought to say, and I hope that he says the same thing to the Chairman of the National Harbours Board. What puzzles me is that the minister just told the house that there is no problem in obtaining orders. Does he mean to say that, no matter what the harvest is in western Canada, all they can find is 250,000 tonnes of wheat to go through that port? He cannot mean that.

Senator Argue: I did not say that.

Senator Roblin: In that case my honourable friend, as usual, has succeeded in confusing me completely. I may be easily confused—I probably am easily confused—but I can tell my honourable friend that he is an expert at confusing, and could confuse anybody about anything.

Senator Argue: If that is the case, then my friend is a very good pupil. I said there would be shipments of 250,000 tonnes, that there would be an increase if at all possible and that, if there is a good crop, a further increase. However, if the honourable senator wants the information in bushels, he will not get it from me because I cannot forecast what the crop will be, and I will not attempt to give figures on how much grain the Wheat Board is likely to put through that port. The answer was very accurate, very factual, and I do not think that anything more can be said at this time, unless somebody wishes to mislead somebody else, and I am not trying to do that.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Is there any particular reason why we cannot be assured that there will be not only a modest increase but a sizable increase in shipments of grain through the Port of Churchill in order to guarantee its future?

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, consideration must be given to the question of the availability of grain along the rail lines adjacent to the port and the feeder lines which would allow for an interchange to take place. The Wheat Board, which, I believe, knows its business, believes, on the basis of its available supplies, that at this time it is impossible to make a larger commitment. I do not know of anybody who knows the business of the Wheat Board better than the Board itself, and that is the information I received.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, it would be most unfortunate if we were to take the same attitude toward the Port of Thunder Bay. Why can we not take a positive attitude and say that everything possible will be done to ensure the future of the Port of Churchill?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: It is great to hear loud applause from the other side. The Canadian Wheat Board has calculated that if it were to double the current prospects of the shipments of grain to the Port of Churchill, without taking into consideration anything else, it would cost the Board an additional $6 million or more. As the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, I am not prepared to commit the pocketbooks of western wheat producers to a payment of $6 million. That port must be economically viable, and I believe that in the long term it will be economically viable. I also believe that the Wheat Board would be making a grave mistake if it were to use that port to its maximum capacity at all times, no matter what the cost. No other business firm in this country would even consider using an uneconomic facility.

I do not believe the facility there is uneconomic. I believe that the Port of Churchill is a good facility, but it does not have too many friends in places where it counts. However, I think it would be silly to spend $6 million to support the port for one year because that money will have to be paid by the grain producers of western Canada. If we force the western producers to contribute $6 million to the use of that port while nothing is contributed by the Government of Manitoba or the Government of Saskatchewan, then the only friends which the Port of Churchill has, namely, some western producers, will be lost. I am a friend of the Port of Churchill.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, I am also a friend of the Port of Churchill. However, I feel that the same hand which supports the Wheat Board is also helping to keep that port open through dredging operations, and so on, which cost millions of dollars. Since it is costing the federal government so much money to keep the port open, I believe the government should make full use of it, even though it may cost the Wheat Board an extra $6 million.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

FEDERAL AID FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TRADE AND CONVENTION CENTRES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On July 14, 1980, he expressed his personal support for the consideration of the request by the City of Winnipeg for assistance for its convention centre. At the time, he commented that Senator Guay would be exerting all the strength he could muster—and we all know that is a lot—within the government caucus in order to try to obtain such aid, and promised that Senator Guay's efforts in that regard would have his full support. I am now wondering whether the leader is able to tell us if he and Senator Guay, in exerting all the strength they could muster in caucus, have yet succeeded in obtaining any funding whatever for Winnipeg's convention centre.

● (1530)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to say that I attended a convention at the Winnipeg convention centre a fews months ago. It is a marvellous facility, and it is greatly to the credit of the people of Winnipeg and Manitoba, in general, that it came into existence. I have directed inquiries to the appropriate sources in government to try to determine whether there is additional aid available for that facility. It was, I understand, constructed before the trade and convention centre program was launched by the federal government. Now, whether there are plans under way to improve or to enhance the facility, I do not know. Certainly, I would support the proposition of federal help for efforts of that kind.

I want to confirm the fact that Senator Guay has been unceasing in his efforts to help Manitoba and in his support of all the initiatives which have been undertaken on behalf of that great province.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Guay is always unceasing. It was for that reason that I asked the question.

I have a supplementary. In October of last year the Minister of State (Small Businesses) wrote to the Mayor of Winnipeg saying that, because of commitments to Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal, further requests for convention centre assistance could not be entertained for three or four years. Is the leader able to confirm that, despite the minister's letter, financial assistance totalling some $10.8 million has since been granted to Halifax, Windsor, Hamilton and Charlottetown?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice, and I would appreciate receiving from the honourable senator copies of letters which may help me in my efforts to try to make known here the further needs of that particular facility.

Senator Nurgitz: I do have copies of that correspondence.

As a further supplementary, I wonder if the leader is able to confirm that, in the case of Windsor, government assistance will allow, for example, the renovation of an existing centre, which appears to run counter to what I, at least, thought was government policy, namely, that existing facilities would not receive any funding.

Senator Perrault: That will be part of the inquiry that will be made of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and that information will be sought.

As I stated earlier, I think this is a case where it appears that the centre was built before the national convention centre program became operative. In a sense, it is unfortunate that the Winnipeg centre was built as early as it was. Whether anything can be done after the fact, I do not know. Certainly, it is unlikely and I do not want to hold out that promise.

A number of requests have come in from various cities in Canada for aid for trade and convention centres. I think it can be said generally that governments have programs which may appear, initially, to favour one province over another. For example, one must remember that there has been enormous federal government investment in power projects in the province of Manitoba, and that specific kind of aid has not been available to certain other provinces. In many ways, the federal government has been very attentive to the needs of the province of Manitoba.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN PEACEKEEPING

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Has the Canadian government been approached with regard to participating in a possible peacekeeping force in Lebanon, and if not, what is the government doing to help the situation in that country?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can appreciate the honourable senator's concern about the situation in Lebanon. We have a late report that came in this afternoon. A ceasefire has gone into effect in both Zahlé and Beirut, and so far appears to be holding. The Lebanese police have taken control of the principal entrances to Zahlé, at least provisionally. Talks are reportedly going ahead concerning arrangements for deployment of the Lebanese army to Zahlé. Our embassy in Beirut continues to function without difficulty. It is situated in a part of west Beirut which is relatively quiet. The Secretary of State for External Affairs today issued a press release on this subject. This covers the points on which the honourable senator has requested information. It is very short, and is as follows:

> The Secretary of State for External Affairs, Dr. Mark MacGuigan, today expressed grave concern at the recent outbreak of violence in Lebanon. The large number of reported cases of injury and death of innocent civilians is particularly distressing and must not be allowed to continue.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

> Canada calls upon all parties to the conflict to refrain from further hostilities and to respect the ceasefire. Canada also urges the parties to respect the duly constituted authorities, to negotiate an end to their differences and to work toward restoring stability in Lebanon.
>
> These points are being brought to the attention of the Lebanese and Syrian governments as well as to others concerned.
> Dr. MacGuigan announced that if an appeal for assistance to Lebanon were launched by an internationally recognized humanitarian organization, sympathetic consideration would be given to any request for assistance from Canada.

There is no immediate information about the possibility of further Canadian assistance to a peackeeping force in that particular area.

THE SENATE

FAMEE FURLANE CLUB OF TORONTO—INABILITY TO ATTEND DELAYED SITTING

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, may I put another question to the government leader on an unrelated matter?

In an endeavour to encourage a greater sense of awareness among minority groups with regard to the political process on Parliament Hill, I had as my guests today some 50 senior citizens who are members of the Famee Furlane Club of Toronto. They were accompanied by Mr. John Sacilotto. The senior citizens were looking forward to seeing the Senate in session. I was wondering whether the leader was aware that because of the delay in the sitting of the Senate these people missed Question Period, as they had to take the bus back to Toronto.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know all honourable senators share Senator Bosa's regret, on hearing that this group came especially from Toronto to see the Senate in operation and were disappointed when we did not sit at 2 p.m. I hope that the Honourable Senator Bosa will extend to these good Torontonians our regret at the delay in the beginning of today's proceedings.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

EMPLOYMENT OF THE DISABLED AND HANDICAPPED

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government.

The major recommendation of the Special Commons Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped was that companies with more than 100 employees bidding on government contracts worth more than $20,000 would be required to show evidence of an acceptable hiring program for the disabled. Yesterday the Minister of Supply and Services said that he would not meet that recommendation.

Would the leader inquire as to whether, in this International Year of the Disabled, the government intends to honour any of the recommendations made by the special committee; and, further, would he appeal to his colleague to reverse what, in my opinion, was his rather hasty decision on this critical situation?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

Senator Muir: I thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I have a supplementary question that the Leader of the Government can also take as notice, if he prefers.

The Minister of Supply and Services, through this deplorable action and decision, has cast a cloud over the usefulness of special parliamentary committees such as the one on the disabled and handicapped. May I ask the leader if Parliament can expect that, in future, the government will be more open-minded to recommendations of committees created on its own initiative? Otherwise, I think the public will see such committees as no more than window-dressing if we do not act on some of their excellent recommendations.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the report produced by the committee in the other place on the subject of the disabled in Canada, in my opinion, is one of the finest reports ever produced in Parliament. Chaired by a member of the government party, its efforts were admirably supported by members of the official opposition. It was a first-rate example of parliamentarians working together to study one of the real concerns in society. I want to assure honourable senators that the government will not be found lacking in its determination to implement many of the report's recommendations.

● (1540)

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I am pleased to hear that reply from the Leader of the Government. I can take that as an assurance that he will lobby his colleague, the Honourable Jean-Jacques Blais, to reverse this, as I said previously, very hasty decision not even to think it over for a little while. I can assume that the Leader of the Government will prevail upon the honourable gentleman to change it.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator has stated that a hasty decision was taken. I have yet to read Mr. Blais' statement on the subject, if indeed he issued a statement. I do know him as a rather compassionate Canadian, and I have always found that particular minister to be very sensitive to human needs. So I would not wish to make an unfair judgment on a situation of which I have no direct knowledge.

Senator Flynn: Is he different from any other member of the cabinet?

ENERGY

REVIEW OF NUCLEAR INDUSTRY

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government concerning our very important nuclear industry, which is based on the figure of $2.5 billion and involves 40,000 employees, and which now seems to be facing great difficulties.

I am particularly interested in the internal review about which the minister in charge of that activity has been talking. I should like to ask when that review will be made public and if it is designed to look into the diminution of safeguards as a device and technique whereby Canada may improve its sales of reactors abroad.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that question will be taken as notice.

NUCLEAR INDUSTRY—SAFETY STANDARDS

Senator Macquarrie: May I ask the government leader if, in his research, he will also look at the other aspect whereby we learn that the Canadian government is seeking international support for the raising of standards under IAEA, which would seem to be a preferable suggestion to the one to which I have just alluded?

Senator Perrault: That question will also be taken as notice.

TRANSPORT

AIR CANADA—MONTREAL-TORONTO—FARE REDUCTION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government concerning the interesting announcement by Air Canada that it is going to reduce by $40 its fare between Montreal and Toronto. While I am happy for the many thousands of people who travel between those two points, it is difficult to reconcile how the company is only following the lead—it is supposed to be the main airline in Canada—of Nordair and CP Air. The company is always asking for an increase because it says its expenses are too high. How can the company suddenly decrease by $40 the fare between Montreal and Toronto? Why, in the name of all that's decent, did the company not do it before, instead of increasing it by $40; and why is it not now decreasing its fares to other points in Canada, to which many people cannot afford to travel by air?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not in possession of any statement with respect to Air Canada's air fare pricing policy, so the question must be taken as notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

AFRICA—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN HUMANITARIAN ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Macquarrie yesterday concerning the African Refugee Conference.

The conference called by the UN General Assembly, with the Organization of African Unity and United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, has as its main objective the mobilization of additional humanitarian relief for refugees throughout Africa.

Canada has announced at the conference a contribution of $22.4 million as follows: $16 million on emergency food aid to countries where the refugee problem is most acute—Ethiopia, Somalia, Sudan and Uganda; and $6.4 million on international humanitarian assistance to programs of different international agencies responding to highest priority needs—and the exact allocation has not yet been determined.

I am able to advise honourable senators that Canada will also continue to encourage the participation of Canadian non-governmental organizations in refugee assistance projects through matching grants.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THIRD WORLD—CANADIAN AID

Senator Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question concerning what the Leader of the Government has just said. What percentage of the gross national product will this government allocate to international assistance programs this year? If I am not mistaken, last year, when I was responsible for international assistance as the Minister of State responsible for CIDA, this percentage was 0.4½ per cent of the gross national product. This represented a decrease from previous years, when it had been 0.6 per cent. Does the government intend to increase this percentage in view of the present problems in the Third World?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not yet have the exact percentage figure, for this year, of aid which has been designated for international relief and assistance, but the question will be taken as notice and the information will be provided for honourable senators when it is received.

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Smith calling the attention of the Senate to some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim as dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (the British Columbia Reference case), (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submit that the said decision does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO INVITE MINISTER OF STATE FOR THE CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD TO APPEAR AS WITNESS

That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture be authorized to invite the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board to appear before it to discuss matters arising out of his responsibilities for the Canadian Wheat Board Act, the Western Grain Stabilization Act and the Grains Group.

Senator Flynn: Has the minister invited the invitation?

Senator Roblin: Will he accept?

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

HAZARDOUS WASTE—ESTABLISHMENT OF DISPOSAL SITE AT CROOKSTON, MINNESOTA

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I intended to ask this question earlier today but I had to make a telephone call to verify certain information.

I have just learned that the Government of the United States intends to place a disposal site in Crookston, Minnesota, a location which might affect the province of Manitoba. Would the Leader of the Government confirm whether there is any truth to that particular statement?

It is also my understanding that mention was made of this matter in the Globe and Mail of today.

If this is, in fact, the intention of the U.S. government, I would consider my question to be a very important one and not one that can wait for a response. I believe we ought to know what the situation is immediately.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, only with leave of the house could I answer a question of that kind.

Senator Flynn: If you have something to say.

Senator Perrault: It would mean reverting to Question Period.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I confirm that there was a report in the Globe and Mail of today that a proposed hazardous waste site in Crookston, Minnesota could be dangerous for Canada, as both the Roseau River and the Red River run north from Crookston into Manitoba.

I can assure Senator Guay, Senator Roblin and others from that province that deliberations in Minnesota concerning this hazardous waste disposal site are at a preliminary stage. The proposed site in Crookston is one of many possible sites under consideration.

Officials of Environment Canada and the Canadian Consulate in Minneapolis are monitoring developments and will keep us informed when a decision appears imminent and as to what effect, if any, the selected site may have on Canada. At that time we shall be in a better position to evaluate the situation and to approach the United States government for additional information, if that appears necessary.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Wednesday, April 8, 1981, moved:

Motion agreed to.

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-64, to amend the Auditor General Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA POST CORPORATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-42, to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, as Senator Grosart did a few weeks ago, I think I should draw your attention to rule 3, under which, if we are going to suspend the rules, particularly in respect of such an important bill as the Canada Post Corporation Bill, we should be given an explanation for doing so.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the matter has been discussed with the opposition in this chamber and it has been agreed that it would be appropriate to have the second reading explanation of this particular bill given this evening. This process of seeking leave in no way suggests that there will be any attempt by the government to prevent the bill being referred to an appropriate committee, should the Senate so decide—in this case, perhaps the committee chaired by the distinguished Honourable Senator Smith. This proposed procedure was discussed with the official opposition.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Of course, we should all recognize that it was the committee chaired by the distinguished Senator Godfrey which studied this measure previously, and that may be the reason he has spoken on the point. He probably also wishes to discharge my responsibilities, as he seemed to intimate he would be doing from now on. However, as the Leader of the Government has already said, the idea of moving second reading later this day is simply to give the sponsor of the bill the opportunity of explaining it tonight. The understanding reached was that Senator Grosart would adjourn the debate until tomorrow, so that we would have a few hours to think about the matter.

Senator Godfrey: Now that Senator Flynn has informed the Senate of the reason for the arrangements, I have no objection whatsoever.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Hicks: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: No?

Senator Hicks: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Leave is not granted, in which case two days' notice of second reading must be given.

● (2010)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there was at least a hope that it would have been possible to adjourn on Wednesday evening for the Easter recess, but, under the circumstances, leave not having been granted, I shall have to move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: I did not hear the honourable leader's motion as to when the bill would be placed on the order paper for second reading.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to move the second reading of a bill, two days' notice is required. Under the rules, if leave is not granted, there must be one day intervening between the day notice is given and second reading. Therefore, in this case notice must be given because leave has not been granted, and second reading will have to be on Thursday. Of course, we could ask for leave to give one day's notice, and then, if granted, second reading could be moved tomorrow; but, without leave, second reading can only be dealt with on Thursday.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order, which is similar to a point of order raised recently by Senator Godfrey. On an occasion not very long ago I raised the point that we have a rule which requires that not only the rule to be suspended be stated but also that the reason be given for the suspension. On that occasion I pointed out the difficulty the Senate has faced over the years in convincing those who have a say in the proceedings of the Senate to observe this rule. At the time I indicated that the matter before us then was a case in point and, clearly, here is another case in point.

I have been informed that discussions have taken place between the Leader and Deputy Leader of the Government, and the Leader and Deputy Leader of the Opposition, which is quite usual and quite proper. However, as Senator Godfrey has suggested, there should be a full explanation. It is easy to say that there has been a discussion, and then to give the reason. I believe I know the reason in this case. I hope I am not out of order in suggesting that reason, but I believe it may be helpful to the situation which the Senate now faces.

The reason is the hope that this bill will be taken into consideration before the Senate rises for the Easter recess, so that it can be dealt with rather expeditiously as soon as we reconvene after the recess. I am quite sure that Senator Godfrey was not aware of the arrangement, and I am inclined to think that Senator Hicks was also uninformed.

Senator Hicks: Certainly.

Senator Frith: The explanation was given.

Senator Grosart: It was not given. I suggest that the real reason was not given—that there was some desire to expedite this bill, but not to push it through today and tomorrow. While I realize that an agreement was reached in the corridors through the usual channels, I suggest, once again, that at the time leave is asked we must be given, according to the rules, a full and complete explanation of why leave is requested. If we follow this procedure, I am quite sure we will not run into these situations. I leave it to Senator Hicks to say whether I am correct in my interpretation.

Senator Hicks: I do not wish to be unnecessarily arbitrary in this matter, honourable senators, but this is a bill in which I have been seriously interested for some years, because it has been a long time coming to this chamber. I wish to have the chance to look at it and the opportunity to say something about it. If, by granting leave, second reading is moved later this day and the debate adjourned until I have had an opportunity to bring myself up to date on the bill, I am prepared to withdraw my objection to suspension of the rule. However, I believe that Senator Grosart has raised a valid point: we ought to be given the opportunity to learn why this urgency exists. After all, this bill does not deal with something which involves a great national emergency. This bill brings about something which we have been trying to do in Canada for at least the last three years. If someone will tell me why we cannot wait another two or three days to consider it, I will be glad to reconsider my objection to proceeding with second reading later this evening.

• (2015)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think the point has been taken validly that the precise reason for the request for leave to be granted should have been stated at the outset. However, I do think that most of the arrangements we make in the Senate are based on a good deal of reason, common sense and an excellent spirit of co-operation. In this case, it was the consensus that it would help honourable senators in considering the merits, or even the demerits, of this Post Office proposal to have the explanatory second reading speech made this evening by Senator Denis.

Before Senator Hicks intervened, I had felt that an adequate explanation had been given.

Senator Hicks: To whom?

Senator Perrault: I hope that honourable senators now understand the reason for this initiative.

Senator Hicks: It was not given to me.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I was aware of the understanding with respect to this bill. I was told that the other place would like second reading as soon as possible because, as Senator Hicks has said, we have been waiting years for the passage of this bill. In particular, the unions are very anxious to have the debate on this bill commenced before Easter. I am told that the postmen are negotiating, and they might believe that it is only a fake as far as we are concerned, and that we are not interested in passing the bill.

The postal employees and unions are asking for passage of this bill as soon as possible, and I think there is good reason to commence the second reading debate this evening. If Senator Hicks wants to study the bill more closely, he will have the opportunity to read the introductory speech, and to prepare his argument and criticism.

Senator Hicks: I withdraw my objection so that the motion for second reading may be put tonight, on the understanding that the debate will be adjourned in order to give honourable senators an opportunity to contribute later on.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

SPACE SHUTTLE COLUMBIA—FELICITATIONS ON SUCCESS OF MISSION

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would have thought the Leader of the Government would have had a word to say about the successful completion of the Columbia space shuttle mission. I am sure we were all extremely pleased with, and impressed by, its extraordinary accomplishment. We wish to express our pleasure and congratulations to the President and people of the United States, and also our pride in having had something to do with it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I know that all honourable senators appreciate the initiative shown this evening by the Leader of the Opposition in drawing to our attention this major technological achievement. It should be noted, as was inferred by Senator Flynn, that some of the components for this further successful conquest of space were provided by Canadians and Canadian companies employing Canadian technology, and we take special satisfaction in that.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—NOTICE OF MOTION RESPECTING DISPOSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, April 15, I shall move:

That the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., for an Address to Her Majesty concerning the Constitution of Canada shall be disposed of as follows:

1. The debate on the said motion and any amendments proposed thereto as herein provided, shall be adjourned to Thursday, April 23, 1981, and may be debated between 2.00 p.m. and 6.00 p.m. and between 8.00 p.m. and 10.00 p.m., and on Friday, April 24, 1981, between 10.00 a.m. and 12.00 noon.

2. No amendments or sub-amendments may be proposed to the said motion except those moved by the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate on Friday, April 24, 1981, as provided hereinafter.

3. The question on the amendment to the motion, moved on March 26, 1981, by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk shall not be put except as herein provided.

4. The Order to resume the debate on the main motion shall be called at 10.00 a.m. on Friday, April 24, 1981, and, notwithstanding any other motion in amendment thereto, the Leader of the Government in the Senate shall forthwith be given the floor to move any amendments to the said Address adopted by the House of Commons on Thursday, April 23, 1981, pursuant to the Special Order adopted by that House on April 8, 1981; and no amendments may be moved to such amendments, but the Leader of the Opposition may, immediately after the said motion of the Leader of the Government, move any amendment to the said motion for an Address; and both the amendments of the Leader of the Government and the amendment of the Leader of the Oppositon may be debated at the same time but without further amendment.

5. Every question necessary to dispose of any amendments moved by the Leader of the Government or by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate of the motion in amendment by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, if it is still before the Senate, shall be put, in that order, no later than 12.00 noon on Friday, April 24, 1981.

6. There shall be no debate after April 24, 1981, on the said motion until a day named by the Leader of the Government in the Senate pursuant to the following paragraph of this Order.

7. After the Supreme Court of Canada has rendered a decision on the appeals concerning the opinion of the Manitoba Court of Appeal rendered on February 3, 1981, and on the opinion of the Newfoundland Court of Appeal rendered on March 31, 1981, on the questions put to the said Courts concerning the amendment of the Constitution of Canada, the Leader of the Government may, by rising in his place and informing the Senate thereof, name two days on which the said motion shall be debated by the Senate.

8. At 6.00 p.m. on the second day named by the Leader of the Government pursuant to the preceding paragraph of this Order, the Speaker shall interrupt any proceedings and, without further debate, put every question necessary to dispose of the said motion. No Senator shall rise to speak after this hour, and all such questions as must be decided in order to comply with this Order shall be decided forthwith before the Senate adjourns.

9. The provisions of this Order shall prevail notwithstanding any rule or practice of the Senate to the contrary.

10. Nothing in this Order shall be considered to affect in any manner or to any degree the separation of the legislative and judicial powers, a fundamental principle of our Constitution.

Honourable senators, the purpose of this motion is to implement in the Senate the all-party agreement that Parliament should not vote on the motion for a Joint Address until the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled on its constitutional acceptability—a condition, honourable senators will remember, that was insisted upon by many honourable senators during the debate in this place. That is the main purpose.

Next, I wish to explain the key elements of the all-party agreement that was reached a couple of weeks ago. The first element is that the Supreme Court should have before it the form of the resolution to be voted upon in its finally amended form after the court's ruling; and the second is that the time for debate and vote on that resolution, as so amended, be agreed upon and fixed by order.

Next, the procedural corollaries to the purpose, and to those key elements, are as follows: In the House of Commons the foregoing historic agreement found expression in a unanimous house order that meant an end to amendments except omnibus amendments proposed on behalf of each party by the party's house leader. Each member of the House of Commons, for this exceptional occasion, subordinated his or her individual right to propose amendments to the right of his or her party to do so; so that he or she had to work out his or her individual wishes in the party caucus for eventual expression in the house by the party leadership.

The second procedural corollary to that all-party agreement finds its expression in the Senate, in the motion for a Senate order, notice of which I am giving now, under rule 45(1)(a), (h) and (i).

Honourable senators, the motion is meant to reflect in the Senate the order unanimously accepted in the House of Commons on the recommendation of the leadership of the three parties. The wording of the motion has been discussed over a period of days with the leadership of the opposition in this house, and the government leadership and the opposition leadership have agreed that this is, and should be clearly considered as, a very exceptional order, in order to meet very exceptional circumstances.

Beyond that I do not speak for the opposition leadership, who will speak for themselves tomorrow, along with any other honourable senators who may have discussed it in their caucuses, and who may wish to participate in the debate when the motion is called tomorrow.

The exact wording of the motion will appear in both languages in today's Debates of the Senate, which we hope to have on honourable senators' desks in their offices as early as possible tomorrow.

We hope to debate the motion and to have the question put tomorrow afternoon. If it is disposed of then, we propose—and part of this appears in the proposed order in the motion—to honourable senators that we sit as follows: tomorrow, Wednesday, April 15, from 2 p.m. to 6 p.m., in the hope that the question will be put on this motion before adjournment. We would then adjourn at 6 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, or before if we are through with our business, until Thursday, April 23, when we shall sit from 2 p.m. to 6 p.m., and from 8 p.m. to 10 p.m. On Friday, April 24, we shall sit from 10 a.m. until 1 p.m., and the question will be put on any motions in amendment no later than noon on that day. That will be approximately half a day after the House of Common disposes of their amendment to the resolution, because their house order requires disposition on the Thursday.

It is then proposed, honourable senators, at 1 p.m. on Friday, April 24, to adjourn until Tuesday, May 19, at 8 p.m. That will be one week after the date to which we believe the House of Commons will adjourn. I believe that on Thursday, April 23, the House of Commons will adjourn until Tuesday, May 12. According to my present information, we will not have enough business from them to justify our sitting the three days that week, and, therefore, unless something changes, we will propose to honourable senators that our adjournment on Friday, April 24, will be to Tuesday, May 19, at 8 p.m.

Honourable senators, I shall not read every word of the motion. Essentially, the first paragraph sets aside those two days next week for dealing with the motion. The second paragraph provides that in this chamber, as in the other place, no amendments or sub-amendments may be proposed to the said motion except those moved by the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

The third provision is that the question on the amendment to the motion moved by Senator Yuzyk on March 26, 1981, not be put, except as herein provided—and we provide for that; that the order to resume the debate be called at 10 o'clock in the forenoon on Friday and, at that time, the Leader of the Government in the Senate be given an opportunity to propose to the Senate a motion in the wording adopted by the other place on the previous day. We will then proceed to have the Leader of the Opposition propose any amendments in an omnibus form. Those amendments may be debated at the same time but without further amendment.

Every question necessary to dispose of any amendments moved by the Leader of the Government or the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, and the motion by Senator Yuzyk, if it is still before the Senate, will then put in that order no later than noon on Friday, as I explained. The debate will then be adjourned until after the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, after which the leadership will name a date, following consultation, for the final two days of debate in the Senate.

Honourable senators, that is the background for this notice of motion, and those are the key provisions of the motion. I do not want to delay you further. I certainly did not mean to enter into a debate on the subject, but merely wanted to assure you that the exact wording will be available tomorrow in both languages. There will be an opportunity to caucus on the subject and to debate it tomorrow afternoon, in the hope that we can both debate the question and put it in the form of an order as to how to deal with the motion for a Joint Address.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to confirm the discussions that have taken place since last week between the leadership of the government and the leadership on this side of the chamber. I confirm that the intention of the government is to have an agreement here that will reflect the agreement made in the House of Commons, but I also wish to confirm that we have not necessarily agreed to what is being proposed in this motion and that we reserve our right to contest the proposal, at least in principle, if not in practice.

I would like to suggest a revision to what the deputy leader said about the resumption of the debate once the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled on the legality of the constitutional package. My understanding is that the Senate will deal with the resolution, if it comes back alive, if it survives the Supreme Court of Canada, only after the House of Commons has dealt with it in accordance with the order passed there—that is, after two days. I draw the attention of the deputy leader to the fact that our order should provide that we have two days after the House of Commons has made a decision on the resolution, not after the Supreme Court has made a decision. I say this because it is provided in the order in the other place that the debate there will be resumed after the decision of the Supreme Court, but here it will be resumed only after the House of Commons has disposed of the resolution. I think that a correction should be made so that we do not commence the debate tomorrow.

I think another small change should be made in the text of paragraph 4, which says that the order to resume the debate on the main motion shall be called at 10 a.m. on Friday, April 24. Since we have already said that we would deal with it on Thursday from 2 o'clock to 6 o'clock in the afternoon and from 6 o'clock ot 10 o'clock in the evening, paragraph 4 should begin: "When the order to resume the debate is called at 10.00 a.m. on Friday . . ."

This having been said, with the proposal duly corrected and placed on the order paper tomorrow, honourable senators will be able to assess exactly what is proposed, the position of the government, and, with the reservations that we have made, the position of the opposition.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think I should put on the record that I agree that, to make sense grammatically, the addition of the word "when" is appropriate.

Senator Flynn: Also the suggestion regarding the House of Commons.

Senator Frith: As to the other question, when I was commenting on the background I pointed out that we were using the wording that was used in the other place—that is, after the Supreme Court decision—but that the naming of the date here would be done after consultation with the opposition. Of course, I would like to put on the record that we have an understanding with Senator Flynn that there will be an allotment of time after the debate in the House of Commons. Therefore, we can either rely on what I am saying on the record, or we can make the correction Senator Flynn is suggesting, and I will discuss that with him.

Senator Flynn: I think my correction would be more logical because it could come at the same time.

Senator Frith: The only reason I put it the other way is that I would like to be free, if it seemed appropriate, to persuade Senator Flynn that we should have two days named, but that we might arrange to do it in such a way that, for example, we only had one day after their day; that is all.

Senator Flynn: You want to be able to announce it two days before the House of Commons has made the decision. Is that it?

Senator Frith: I want to be free, if I have information on when the House of Commons' two days will take place, to do so.

Senator Flynn: If that is the only problem, we will give you leave, after due explanation.

Senator Frith: It is all on the record.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I think my friend is somewhat confused. He suggests that after the Supreme Court has rendered its decision, and not until then, the motion for the Joint Address will be put. Is that not what you said?

Senator Frith: Since we are trying to reflect the all-party agreement that has been made, the provision in the order of the House of Commons is that after the Supreme Court has made its decision, the government house leader will name two days for debate. After that, the vote will be taken.

Senator Walker: I thought you said that; I did not misunderstand you. Thank you.

Under the circumstances, if the Supreme Court renders a decision that the whole matter is ultra vires, surely there can be no more debate on it. Why would you then vote on a motion which has already been declared by the Supreme Court of Canada to be ultra vires? There is a 90 per cent chance that that will be the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, with 50 years of precedents behind it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, if I may divide the question into two parts, and deal with the second part first, I do not want to lay odds. I suppose everyone is entitled to his own opinion as to whether that chance is 90 per cent or 10 per cent. In any event, to consider the first part of the question, I believe that that is why the party leadership in the other place did not say that the motion would be put on the order paper; that it would be debated and voted on after the decision of the Supreme Court. What was said is that the leadership would have a right to choose the two days.

● (2040)

It is pretty well understood that if the ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada is adverse those days will probably not be named.

Senator Walker: I am glad you cleared that up, because you had said the opposite.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the deputy leader. I happen to be one of those who believe that the real work of the Senate is done in committees. If, as I understand, it is the intention that the Senate adjourn until May 19, I have no objection to that, assuming there is nothing for us to do in this chamber. However, there is a lot of work to be done in committees in the meantime. With that in mind, what arrangements will be made with respect to committees? I certainly hope the fact that the Senate will not be sitting will not affect the sitting of committees.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, in my brief period as deputy leader I have come to realize that the conflict between committee work and chamber work is a constant problem. One must always take into account the work of committees when one considers the adjournment of the Senate. I believe it is an implicit understanding that when the Senate adjourns the committees will not normally sit. I am not sure that should be the rule. In any event, to answer your question directly with respect to the arrangements that will be made to allow for committees to sit during the week of May 11, if the Senate is not sitting then, all the necessary arrangements will be made.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE - FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have been containing myself with great impatience to ask the question which I endeavoured to ask improperly earlier this evening. I consider it a most important question and I address it to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Does the minister have a statement for this house on the current status of efforts to reach an energy agreement with the producing provinces?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the briefest answer I can think of is "no." Actually, I can add one sentence to that. Both ministers, who were at the meeting in Winnipeg, expressed the view that progress had been made.

DOMESTIC OIL PRICE—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS—EXPRESSION OF OPINION BY ENERGY USERS COUNCIL

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. Is the minister aware of the existence of the Energy Users Council, which is a new association? I am told that that association is comprised of a number of organizations, such as the Housing and Urban Development Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Retail Council of Canada, the Canadian Automobile Association, the Canadian Construction Association, and others. Is the minister aware of the formation of that new organization?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I was going to say "no," but I believe I did hear that there was some work being done on it. I would not like to say "yes," however, if that were to imply that I know a great deal about the status of the organization or, indeed, its objectives.

Senator Donahoe: In light of the minister's answer, perhaps I ought not to ask this further supplementary question, because, if the minister has so little knowledge of this new organization, perhaps he is not able to tell us that he is aware that it has said that the longer we delay in adjusting to higher prices the more difficulty we will have in adjusting to an inevitable reality. Is the minister aware of that expression of opinion by this new organization?

Senator Olson: Well, I have heard that expression of opinion a number of times, but I did not know it had come precisely from that organization.

Senator Donahoe: This is my final question. Can the minister accept that that is the view of that new organization and that that view has been expressed in those terms? If so, does it suggest anything to him in respect of what he might advocate with his colleague the Minister of Energy?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, I would not like what I said a moment ago to be misinterpreted to the extent that I accept the view. I accept that the view was expressed. There is a significant difference. With that qualification, I will take Senator Donahoe's advice and try to find some confirmation of that. I will also try to determine why it was necessary to set up some kind of new organization to express that view, because most of the organizations he named as comprising it have already expressed views, some similar and some not so similar to what he has just stated.

EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. On January 29 he presented his justification for the exodus of oil rigs from western Canada, which had only then begun. It was the fact that there already existed in Alberta too many capped gas wells. Is the minister still of that view, in light of recently released figures showing that for the first time in 10 years Canada's natural gas reserves have actually declined?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I should like to see the figures that show they have actually declined. That may be someone's view, but I am not sure that view comes from the National Energy Board, which has heard or taken evidence on that.

I should also clarify the interpretation the honourable senator just put on what I said on January 29. I said that any further investment in drilling more gas wells for the purpose of capping them, when it is known that that is the market situation, is probably not such a good idea.

Senator Balfour: Would the honourable gentleman be prepared to provide the Senate with up-to-date data concerning drilling activities in western Canada? Specifically, how many rigs have now left the country, and how many exploration and development wells does he now anticipate will be drilled in western Canada in 1981?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can take that question as notice, but I do not want to raise any expectation with respect to the reply that can be made because, obviously, all through the winter there has been a lack of agreement as to how many rigs have left. Indeed, it should also be pointed out that in the prospect of coming to an agreement—and I think some encouraging words came out of the meeting yesterday in Winnipeg—this could change quite dramatically.

Senator Balfour: Does the honourable gentleman not agree that the number of rigs that have left the country can be precisely measured by ascertaining from the customs officials at the border-crossing points in Alberta and Saskatchewan how many rigs have crossed the border from north to south? If that is not the case, why can he not provide us with that precise figure?

Senator Olson: I will try to obtain that information, honourable senators.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CONFINEMENT OF SOVIET DISSIDENT, ANATOLE SCHARANSKY

Hon. Peter Bosa: I should like to direct a question to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. There have been reports that the Soviet dissident, Anatole Scharansky, has been placed in solitary confinement. Can the Leader of the Government tell us if that is true? Can he share with honourable senators what information he has?

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, news reports were issued just today that Anatole Scharansky has indeed been placed in solitary confinement. Canada's delegation to the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe made representations on Scharansky's behalf on November 14. That fact is known to some honourable senators. The representation was made in strong terms.

The case of Scharansky and other dissidents has been discussed on a number of occasions with concerned Canadian groups. The Canadian government continues to be concerned about this and other violations of human rights in the Soviet Union, and the government will consider what action might be appropriate in the future.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

EMPLOYMENT OF THE DISABLED AND HANDICAPPED

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to follow up on a number of questions I posed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate last Thursday. I asked him questions concerning government policy regarding the recommendations of the Special Commons Committee on the Disabled and Handicapped. Is he yet in a position to respond to those questions?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret that as yet I have not received replies to the requests for information which were sent last week. I hope that it will be possible to obtain that material before the Easter recess.

• (2050)

Senator Muir: I thank the honourable gentleman, and I would ask him a supplementary question. He will recall that my question at that time related to a statement made by the Honourable Jean-Jacques Blais, Minister of Supply and Services, to the effect that he could not endorse the major recommendations of the Special Commons Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped that companies receiving major government contracts implement suitable hiring policies for the disabled. Perhaps the Leader of the Government read or heard that later in the week the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, supported the idea of contract compliance as a means of encouraging private businesses receiving government contracts to hire more handicapped workers. I ask the honourable gentleman: Which minister speaks for the government? Would he secure that information when he brings his reply back to the house?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope that a good deal of the misunderstanding which exists can be cleared up when I bring a further reply to this chamber. Certainly, both gentlemen are very capable ministers. I do not have the complete texts of the remarks attributed to either of them and, consequently, it would be very unfair for me, or for any other senator, to draw conclusions merely from fragmentary news reports.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, I raise a further supplementary question. The honourable gentleman said the same thing last week, that he was not aware of what had transpired. I would think that in the intervening period since last Thursday he would have had the time to find out. Does the leader recall that last Thursday he said that the Honourable Jean-Jacques Blais was a compassionate man? Would he please clarify that comment, if he can?

Senator Perrault: I may be mistaken, but I believe that I also requested last week from the honourable senator a copy of the remarks attributed to the minister. They have not been forthcoming. I would appreciate receiving the alleged article as quickly as possible. Certainly, I have been unable to obtain a copy of any speech which suggests that the government is not sympathetic to the handicapped.

Senator Muir: I suggest to the honourable gentleman that he review the record of the committee proceedings and the press reports pertaining to the matter. If his staff is unable to find the press reports, I will be glad to send him copies.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it would have helped had this been done last week. I will try to obtain that information. I believe that the government has done a great deal to indicate its concern for the plight of the handicapped in this country. And, certainly, this concern is not held exclusively by members of the government party. I know that many members of the opposition are very concerned about the handicapped in our midst.

Senator Muir: Honourable senators, the honourable gentleman said last week that he would provide the information. Since he took it upon himself to secure that information, I do not see why he is trying to put the onus on me.

Senator Perrault: I mean your press reports.

Senator Muir: I am sure that the leader's wonderful staff can look after the matter for him.

TRANSPORT

AIR CANADA AND CP AIR—OTTAWA-TORONTO AND MONTREAL-TORONTO FARES

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I regret that I have not given notice to the Leader of the Government of my questions, but they arise from reports in today's newspapers. I ask these questions of the Leader of the Government because of our impending recess and their interest to consumers in the Ottawa area. One article in the press this evening suggests that return flights between Ottawa and Toronto now cost Air Canada and CP Air passengers $20 more than the return flights on the same airlines between Montreal and Toronto—this despite the fact that the Montreal-Toronto run is 280 kilometres further than the 798-kilometres Ottawa-Toronto flight.

OTTAWA-NEW YORK ROUTE DESIGNATION OF AIR CARRIER

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: My other question also relates to a matter coming under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport, or the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission, and I hope that the leader will be able to obtain the information before we enter the Easter parliamentary recess. It relates to the long-delayed decision by either the Department of Transport or the CTC with respect to the Ottawa-New York air route. A U.S. Civil Aeronautics Board official said on Monday that he was surprised at the length of time which the Canadian government is taking to get talks under way on the transferring of the rights to the route to a Canadian carrier. Thérèse Giroux, a CTC official, said that the route is American and is not in our hands, that it is up to the Minister of Transport, the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin, to designate a carrier. A designation has not been decided upon, although the matter has been before the minister for a considerable period of time.

This matter, and the other, is of considerable interest to air passengers in the Ottawa area. It would be appreciated if, before we rise for the recess, some information could be given to this chamber.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The Honourable Senator Benidickson has posed two questions of some importance to the travelling public. The questions will be taken as notice because of their technical nature. It may well be that the chairman of the Transport and Communications Committee and those who serve on that committee will wish to pose certain questions relating to fares at some future committee meetings with Air Canada officials.

Senator Benidickson: Honourable senators, I would point out that this situation involves a general matter of principle which is of interest to all of us. There has been an ongoing debate in recent years as to the advantages and disadvantages of deregulation of air rates, both in the United States and Canada. I, personally and on behalf of consumers, would like to see the CTC and/or the Minister of Transport prodded into action with regard to both questions I have raised. Perhaps they will comment on the general advantages or disadvantages of regulation versus deregulation. There has been some progress in this regard in both countries.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, in reference to the comments of the Leader of the Government with regard to the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, while I cannot speak for that committee, I can say that, as I understand the rules, we do not have the power to ask any such questions unless the Senate refers them to us by way of a motion. I do not think the committee would object very strenuously if the Senate were to do so.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have any information immediately at hand to explain these alleged fare anomalies. Certainly, if the information which Senator Benidickson has brought to the chamber is correct, it would be useful to have an explanation of certain apparent differences in the fares structure. If the chairman of the committee believes there would be value in a study or a referral of that kind, I am sure that he will let his leader know and perhaps communicate that information to the government. Certainly, there would be interest on this side in such a study.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I do not wish to put myself in the position of assuming the responsibility for starting any move that might necessarily lead to this kind of investigation. All I would like to say is that if there is a desire on the part of the government or the Senate to have the committee investigate the matter, I am sure that the committee would not find it in any way objectionable.

Senator Perrault: I thank the honourable senator for his willingness to proceed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT PRACTICE RESPECTING AGREEMENTS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is with regard to a memorandum written by Indian Affairs officials which was released last week. It appears to indicate that the government knew from the outset that funds were not available or slated for priority in parliamentary budgets insofar as the government's responsibility deriving from the James Bay Agreement was concerned.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what the government practice is with respect to signing agreements and making commitments on behalf of the government and then the realization, if funds were not budgeted, as in the case of the James Bay Agreement?

• (2100)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I do not know of any leaked memorandum. However, the leaking of memoranda appears to be a new national obsession at various levels of political life. One may well ask what has happened to loyalty oaths or how some who take oaths of secrecy can, in conscience, accept their pay. It is a problem that has affected almost all governments and parties in this country. Surely it is deplorable and reprehensible conduct.

Senator Murray: Cover up! Cover up!

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am not here to defend memo leakers, but—

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Nurgitz: —it would appear to me that the information contained in this memo, whether leaked or otherwise, is somewhat embarrassing. I am particularly concerned as well that the same memo highlighted the fact that the James Bay Agreement is vague and imprecise on many points because there was insufficient time to discuss them in any detail.

Would the leader inquire and report back to us on how the government came to finalize this particular agreement without discussing it and leaving vague and imprecise details in the agreement?

An Hon. Senator: Why not tell us now?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not have a copy of the alleged leaked memorandum, and I will take the question as notice. However, I think at times too much importance is given to unattributed memoranda which come out of private files or which are purloined from government or opposition offices.

Senator Roblin: Behind closed doors.

Senator Perrault: Without knowing the background of memoranda of this type, it is very difficult to accord to them any particular weight. The question will be taken as notice.

Senator Nurgitz: Before I leave the entire question, honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate find out if the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is prepared to deny the allegations that are contained in the memorandum? Would he, at the same time, find out for us whether, despite the lack of allocation of funds, as is alleged, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will honour the commitments made in the James Bay Agreement?

Senator Murray: Good question.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think all these questions are of interest. I would appreciate it very much if the Honourable Senator Nurgitz would provide me with a copy of the leaked memorandum so that I could perhaps study it.

Senator Nurgitz: This is not a supplementary question, but I would like to point out that I am not on the select list of people who receive leaked memoranda. The memorandum was leaked, I understand, to the Honourable Warren Allmand. I do not belong to that party, so I assume I would not be on the list. It was Mr. Allmand who brought this forward. I do not have the memorandum, but I have a newspaper account, and I would be delighted to have a page give it to the Leader of the Government.

INDUSTRY

CHRYSLER CORPORATION—POTENTIAL MERGER

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development which deals with a statement that Chrysler Corporation is trying to effect a merger with any one of a number of motorcar manufacturers. Could the minister tell us whether the various government financial arrangements—the guarantees and so on—with Chrysler would continue to apply if such a merger were to be effected?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am sure Senator Doody recognizes at once the hypothetical nature of that question. Obviously, we would have to look at what is involved in those proposed mergers. We do not know if there is one, and if there is one or more, we have no idea what might be involved in it or them.

Senator Doody: With great respect, Mr. Minister, I do not think the question is hypothetical at all, but deals with the fact that Chrysler may be going around the marketplace to these various other automobile companies saying, "We have X guarantees from the Government of Canada," which might place them in a more beneficial bargaining position when they are talking to these other companies. Are they, in effect, trying to achieve a merger partially on the credit of the Government of Canada?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if Senator Doody wants to raise that possibility, he should take into account that it will be quite a long time before any of these underwriting obligations become operative and, indeed, in addition to that, there is a major investment requirement to be fulfilled in Canada by the Chrysler Corporation.

QUEBEC

RE-ELECTION OF PARTI QUEBECOIS GOVERNMENT

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Will the minister tell us whether the Right Honourable the Prime Minister has received a message of thanks from René Lévesque for the great contribution his policies in recent months have made to the re-election of the Parti Quebecois last night?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, any such message of congratulations may well be long delayed in the mails.

MANITOBA

MESSAGE FROM PREMIER

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Did he receive the message which the Premier of Manitoba sent to all Manitobans? It must be very informative because he is also speaking on behalf of the federal government.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Guay has the text of that message sent by the Conservative Premier of Manitoba to support the federal government's position.

Senator Guay: I understand that Senator Roblin is also included in that particular paper. I do not have it at hand as yet, but I am interested to hear what it is all about. The one thing I do know, frankly, is that the cost is added to our taxes in Manitoba in any case.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I can always rely on my colleague, Senator Guay, for information as to what is going on in the Conservative Party in Manitoba.

Senator Guay: I am surprised that the honourable senator is unaware of this article because his picture is even included in the paper.

THE ECONOMY

STATUS OF ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on April 7 by Senator Doody concerning the Atlantic Development Council.

The Atlantic Development Council was set up at the time the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was established, to advise the minister on development policy in the Atlantic provinces. I am informed that the council has served a useful function in that regard, particularly in the earlier formative years of the department. Along with the minister's review of the future role of DREE, my colleague is considering what role might be played by advisory bodies, including the ADC. It has not been considered advisable to fully activate the council at this time until the broader question has been determined.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised on April 7 by Senator Marshall concerning mortgage interest rates.

My colleague, the Minister of Finance, has said this situation is a matter of very deep concern to our government. The problem of high interest rates, of course, is not one that originates in Canada. Many members of the international community are having to face the problem of higher interest and mortgage rates.

The Minister of Finance has undertaken to monitor very carefully the impact of high interest rates on various groups in the country. I have made the minister aware of the honourable senator's concerns in this area and want to thank him for his representations.

NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

RECONSTITUTION OF DEFUNCT SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised by Senator Robichaud on March 18 concerning the possible revival of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on the National Capital Region.

The committee was set up in June 1975, and was composed of 15 members of the House of Commons and eight senators. Between June 1975, and October 1976 it held 40 sittings during the first session of Parliament. Those who appeared before the committee were chairmen and heads of departments of NCC, RMOC, CRO and individual municipalities. It was reinstated during the third session and held four sittings between December 1977 and June 1978. It died with the election and was never reinstated. It seems that the main reason was lack of interest of the public, the news media and, to a certain extent, local members of Parliament. The committee never produced a report. From what I gather, the NCC would have little interest in pushing for its reinstatement. It is up to local members of Parliament and senators to press for a reinstatement, if they so wish.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THIRD WORLD—CANADIAN AID

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised by Senator Asselin on April 9 concerning the percentage of the gross national product to be allocated to international assistance programs.

The government is committed to allocating 0.5 per cent of the gross national product to international assistance programs by 1985. Further, the government is committed to a target of 0.7 per cent of the gross national product by the end of the decade.

However, it is impossible to establish the level of assistance for "this year" since we do not know whether the Honourable Senator Asselin meant the 1980-81 or 1981-82 fiscal year, or the 1981 calendar year. I would be pleased to bring further information to the Senate if Senator Asselin could be more specific in his question.

POLAND—THREAT OF RUSSIAN INVASION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to respond to a question raised by Senator Asselin on April 7 concerning possible sanctions imposed on the U.S.S.R. in the event of an invasion of Poland.

Canada remains in close contact with its allies on this question. Discussions are going on with regard to what would constitute an appropriate response should an invasion occur. However, since the matter remains hypothetical, it would not be appropriate to discuss the details of a possible response at this time.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Flynn asked a question on April 9 about references to the Supreme Court of Canada concerning amendment of the Constitution. In particular, he sought clarification on whether the appeals from the judgments of the Manitoba Court of Appeal and the Newfoundland Court of Appeal would be heard together. He also asked whether the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal, if it is rendered before the hearing of those other appeals, will be taken into consideration at that time, and whether the Government of Canada intends to submit any further questions for consideration as well.

On April 7, 1981, pursuant to a hearing before the Chief Justice of Canada, and attended by the lawyers for the Attorney General of Canada, and the Attorneys General of the provinces, concerning administrative arrangements, it was ordered that the appeals from the judgments of the Manitoba and Newfoundland Courts of Appeal be heard together on April 28, 1981. The former appeal was initiated, as honourable senators know, by the Government of Manitoba, and the latter by the Government of Canada.

As the judgment in the matter now before the Quebec Court of Appeal has not been rendered, the question is hypothetical.

The case before the court is on appeal from decisions in Manitoba and Newfoundland. It is not a federal reference to the Supreme Court. Therefore the Attorney General of Canada is not asking questions of the Supreme Court.

The Attorney General of Canada will file in court the resolution as tabled in the House of Commons on February 13, 1981, as well as any amendments passed by Parliament before April 28.

Of course, information concerning the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal, which was expected today, will certainly be brought to the Senate immediately.

Senator Donahoe: You got the Quebec decision yesterday.

Senator Perrault: Well, I have not received a copy.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The Leader of the Government has said that the resolution, with the amendments that would be voted by both houses of Parliament, would be put before the Supreme Court.

Senator Perrault: Yes.

Senator Flynn: But in what context? Are we asking the court to rule on this resolution? Are we doing anything about this move of putting the text of the resolution before the Supreme Court? It seems to me that if you say we are restricted to the questions put by the Governments of Manitoba and Newfoundland to their respective appeal courts, tabling the resolution, as amended, before the Supreme Court would have no meaning unless we ask the Supreme Court to rule on its validity.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I do not wish to give a legal opinion. I have read the statement by the government. I may say to the honourable senator who commented a moment ago about the decision of the Quebec courts that I have before me a memorandum dated April 14, which is today. It says that in the event the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal is rendered today, they would inform my office before 8 p.m. I have not as yet received any official communication. On the memorandum there is today's date.

Senator Flynn: I see. I would appreciate clarification, if it is possible, on what is the meaning of the presentation to the Court of the resolution, as amended or otherwise, by the two houses of Parliament.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I will take that as notice. I do not want to provide information beyond the information I have received from the Minister of Justice at this time.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Did I understand the Leader of the Government to say that the resolution that would be presented to the Supreme Court was the resolution as passed by the House of Commons, with no reference to the resolution as passed by the Senate?

Senator Perrault: It makes reference to Parliament.

Senator Grosart: Would you read it?

Senator Perrault: Yes.

> The Attorney General of Canada will file in Court the Resolution as tabled in the House of Commons—

I may say, honourable senators, that this reply obviously was prepared originally for the House of Commons.

Senator Grosart: That is exactly my point.

Senator Perrault: Yes, the words "and the Senate" are here:

> The Attorney General of Canada will file in court the resolution as tabled in the House of Commons and the Senate on February 13, 1981, as well as any amendment passed by Parliament before April 28.

Senator Grosart: Do I understand that the Leader of the Government has now added the words "as passed by the Senate" to the official statement that he was reading?

Senator Perrault: It talks in terms of the amendments passed by Parliament, and also in terms of the resolution tabled in the House of Commons on February 13. I think the words "and Senate" should be added to the previous part of the sentence, in view of the fact that it was also tabled in the Senate. It is a valid point.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, while I appreciate the fact that the Leader of the Government does not wish to answer any legal questions, perhaps he could find out the answer to the following. It arises out of the comment of the Leader of the Opposition. It seems to me, as a lawyer, but not a constitutional lawyer, that if the two appeals, to which the Leader of the Government has referred, comprise the subject matter that is before the Court, then those appeals must be decided on matters as they were when the decisions appealed from were decided; and it is completely irrelevant what the House of Commons or the Senate, or Parliament as a whole, may have said after those decisions were rendered, unless there is some other question being put before the Supreme Court.

Senator Perrrault: Honourable senators, the point is understood on this side. The question will be taken as notice and perhaps a more detailed explanation will be available tomorrow.

CUSTOMS TARIFF
IRISH FREE STATE TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1932
UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1932
UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1937

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-50, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932 and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937.

Bill read first time.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate, moved that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

AUDITOR GENERAL ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Douglas D. Everett moved the second reading of Bill C-64, to amend the Auditor General Act.

He said: Honourable senators, this is a short bill, and, with leave, I would like to read the entire text. It is Bill C-64, an Act to Amend the Auditor General Act.

> Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:
> 1. Subsection 4(1) of the Auditor General Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:
>
> "4. (1) The Auditor General shall be paid a salary equal to the salary of a puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada."
>
> 2. This Act shall be deemed to have come into force on April 1, 1981.

● (2120)

Honourable senators, at the present time the Auditor General of Canada is paid the same salary as the Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Canada. With the amendments to the Judges Act that this chamber passed recently, and which received royal assent, that salary amounts to $81,320, according to my calculations. It is felt that the Auditor General should be paid, more properly, on the basis of the salary of a puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, and that salary, according to my calculations, is $86,670.

I really have nothing further to say on the bill, except to commend it to honourable senators and to express the hope that—after certain remarks that I understand will be made by my colleague on the other side, Senator Doody—it receive third reading this evening, as it did in the other place.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, as the sponsor of the bill has suggested, this is a simple bill. It is short and concise. As Senator Everett has said, its purpose is to raise the level of salary of the Auditor General to that of a puisne judge of the Supreme Court. The amount may appear to be rather large to many of us—$86,000 a year. It is a substantial increase in relation to the salary paid to the previous Auditor General. I understand, however, that the retroactive provisions of the Judges Act will apply also to Mr. Macdonnell.

I am sure many people will comment on the size of these salaries, but in all fairness to everyone concerned, it is impossible for us, in these times, to get talented people to take on these very important positions unless we are prepared to pay them salaries which are competitive with those in the open market, in the private sector, as well as in the professional areas.

The responsibility that the Auditor General has is a heavy one indeed. He is really the watchdog of the treasury. He is responsible for looking after the public purse. Even with the kind of talent that can be attracted by salaries such as that, and the kind of talent that the new Auditor General has, I still feel that his hands will be more than full, trying to keep track of the spending practices and systems of the government. I note that another senior financial man has just been appointed as an official agent of the Government of Canada, in the person of the Comptroller General. His salary, I think, will be in the same range, and properly so. It is time for us to recognize the importance of these positions, and pay those who hold them salaries commensurate with their responsibilities. I have no hesitation in recommending the bill.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I would like to say one word. I take exception to one sentence that Senator Doody said. I still do not think that these salaries are properly competitive with what these gentlemen can get in private business. They are still making some sacrifices by taking these jobs at these salaries.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: With leave of the Senate, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time, and passed.

[Translation]

CANADA POST CORPORATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Azellus Denis moved the second reading of Bill C-42, to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts.

He said: Honourable senators, since it is already late, I shall not keep you too long. While I shall try to be as brief as possible, I must say enough for this assembly to realize the importance of passing this bill. Honourable senators, the bill of which I have the honour to move second reading is not very complicated in my opinion, since its purpose is simply to transfer the responsibilities of the Postmaster General to the Canada Post Corporation.

First of all, turning the Post Office Department into a Crown corporation was proposed by several task forces, including the Glassco Commission in 1962 and the Montpetit Commission in 1966, which were both established to loop into this matter. The blueprint for change contained the same recommendation. In December 1978, a bill to turn the Post Office into a Crown corporation, Bill C-67, was introduced in the House of Commons, but it had not been passed when Parliament was dissolved. In 1979 and 1980, through another misfortune, the question was re-examined by successive governments and postmaster generals in consultation with postal users and the unions.

Finally, on July 17, 1980, the bill to turn the Post Office Department into a Crown corporation was introduced. This bill repeals the Post Office Act passed in 1867 and amended in 1972.

I shall limit my comments to a few of the aspects of the operations involved in the reception, the transmission and the delivery of mail matter throughout the country and the rest of the world, which operations will now become the responsibility of the Post Corporation.

First, the mission of the Corporation will remain the same. In a few words, it will operate the same postal service, but with more success if possible, by taking into account the benefits of improving the service while aiming at self-sufficiency, by ensuring the greatest possible security for mail matter, and finally, by instilling in its employees a sincere desire to be more productive.

The Governor in Council will appoint the chairman of the board of directors and the president of the Corporation and nine other directors. The board will direct and manage the business of the Corporation and may also appoint the number of vice-presidents it considers necessary to assist it in its duties.

If I may, I shall now say a few words about the exclusive privilege of the Corporation and list briefly the powers conferred on the Corporation under clauses 14 to 19 inclusively. The Corporation needs a substantial number of mail items to be able to charge reasonable rates, recover its costs if possible and provide consistent service throughout Canada, even in non-profitable areas. This is why the bill grants to the Corporation the exclusive power to collect, transmit and deliver letters to the addressee.

This monopoly does not apply however to letters carried incidentally by a friend or delivered along with goods, by a heating oil dealer, for example, who delivers his bill at the same time, or delivered by an employee of the sender. The courts of justice are also entitled to have delivered without any assistance from the postal service any paper, writ, processes, proceedings and so on. Urgent letters can also be transmitted by messenger, but at a rate three times higher than that charged by the Corporation.

I now come to the directions of the Corporation, its status, its financial arrangements and its annual report which are covered in clauses 20 to 33.

All the assets of the Corporation belong to the Crown. In the exercise of its powers, the Corporation must comply with the directions of the Governor in Council; when the Corporation, while complying with these directions sustains or is likely to sustain financial loss, a compensation must be paid out of the moneys appropriated for this purpose by Parliament.

As far as its status is concerned, the Corporation is an agent of Her Majesty, may enter into contracts in its own name or in the name of Her Majesty, although it may also enter into contracts with Her Majesty; legal proceedings may be instituted by or against it.

Another important feature is that no act relating to the winding up of a corporation can apply in respect of the Corporation. As far as finance is concerned, the Corporation may, with the Minister of Finance's approval, borrow money, sell or pledge debt obligations, as well as mortgage the assets obtained from the government.

However, to borrow from the government, the Corporation needs the approval of the Minister of Finance and the Governor in Council. The aggregate amount of these loans must not exceed $500 million. These loans must be reimbursed by the Corporation, and any balance outstanding must be included in the next appropriation act laid before Parliament.

The accounts of the Corporation are audited each year by two auditors appointed by the Governor in Council. These auditors must be duly qualified and independent Canadians; they must not be either directors or officers of the Corporation.

Finally an annual report on the operations of the corporation is to be submitted within three months to the minister who within fifteen days will table it before Parliament. Such a report is then referred to the appropriate standing committee of Parliament.

There are a few other powers vested in the corporation. With the approval of the Governor in Council, it can make regulations authorizing the definition of a letter, the classification and definition of mailable and non-mailable matter; the setting up of standards and classes for such matters as well as postage rates; the design and issue of stamps, the rise of stamp dispensers and postage meters; the closing down of post offices and termination of rural routes and letter carrier routes, etc.

The proposed regulations are to be published in the Canada Gazette and comments about them will be received by the Minister who will submit them to the Governor in Council.

If, within 60 days, the Corporation has received no complaints, no objections, the proposed regulations are then considered approved.

Finally, I should like to mention that the Corporation appoints postal inspectors to provide for the security of the officers and employees of the Corporation as well as its property.

Honourable senators, I shall not dwell on that part of the bill that deals with violations of the act. Knowing your wisdom and your integrity, I know you will never have to refer to the clauses that deal with them.

Generally, it can be said that the assets of the Post Office Department, fixed and movable, are transferred to the Corporation which takes over their management and control.

The same applies to all responsibilities related to postal activities and actions brought against them.

Existing orders, decrees, enactments, instructions, licenses, permits, contracts remain in effect but may be altered, replaced or cancelled after two years from the date of implementation of this clause, subject to the approval of the governor in council.

The entire staff of the Post Office will be in the employ of the Corporation, with each employee retaining his or her benefits. Furthermore, all Post Office employees transferred to the Corporation will be considered, for a three year period, on the same level as Public Service employees with regard to eligibility and transfers.

Collective agreements will remain in effect for the duration of their term even after the take-over by the Corporation and all amendments by the Postmaster General to labour relations between management and employees, have recently been approved by the various unions and the opposition, including the former Postmaster General, the Honorable John A. Fraser.

Honourable senators, I believe I have selected some interesting points in this bill to indicate that the changeover from the Post Office to the Canada Post corporation was made without any radical changes, in what I would call a harmonious way. This piece of legislation is the result of days and days of consideration in committee and in the House of Commons.

This bill has benefitted from the invaluable cooperation of Post Office advisers, unions and rank and file employees and union members, and it seems that all parties are satisfied with its contents which is the result of a lengthy study in committee, including consideration of over 60 amendments, many of which have been included in the final bill. I want to mention finally that the New Democratic Party member for Kootenay East-Revelstoke commended among others the present and former Postmasters General, the Honorable André Ouellet and the Honourable John A. Fraser, as can be seen on page 9140 of the Commons Hansard. There is also another statement made by the conservative member for Pembina which confirms the approval of this bill by conservative members and which is found on page 9051 of the Commons Hansard.

It is therefore with pleasure and confidence that I move second reading of Bill C-42 to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make amendments to other acts.

[Senator Denis]

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada; and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, that the motion be amended in Schedule B of the resolution by inserting immediately after Clause 28 the following:

"28.1 Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms set out herein are guaranteed equally to men and women."—(Honourable Senator Lang).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the last time this order was called I asked, at Senator Lang's request, that it stand in his name. Since then, by reason of the motion, notice of which I gave earlier today, I felt that Senator Lang would want to know that we would probably not be proceeding with this item this week, but that an opportunity to discuss it would arise later on the assumption that a house order of the nature that I gave notice of earlier would be adopted. Therefore, by arrangement with Senator Lang, I would ask that this item stand in my name, pursuant to an agreement between Senator Lang and myself.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, April 9, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Smith calling the attention of the Senate to some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim as dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (The British Columbia Reference case), (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submitting that the said decision does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Eric Cook: Honourable senators, I apologize for addressing you at such a late hour, but I am afraid that if I do not speak tonight or tomorrow, I will not get another opportunity until some time in May. I think perhaps I should trespass on your good nature and go ahead.

Honourable senators, this debate deals with a very serious and major problem for all provinces interested in offshore oil. It has been an interesting debate, and I am far from sure that I can add much of value to the very able addresses of Senator Smith and Senator Frith. I know that I have no authority to speak for the Government of Newfoundland. Nevertheless, as a Newfoundlander greatly concerned about the issues that are being debated, I feel obliged to make my contribution. I am totally in sympathy with the arguments of Senator Smith, and it follows that I cannot agree with Senator Frith, although I greatly admire the skill he displayed in marshalling so ably the scanty arguments at his disposal.

When I had the honour of sponsoring the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act in 1964 I said, in part:

> The fishing zones of Canada will of course be something entirely new to the statute law of Canada, and will have important consequences for Canada and other countries which have fished off Canada's coast.
>
> While there is not complete agreement between the nations on what is the accepted law of the sea, nevertheless great advances have been made since His Holiness Pope Alexander VI parcelled out the undiscovered world between Spain and Portugal.
>
> Professor Herbert Arthur Smith in his excellent book The Law and Custom of the Sea writes on this important point as follows:
> > Towards the end of the fifteenth century the great voyages of discovery gave a new importance to the law of the sea and this period may be taken as the starting point of the modern law. At this point we see the emergence of the fundamental problem of national jurisdiction over the high seas. Was it or was it not possible for the oceans and their shores to become in law the exclusive property of particular States? In 1493 Pope Alexander VI (Rodrigo Borgia) published the famous Bulls which divided the undiscovered world between Spain and Portugal by a line drawn from pole to pole a hundred leagues west of the Azores, and even purported to prohibit all commerce in the oceans except by licence of the Spanish and Portuguese sovereigns. By the Treaty of Tordesillas in the next year the sovereigns concerned shifted the line to 370 leagues west of the Cape Verde Islands, and the consequences of the demarcation remain to this day in the fact that Brazil is Portuguese while the rest of South America is Spanish.
> At the time this sweeping claim seems to have passed unchallenged, and it is to Queen Elizabeth I that we must give credit for being the first to assert the freedom of the oceans as a principle of the law of nations. The immediate cause of controversy was occasioned by Drake's voyage in the Golden Hind, which provoked a strong Spanish protection in 1580. In her reply to the Spanish Ambassador the Queen declared that the use of the sea and the air was free to all mankind, and that no exclusive rights in either could be claimed by particular nations or individuals. In due course the English claim was supported by the Dutch, and in the seventeenth century the general principle of the freedom of the high seas became an accepted maxim of law.
> But general principles are seldom sufficient for the solution of particular problems. The most difficult task of law is to harmonize principles which may appear to conflict and to define the boundaries within which this principle or that is to prevail. If it was agreed that the high seas lay outside all national jurisdiction, it was equally agreed that every State had authority over the waters within its own land frontiers or immediately adjoining its shores. How was the line to be drawn between the waters which were subject to national authority and the "high seas" which were governed only by the law of nations? Again, was there any overlap between the two? Had foreign ships any legal rights in national waters, and in what cases, if any, could national jurisdiction be extended into the high seas?
> While at the present time—

That is the year 1964:

> —a number of countries agree that the width of the belt of territorial waters is three nautical miles, such agreement is far from universal. Among the states claiming a wider minimum limit for their territorial sea, the following may be noted. Sweden and Norway claim four miles; Italy, Spain, Portugal, India and Yugoslavia claim six miles; Mexico claims nine miles; Albania claims ten miles; Russia and the United Arab Republic each claim twelve miles. Moreover, a large number of states, including France, qualify their general acceptance of the three-mile limit by claiming certain extensions for varying purposes . . .
> Among the countries claiming an additional area for the protection of their fishing are Norway and Iceland, and Denmark for Greenland and Faroe Islands—each of which claims 12 miles. There are other countries which claim a greater distance. Peru, Costa Rica and El Salvador each claim 200 miles. Finally, a number of countries claim different areas for other purposes such as Sanitary Regulations and Pollution of Sea and Neutrality.

These comments were made in 1964, and it is important to remember that the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act of 1964, and the claims of other countries to which I referred, had to do with jurisdiction over the seas adjacent to the countries concerned. In the meantime, developments were taking place in the formation and enunciation of the law of the sea in relation to the lands under the seas, the lands in question being the continental shelves of the maritime countries.

I refer to a booklet issued by the Government of the Province of Newfoundland entitled Heritage of the Sea—Our Case on Offshore Mineral Rights, and I quote three main items from page 24, where it is pointed out:

> (1) On September 28, 1945, the landmark Truman Proclamation was issued by President Harry S. Truman, declaring that the United States had the automatic and exclusive right to develop the mineral resources of its continental shelf and inviting its neighbours to claim likewise.
> (2) In 1969, the International Court of Justice another branch of the United Nations, in the North Sea Continental Shelf Cases, confirmed that a coastal state's continental shelf rights arise quite independently of and predate the 1958 UN Treaty. Moreover, those rights, the court said, are inherent rights and need not be claimed in any sort of legislation or proclamation; they exist anyway.
> (3) By our critical date, March 31, 1949, the USA's automatic rights theory, as later confirmed by the International Law Commission and the International Court of Justice, had been used extensively without protest. Since its first unveiling in 1945, it had never been seriously challenged.

That the continental shelf up to a limit of 200 miles—as agreed by treaty—is the property of each maritime power is now recognized, settled, international law. To use the language of Professor Herbert Arthur Smith, from whose work I quoted earlier, the general principle of ownership of the continental shelf has become an accepted maxim of law. Not yet settled is the ownership of the vast areas of the seas of the world which do not cover the continental shelves of the maritime countries of the world. This will be one of the subjects to be covered in the proposed Law of the Sea Treaty.

Professor Maxwell Cohen touches on this subject in his article entitled "Canada's Missing Link: Sharing" published in the Globe and Mail on January 16, 1981.

> The years of debate on the Law of the Sea Treaty may have brought the subject another step forward. Answers had to be found to the claims of landlocked states as well as to countries without continental shelves or rich resources off their coasts. That treaty will provide for continental shelf revenue—beyond the 233-kilometer (200 mile) exclusive economic zone—to be shared. Seven per cent of the wellhead revenues—1 per cent per year from the sixth year onward—is to be deposited with the Seabed Authority and distributed to non-affluent countries under some fair formula.

So much, honourable senators, for the International Law of the Sea as it relates to, first, the continental shelf, and, second, the vast areas of the seas of the world outside and beyond the continental shelves.

What is the effect of all these interesting developments on federal-provincial ownership of natural resources on the continental shelf surrounding Canada?

Is the question of ownership to be settled according to international law or do we follow the rule in the 1876 case R. vs. Keyn?

Again I quote from the Newfoundland government publication Heritage of the Sea—Our Case on Offshore Mineral Rights:

• (2150)

> This then was the setting for the celebrated case of R. v. Keyn in 1876, Ottawa's key case in the 1967 British Columbia Offshore Minerals Reference. Keyn was captain of the German vessel Franconia which ran down the British vessel Strathclyde two and a half miles off Dover Beach, killing a number of people on the Strathclyde. Keyn was charged with manslaughter. The Court split seven to six, the majority holding that English criminal law did not apply to foreigners in England's three-mile territorial sea for it felt that the right of one state's vessels to freely pass through another state's territorial sea was firmly entrenched in international law.
> The 1876 case of R. v. Keyn was one of the most controversial cases in English law and has been criticized by the courts and learned writers alike and in fact was overruled by the English Parliament in the Territorial Waters Jurisdiction Act of 1878. It did not even deal with offshore minerals, but with a criminal charge of manslaughter. It perhaps seems strange that this case over 100 years ago, in a matter as remote as the skill of a German captain, would now play a key role in deciding Newfoundland's future. Yet the fact remains, that the remarks of certain of the majority judges which can be interpreted to mean that at Common Law the Crown's rights in general stopped at the low water mark, comprise the main prop of Ottawa's claim to our offshore minerals.
> Whatever its application to British Columbia, the evolution of both the law of the sea and Newfoundland's constitutional status with the passage of time has made the case of R.v. Keyn irrelevant to the interpretation of our Terms of Union.
>
> Even in the 19th century England, the effect of R.v. Keyn was confined to criminal law matters. People holding crown grants to subsea minerals had naturally been worried by this case. They had taken out crown grants, started submarine coal mines, dutifully paid their royalties and now their title to subsea minerals seemed in jeopardy. Not so, said the Law Officers of the Crown in 1878 replying to an official inquiry as to whether, in view of R.v. Keyn, new legislation should be passed. In their words:
> "We do not think any doubt really exists as to the Crown's Title to the bed of the Sea adjacent to the Sea Coast of the Queen's Dominions and to the minerals therein."

> Thus, R.v. Keyn was buried away, only to be resurrected by Ottawa in its present fight with the Provinces over offshore minerals.

As I have already shown, it is now a clearly established and agreed maxim of the Law of the Sea, that the continental shelf—which will be limited to 200 miles by treaty—belongs to and is owned by the country to which the continental shelf is attached or of which it forms part.

The ownership of the continental shelf as between nations, according to international law, belongs to the individual maritime nations of the world. In a unitary state as, for example, the United Kingdom, international law and the national law of the unitary state coincide and no question remains to be determined.

To determine our rights between ourselves, we must have recourse to our own law. Pursuant to Canadian law, ownership of the resources of a province is vested in the Queen in right of the province. As the continental shelf is merely an extension of the land mass of a province, it therefore follows that the resources of the continental shelf have always been vested in the Queen in the right of the province, which is the result of the decision of the International Court of Justice in the North Sea continental shelf cases.

Indeed, following the rationale of the North Sea continental shelf cases, it is my view that to successfully argue that the provinces have no right, title or interest in the resources, one would have to establish that the Sovereign of England had expressly excluded the continental shelf from the land of the province. It is not necessary, in my view, for the province to establish that the province had been granted its continental shelf, but it is necessary for Ottawa to establish clearly that it was excluded.

If Crown land grants to Canadian citizens are looked at one will note that the Crown exempts or reserves to itself minerals, and so on. Otherwise, if not so reserved, everything would go to the grantee. In the same way, the continental shelf is attached to the land mass of the province unless excluded.

What then is the root of the title of the Queen in the right of the provinces to the continental shelf? Did the Keyn case decided in 1876 merely settle some provisions of the British criminal law, or did it affect the title of the Crown to offshore rights?

The opinion of the law officers of the Crown rendered in 1878 said:

> We do not think any doubt really exists as to the Crown's Title to the bed of the Sea adjacent to the Sea Coast of the Queen's Dominions and to the minerals therein.

On the other hand, I can find no root of title of the Queen in the right of Canada to the continental shelf of the Province of Nova Scotia, and I fail to see how any treaty or the law of the sea confers any title on anyone. The treaty only confirms a title which already exists, but it is utterly beyond the power of a foreign country to confer by treaty a Canadian title to property.

To me, the only way you get a title is from a predecessor in title or by prescription—that is, by adverse possession—and if Ottawa argues that before the Law of the Sea Treaty the "no man's land" theory applied, how can it argue that it adverseley occupied this "no man's land"? If so, against whom did it occupy it—against the Queen in the right of the provinces?

On the question of the affect of a treaty on provincial law, the Globe and Mail of January 20 quoted Chief Justice Evans as saying "a valid provincial law cannot be struck down because of an alleged breach of an international law." It follows that if by valid Canadian law the continental shelf belongs to the provinces, the Law of the Sea Treaty cannot in my view override this legal position.

Unless, under the provisions of Canadian law, offshore rights already belong to the federal government, the federal government cannot obtain ownership by international treaty. This is clearly the effect of the words of Lord Atkin, in delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee in Attorney General for Canada vs. Attorney General for Ontario (1937) A.C. 326 (P.C.), at page 352:

> It would be remarkable that while the Dominion could not initiate legislation, however desirable, which affected civil rights in the Provinces, yet its Government not responsible to the Provinces nor controlled by Provincial Parliaments need only agree with a foreign country to enact such legislation, and its Parliament would be forthwith clothed with authority to affect Provincial rights to the full extent of such agreement. Such a result would appear to undermine the constitutional safeguards of Provincial constitutional autonomy.

In other words, if the provinces have ownership of offshore resources, the federal government cannot take such ownership away merely by making an international treaty.

If, therefore, the Keyn case is still good law, which clearly it is not, Ottawa has no more right to the "no man's land" than Nova Scotia, if Ottawa says it has, what is its root of title? Nova Scotia as the owner of the land mass is the only one who has any root of title, any colour of right to its own continental shelf.

In Newfondland's case, the Imperial Conference of 1926 formally agreed that the self-governing Dominions—that is, Australia, Canada, the Irish Free State, Newfoundland, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa—were "autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs" and we had that status when the Terms of Union with Canada became the law of the land. Any doubt as to our status during Commission of Government, which was the government in Newfoundland before 1949, was eliminated by Term 7 of the Terms of Union which our negotiators in 1948 wisely inserted to say that Newfoundland's Dominion status and rights, suspended by Commission of Government, came back in full force for an instant prior to Union. Thus, Newfoundland entered Confederation, not as a colony but as,

and with all the rights of, a fully-fledged, self-governing dominion; that is to say, a sovereign state.

● (2200)

Term 7 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada reads:

> 7. The Constitution of Newfoundland as it existed immediately prior to the sixteenth day of February, 1934, is revived at the date of Union and shall, subject to these Terms and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946, continue as the Constitution of the Province of Newfoundland from and after the date of Union, until altered under the authority of the said Acts.

Term 7 was not inserted in the Terms of Union because of a mere whim: it was inserted for a good and solid constitutional reason. Newfoundland, although for sentimental reasons we often used the title of Britain's oldest colony, was in 1933 a full dominion pursuant to the terms of the Statute of Westminster.

This is, of course, a matter of clearly recorded history and requires no further proof but, as a matter of interest, I quote from a work published in 1967 by St. John Chadwick entitled, Newfoundland: Island into Province, which gives some further background regarding Newfoundland's constitutional position. At page 127 he writes:

> A measure of Newfoundland's growing involvement in the higher councils of the Empire (however infrequently she might contribute to them in practice) can be gauged from the press release issued on 19 August 1918 by the Prime Ministers then gathered in London. The Imperial War Cabinet, ran this statement, had been continuously in session for the past two-and-a-half months. These meetings had proved of such value that its members had thought it essential that certain modifications should be made in the existing channels of communication so as to make consultation between the various Governments of the Empire in regard to Imperial Policy as continuous and intimate as possible. It has therefore been decided that for the future the Prime Ministers of the Dominions, as members of the Imperial War Cabinet, shall have the right to communicate on matters of Cabinet importance direct with the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, whenever they see fit to do so. It has also been decided that each Dominion shall have the right to nominate a visiting or a resident Minister in London to be a member of the Imperial War Cabinet at meetings other than those attended by the Prime Ministers.
> The Newfoundland Government was proud to take advantage of this arrangement and the then Prime Minister, Mr. (Later Sir William) Lloyde represented the Colony at both the London Conferences and the eventual Peace Conference in Paris.

Again, at page 156, he writes:

> But even before that date, the Newfoundland Government had realized that they could go no further without external help.

[Senator Cook.]

This deals with the time when we received help by way of Commission of Government.

> At their request a Royal Commission had, in February, been appointed to investigate the whole situation.
>
> 'Whereas', ran the sonorous first preamble to the Royal Warrant, 'on the advice of our Ministers in our United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in our Dominion of Canada and in our Island of Newfoundland We had deemed it expedient that a Commission should issue forthwith to examine into the future of Newfoundland and in particular to report on the financial situation and prospects therein.'
> The terms of the Warrant were themselves significant. Although by now it was a question for Newfoundland of 'needs must', this was not an investigation thrust upon an independent country against its will. The terms of the Balfour Declaration and the spirit of the Statute of Westminster were safeguarded to the hilt. Only following a request from the sovereign Parliament of Newfoundland was the Royal Commission invited and empowered to take evidence in the Island. Significantly its high-powered three-man team consisted of representatives from Canada and Newfoundland as well as from Britain. Whatever they might later have to say about the highly critical tone of the Report, Newfoundlanders could not subsequently complain that the Royal Commission had been foisted by an Imperial power upon an unwilling people.

And finally, at page 162, he writes:

> But, looking to the future, the most important recommendation of all—

That was a recommendation of the Royal Commission—

> —was that 'as soon as the Island's difficulties are overcome and the country is again self-supporting, responsible government, on request from the people of Newfoundland, would be restored.'

Therefore, by virtue of the provisions of the recommendations of the royal commission under which our Constitution was suspended, and by virtue of having in the 1940s once again become completely self-supporting, with indeed a surplus, Newfoundland, as stated in Term 7, entered union with Canada as an independent, self-supporting dominion of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Honourable senators, while the title of the provinces to the continental shelf off their shores may lack documentary proof, that is to be expected. I suspect that there is a lack of documentary proof to the title of every maritime power that claims its own continental shelf. However, the federal government also lacks documentary proof and, in addition, it has no colour of right whatsoever, inasmuch as the federal government never at any time owned the land to which the continental shelf is attached.

There are those who find it incredible that Newfoundland should claim ownership of the offshore oil. I ask these people to consider what the situation would be if Newfoundland had not become Canada's tenth province.

The options given to Newfoundlanders at the time of the second referendum, July 22, 1948, were union with Canada or a return to responsible government, as we had in 1934; in other words, a return to dominion status. Newfoundlanders wisely chose union with Canada.

If Newfoundlanders had voted for the other option, there could be no question that the Dominion of Canada would today have any claim of any kind whatsoever to the offshore oil.

However, Newfoundlanders chose the option of union with Canada, and, as a result, the Dominion of Canada made a treaty with the Dominion of Newfoundland.

Did that treaty provide that the Dominion of Newfoundland surrender ownership of offshore oil and transfer such ownership to the Dominion of Canada?

No such provision will be found in "Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada." On the contrary, term 37 of the terms, entitled "Natural Resources", reads:

> 37. All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to Newfoundland at the date of Union, and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals, or royalties, shall belong to the Province of Newfoundland, subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than that of the Province in the same.

Honourable senators, there is no limit or reservation in term 37. It is clear that the Dominion of Newfoundland would have ownership of the offshore oil, if the Dominion of Newfoundland existed in 1981.

In 1949, before Newfoundland actually became a province of Canada, Newfoundland was an independent dominion. In view of term 7 and term 37, what event took place after March 31, 1949, and up to the present time that transferred ownership of the offshore rights from Newfoundland to Canada?

The two major developments before and after 1949 were the Truman Declaration of 1945 and the International Court of Justice decision in 1969 in the North Sea continental shelf cases, both of which are in support of Newfoundland's case and fatal to the federal claim.

• (2210)

If the federal government disputes the judgment of the International Court of Justice, then the federal government must accept the onus of proving or establishing when the offshore oil rights did come into existence. If, indeed, the International Court of Justice was wrong in declaring that a coastal state's continental shelf rights always existed, then someone must establish the magic moment in time when such rights came into being.

In the case of Nova Scotia, did these rights exist only in a growing condition until July 1, 1867, when the rights suddenly matured and could be seen to exist? In the case of Newfoundland, did the offshore rights only come into existence after March 31, 1949?

It does seem only simple logic and common sense that the same rule or measure of time would apply to both Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, and the only sensible solution is not to try to establish some artificial period of time in each or both cases, but to accept the decision of the International Court of Justice, which is accepted and applied throughout the whole wide world.

Until the federal government can clearly establish that the judgment of the International Court of Justice was wrong, when it ruled that a coastal state's continental shelf rights are inherent rights, and, further, can clearly establish a date after July 1, 1867, in the case of Nova Scotia, and a date after March 31, 1949, in the case of Newfoundland, when offshore rights first came into existence as the property of the federal government, I am of the opinion that the rights belong to Nova Scotia and to Newfoundland.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the inquiry to which Senator Cook has just spoken is limited to the claim of Nova Scotia to the minerals off its shores. He has quite appropriately discussed as applying to Newfoundland the principles which have already been debated as applying to Nova Scotia; and I think it is logical that he would do so. Honourable senators will recall that both Senator Smith and I have displayed an interest in this subject, and we are both interested in the application of those principles to Newfoundland.

The reason I am speaking, in connection with the adjournment of the debate is that if we are to extend it, perhaps both Senator Smith and I, as well as other honourable senators, would like to have an opportunity to speak to the Newfoundland aspect, which is not in the wording but has been extended by Senator Cook's intervention. Therefore, I would propose the adjournment of this debate so that I can speak on the Newfoundland aspect, but technically I am not able to do that because the strict wording of this inquiry limits it to Nova Scotia, and I have already spoken on that.

Hon. William J. Petten: If honourable senators agree, I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, perhaps I should respond to the remarks of Senator Frith. I, as the originator of the inquiry, would be happy to follow his suggestion and formally extend the terms of the inquiry to include a discussion of Newfoundland.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would it not be necessary for someone to either amend this inquiry or propose a new one, otherwise the rules of debate would hardly apply? Perhaps Senator Petten could take that point under advisement when he next speaks on the matter.

Senator Petten: In the meantime, if honourable senators agree, I will adjourn the debate. If we want to amend the inquiry at a later date, I shall be happy to take that into consideration.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, before the honourable senator adjourns the debate, I would say that Senator Cook has made a remarkable and most helpful speech.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-17, to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SCHEDULE OF AUTHORIZED SALARY REVISIONS TABLED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled a schedule of authorized salary revisions for certain Senate positions effective April 1, 1981, as approved by the committee at its meeting of Wednesday, April 15, 1981.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, while I was present at the Internal Economy Committee meeting held this morning, which approved the report submitted by Senator Graham, I would ask him if he would outline to the house the percentage increases that were approved and how they apply, in general, to our staff.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, the schedule covers most of the categories of employees of the Senate. The percentage increases range between 9 and 11 per cent. In some cases, I believe there are some percentage increases as high as 11.5 per cent, but, generally speaking, across the board we have increased salaries in accordance with increases that were approved by the House of Commons at an earlier date.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not rising to give notice of a motion, but because we have established at least an interim custom of discussing our schedule at this point in the Order of Business. I would like to discuss the day to which we propose to adjourn.

Honourable senators might like to know that I am informed that the House of Commons will be adjourning today at 6 o'clock until next Tuesday, when it will begin the implementation of its house order on the amendments to the resolution respecting the Constitution. Since we hope, pursuant to what I said yesterday, to adjourn today, I want to say that I believe our business today will consist principally of debate on the Canada Post Corporation Bill, which will perhaps receive second reading and be referred to committee. We will then proceed to deal with the Senate order, notice of which I gave yesterday. Then we will adjourn until next Thursday at 2 o'clock. On Thursday we will sit from 2 o'clock until 6 o'clock, and from 8 o'clock until 10 o'clock. On Friday we will sit from 10 o'clock until 1 o'clock.

Senator Benidickson: One o'clock a.m.?

Senator Frith: One o'clock p.m. I had not thought there was such a threat in my voice to suggest I was indicating 1 a.m.

If all of these things evolve as hoped for, we will then adjourn at 1 o'clock on Friday, April 24 until Tuesday May 19. We will just have to see what happens, as usual. It is only because I frequently give an outline of our proposed program on the last sitting day of the week that I have done so today.

I should add a footnote, to say that, if today we refer the Canada Post Corporation Bill to the Committee on Transport and Communications, it may well be that the chairman of that committee, Senator Smith, will ask members of the committee to meet on the morning of Thursday, April 23. If the members of the committee receive a request from Senator Smith, or the clerk of the committee, to attend here some time in the forenoon prior to the sitting of the Senate at 2 o'clock on that

Thursday afternoon, that will be because the bill will have been referred to committee today. We will then deal with the report of that committee, if it is ready to report, on Thursday, April 23.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I should like to comment on two points. I was impressed by what Senator Godfrey said yesterday concerning the possibility of committees of the Senate sitting between April 24 and our projected return on May 19. Has anything been done with respect to that?

In the Ontario legislature, during recesses, committee work continues in a commendable way, with a little compensation, which I think is not untoward, although it does not mean anything to me personally. That compensation is for committee work that takes place when the legislature is not sitting, and those committees do good work.

Here, in the Senate, a tremendous amount of committee work goes unnoticed, and I think that during the recess some committee work should proceed until the projected resumption on May 19. Has the Deputy Leader of the Government given any consideration to that idea?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, as I said when Senator Godfrey raised the same question last evening, we will do everything in our power to accommodate the committee chairmen who wish to have meetings at any time while the Senate is not sitting, just as we try to accommodate them when the Senate is sitting.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, since reference has been made to the committee of which I have the honour to be chairman, perhaps I could say to the members of the committee that, if the reference to our committee of the post office bill should be made before adjournment today, it would be my intention, which I hope would be acceptable to the committee, to have notices sent out for a meeting of the committee on Thursday morning, April 23, at approximately 10 o'clock or some relatively convenient time. We would then begin consideration of that bill and decide when we would meet again. Unless someone rises now to express a different view, when I leave the chamber I shall ask the clerk of the committee to send out notices of that kind if, in fact, the bill is referred today. Of course, I will not do so if the bill is not referred today.

● (1410)

Senator Frith: The only point I would like to add to my thanks to Senator Smith for his clarification of the plans of the committee is that we now know from our proceedings last evening that Senator Hicks and Senator Godfrey wish to speak to this bill. There may be other senators who wish to speak. I want to make it clear that no understandings, agreements or undertakings have been given which will in any way interfere with the opportunity for Senator Hicks, Senator Godfrey or any other honourable senator to speak to the bill. It may be that third reading, after the committee has reported, will be the most appropriate time for their intervention in the debate. Whatever the case, I want to be sure that there is no misunderstanding that we had any intention to foreclose, limit or restrict honourable senators who wish to speak to the bill.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): As far as we are concerned, we cannot bind this side to any agreement to the extent that you on that side can.

Senator Frith: Une autre entente cordiale.

Senator Flynn: You have more problems with your party than I have with mine.

Senator Frith: We will see. Merci, on verra.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

RATE OF INFLATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development, and ask him whether he has taken note of the fact that the rate of inflation, which is 12.22 per cent, as recorded the other day, is now substantially higher than that forecast by the Minister of Finance in his budget. In fact, it represents the highest rate of inflation for many years. What steps does the government intend to take to deal with this important and pressing matter of public concern?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, the answer to the first part of the question is: Yes, we have noted that the rate of inflation for the last recorded month is running at the rate suggested by the honourable senator and that, indeed, it is somewhat higher than was forecast in the budget of last October. As the Minister of Finance has pointed out, it is not fair to make a prediction on the basis of one month, although there are a couple of other increases which are equally disturbing, nor is it fair to suggest that a trend in the escalation of the rate of inflation has set in. It is also noted, of course, in the performance of the economy for the last month and, indeed, for the last two months, that the pace and activity within the total economy has been somewhat higher than expected.

Senator Roblin: If I were the minister I, too, would grasp at any favourable straws that floated by, in the hope of giving even more good news on that particular front.

Senator Frith: That is frank of you.

Senator Roblin: The question of inflation remains. It seems to me that it is not a matter of one month's aberration. We have seen a steady rise over the ministerial forecast for the last six months. I am rather concerned that the government does not think it necessary to do anything about this inflationary trend at the present time. I am also concerned that the government is not responding to the initiative taken by the Premier of Ontario, who has suggested that at least there should be meetings to discuss this topic. That, to me, is the least the government could do. I would like to know why the government does not consider it necessary to talk about inflation now, but prefers to postpone the matter until some time in the autumn.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I cannot add very much to what I have already said. I do know—and perhaps the honourable senator will acknowledge my point—that not long ago his party, and perhaps the honorable senator himself, admonished the government for not taking measures to enhance or expand the economy. I am sure the honourable senator knows as well as I the potential consequences of such action.

● (1415)

The fact of the matter is that the economy has performed somewhat better—in fact, I would almost say significantly better—than some of the projections that were made, not only in the budget of October 28, but, indeed, in some statements respecting the economy made even before that. According to some of the people who engage in this kind of forecasting, the prospects for the balance of 1981, even without any change in policy, are equally good for the economy.

Therefore, if we are to try to counter that with even more severe use of the instruments now available, such as the policy that has been consistently followed by the Bank of Canada or the fiscal stance of this government, we may have some undesirable fallout. It is not a case of not being concerned about the matter. The honourable senator knows that a very delicate balance has to be followed in these things so that you do not have the problem, on one side, of too much restriction and, on the other side, of too much incentive.

Senator Roblin: I will just make a final observation and then put a question to my honourable friend. What he is really telling me is that the government does not intend to do anything about the matter. It is just going to let events run their course.

My question is: At what rate of inflation does my honourable friend think the government might do something about it?

Senator Olson: A rate of inflation at a somewhat lower level than it is at today would be more acceptable, providing we could keep the economy moving at the levels it is at with the modest expansions that are now being forecast.

Senator Roblin: Does my honourable friend think that an unemployment rate of 8 per cent is keeping the economy in a satisfactory position?

Senator Olson: The unemployment rate is not 8 per cent; it is 7.3 per cent.

Senator Roblin: It will be 8 per cent, or I have missed my guess. There are one million people unemployed, whatever percentage you put on it.

Senator Olson: If that is the view my honourable friend wants to take in dealing with that side of the argument, he also has to accept that, perhaps, a modification of fiscal policy or monetary policy would improve that situation.

Senator Murray: Or energy policy.

Senator Olson: Then, on the other side of the coin, he can come back and complain about the rate of inflation. He knows enough about economics to know that those kinds of arguments are like trying to ride both sides of the fence at the same time.

Senator Flynn: You should know something about that.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend could give me lessons in that.

PARLIAMENT

NEWSPAPER ARTICLE—USE OF DESIGNATION "M.P."

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: My question is for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In the Globe and Mail of today I noticed a headline stating that the post office bill had been passed by M.P.'s yet, I think Senator Hicks would confirm that the bill is still before us.

Does the minister think he ought to write to the Globe and Mail noting that such a headline should have reflected that only "M.C.'s" had passed the bill, and not "M.S.'s", and certainly "M.P.'s" had not passed the bill?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, this incident completely exonerates the position that I have been trying to take for months and that is that members of this house are M.P.s.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

PROPOSED CANADA POST CORPORATION—APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. This morning, the head of the Toronto Transit Commission announced that he had been appointed head of the proposed Canada Post Corporation, with a five-year contract at $150,000 per annum.

Would the Leader of the Government advise the Senate what authority was used in negotiating the contract, as Bill C-42 has not been passed by this chamber or received royal assent?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator makes a valid point. The announcement was, apparently, made by this gentleman in Toronto. He is reported to have said that he had been contacted regarding a position with the Post Office and that he understood he was going to receive a certain specified salary. If the reports are accurate, it certainly seems to be an impropriety, at the very least, for this gentleman to have anticipated an action of this chamber.

Hon. G. I. Smith: It is more than impropriety. It should be taken into consideration when considering his fitness for such a delicate task.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEW BRUNSWICK—STATUS OF AGREEMENTS

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it concerns the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I was going to direct my question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board because, as a former chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, he took great interest in the matter of Kent County, New Brunswick.

On March 31 the agreements between DREE and the Province of New Brunswick expired, including the Kent sub-agreement. There have been assurances that new agreements will be signed. During a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture concerning Kent County in July, Mr. De Bané stated, for the record, that projects in Kent, which the provincial government considered essential, would receive funding in any new agreement.

● (1420)

The fact that agreements have not been signed and, therefore, allocations of available monies have not been made, has made it very difficult for those involved in the Kent Region Project to make plans for the coming year. For example, farm plans could not be completed for the coming crop year because of the uncertainty, and staff working with the Kent Region Project, not being assured of continued employment, have left or are seeking new jobs. I am sure that there are similar problems with other agreements in New Brunswick. Therefore, the subcommittee on Kent County of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture hopes that agreements will be signed as soon as possible.

Could the minister find out from his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, what the status of all the agreements—not just the Kent sub-agreement—with New Brunswick is, when new agreements will be signed and for what term?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. It is a detailed question, and an important one.

Senator Sherwood: Can we anticipate an answer next week, considering the urgency of this matter?

Senator Perrault: A request will be made immediately for the required information.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

ACCESS TO INFORMATION BILL—PROPOSED COMMITTEE PRE-STUDY

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to Senator Goldenberg, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

[Senator Perrault.]

On March 31 I wrote a letter to Senator Goldenberg, which reads as follows:

> I note from the press that the House of Commons Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is considering the Access to Information Bill. As you know, the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments studied this question for several years, and I have been particularly interested in this subject.
> It seems to me that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee should be doing a pre-study of this very important Bill, and that they could make a real contribution by doing so.
> I would appreciate your advising me if you had considered having the subject matter of the Bill referred to your Committee and if not, why not!

The following week, on Tuesday evening, Senator Goldenberg spoke to me in the chamber and said there was to be a meeting of the committee on Thursday morning, and we could discuss it at that time.

The next day he said that there were witnesses to be heard on Thursday morning, and it would not be convenient to discuss it then. I then asked him if the steering committee could consider it and bring forward recommendations to the committee. He replied that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee does not have a steering committee, but he indicated that he would consult with some of the other members of the committee and let me know.

This morning I spoke with Senator Goldenberg, and he indicated that he was not going to discuss with the other members the question of a pre-study of the bill until we come back on May 19, which I think is too late. This is the type of bill in which the non-partisan atmosphere of a committee of this chamber could make a real contribution. If we wait until the bill comes here after it has been through the House of Commons, we cannot make the kind of contribution that Senator Hayden, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and his committee, have made so often in the past. We do have a precedent for this as far as the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs is concerned because, on January 24, 1979, Senator Goldenberg did move that the subject matter of the Public Referendums Bill be referred to his committee.

My question to Senator Goldenberg is: Why did he not recommend, when the bill first went to a committee in the House of Commons, that a pre-study be held of this bill by this committee?

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, Senator Godfrey has reported accurately the sequence of events that transpired concerning this bill, but, in my view, the Access to Information Bill is a highly complicated one. It is still before the committee of the House of Commons. That committee has met 12 or 15 times. It is going to report the bill back to the House of Commons with a great number of amendments and, having regard to the fact that there were two other bills in the interval before our committee, I did not think that we should duplicate the work of the House of Commons at this particular time. I wonder what would have happened if, for example, Senator Smith, the very able Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, had made a pre-study of the bill on the Post Office which we had before us last night, and which came to us with 61 proposed amendments by the House of Commons committee. But the committee would have studied the original bill.

I told Senator Godfrey this week that I would discuss this with a number of members of the committee, but, in view of the fact that we knew we were going to have a rather long adjournment, I thought I would defer it until our return.

• (1425)

LAW REFORM COMMISSION—PROPOSED COMMITTEE STUDY

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I should like to ask Senator Goldenberg another question. I shall read the following letter that I wrote to him on May 8, 1980:

> After reading the enclosed this morning—

I should say that "the enclosed" was an article by Patrick Donohue on "Law reform: no bang for the buck in 9 years". I would like to read a couple of excerpts from that article, which will explain my letter. They read as follows:

> It would surprise many Canadians to know that a federal commission has been working for nine years at changing the legal basis of our society. The impact of the Law Reform Commission of Canada has yet to be felt by the average Canadian. Since the commission's inception in 1971, no new laws have been enacted as a result of its efforts.

Further down, the article continues:

> The problem for the commission is that no one is responsible for following up its recommendations with proposed legislation. After the commission's reports are tabled by the minister of justice in the House of Commons, they are turned over to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs—

That is the House of Commons committee.

> —which is free to ignore the recommendations—

Continuing further down, the article says:

> Parliament should examine the commission as it has evolved to see whether the public is getting satisfaction for its money. The "bang for their buck" has become a whimper.

On May 8, 1980 I wrote to Senator Goldenberg as follows:

> After reading the enclosed this morning, it occurred to me that this would be a great area for the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to take an interest. You could pick out certain recommendations where you think action should be taken by the Government and hold hearings on them, then bring in a report and follow it up in the way the National Finance Committee does after they issue a report. We call back the Government officials some months later to see what they have done about it.
> Of course, if your Committee is too busy with legislation they wouldn't be able to handle it, but my impression is that the Committee hasn't had very much to do in that regard the last couple of years.

I must say, honourable senators, that I did check, and I found that in 1980, other than on the Constitution, the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee had met for a total of 4 hours and 20 minutes. After I wrote that letter to Senator Goldenberg, he spoke to me and said he had been thinking about exactly the same thing and he was going to do something about it.

My question to Senator Goldenberg is: When does he intend to take some action on the suggestion I made nearly a year ago?

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: As we say in French, "En temps et lieu".

Senator Flynn: In due course.

FISHERIES

GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—CLOSURE OF HERRING FISHERY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on April 9 concerning herring; but I shall await his presence in the chamber before giving that reply.

> 2. No amendments or sub-amendments may be proposed to the said motion except those moved by the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate on Friday, April 24, 1981, as provided hereinafter.
> 3. The question on the amendment to the motion, moved on March 26, 1981, by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk shall not be put except as herein provided.

4. The Order to resume the debate on the main motion shall be called at 10.00 a.m. on Friday, April 24, 1981, and notwithstanding any other motion in amendment thereto, the Leader of the Government in the Senate shall forthwith be given the floor to move any amendments to the said Address adopted by the House of Commons on Thursday, April 23, 1981, pursuant to the Special Order adopted by that House on April 8, 1981; and no amendments may be moved to such amendments, but the Leader of the Opposition may, immediately after the said motion of the Leader of the Government, move any amendment to the said motion for an Address; and both the amendments of the Leader of the Government and the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition may be debated at the same time but without further amendment.

5. Every question necessary to dispose of any amendments moved by the Leader of the Government or by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate or the motion in amendment by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, if it is still before the Senate, shall be put, in that order, no later than 12.00 noon on Friday, April 24, 1981.

6. There shall be no debate after April 24, 1981, on the said motion until a day named by the Leader of the Government in the Senate pursuant to the following paragraph of this Order.

7. After the Supreme Court of Canada has rendered a decision on the appeals concerning the opinion of the Manitoba Court of Appeal rendered on February 3, 1981, and on the opinion of the Newfoundland Court of Appeal rendered on March 31, 1981, on the questions put to the said Courts concerning the amendment of the Constitution of Canada, the Leader of the Government may, by rising in his place and informing the Senate thereof, name two days on which the said motion shall be debated by the Senate.

8. At 6.00 p.m. on the second day named by the Leader of the Government pursuant to the preceding paragraph of this Order, the Speaker shall interrupt any proceedings and, without further debate, put every question necessary to dispose of the said motion. No Senator shall rise to speak after this hour, and all such questions as must be decided in order to comply with this Order shall be decided forthwith before the Senate adjourns.

9. The provisions of this Order shall prevail notwithstanding any rule or practice of the Senate to the contrary.

10. Nothing in this Order shall be considered to affect in any manner or to any degree the separation of the legislative and judicial powers, a fundamental principle of our Constitution.

[Senator Frith.]

[Translation]

He said: Honourable senators, I have two things to say first. I do not have that many comments to make on the motion because yesterday I gave the reasons why I intended to move the motion today. However, there are two small housekeeping matters that I might be allowed to explain in English, and then I could perhaps make some kind of introductory remarks to the motion.

[English]

Honourable senators may have noticed that during the course of the debate yesterday the Leader of the Opposition and I, in effect, agreed on a change to paragraph 4 in the proposed order, the terms of which are printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for yesterday. It was because of a lack of grammatical consistency that, after further discussion, we decided it was better in its original form. If it is satisfactory to honourable senators, I will not go into the details of that. What it means is that with regard to the two items that we were not prepared or able to agree upon fully yesterday—the first being a change in the wording of paragraph 4 and the second being a change in the wording of paragraph 7—we should say regarding paragraph 4, as they say in the editing business, "Stet." In other words, it remains as it was because of a change in paragraph 1.

• (1430)

With regard to paragraph 7—and it seems to me this requires further explanation—honourable senators will recall that paragraph 7 of the proposed order provides for a method of dealing with the resolution after the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada has been handed down, and the original wording, which honourable senators will find in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, provided for our dealing with the matter by naming two days after the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada had been rendered. That provision was exactly the same as obtained in the House of Commons. Senator Flynn pointed out that we have already agreed to deal with the matter here, finally, only after the House of Commons has disposed of it. He was quite correct about that, and suggested that we should re-word paragraph 7 to provide that our final two days will be named after the House of Commons has disposed of the matter, rather than after the Supreme Court of Canada has disposed of it.

The somewhat obscure comments I made, that appear on the record, were meant to say that we should leave ourselves a little more flexibility than that, and that we should name our final two days after the House of Commons has named their two days, simply to give ourselves the latitude to go either two days after them, or perhaps one day, or perhaps a day and a half, or whatever we decide is the best way to deal with the matter in the interests of the country and in the interests of the Senate.

As a result, I proposed a re-wording to Senator Flynn, and we have agreed that that is the way we will deal with it.

The sequence will therefore be as follows, as I understand it. The House of Commons will dispose of the amendment stage next week. Please remember that there are three stages: the amendment stage; the Supreme Court of Canada decision stage; and the disposition by Parliament stage. What will happen is that by Thursday of next week the House of Commons will dispose of stage 1—that is, the amendment stage. If this order is adopted, we shall deal with our part of Parliament's disposition of that stage on Friday, by 12 noon—at least, it will be put no later than 12 noon. Then we come to stage 2, which is the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. If the result of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada is that the proposal is illegal, as Senator Walker and I discussed yesterday, the chances are that no days will be named, and a whole new set of circumstances will be before us. If the Supreme Court of Canada decides that the proposal is constitutionally acceptable, then the House of Commons will name its two days. When they have done that, Senator Flynn and Senator Perrault will consult in order to decide, in the particular circumstances, when we should deal with it for our final two days. But all of the above is subject to the fact that we shall not vote on it until after the House of Commons has voted on it, that being consistent with the agreement reached between Senator Perrault and Senator Flynn. Those are the housekeeping elements I referred to.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, if I may now switch over to French, I would like to explain from a technical point of view the substance of this motion. It is meant to implement the agreement ratified in the other place by the three parties and providing that Parliament will not vote on the motion before the Supreme Court has reached a decision on the constitutional acceptability of the motion.

As I mentioned yesterday, that was one of the conditions on which several senators have dwelt during our debate in this chamber.

That is the primary aspect, the main purpose. There are, as I mentioned, three elements in that agreement, which is not necessarily cordial, but which is nevertheless beneficial.

Those elements are, first, that the Supreme Court, if possible, should receive the amended motion in a more or less final format in order that they may reach reasonably a final decision. The second element is that the time devoted to the final stage of the debate be set by Parliament pursuant to the provisions of the agreement reached in the other place.

The procedural corollaries have been stated in a House of Commons order. This House of Commons order has now been deferred to us to the extent that we are now dealing with the agreement. Under that order, and it is a quite important aspect for us, the members of the House of Commons have agreed to refrain from suggesting any amendments in such special circumstances and to try to reach an agreement on one omnibus amending motion for each party.

In the Senate, the corollary is found in the motion now before us. Those are the reasons, the background and the basis for the motion now under consideration.

As for the specific wording of the motion now appearing in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, as I mentioned yesterday, the opposition and the government have agreed on only one principle up to now. Since the circumstances are quite unusual, and since the motion now before us is also quite unusual, for these same reasons we find ourselves in unusual circumstances and the same may be said of the other place.

There is only one other housekeeping aspect to the matter.

[English]

I am indebted to Senator Macquarrie for pointing out to me that the motion as it appears at page vii of yesterday's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate is grammatically in error. Paragraph 10 reads:

> Nothing in this Order shall be considered to affect in any manner or to any degree the separation of the legislative and judicial powers, a fundamental principal of our Constitution.

Senator Macquarrie and I reminded ourselves, at his initiative, that "principal" is only a noun in one particular case; otherwise, "principal" is an adjective and "principle" is the noun. I thought that Senator Macquarrie's way of remembering the one occasion on which the word "principal" is a noun is one that may not be totally consistent with everyone's personal experience—it is to remember that the principal of the school is your pal.

In any event, after what I am sure honourable senators have found to be a somewhat pedantic digression—one which neither Senator Macquarrie nor I would so describe—I would like to move the motion in its modified form. It contains two corrections, one in order to have the motion conform to the change in paragraph 7 that I have already explained—that is, the paragraph dealing with the two days—and the other to ensure that the new version spells the word "principle" correctly.

• (1440)

Senator Flynn: Did you say "virgin" or "version"?

Senator Frith: It is the second version, and, therefore, it cannot be described as virginal.

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and pursuant to rule 23, I move:

> That the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., for an Address to Her Majesty concerning the Constitution of Canada shall be disposed of as follows:
> 1. The debate on the said motion and any amendments proposed thereto as herein provided, shall be adjourned to Thursday, April 23, 1981, and may be debated between 2.00 p.m. and 6.00 p.m. and between 8.00 p.m. and 10.00 p.m., and on Friday, April 24, 1981, between 10.00 a.m. and 12.00 noon.
> 2. No amendments or sub-amendments may be proposed to the said motion except those moved by the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate on Friday, April 24, 1981, as provided hereinafter.

3. The question on the amendment to the motion, moved on March 26, 1981, by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk shall not be put except as herein provided.

4. The Order to resume the debate on the main motion shall be called at 10.00 a.m. on Friday, April 24, 1981, and, notwithstanding any other motion in amendment thereto, the Leader of the Government in the Senate shall forthwith be given the floor to move any amendments to the said Address adopted by the House of Commons on Thursday, April 23, 1981, pursuant to the Special Order adopted by that House on April 8, 1981; and no amendments may be moved to such amendments, but the Leader of the Opposition may, immediately after the said motion of the Leader of the Government, move any amendment to the said motion for an Address; and both the amendments of the Leader of the Government and the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition may be debated at the same time but without further amendment.

5. Every question necessary to dispose of any amendments moved by the Leader of the Government or by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate or the motion in amendment by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, if it is still before the Senate, shall be put, in that order, no later than 12.00 noon on Friday, April 24, 1981.

6. There shall be no debate after April 24, 1981, on the said motion until a day named by the Leader of the Government in the Senate pursuant to the following paragraph of this Order.

7. After the Supreme Court of Canada has rendered a decision on the appeals concerning the opinion of the Manitoba Court of Appeal rendered on February 3, 1981, and on the opinion of the Newfoundland Court of Appeal rendered on March 31, 1981, on the questions put to the said Courts concerning the amendment of the Constitution of Canada, and a Minister of the Crown in the House of Commons has designated the final two days for debate in that House pursuant to paragraphs 5 and 6 of the Special Order adopted by that House on April 8, 1981, the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate shall consult and thereafter the Leader of the Government may, by rising in his place and informing the Senate thereof, name two days on which the said motion shall be debated by the Senate pursuant to the understanding that the Senate shall not vote on the motion until after it has been voted upon in the House of Commons.

8. At 6.00 p.m. on the second day named by the Leader of the Government pursuant to the preceding paragraph of this Order, the Speaker shall interrupt any proceedings and, without further debate, put every question necessary to dispose of the said motion. No Senator shall rise to speak after this hour, and all such questions as must be decided in order to comply with this Order shall be decided forthwith before the Senate adjourns.

9. The provisions of this Order shall prevail notwithstanding any rule or practice of the Senate to the contrary.

10. Nothing in this Order shall be considered to affect in any manner or to any degree the separation of the legislative and judicial powers, a fundamental principle of our Constitution.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, may I ask a question with regard to the reply of the deputy leader? If the Supreme Court brings in a judgment dismissing the appeal or making a finding that the whole matter is illegal, why would two days be necessary for discussion? The whole matter is functus.

Senator Frith: Perhaps I did not explain this clearly enough yesterday, honourable senators. When Senator Walker pointed out this problem yesterday, I said it was my understanding that the order in the House of Commons and the order here do not provide for automatic debate for two days, or for any time, after the decision of the Supreme Court. That is the flexibility we are trying to maintain in the order. In other words, once the court has made its decision, the provisions of the order in the other place and the order here are that two days may be named. Of course, if the court decides totally against the proposal, as I said last night, it is very doubtful that those two days will be named.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I agree with the Deputy Leader of the Government. We are dealing here with quite an exceptional and unusual situation, one which will not recur very often, at least I hope not.

Up until an agreement had been reached in the other place concerning the disposition of the resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen to amend the Constitution of Canada, discussions had been held here between the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition on the manner in which to deal with this resolution.

We agreed that two things had to be agreed to. First, that the Senate would not come to a decision before the House of Commons; second, the duration of the Senate debate after the Commons' decision. On that point, we had come to some agreement which was not finalized but which was accepted by both sides.

The recent settlement reached in the Commons has changed our perspective. Now it has been suggested to us in the other place, as we usually call it, that agreement should apply to us as well.

I will not deny that that is the view of the official opposition in the other place. I know for a fact that it is the firm conviction of the government. But I must admit that the Leader of the Opposition in the House told me that we should implicitly comply with the conditions agreed to in the other place to dispose of this resolution.

Of course, I must say right away that we on this side of the house had not given any mandate to that effect. Legally we do not consider that we are so bound, but perhaps to a certain extent we consider that we are morally bound.

I wanted to clarify that aspect.

There are two things we find hard to swallow here: the fact that we have bound, if you like, all senators by this agreement whereby only the Leader of the Government and only the Leader of the Opposition may propose changes or amendments to the resolution. In the case of senators who sit here as independent members, Senator Molson, Senator Manning, Senator Lawson and perhaps even Senator Cameron, and we could even add honourable senators who sit in this house as Liberals but who do not agree with the government resolution, I do not believe it is very fair to them that they not be allowed to propose changes or amendments to the resolution.

If they agree it is up to them to say so. But I do not think that we on this side, the official opposition, like you on the government side, can force that silence or that restriction upon those senators. I would even go as far as to say that it cannot be forced upon some honourable senators on this side of the House who have already expressed their views about certain amendments they would like to see made to the resolution, amendments which the parties are not necessarily prepared to move as such. That is the first element.

As to the second element, we had agreed that there would be no obligation, that we would not be bound by the changes or amendments proposed in the House.

I will never agree to say that I, on behalf of the opposition or in any other capacity, cannot propose changes or amendments which differ from those made in the other place. Can you imagine the Senate saying: "We renounce in advance our right to change in any way whatsoever the amendments which come to us from the House of Commons"?

In this respect the Leader of the Government and his deputy had agreed that we would not be bound. In principle we do not agree, but should the house decide that that is the way we must proceed, I do not want that on either side we be bound by texts debated in the other place.

Those are the essential points. There were a few diverging opinions about the text, perhaps Senator Macquarrie did notice them as well, including at the top of page vii the fact that the Leader of the Government may propose "amendments", but that the Leader of the Opposition may propose "an amendment". Obviously, this is a grammatical mistake, but I believe that the plural should be used both for the Leader of the Government and for the Leader of the Opposition.

Now, with respect to paragraph 7 as amended by the deputy leader of the government, it provides that the two days designated to deal with the main motion as amended—this will be after the Supreme Court has given its ruling, of course, and only if the Supreme Court rules that it is legal—will be set by the Leader of the Government in consultation with the Leader of the Opposition. I would like the Leader of the Government to confirm at this time that he will not compel the Senate to debate the motion while the House of Commons is debating it, because due to the way the motion is written, it could be debated simultaneously and it could be decided that the House of Commons would vote at 6 o'clock and the Senate would then be required to vote at 8 o'clock.

The motion says:

• (1450)

[English]

> —pursuant to the understanding that the Senate shall not vote on the motion until after it has been voted upon in the House of Commons.

Technically, you could set the two days and determine that the two days in the House of Commons would end at 6 o'clock and that the two days in the Senate would end at 10 o'clock on the same date—that is, p.m., for the information of Senator Benidickson.

At this point I should certainly like the Leader of the Government to confirm that those two days will follow the two days in the House of Commons; that they will not be simultaneous. Frankly, I do not see what the government would gain by saving a day or saving a few hours. Depending on the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, it may be that, after all, we will only need one day.

I would be satisfied if the Leader of the Government told me that he would not insist on setting a day which would be the same as one of the days provided for in the other place. It may be that the Leader of the Government will wish to reply to that later.

Finally, I have a few comments, which I make more or less with tongue in cheek, respecting paragraph 10, to which the Deputy Leader of the Government has just alluded:

> Nothing in this Order shall be considered to affect in any manner or to any degree the separation of the legislative and judicial powers, a fundamental principle of our Constitution.

Why have you included that in the text? How, with an order like this one, can we affect the fundamental principle of the separation of the legislative and judicial powers?

I noticed that the Prime Minister was quite amazed in the other place after the decision of the Newfoundland Court of Appeal was handed down. Probably he is in better humour today as a result of the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal. The score is seven to six, now, in favour of the government.

Senator Perrault: They are in the third period.

Senator Frith: It only takes one goal to win the Stanley Cup.

Senator Flynn: We are not in the third period. The third period will be the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Perrault: No, that's overtime.

Senator Flynn: No, no; there is no overtime there, I can assure you. Indeed, I wonder if we should not call it comment, dit-on, hors concours?

Senator Roblin: How about an exhibition game?

Senator Connolly: Maybe that would be the play-offs.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

The Prime Minister, as I say, was a bit amazed last week. This is what he was saying:

> Madam Speaker, it is basic to our system that three judges, five judges, or nine judges cannot tell us what is right. We are elected by the people. We are answerable to the people.

Of course. Nobody has ever suggested that a court could issue an injunction against Parliament. That has never been done. It could not be done. The Prime Minister, however, should realize that in a federal state the courts do have the last word concerning the ability of levels of legislature, federal or provincial, to enact certain provisions. The judges of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland did not tell Parliament, "You cannot do it." They said it was illegal. But Parliament continued to do it. The Prime Minister could have been even more stubborn than he has been up to now. He could have said, "I will not wait for the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada." It was his decision to make. I think, when he decided that he would wait until after the Supreme Court of Canada had decided whether or not this resolution was legal, he showed that on occasion he can be reasonable.

This is not ordinary legislation. In the normal course of events, when we deal with a particular bill about which there is some doubt as to its legality, Parliament is not necessarily stopped by anyone going to the court and asking to have the legislation declared invalid. In fact, an individual could not ask the courts to make a decision on a bill that had not been passed. However, the provinces are in a different situation, in that they can have a reference to the appeal courts of the provinces and eventually to the Supreme Court of Canada. The same applies to the federal government.

On a previous occasion, at the suggestion of Senator Lamontagne, who was the joint chairman of the joint parliamentary committee dealing with Bill C-60, Prime Minister Trudeau referred to the Supreme Court those provisions of the bill dealing with the abolition of the Senate and its replacement by a House of the Federation. Senator Lamontagne had suggested it would be safe for the government to refer those provisions to the Supreme Court. Mr. Trudeau decided to go to the Supreme Court, and was told by the Supreme Court that it could not abolish the Senate and replace it by a House of the Federation under the provisions of Bill C-60.

I do not see why we should get excited about what is taking place now. In doing what he is doing now, the Prime Minister is simply being prudent. Moreover, he is simply helping Parliament to make a proper decision.

● (1500)

If this matter is ultra vires, then one must consider whether to support or oppose the resolution, to vote "yes" or to vote "no". I am very happy that we came to the conclusion that a final decision would not be made by the House of Commons or the Senate until the Supreme Court of Canada had ruled on the matter. As far as I am concerned, it is not necessary at all for Parliament, the House of Commons or the Senate, to look into the amendments with which we may be dealing, both in the house and the Senate, next week. There is no amendment that would have any bearing on the constitutionality of the resolution. Of course, it is a device to save face, and all sides were called upon to make certain concessions.

However, by accepting this agreement, we have imposed on this chamber rules of debate which are not normal and which are perhaps unfair. But we must go along with the agreement, and perhaps we on this side have a moral obligation not to call a vote. If it is the wish of the majority, we will let it go on division, but I am very unhappy that the Senate would adopt such an order and that we have agreed to deal with this matter in this way.

My only consolation is, once again, that the Prime Minister has recognized—though he would not admit it publicly and though he tries to cover his position on this resolution in that last silly paragraph—that in a federal state such as Canada the Supreme Court of Canada is the final arbiter between the two levels of government, and that in the Parliament of Canada the House of Commons and the Senate will not be called upon to make a final decision before the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled on the legality of the resolution.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have listened with great interest to the views of the Leader of the Opposition. He has made reference to the fact that this is an extraordinary situation, and, indeed, it is. The motion before us reflects to a very great extent the rather historic agreement achieved by the national party leaders a few days ago. I wonder whether there have been any other times in the history of our country when such an accord has been achieved.

The Right Honourable the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Official Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party have agreed on a procedure which they have urged upon their followers for the passage of this particular order of the house through Parliament. I say "through Parliament" because the leaders of the parties really gave a commitment, as was confirmed by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate today, with respect to the type of actions they would expect and hope for from their followers in both the House of Commons and the Senate.

Before the unanimous agreement, the debate in the other place had been a very rancorous one. I must say, honourable senators, that the Senate can take pride in the fact that more than one editorial observer has stated that the quality of the debate in this chamber during this constitutional discussion has been of a high standard—better, some have written, than the debate in the other place. I was particularly interested in the views of one of Canada's leading columnists who wrote the other day that, while he very much regretted having to write it, the quality of the Senate debate on the Constitution has been outstanding. This is to the credit of all those who have participated in this discussion, whether they sit in opposition or on the government side. Certainly, a great deal of credit goes to the senators who served on the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution because their work was of an excellent quality.

For the past six months this country has debated the proposals on the Constitution. The discussion, which has gone on for considerably longer than six months, has been at times difficult, heated and rancorous. So it was that parliamentarians of both houses and, I suspect, most of the Canadian people, welcomed the agreement which was announced by the three parties a few days ago. The other place has achieved agreement on certain matters. The first one is that no final vote on the resolution will take place until the views of the Supreme Court of Canada are made known. I am sure that honourable senators will agree that that is a good idea. I realize that, in its first stages, it was perhaps advanced by the opposition, which points out the value, once again, of having an opposition in our parliamentary system. It is one of the values which flow from debate which goes forward in this and other chambers.

The parties in the other place have agreed that all amendments will be dealt with in the form of omnibus amendments to be tabled next Tuesday. It is my understanding that the omnibus group of amendments will be presented by the opposition parties by 6 o'clock next Tuesday, and that at 10 o'clock on that day the government amending proposals, if any, will be made known. Also, there has been an unprecedented agreement on the part of our national leaders that a three-day debate will take place in the House of Commons with all questions relating to amendments put on Thursday evening, April 23. The agreement came as a surprise to many who had assumed that we had a parliamentary impasse and that parliamentarians could not get together to work out an accord. Perhaps the agreement demonstrates again one of the strengths of the system. If there is one thing we have discovered, it is that the parliamentary system works best through good will and co-operation.

Senator Frith: And at times it is unwilling co-operation.

Senator Perrault: Of course, there are times when the parties must be accommodating, flexible and patient. We have had a good relationship with the official opposition in the Senate. Despite the contrary views expressed from time to time, we have had an excellent working relationship with opposition senators during the entire debate on the Constitution in this chamber. After six months of debate and discussion in committee, in this chamber, and in the other place, it is obvious that a parliamentary consensus has been developed to make provision for the orderly disposition of the resolution on the Constitution and, perhaps, the Constitution issue itself.

The procedural approach is unique, in that members of the other place—after their leaders had spoken out and had also spoken to us—by a free vote, unanimously endorsed the agreement reached by the leadership of our national parties. We are not calling for unanimity in this chamber. The Leader of the Opposition has expressed his viewpoint and he has said that perhaps, on division, this proposal can proceed.

Because of the key role of the Supreme Court of Canada in this new procedural equation, we recognize that a significant time factor exists. Yesterday in this chamber I made this comment, as it is reported at page 2288 of Debates of the Senate:

> On April 7, 1981, pursuant to a hearing before the Chief Justice of Canada, and attended by the lawyers for the Attorney General of Canada, and the Attorneys General of the provinces, concerning administrative arrangements, it was ordered that the appeals from the judgments of the Manitoba and Newfoundland Courts of Appeal be heard together on April 28, 1981. The former appeal was initiated, as honourable senators know, by the Government of Manitoba, and the latter by the Government of Canada.
>
> As the judgment in the matter now before the Quebec Court of Appeal has not been rendered, the question is hypothetical.

Of course, we now know the decision.

• (1510)

Later on I was asked a question by the Leader of the Opposition and by Senator Smith concerning the reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. Honourable senators, the view of the Government of Canada is that the Supreme Court will undoubtedly wish its decision to be relevant to the prevailing circumstances at the time of its hearing of the Manitoba and Newfoundland appeals, and would not want to find itself in the same circumstances as those objected to by the Chief Justice of the Manitoba Court of Appeal, namely, deciding on a hypothetical case. Thus, it is the view of the government that the Supreme Court will want to take into account the developments which the Attorney General of Canada will file before the court, as previously mentioned.

As earlier reported, the Attorney General of Canada will file in court the resolution as tabled in the House of Commons and the Senate on February 13, 1981, as well as any amendments passed by both houses before April 28.

This is the government's position with respect to the importance of having the Supreme Court apprised of the view of Parliament before the court begins its deliberations on April 28.

I believe that parliamentarians of all parties have come to a recognition of the importance of this date of April 28. We have now achieved agreement on the importance of the views of the court. Parliament's decision next week will most certainly assist the court in its deliberations.

Honourable senators, our purpose here is to implement an all-party agreement to place the subject matter of the motion for a Joint Address before the Supreme Court, and not to have a final vote on it until the Supreme Court has rendered its decision.

I do not intend to say more. The facts have been set out. There has been a long and productive negotiation with members of the official opposition. They have made a number of suggestions about the improvement of this house order without demanding or receiving any unreasonable condition from the government, and we, for our part, have acted in the same manner. I hope honourable senators will support this house order so that, hopefully, during the coming week, we can move on to the next phase which will be a conscientious consideration of the amendments presented, not only by the opposition but also by the government.

Senator Flynn: Would the leader, if possible, reply to my question concerning the two days after a decision has been rendered by the Supreme Court?

Senator Perrault: I thank Senator Flynn for reminding me. I had intended to answer his question with respect to what might well be a final two-day debate—and it could be less, Senator Walker, if the court rules adversely. I think Senator Walker is quite right in his suggestion.

The view is that, perhaps, it would be better to leave that matter as flexible as possible. It would be our intention to work out an agreement with the official opposition on this point. It may be that, in the light of developments, it will require more or less time, but we would want to achieve an accord with the official opposition on this point without engraving on bronze or etching in stone a position now that may be quite inflexible in the light of events.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I have not the least intention of adding anything to what has been said so well in this chamber, but Senator Flynn did mention my name and that of Senator Manning.

Of course, this reminds me that, as an independent, I have no part of any agreements that have been made between the house leaders here, in the other place or anywhere else. I believe the same situation applies to Senator Manning and, perhaps, others in this chamber. Honourable senators will know that for some time I have been flogging the horse that when, in the course of time, an individual arrives in this august chamber he should forget his party duty to always vote as he is told, and that he should vote only for what is best for Canada, regardless of what whips or house leaders may say. I realize that I am on a losing wicket in that regard because I do not find general agreement.

When we talk about agreements between leaders and agreements between whips to either do things or not, I cannot resist the temptation to say that that does not apply to any senator who, in his own good judgment, chooses to go his own way and say his piece, as he wishes, in dealing with the main motion or the amendments. He should vote in any way he chooses. He is appointed to this chamber not to be the voice of the party, but to be the voice of some part of Canada, and he should vote with that in mind.

At times I have found it very disturbing—and, perhaps, I am not alone—that there is such subservience, and a great sense of gratitude, to the party leader who appointed the lady or the gentleman to this chamber. I view the matter quite differently. When we are appointed to this chamber, we are called upon to do a job and the outlines of that job are made clear to us. While we may feel honoured and pleased that we have been selected for the appointment, I do not think we should go around for the rest of our lives bowing and saying how grateful we are to somebody who was good enough to give us this nice job. If that is what the Senate is, I don't like it. I do not really want to be part of that kind of setup. When an issue concerning the whole country comes up, as I said before, the only duty we have here is to vote as we think the whole country would like to see that issue resolved.

With regard to this particular matter of the moment concerning procedure, I should like to mention that, in the many years I have been in the Senate, one of the qualities of the Senate which has always impressed me is the great courtesy exhibited by the leaders, the Speakers and fellow senators to all other members of this chamber. In this case, I must say that the Deputy Leader of the Government was good enough to speak to me yesterday. He told me that he had spoken with Senator Manning and had received his agreement, and he asked me how I felt about this situation. Honourable senators, we all know that he did not have to ask me; it was just plain courtesy, good manners, and a very appropriate way of dealing with a member of this chamber.

I informed him that I felt the proposal was a good one, and that it was the right way to proceed. I also told him that I had, over the last period of time, spoken to the Leader of the Opposition, and that I felt that he wanted to see a rational settlement of the method of handling the matter but that I had, certainly, no impression whatsoever that he wanted to obstruct or delay the rational passage of this measure. I also told him that, under the circumstances, particularly if Senator Manning is of the same frame of mind—since he is the only one I know of who has declared his position—then I would be perfectly happy to go along with it.

I repeat that I appreciate the way in which the Deputy Leader of the Government has acted in this regard, and I appreciate the fact that the Leader of the Opposition has given me a chance—in fact, I think he forced me—to make some remarks.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I would like to obtain further clarification regarding a technical aspect of the motion before us this afternoon. In paragraphs 1 and 5, reference is made to Friday, April 24, 1981 between 10.00 a.m. and 12.00 noon. In paragraph 5 reference is made to—

Senator Frith: Excuse me, which paragraphs are you talking about?

Senator Leblanc: Paragraphs 1 and 5. Reference is made to the Friday sitting from 10.00 a.m. to 12.00 noon. In paragraph 5 the same reference is made, namely a sitting from 10.00 a.m. to 12.00 noon.

Yet in the explanations provided yesterday by the Deputy Leader of the Government we were told that the Senate would then sit on Friday, April 24, from 10.00 a.m. to 1.00 p.m. And again this afternoon you also said that we would sit until 1.00 p.m., since you were made to specify whether it would be a.m. or p.m. So I would like to know whether it is the text of the motion itself that says up to 12.00 noon or the explanations which say up to 1.00 p.m.

Senator Frith: That is not necessarily so. The idea was to spend the time between 10.00 a.m. and 12.00 noon debating the amendments. And at 12.00 noon we would proceed with the vote, the question being put to the Senate. Reference was only made to 1.00 p.m. specifically to indicate that it is expected that at that time we will be ready to adjourn. this does not necessarily mean that we must keep on sitting here if our work is over with before 1.00 p.m.

Senator Leblanc: Well, it may be clear in your mind but it was not that clear in mine. It actually states in paragraph 1 of your motion:

> The debate on the said motion and any amendments proposed thereto as herein provided, shall be adjourned to Thursday, April 23, 1981, and may be debated—

The debate will then proceed.

> —between 2.00 p.m. and 6.00 p.m. and between 8.00 p.m. and 10.00 p.m., and on Friday, April 24, 1981—

The debate will then proceed, as it implied.

> —between 10.00 a.m. and 12.00 noon.

So this means that the debate will come to an end but that the Senate will not necessarily adjourn.

Senator Frith: No. The idea is for the debate to proceed. That is to say that the debate will go on between the hours of 2.00 p.m. and 6.00 p.m. and between 8.00 p.m. and 10.00 p.m. Not necessarily from 8.00 p.m. to 10.00 p.m. but between these two hours. And then on Friday, April 24, 1981 between 10.00 p.m. and 12.00 noon. At 12.00 noon the question will be put and it is then expected that we will go on until 1.00 p.m.

I can tell you that the first draft of the motion did not use the words "between" but rather did set specific times. This is why finally we insisted on using the words "between" in order to get some flexibility and be able to carry the debate between the specified hours provided for in the time frame.

Senator Flynn: I think I could explain that we had initially agreed that the Senate would sit Friday morning from 10.00 a.m. to 1.00 p.m., with the questions being put at 12.00 noon. That is what led to the confusion I believe. When we say from 10.00 a.m. to noon, some seem to think that the sitting would adjourn at noon. That is not so and we have to keep on sitting so that the question can be put. I do not know who changed—

Senator Lamontagne: We were just talking about the debate.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I understand. If we had said that the Senate would be sitting from 10.00 a.m. to 1.00 p.m., as agreed, we would not have had all this confusion. It is not serious, but this is how it must be understood.

Senator Frith: It should also be mentioned that paragraph 5 provides that every question shall be put no later than noon on Friday, or more specifially:

> —shall be put, in that order, no later than 12.00 noon.

I understand that if I speak now I will close the debate.

Senator Flynn: Not necessarily.

The Hon. the Speaker: You have not yet introduced the motion.

• (1520)

[English]

Senator Frith: I agree it is not necessary for me to speak but, in my view, it is desirable for me to mention three things. The first point touches on the reason for the two days. The understanding that Senator Flynn and I finally reached was that we would leave ourselves flexible to go anywhere from House of Commons—as they would say in NASA—plus two, plus one and a half, plus one or whatever, and we would have certain overlapping if we decided we wanted it.

Secondly, I want to thank Senator Molson for the comments he made. If I may strike a small blow for those of us who do have party affiliation in this chamber, I have never felt I voted with the party out of unending gratitude for the fact that party had appointed me, but, rather, because I declared what party I wanted to have affiliation with.

Senator Walker: You were doing so well.

Senator Frith: I am saying this, not on my own behalf, but I hope that all senators feel, notwithstanding any party affiliation, that in the final analysis they are always free to vote as they choose to, and we have seen evidence of that independence during this debate.

My final point is to make some comments on paragraph 10. I understand—

Senator Flynn: You would not leave it there.

Senator Frith: As Senator Flynn says, I would not leave it there, and I do not want to leave it there because his view is that it is a silly paragraph, and I can understand why, on its surface, it would create that impression. The reason for paragraph 10's dealing with the assertion that the order is not to be taken as a precedent for suspending the separation-of-powers principle is as follows—and I admit it is not a fully satisfactory way to express it.

First, I accept what Senator Flynn says, that in a federal system, on the question of division of powers, there is no question that the court has the final say. What is unique in this situation is that an essentially political decision has found its way into the courts, and the result has been—and this is probably best expressed in the 17th century, I believe it is the 1682 Bill of Rights—that there is an important principle of division of powers—

Senator Roblin: 1688.

Senator Frith: Whatever it is. The principle, in any event, is that there is a separation and an important separation in our system—

Senator Flynn: I have never doubted that.

Senator Frith: —between the executive, legislative and judicial, and that the legislature is not formally, and ought not to be subject to the judicial in the exercise of its legislative functions. It is the result of its legislative functions that are subject to the courts' decision, of course. That is the whole body of constitutional law.

The reason that was put in is that if this were taken as a precedent in this sense, namely, that apart from the ability of a provincial government to refer its legislation, if it wishes to do so, to its Court of Appeal, or the federal government, if it wishes to do so, to refer its legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada, other governments or, particularly, individuals would be able to prevent Parliament from functioning, and then we could have outrageous and totally undesirable consequences. An individual could stop Parliament—

Senator Flynn: Nobody could stop it.

Senator Roblin: No.

Senator Frith: —from considering, and this is how it would work. I understand the point of view taken on the other side.

Let me explain from my personal experience. Before I came to the Senate, I was retained to attempt to change Parliament's intention to pass Bill C-58 on Time, Reader's Digest and border broadcasting. I had some grave doubts and prepared a full brief as to the legal deficiencies of that legislation, in addition to its political deficiencies. Tax legislation was being used to produce other results, and it was not really tax legislation. Under the law, as it stood before Parliament considered the question, my client was operating at considerable profit. I am talking about purely practical consequences. If, in that situation, I had been able to bring an action or apply to 10 courts, because there was an aspect of this that was provincial—

Senator Flynn: You were not.

Senator Frith: Just a minute. If I had had a precedent like this, and if I had been in a position to say to the courts—I may not have succeeded in all of them—that Parliament was in the midst of a political decision which had been taken before the courts and the decision was rendered that Parliament should not continue its debate because a court had pronounced it illegal, my position, as counsel for my client, could have been as follows: I will launch all of those 10 actions, and hope that the opposition will keep the thing alive until out of all of those courts I get one judge who says it is illegal—

● (1530)

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: Then I provide that ammunition to the opposition, so that the opposition would be in the position of saying, as was said here, "A court has declared this to be illegal, and therefore Parliament should not continue."

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: "No" is not the answer.

Senator Flynn: "No" is the answer.

Senator Frith: It is your answer. Let me finish my point. I do not expect it to be agreed to. Those are the reasons why we felt something should be said. The only difference is that I understand the position taken by Senator Flynn, that the court has the final decision in a federal system. He is not able to see any merit in my point, but there it is. That is the reason why, in my view—

Senator Flynn: The difference is that in your case it was an individual, and he could not take action before Parliament had made a decision, whereas here we have the process of reference by a provincial government, which is entirely different. You would not have been able to reach first base with your action. That is why you did not take it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I want to get this on the record. I do not expect it to be agreed to.

Senator Flynn: If I were you, I wouldn't put it on the record.

Senator Frith: But you are not me, and I shall put it on the record.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: May I ask the honourable senator a question? I am sorry to intervene, but it was also my understanding that an individual could not make a reference to the court; that it was only a government that could do so, and that, in fact, an action had to be brought on the subject of an act. It is not within the competence of an individual to make a reference to the court.

Senator Frith: That is precisely the point. That is exactly the point, because in this case the provincial legislature referred federal legislation, and the reason why we put in clause 10 was simply to say that we did not want anyone to think that it creates a precedent for anything different from exactly what Sentor Everett has said. That is the reason why it is put there. I am not putting it there in the hope that everyone will stand and cheer and agree with it. I am simply saying that it was not put there totally without purpose.

Senator Perrault: Question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lamontagne, P.C.—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: On division.

Motion, as modified, agreed to, on division.

CANADA POST CORPORATION BILL

SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Denis for the second reading of Bill C-42, to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related acts and to make related amendments to other acts.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn may have anticipated what was in my mind. I was very close to saying I would let it stand. We have been talking about agreements here. There was an understanding that this would be brought forward, and on that understanding I tried to accommodate the management in the Senate. My disposition, after sitting here for the past hour or so, when that undertaking was not kept, was to reserve my remarks to a time when perhaps the Leader of the Government would not find it necessary to read us yesterday's speeches and the Deputy Leader of the Government would not find it necessary to regale us with reminiscenses from his days at the Bar.

However, because there are other honourable senators who wish to speak—and that was made clear at the time it was said that this item would be brought forward—I will continue to accommodate the work of the Senate, but not with any great enthusiasm.

The bill before us was described by the distinguished sponsor, Senator Denis, as one not having any great complexity. But I would be inclined to disagree with him on that—and he will understand that I have disagreed with him on other occasions. In my opinion, it is a very complicated bill. It is one which has had a long and controversial history. The idea of this substantial change in the handling of the affairs of the Post Office goes back many years. It is actually 20 years since it was first proposed by the Glassco Commission, and it has been before Parliament in one way or another for many years. In its latest reincarnation—if I may call it that—the bill, as it is now before us, is substantially the bill that was proposed by the Postmaster General of the Conservative government in 1978. It has undergone many changes, and the Honourable John Fraser might hardly recognize the bill. Many of the changes have been improvements; some have not. Some of the suggested amendments that have been pressed upon the government, particularly on the minister, by both opposition parties in the other place, and particularly by those who will be affected by some of the provisions of the bill, have not been incorporated in the bill now before us.

The purpose of the bill—again as stated by Senator Denis—is to improve Canada's postal service. The improvements required are many, in many aspects of the operation of the postal service. I need hardly say that over the past few years great dissatisfaction has developed among the Canadian public over the service that has been given, particularly with regard to the service provided today at today's rates—the so-called 17-cent rate—and the former service and former rates. The classic story today appears to be that perhaps 17 cents is not too expensive for a letter to go from Halifax to Vancouver, because it will take 17 days, at least, to get there, so it is only one cent per day.

There are those complaints, and we are all aware of them. They have been detailed and brought to the attention of Parliament over the years.

The purpose of the bill is to make an improvement in the service. It is clear from the provisions of the bill that it is the hope, at least, of the government that this new approach to the postal service will then make the new corporation revenue dependent sooner or later; so that we will at least have a diminution, and hopefully an end, to the huge deficits which have been piled up by the Post Office, amounting to approximately $500 million each year for the last few years.

A third hope for the bill, of course, is that it will do something substantial about the very bad state of management-labour relations in the Post Office. There is some indication that the major unions involved believe that the passage of this bill—the changeover from the departmental operation of the postal service to a crown corporation operation—will improve management-labour relations. I have heard nothing to indicate why there might be that hope, but perhaps those responsible for the union on the labour side feel that it will, and we should have some hope that their hopes will be satisfied in the years ahead.

There are many problems in the minds of those who have examined this bill, and who have been interested in the affairs of the Post Office over the years, one of which is the question of parliamentary control, which is obviously of concern to Parliament itself. It seems to me, from my reading of the bill, that the control of postal rates now passes out of the hands of Parliament, for example. I may be wrong in that, but that is what my reading of the bill tells me. We have had problems in the past over increases in postal rates without the approval of Parliament, and it seems to me that this bill, in its present form, takes away from Parliament that control. Instead, it leaves the control of postal rates and many other things in the hands of, or subject to the discretion of, the new corporation, which is in turn subject from time to time to directives—rather ill-defined in the bill—from the government.

It is difficult to say where control lies if we read the provisions of this bill literally. The definition of the scope of the activities of the corporation is very unclear. It is absolutely amazing to me that we would be asked to pass a bill which gives this new crown corporation a monopoly of many aspects of the postal service, but that does not define the word "letter," for example. This could cause all kinds of problems. It was proposed to the government that one of the fundamentals of a bill of this kind is the definition of the scope of authority that is being given to a crown corporation. The government, for some reason that I do not know and cannot find out, has refused repeatedly to define "letter".

Senator Hicks: It defines "mail".

Senator Grosart: I will come to that in a moment.

It does not define "letter," and though it defines "mail," it does not, strangely enough, define "undelivered mail". It defines an undelivered letter, but does not say what a letter is.

The problem, of course, is that because the corporation is given the authority to define "letter," it is given the authority to extend the scope of its activities far beyond anything that Parliament may have contemplated. It can define a letter in any way it wishes, and take over important communication activities that are now in the private sector. That is my interpretation of the situation we have under the provisions of this bill as it now stands before us.

I am concerned also about the question of financial control. There is a major exception, for example, to one of the provisions of the Financial Administration Act, which should apply to this bill, as it does to others. I will mention that in some detail in a moment. I should say at this point that I hope that all of the matters I am now dealing with will be considered in committee and that answers may be provided there.

To continue, there is a serious omission as to the authority of the Senate, in one of the provisions of this bill, which has not, as far as I know, been brought to the attention of this chamber.

Perhaps because I am suggesting that the bill go to committee, for the fullest possible discussion of these matters, I will, if I may, for the convenience of honourable senators who may wish to follow the course of my remarks, go through the provisions of the bill seriatim, and make some comments on them as I go.

As I have said, there is no definition of "letter" in the interpretation clause. There is an attempt to exclude certain methods of communication from the definition provisions, which are found in clause 15. To begin with, clause 14(1) says:

> Subject to section 15, the Corporation has the sole and exclusive privilege of collecting, transmitting and delivering letters to the addressee thereof within Canada.

The use of the word "letter" there indicates that this is the essence of the scope of authority of this new corporation.

There is an exclusion of certain types of mail, and then comes a group of exclusions which are the obvious things. You can, for example, carry a Christmas card along with a Christmas present that you are giving to someone. That is not a letter within the definition of the bill. There are other similar ones.

An exclusion has been inserted, in an attempt to satisfy those who are in what is generally called, I think, the courier business, because as the bill was originally drafted it was very doubtful that anyone could successfully continue in that business. It is an exclusion to permit couriers to continue to operate that seems rather strange to me. It comes in clause 15(e):

> letters of an urgent nature that are transmitted by a messenger for a fee at least equal to an amount that is three times the regular rate of postage payable for delivery in Canada of similarly addressed letters weighing fifty grams;

Here we have a post office system which we would hope would be competitive as regards efficiency in any field, but, on the contrary, we are told that the post office cannot be competitively efficient unless the competition charges three times the rate that the post office charges. This does not make me feel that we are going to have the kind of efficiency that many of us hoped for as a result of this change from department to crown corporation status.

The powers of the corporation concern me, as well. In clauses 16 and 17—and I am dealing only with clauses that illustrate my comments on the principles of the bill, which is what we are concerned with on second reading—the corporation is given certain powers. Clause 17(1)(a) provides for regulations:

> prescribing, for the purposes of this Act and the regulations, what is a letter and what is non-mailable matter and undeliverable mail, other than undeliverable letters, and providing for the disposition of non-mailable matter, undeliverable mail and mail on which sufficient postage is not paid, including the disposition of anything found therein;

The very fact that somebody—the minister, I presume—finds it necessary to allow this corporation to make these definitions means, really, that the corporation, by its own regulations, can actually make new laws. It can decide what the scope of its activities is, completely beyond and after Parliament's decision.

An attempt to give some control is provided, I suppose, by clause 20, which is headed "Directions". This clause provides:

> (1) In the exercise of its powers and the performance of its duties, the Corporation shall comply with such directions as the Governor in Council or the Minister may from time to time give to it.

"Minister" is described in the interpretation clause as:

> —such member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada as is designated by the Governor in Council to act as the Minister for the purposes of this Act;

The ministry has this power to give any directive it likes, with no limitation whatever. It can impose any directive on the corporation. So what is the change? One wonders whether there is a change from having a Postmaster General running a department to having a minister running a department; a minister who can give any directive he chooses to the corporation. Is this a major change? I do not know.

• (1550)

Honourable senators are well aware of the fact that the Financial Administration Act contains within it a very important section which deals with the question of the type of contracts that can be awarded without tender. I believe the general rule applies to tenders under $5,000. Does this mean that this corporation has a specific exemption under the Financial Administration Act? I know that there may be an explanation, one which no doubt refers to rural carriers, amongst other things. There might be some problems caused by putting up for tender rural carrier contracts as they become due. That specific exemption could be defended. However, what concerns me is that this provision may be sweeeping in its consequences. The corporation may be exempt in terms of the important principle of control over government contracts. There is no mention of any limitation for any specific purpose. This corporation has a power that is denied the government itself, whether it be the Department of Public Works or any other department. Why? Again, I hope there will be an explanation.

I am concerned, as I am sure all honourable senators are, with the fact that this bill disclaims in clause 38 any liability whatsoever to the public on the part of the corporation or its employees for any damage or loss to mail in transit. Perhaps that can be explained in committee; I do not know.

There is also provision for the corporation to submit an annual report. The Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, I am sure, will be interested in this because he has taken care, over the years, to see that the Senate's interests are looked after in these matters. The marginal title is "Reference of Annual Report to Committee." Clause 33(2) reads:

> Every annual report laid before Parliament pursuant to subsection (1) stands permanently referred to such standing committee of Parliament as is established for the purpose of reviewing matters relating to transportation.

Of course, in the House of Commons estimates are required to be referred to standing committees of the house. In the case of a crown corporation, annual reports are referred to a standing committee of Parliament. If we are to be included, this subclause should read: "such standing committees of Parliament as are established—" I say this because this particular bill was referred to the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, but there is a provision in the bill that, in future, matters pertaining to it will be referred to the Committee on Transport in the other place. It so happens that we are referring this bill to our Committee on Transport and Communications, and I would hope that there would be an amendment of this subclause to make it clear that such matters will be referred to committees of Parliament.

I believe there has been an objection made, on behalf of the Province of Ontario, to clause 3, which reads:

> This Act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province and on any agent thereof.

I have made several inquiries of legal friends as to the significance of this clause. The general answer I have received is that the addition of the words "or a province" is quite unnecessary.

Senator Flynn: I agree with that.

Senator Grosart: Although Senator Flynn was not one of the eminent authorities I consulted, I am glad he concurs in that opinion.

I would like to refer, if I may, to another clause which I think requires explanation. I have asked several people who are conversant with the bill, as it stands, to explain this clause to me, and they have not been able to do so. Perhaps some honourable senator will be able to make sense of it, though I am not saying it does not make sense. I am referring to clause 12, which reads:

> The fact that an act of the Corporation, including any transfer of property, is contrary to this Act, the by-laws of the Corporation or any direction given to the Corporation under section 20—

That is, the government directives.

> —may not be asserted against any person dealing in good faith, directly or indirectly, with the Corporation.

I merely say that it would be useful to have an explanation of this clause in committee.

I should like to return to the subject of the powers granted to the corporation under this bill. Sometimes the corporation seems to be given adequate powers; sometimes it is given inadequate powers; and at other times it is given powers far beyond anything which is necessary or desirable. I am referring to the old question of the discretionary power of the minister. Clause 5(1)(b) declares that an object of this corporation is:

> to manufacture and provide such products and to provide such services as are, in the opinion of the Corporation, necessary or incidental to the postal service provided by the Corporation;

My objection is to the words "in the opinion of the Corporation,". In effect, those words state that the corporation can manufacture any product it likes or provide any service it likes, if, in the opinion of the corporation, that product or service is necessary and incidental to the postal services. Surely we should ask the minister to delete that phrase, "in the opinion of the Corporation," so that it would read, "and to provide such services as are necessary or incidental." In this way, anybody who felt aggrieved, in any way, by an action of the corporation could at least challenge the authority of the corporation in the courts, to prove that its action was necessary and within the authority given it by Parliament. However, the insertion of this phrase means that the court has no authority over matters of this type. If the corporation should say, "In our opinion, it was necessary to go into the business of building automobiles," nobody could object to that in court. Under that provision, as I understand it, the corporation could invade many of the trade areas of its competitors, and say, "We have to provide a service, in our opinion, and that is the end of it."

• (1600)

In this place we have objected—successfully, I am glad to say, on earlier occasions—to the inclusion of that sort of expanding authority given to ministers. The old phrase used to be: "The Governor in Council has the power to make regulations which, in the opinion of the minister, are necessary to the implementation of the act." Over the years in this place we have been responsible, to quite an extent, for taking that phrase out. Now it is back in here, and I hope that in committee the minister, or his officials, can be persuaded to change it.

I have said that I am concerned about the financial control.

Senator Hicks: That begins in clause 31.

Senator Grosart: Senator Hicks is quite right that the question of financial control starts at clause 31. Clause 31(1) provides:

> Subject to subsection (2), the accounts of the Corporation shall be audited jointly each year by two auditors appointed by the Governor in Council for a term of two years.

The question arises: Why not the Auditor General? I am told that the Auditor General would have no objection whatsoever. It would obviously be a very great saving, if the Auditor General were given the authority to audit the books of this corporation; and that would mean that there would immediately be installed a system of comprehensive auditing. I will not go into the details of that, but it is a type of auditing that has been recommended for all crown corporations by the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons and by the Auditor General himself. There is no provision of any kind here for comprehensive auditing, and the suggestion that the Auditor General should perform the audit of this corporation has apparently been rejected.

Honourable senators, those are a few of the matters that occurred to me in a rather short reading of the bill. It seems to me that, even though the bill has been before committee in the other place, it has not had the kind of scrutiny that I would hope it would receive in our committee.

I am quite sure that Senator Godfrey, for instance, will have one or two comments to make—and I will leave them to him—with respect to two important recommendations made by the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments which do not appear in the bill because, I believe, they were rejected by the minister.

Honourable senators, I am glad that the Senate management has agreed that this bill should go to committee, and I trust that, with respect to these and other questions, satisfactory answers and changes, as necessary, will be forthcoming.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I have listened with interest to the sponsor of this bill and to the remarks just completed by Senator Grosart. I agree in large part with both of them. I join with Senator Grosart in expressing the wish that the committee will give consideration to the points in the bill that he has referred to.

As has already been said, we have been waiting for this bill for a long time. I certainly do not object to it, but, like some others, I am not sure that the creation of a crown corporation will, in itself, bring about the great improvements in postal service and in the economy of operating the Post Office which some people hope for. I hope it will, myself, but I cannot really find the reasons why one can confidently expect this to occur, unless it should be in the area of labour-management relations, to which reference has already been made.

There are two or three clauses of this bill to which I should like to refer briefly. The first is clause 25, which says:

> 25. The Surplus Crown Assets Act does not apply in respect of the Corporation.

That is a rather general and sweeping exclusion, but I, for one, am glad to see it in there because, while the National Postal Museum is not in itself mentioned in this bill at all, this provision will enable the National Postal Museum to dispose of surplus material, which was the situation envisaged by those philatelists who supported the creation of the National Postal Museum a few years ago. I have been a member of the museum's advisory board since its inception. Already we are finding that people are not willing to designate philatelic material to the museum because they feel the museum has vast surpluses which it is unable, under the present laws of Canada, to dispose of. So this provision, I think, will make the postal museum a much more living organism within the Post Office, and I think it will make it much more popular with philatelists, who will be more willing to see that materials which the Post Office needs are given to, or sold to, or made available under some arrangement to, the National Postal Museum.

I have also observed in the bill that no reference is made to real estate. I understand that agreement has not yet been reached between the Post Office Department and the Department of Public Works on whether post offices and postal property all over Canada will become the property of the new crown corporation. I think that is an important matter and one which Parliament ought to be more informed upon before passing this legislation. I am sorry one cannot discern that from the bill as it is now before us.

I also want to refer briefly to clause 51. Senator Grosart observed that the bill does not define a letter. Clause 51 seems to me to create another difficulty. It reads:

> Every person commits an offence who, without the consent of the Corporation, engages in the business of selling postage stamps to the public for the purpose of payment of postage.

I don't know how that will be interpreted, but I hope it will not be interpreted so that it is illegal for the room clerk or the desk clerk of a hotel to have stamps available for guests who may be staying at the hotel. That is a service which is provided by most hotels all over the world, and I would not like to think that we would be arresting or bringing before the courts the desk clerks in hotels of Canada for selling postage stamps to visitors to this country and to those hotels.

Senator Muir: Would the same thing apply to stamp machines?

Senator Hicks: Well, stamp machines will no doubt be operated by the crown corporation itself. But drug stores, I think, again pose the same kind of problems I have referred to in relation to hotels. It may be that this matter can be dealt with by regulation, but I am not so sure that it can, and I think it deserves some examination by the committee to which this bill is referred.

I note that a person—a good person, I think—has already been tentatively designated as the president of the corporation, and I wish him well in the endeavours that will be his in trying to make this new crown corporation work, and work better than the Post Office Department has been doing in recent years in Canada.

Finally, I have just one other observation. I view with whimsicality, I guess—

Senator Frith: "Whimsy," I would think.

Senator Hicks: "Whimsy," all right; that is a better way of putting it. I view with whimsy the dropping of the title Postmaster General. This has been an honourable post since well before Confederation in the various parts of Canada. Some other countries in which their post offices are run by crown corporations nevertheless designate an official as Postmaster General, so that that ancient and honourable designation is not lost. Perhaps the president could also be known as the Postmaster General, or perhaps the title could be given to the minister responsible for the corporation. I urge those who are concerned with the operation of the new crown corporation to manage their affairs efficiently, without depriving us of this ancient, honourable and respected title of Postmaster General.

• (1610)

Other than the few reservations I have indicated, I wish the bill well. I hope that it will achieve the objects for which the government of the day and preceding governments have hoped.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I had intended to speak on this bill on second reading and would have done so had there been the regular two days' notice. Frankly, I have not had the chance to do the homework which I feel is necessary to speak on this topic.

My interest in this bill stems from the fact that the enabling clauses of the bill were referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. The committee sat and made certain recommendations, some of which, as Senator Grosart explained, were not accepted. Anything which I can say at second reading stage, I can say equally well in committee. However, due to the fact that the committee meeting will not be tomorrow morning—as was the case on other occasions, when the committee met the morning following second reading, to which I objected—I will now have a chance to prepare myself properly, as will other senators, to take part in the proceedings of the committee next Thursday. Even though I am not a member of the committee, I shall be there.

Senator Flynn: You will be welcome.

Senator Godfrey: I believe it is very important that the Senate not adjourn for three weeks before disposing of this motion.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I find myself in a position somewhat similar to that of Senator Godfrey because I would also like to make a long speech on Bill C-42 now under consideration, and particularly on section 31 which concerns the appointment of auditors. I know that the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants submitted a brief to the committee of the other place and that this brief was not examined at all. Of course, this brief made recommendations concerning the appointment of auditors. While I am not a member of the Committee on Transport and Communications which will study this bill, I plan on attending the meetings of this committee to express my views and perhaps also to make my own recommendations on this subject, which I believe to be very important.

I know that Senator Denis referred yesterday to the auditors, mentioned in section 31 of the bill.

I believe that it is rather important to examine all the provisions of section 31. However, so as not to delay second reading of this bill, I shall abstain from making my nice long speech this afternoon.

[English]

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to make a brief comment on this bill with regard to a matter which has been drawn to my attention by a firm involved, as a special courier, in the delivery of letters. I refer to clauses 14 and 15. Clause 14 gives to the crown corporation:

> the exclusive privilege of collecting, transmitting and delivering letters to the addressee thereof within Canada.

There are several exceptions to clause 14, which are outlined in clause 15. Clause 15(1)(e) reads, in part:

> letters of an urgent nature that are transmitted by a messenger for a fee at least equal to an amount that is three times the regular rate of postage payable for delivery in Canada—

The concern expressed by the particular individual who is engaged in this specialized business was that this clause would not be interpreted in such a way that these people could remain in business. Such businesses provide an essential service.

I rise only to draw this matter to the attention of the committee, so that it will be reviewed carefully and so that any concerns in this regard may be put to rest. I, for one, feel that this service is important and that it should be available to those who need it. I certainly hope that the new post office corporation will provide the kind of mail delivery which was provided when Senator Denis was Postmaster General. Certainly, if he were still Postmaster General, employer-employee relations would be such that there would be peace in the Post Office, there would be next-day delivery, and the postage rate would still be three cents. We miss him.

The point I am trying to make is that we must ensure that these alternative services are not prejudiced and that they do not face the future possibility of being put out of business. These businesses provide an essential service which is not likely to change immediately insofar as the immediate delivery of urgent mail is concerned.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise with regard to the comments made by Senator Buckwold on the problems faced by the private couriers. It is rather ironic that the Postmaster General, who will give that monopoly to the new crown corporation, is at the same time the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in charge of combines legislation. Perhaps during the committee hearing somebody could ask the minister about the conflict, if not of interest, at least of responsibilities.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if Senator Denis speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Buckwold: Just before Senator Denis speaks, may I apologize to Senator Grosart who, I understand, raised the same point? Unfortunately, I was out of the chamber at the time he made his point. I certainly did not want to upstage or downgrade anything Senator Grosart might have said; I merely want to get my point across.

[Translation]

Senator Denis: Honourable senators, since Senator Buckwold is practically the only one who had praise for me, I will answer him first and tell him that I am grateful for his kind words. I would have liked Senator Grosart to refer to that successful period when I was Postmaster General. It does not seem right both to criticize and praise the Post Office Department, especially at this time.

[English]

Senator Buckwold knows that the monopoly on the delivery of letters is being given to the corporation in order that there may be a uniform delivery service throughout Canada, including the isolated areas of the country. I am sure that Senator Buckwold also realizes that if the better parts of the country are served by couriers, there will be no profit areas left to the corporation. The situation could arise where, for example, the courier service in Montreal is very good and the crown corporation postal service in Toronto is very bad. The purpose of having messengers charge three times the postal rate is to leave the crown corporation some profitable areas in order that it may reduce its deficit. That is all I can tell him in that regard. There has been no change in this situation.

● (1620)

I thank Senator Grosart for his favourable comments. Having heard what he said, I was beginning to think that I was a good sponsor, but then he started to complain about, and to show some dissatisfaction with, the past and present Post Office Department services. This is an argument in favour of the new society and is proof that there must be change. Senator Grosart stated that government should have more control, but a couple of sentences later he stated that they do not have control over other things.

In order to protect the public, the government must have a certain amount of control over the new society. The new society has ample opportunity, under the provisions of this bill, to ask the minister responsible to exercise more control.

As far as the definitions of "letter" and "tariff" are concerned, those are contained in the regulations, and decisions could be made from day to day. Under the regulations, if a member of Parliament or a person is not satisfied, he can lodge a complaint within 60 days. The regulations, including the interpretation of "letter" or an increase in the tariff, will be published in the Canada Gazette, and this is stipulated in the bill. This affords to anyone the opportunity to make a complaint to the minister or even to the Governor in Council. Therefore, the public is protected.

Most of the matters we have discussed are contained in the regulations. Those regulations give the power to make changes, as long as those changes are published in the Canada Gazette, which then gives the public an opportunity to complain.

Under this bill, government expenditure is reduced to a limit of $500 million. Formerly, there was no limit on the amount of money which could be spent in the course of operating the Post Office, but now it cannot exceed $500 million. Now, the Governor in Council, before authorizing large expenditures, must take into consideration the protection of the public.

As far as employees of the Post Office are concerned, they have been asking for this kind of change for two or three years. As Senator Grosart has said, they are not satisfied at the present time and they hope that the bill will be passed as soon as possible. If this bill is not passed as soon as possible, then we will be responsible for the anxiety caused to those employees by having to wait another six months or a year before the passage of this bill. Because of the recent changes in government they have had to wait until now for the presentation of this bill. I believe that it is our duty to give those employees, those syndicates, and those unions an opportunity to do good work because what they are asking for is their affair and their business. At the same time, government is protected.

Honourable senators, this is a good piece of legislation which will please, at the same time, both the employees and the public.

My good friend Senator Leblanc raised the matter concerning two auditors. Honourable senators, I would suggest that it offers more protection to have two auditors than to appoint the Auditor General. Is the Auditor General independent, or is he influenced by government? There will be no question that the two auditors who will be appointed will be independent; they will be employees neither of the Post Office nor of the government. Both auditors will be replaced every two years, which is an added reason in favour of this provision. Having two auditors instead of having only one is an added safeguard. One can make a mistake, and although two can make a mistake, they will not make mistakes so often.

Senator Godfrey has expressed concern over the recommendations which have been made, but I am sure that, during the committee meeting he will receive satisfactory answers to his questions. However, this matter has already been studied during 13 or 14 days of committee hearings. I believe the House of Commons committee studied the matter for eight days, during the course of which they made over 60 amendments. However, if the matter is referred to committee for further study, perhaps the experts would explain the reasons why they did not include this recommendation.

Honourable senators, much work has already been done by the minister in connection with this bill, and I hope that, with the assistance of his experts and after careful study in committee, they will decide to incorporate another amendment.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time

Hon. Azellus Denis moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION BY SENATOR FLYNN WITHDRAWN

On the Motion:

That in view of the decision rendered by the Supreme Court of Newfoundland on the legality of the constitutional resolution now being debated in Parliament and the fact that the Supreme Court of Canada has agreed to hear an appeal from the decision of the Court of Appeal of Manitoba on the matter, and further, that the Prime Minister has indicated that he would not ask the Parliament at Westminster to consider the resolution before the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled as to its legality, the Senate considers that the debate on the motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, and the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, is inappropriate and should be adjourned until after the Supreme Court of Canada has rendered a final decision on the legality of the contents of that Address.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask leave to withdraw Motion No. 1, standing in my name, in view of the fact that the order we adopted previously covers the point.

Senator Langlois: It is even better.

Senator Flynn: I will not argue that at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is is agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CANADA POST CORPORATION BILL—STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications I would like to inform you that the committee met this morning to consider the Canada Post Corporation Bill, and that I have been instructed to report the bill today, if possible. The necessary documentation is now being prepared and later this day, together with the Leader of the Government, I shall be asking permission to revert to Reports of Committees so that I may present the report.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if the committee reports the bill without amendment, then on behalf of Senator Denis, the sponsor of this bill, who is unable to be here today, I shall ask leave to proceed to third reading later this day.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow I will move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 12th May, 1981, at—

Honourable senators, I am reading the wrong motion. Please ignore what I have just said.

I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, April 24, 1981, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, I do not see why we have this motion before us, since we have already decided that we shall sit at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Senator Frith: In view of the Senate's order, I believe that the honourable senator is quite right and that this motion is superfluous.

Hon. G. I. Smith: On the point of order, honourable senators, I could not help but notice the date in the abortive notice first read by the Deputy Leader of the Government. I wondered if there was some difficulty about that date, contrary to what we were led to believe last week.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I had proposed to move that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 19, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening, as previously understood. I had prepared a motion to adjourn until May 12, in the event that the Senate wanted to spend additional time on the Post Office bill. If we felt that we wanted to give that bill more attention, it occurred to me that it would not be appropriate for us to take an additional week's adjournment. The motion of which I shall give notice is for an adjournment until May 19, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

Senator Flynn: A trade-off.

Senator Frith: No, it is not a trade-off at all.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Another trade-off.

Senator Frith: I must insist that it was not a trade-off, honourable senators; it was just that I saw a lot of concern with regard to the Post Office bill.

Senator Asselin: Shame.

Senator Frith: I felt that I should not subject myself to possible criticism regarding not giving honourable senators, who were eager to give the bill further attention, a week they could otherwise have in which to do so.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Asselin: We do not accept your trade-off. You will not have any trade-off with us.

Hon. Allister Grosart: Regarding the remark made by the Deputy Leader of the Government that he had anticipated the possibility of further discussing Bill C-42, my comment is, in the famous words, "Now he tells us."

Senator Frith: Yes, now I tell you because I had to see what would happen in the committee.

Senator Flynn: The motion should be put now.

Senator Frith: I have just given notice that the motion will be moved tomorrow. I had to give one day's notice.

Senator Flynn: That is fine.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY

IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILES

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. I did not get to my feet immediately because, out of courtesy, I like the opposition to ask the first question.

Senator Asselin: We wanted to give you a chance.

Senator Austin: It is very kind of the opposition to allow me to ask the first question. I wish to ask the minister a question with respect to trade with Japan in automobiles. What is the policy of the government with respect to the possibility of restricting imports of Japanese automobiles into Canada?

As I understood the statement made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the other place yesterday, he said that Canada wanted equivalent treatment, in terms of a reduction in imports, to that which the United States is seeking from Japan. Apparently, he is also saying that our policy is entirely tied to the American policy: if they succeed in reducing Japanese car imports into the United States, we want the same treatment; if they do not succeed, we have no separate policy for reducing imports into Canada on our own.

I am rather puzzled and should like to know whether we are concerned with respect to the import of Japanese automobiles into Canada or whether we are tied to some form of U.S. action. What is our policy?

● (1410)

In particular, is Mr. Gray alluding to the possibility of raising auto prices to Canadian consumers by reducing the availability of foreign automobiles to the Canadian consumer?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, most of the question posed by the Honourable Senator Austin must be taken as notice. However, I do have some information on the general subject. We have had discussions with the Japanese over the past week. These discussions were held in Tokyo with senior Japanese officials. It would not be helpful to comment further publicly on what are described as "delicate talks" which will continue between our governments.

My colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, is monitoring the developments very closely.

I can report that we have received a report from the Canadian delegation which visited Tokyo last week. The Japanese are fully aware of the problems faced by the Canadian automobile industry and the importance we attach to the Japanese authorities' taking action to restrain automobile exports to the Canadian market in parallel with any action taken regarding the American market. We would expect that the Japanese would take similar but not necessarily identical action for the Canadian market as may be taken for the United States.

It was agreed during the consultations held in Tokyo that there was a need to continue discussions on this matter between Canada and Japan in the near future.

As I stated earlier, the remainder of Honourable Senator Austin's question will be taken as notice.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to point out to the Leader of the Government that Canada has a particularly favourable trade balance with Japan. In my part of the country, British Columbia, we have a high percentage of that favourable trade balance. It would be inappropriate in the extreme in our relations with the Japanese to trade off, at the cost of Britsh Columbia's primary sector, advantages which would be conferred somehow on the automobile manufacturers in central Canada.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government to bear in mind the present regional economic advantages, and ask him to ensure, before Canadian consumers are asked to subsidize automobile manufacturing in central Canada, and the high wages paid to the automobile industry workers, that efforts are made to ensure that the automobile industry in Canada is rational and competitive.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the important views of Senator Austin will be brought to the attention of the minister responsible.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, just before we entered the chamber today, the Honourable Senator Guay asked whether there was any further information on the subject of the Garrison Dam. I do have some further information to give to Senator Guay and other honourable senators, including Honourable Senator Roblin.

Canadian and American officials are meeting today in Washington to commence a process of consultation on the Garrison diversion project. The Canadian delegation includes representatives of the Department of External Affairs, Environment Canada, and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, as well as the Government of Manitoba. They will be taking this opportunity to express to the United States once again Canada's objection to the Garrison diversion project as currently designed and authorized, and to explain the basis of our concern.

We are looking forward to hearing the presentation of the representatives of the United States, and to learn how they intend to meet their international obligations under the Boundary Waters Treaty.

We are hopeful that this meeting will be a useful step in resolving this longstanding issue.

THE BUDGET

PREPARATION—CONSULTATION WITH LABOUR AND INDUSTRY ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was asked by the Honourable Senator Smith on October 29, 1980, concerning consultations with the Canadian Labour Congress about the budget. The answer to that question is as follows:

The Minister of Finance, throughout the year, but particularly just prior to a budget exercise, receives briefs and suggestions from a great number of groups in the country. The October 28 budget was no exception. A meeting was scheduled with the Canadian Labour Congress, which had requested a meeting with the Prime Minister, not the Minister of Finance. Upon receipt of the referral, the representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress cancelled out. The Minister of Finance did, however, meet with a group representing small business in Canada on a number of economic issues.

● (1415)

FINANCE

INTEREST RATES—PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator McElman on March 11 concerning chartered bank profitability and interest rate spreads.

It was reported in the Globe and Mail on March 10, 1981 that Canada's major chartered banks had recorded during the quarter ended January 31, 1981 one of their best profit performances in history. The total operating profits of the big five increased by 56.9 per cent over the same quarter in 1980. The Royal Bank recorded the largest increase, 76 per cent; the Bank of Nova Scotia recorded the lowest increase, 24 per cent.

The banks, in their statements to shareholders, have attributed most of the gains to an improvement in domestic margins, and comparisons of prime lending rates with the banks' cost of funds confirm this. The spread between the prime rate and interest rates on personal savings accounts was about five percentage points during the quarter, in comparison with an average of three percentage points in fiscal 1980. However, nearly half of the increase in profits can be attributed to the increase which took place over the period in bank assets.

Bank analysts believe that the overall gain for fiscal 1981 will, in percentage terms, be much below the increase recorded in the first quarter—possibly in the 20 per cent range. The outcome, however, will depend very much on interest rate behaviour during the remainder of the year.

During the quarter ended January 31, 1981, bank revenues recorded a substantial increase which resulted in before-tax and after-tax increases in profit. This followed two quarters when bank revenues remained static or declined. In comparison with the same quarter last year, nearly half of the increase in revenues and profits is a direct result of the expansion in bank assets. The remainder appears to result mainly from the widening which has occurred between the banks' lending rates and their costs of funds. This widening tends to occur when rates rise, but after a lag, and particularly when rates fall, there is a marked narrowing of this spread. Bank analysts expect this spread to narrow as the year advances. Bank revenues and profits reflect these market conditions—that is, the increased variability of interest rates—and will become more stable to the extent that interest rates stabilize.

Honourable senators, I would note that our analysis indicates that the chartered banks' recent profitability has increased but not to levels which can be considered to be excessive. The Minister of Finance has stated that he will continually monitor the situation and, if action is required, he will be prepared to consider it.

Honourable senators, I must apologize for the long reply, but the question is of some importance and is of interest to many honourable senators, and I felt that it should be delivered orally.

FISHERIES

GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—CLOSURE OF HERRING FISHERY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on April 9, 1981, concerning the closing of the herring fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. If this could be made part of today's record, honourable senators may wish to consider the explanation given and ask a series of questions based upon that reply.

(The answer follows:)

The advice received from the Canadian Atlantic Scientific Advisory Committee indicated that while further analysis of the status of the Southern Gulf of St. Lawrence herring fishery would be carried out in May, when all data from the 1980 fishery would be available, there is accumulating evidence that the actual biomass is in the lower part of the possible range. Indeed, the scientists are sufficiently concerned about the biomass level and the potential collapse of this stock to advise extreme caution in the establishment of the TAC for this stock and particularly the establishment of the quota for the "edge" purse seine fishery which takes place at this time.

Herring and similar relatively shortlived pelagic species are subject to very considerable annual fluctuations in numbers and thus assessment of stock status requires that the most recent data possible are used in the analysis. In fact, the assessment on which the present advice is based was carried out as soon as preliminary fisheries data from 1980 were available, although this was not complete and further analysis will be necessary when more complete fisheries data are available.

I might note that the availability of such data would be greatly improved by greater cooperation from the fishing industry in providing information on their operations.

It is not completely accurate to suggest that the new management measures will take away the livelihood of seiner operators. Discussions are presently taking place with the seiner operators affected by these measures in order to find a solution to this difficult problem.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question respecting the statement on the Garrison. I gather from the minister's statement that the delegation going to Washington is largely a technical one. Will there be an opportunity for them to meet on this matter with the interested members of Congress? We have had some success in dealing with the State Department and technical people, but not so much success with the members of Congress who, I feel, are the prime target. Could the minister say whether he thinks that is going to happen?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can say that contacts have been made at the political level as well. However, the question will be taken as notice, and it may be possible to bring a more detailed itinerary to the chamber. Based on the information which has been made available to me, I think Canadians can feel optimistic about the outcome of these talks.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

EMPLOYMENT OF THE DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government if he has any response to the questions I posed regarding the disabled and the apparent difference of opinion between the Honourable Jean-Jacques Blais and the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that material has not yet been received. We are awaiting its arrival with keen anticipation.

● (1420)

Senator Muir: The honourable gentleman asked me if I would provide him with the information as to when this was supposed to have been noted in the records. At the hearing of the Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped, held on Wednesday, April 8, 1981, the witness was the Honourable Jean-Jacques Blais, who said, as reported at page 17:8 of the proceedings of the committee:

> However, I will not be able to meet your recommendation that suppliers' affirmative action programs be subject to contractual undertakings. I might point out that our Canadianization program, to which I referred previously, while successful, is not achieved through contractual undertakings, but through persuasion and effective communication in the marketplace.

Senator Perrault: I thank the honourable senator for his helpful information. However, I am hopeful that a more complete statement can be brought to the chamber explaining the official position.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—PROCEDURE RESPECTING DEBATE

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government. Could he tell us what the order of the debate will be with respect to the Constitution and, particularly, at what time amendments will be brought before the chamber, and what time will be permitted for debate on such amendments? I am particularly interested in hearing the opposition members argue the position of their party on the suspensive veto and how that would work in this chamber.

Hon. Martial Asselin: In the committee you voted against the supremacy of God. Do you remember that? I was there.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in answer to the question asked by Senator Austin regarding, first, the Constitution resolution, the order of the Senate which honourable senators will find on page 1132 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for Wednesday, April 15, 1981 contemplates that we will use most of our time this afternoon and this evening to discuss that resolution. It is understood—I may be corrected if I am wrong—that no honourable senator needs to feel limited by the fact that the amendments that are before the other place technically are not yet before us. In other words, any honourable senator who wishes to speak on the amendments that are being debated in the other place should feel free to do so. So we can use up our time more or less in anticipation of those items, because we know that according to our order we will be moving substantially those amendments. In fact, according to our order we will move exactly the amendment that is accepted by the other place—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): No, no. I think the Deputy Leader of the Governement is trying to suggest something that he really does not mean. He did not say that last week, and I hope he will retract it immediately.

Senator Frith: The order provides—

Senator Flynn: No, no. Look at what you said last week. Let us not argue.

Senator Frith: I am not seeking to argue anything. I am simply trying to point out what the motion says. I do not want to argue anything. Paragraph 4 says:

> The Order to resume the debate on the main motion shall be called at 10.00 a.m. on Friday, April 24, 1981 and, notwithstanding any other motion in amendment thereto, the Leader of the Government in the Senate shall forthwith be given the floor to move any amendments to the said Address adopted by the House of Commons on Thursday, April 23, 1981, pursuant to the Special Order adopted by that House—

That is all I meant to say. If I said something different from that, then I did not intend to do so.

Senator Flynn: I think you said that I would have to move exactly the same.

Senator Frith: No, no. Let us be very clear about that. The Leader of the Opposition is not bound in any way to move any amendment; no, not at all. I meant that the Leader of the Government would—

Senator Flynn: Then I withdraw.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): We were speaking for ourselves. You may choose to differ from your leader.

Senator Flynn: I stand corrected once more.

Senator Frith: In terms of standing corrected, as between you and me, I would say it is two to one in your favour—at this point anyway.

Senator Flynn: I am not sure about that.

Senator Frith: In any event, honourable senators, that is what the order provides. The relevance of that is that no honourable senator, in speaking today on the Constitution resolution, needs to feel limited by the resolution in its form before us, and he or she should feel free to speak about the amending package as it has been tabled in the other house.

The next step will be at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning when, pursuant to paragraph 4, the Leader of the Government will be given the opportunity to move the amendments adopted in the other place; following which the Leader of the Opposition will be given the opportunity to propose any amendment he wishes. I then expect that the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition will be the first to speak to their proposed amendments. Senator Yuzyk's amendment will still technically be before us at that point.

● (1425)

We will, therefore, spend the time between 10 a.m. and 12 noon tomorrow discussing those amendments, but, again, we can discuss them also, to the extent that we know about them, today.

If I may take the opportunity to say what I think will be happening today and tomorrow, it is that if Senator Smith is ready with his report, then before we get to the resolution on the Constitution we will hear his report and deal with third reading of the post office bill. When we have disposed of that, there is a bill, Bill C-50, that Senator Buckwold will be sponsoring, and he is ready to proceed with it, but Senator Flynn and I have agreed that we want to give the maximum time to the Constitution, so I have proposed that that stand on the order paper, and we will continue to stand it and not deal with it at all, unless we have the time. If we do have the time, we will give it second reading.

Then we will proceed to the Constitution resolution, dealing with it in the manner we have just discussed. I will be yielding to Senator Lang, and when he has spoken we will proceed and probably use all of the time available to us to discuss the Constitution. Only when we have run out, so to speak, will we deal with other business. That is how I see the proceedings for the rest of today and tomorrow. If there is something I have not made clear, I will be glad to try to do so.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, my question has to do with the vote on the amendments tomorrow. Could you tell us clearly how you intend to proceed? Will there be a specific vote for each specific amendment, or one vote for several amendments? It is not very clear in this order of the house.

Senator Frith: The wording of the order is meant to establish only omnibus amendments in the same form—

Senator Flynn: No! No!

Senator Frith: That is, there are only three amendments that are before us for voting. There will be the omnibus amendment of the government, the omnibus amendment of the opposition—

Senator Flynn: No! No!

Senator Deschatelets: The Deputy Leader will realize, then, that if I am against one amendment, and in favour of another amendment, and if the two are put together, I will have to vote against. This is the position I will be in.

Senator Frith: That is my understanding of the order that was agreed to in the other place, the same as here.

Senator Flynn: I disagree entirely with the position taken by the Deputy Leader of the Government. I suspected that he would try to pull that. I should not say that. I thought he was preparing the ground for what he is saying now, just a few moments ago.

There is nothing in this order that would permit the majority here to impose on us the necessity to vote an omnibus amendment. There is nothing of that kind here. In the house, all right, but that is their problem. It is not our problem, and the amendments have to be voted the way they are presented, and if they are presented separately, they are going to be voted separately. If you are trying to impose closure on us in this way, you had better think again.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we are going to end up with a two-two score, because I am not attempting to "pull" anything, or to have anything happen except what is in the order. The order provides that no amendments or sub-amendments may be proposed to the said motion except those moved by the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate on Friday, April 24, as provided herein. The Leader of the Government can move the adoption of amendments already adopted in the other place. We have already covered that.

> —no amendments may be moved to such amendments, but the Leader of the Opposition may, immediately after the said motion of the Leader of the Government, move any amendment to the said motion for an Address; and both the amendments of the Leader of the Government and the amendment of the Leader of the Opposition may be debated at the same time but without further amendment.

Paragraph 5 says:

> Every question necessary to dispose of any amendments moved by the Leader of the Government or by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate or the motion in amendment by the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, if it is still before the Senate, shall be put, in that order, no later than 12.00 noon on Friday, April 24, 1981.

I am certainly not suggesting that we propose an amendment and that no other amendment is available; but the amendment that is proposed by the Leader of the Opposition, according to paragraph 4, I take it, need not be an omnibus amendment. It is nevertheless one amendment only.

● (1430)

Senator Flynn: The deputy leader has a convenient memory. When we discussed this motion, I mentioned that there was certainly an error made by using the singular in that paragraph when, in the following paragraph, the plural was used. I mentioned that, and there was no correction made by either the deputy leader or the Leader of the Government. There was never an understanding; there was never a discussion to the effect that we would have only one question on all the amendments that we wished to move. I will ask my deputy leader to support my statement that, in the discussions we had, there was never any question that we would be limited to one vote on all the amendments that we wish to propose.

Senator Frith: There is clearly a misunderstanding—

Senator Flynn: There is more than a misundertanding.

Senator Frith: No, there is not anything more than a misunderstanding. There is a misunderstanding. The intention was to make this order resemble as closely as possible the order in the other place.

Senator Flynn: That is something else.

Senator Frith: In my opinion, one of the absolutely key elements of the order in the other place was the omnibus amendment provision. It was clearly my understanding—

Senator Flynn: No!

Senator Frith: Don't say no to what my understanding was.

Senator Flynn: I say no.

Senator Frith: The honourable Leader of the Opposition is telling me no as to what my understanding was. Let me say what my understanding was; we already know what his is.

Senator Flynn: I challenge your sincerity.

Senator Perrault: Listen and grow in wisdom.

Senator Frith: I am sorry that the Leader of the Opposition challenges my sincerity. Whether it is challenged or not, here it is. It was clearly my understanding—and, I thought, everyone's understanding—that we were attempting to make this order resemble as closely as possible the order in the other place. It was my understanding, secondly, that a very important part—an absolutely vital part, in my opinion—of the order in the other place was the concept of omnibus amendments made by the government, the opposition and the New Democratic Party. In my opinion, that is why we used the word "amendment."

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith: I repeat, in my opinion that was why we used the word "amendment", and it was very definite that we were operating with a view to keeping as closely as possible to the order in the other place.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: That is why, when I gave notice of the motion, I said that we were trying to keep it as close to the form of the order in the other place as possible.

My understanding of clause 4—I suppose we will have to have a ruling on it and I am sorry about the misunderstanding—

Senator Flynn: Sorry! Spare me!

Senator Frith: There is no doubt that we do not have the ability to move any more than one amendment; the opposition has the right to move one amendment; and the amendments that are voted on, according to clause 5, are the government's amendment, the opposition's amendment and Senator Yuzyk's amendment.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am not certain that I can shed too much light on this convoluted and arguable matter, but it is perfectly clear that the government and the opposition start from different points of view in the whole development of this procedural resolution that we have before us.

As the Deputy Leader of the Government has quite correctly stated, it was his object all along to secure a resolution from this chamber which was identical in all respects to what had been agreed to as the procedure to be followed in the other chamber. However, I think it is equally correct to say that it was the clear objective of the Leader of the Opposition to do no such thing. The question was how far would we in the opposition be able to go to meet an objective with which we did not agree, but which we were willing to discuss, because we wanted to come to the largest possible measure of agreement as to how we should proceed with this matter here.

Perhaps it is not appropriate for me to dwell too much on what was said in our private discussions, but if I can by inference deal with the position taken by the deputy leader, let me say that many of us on this side of the house objected, as a fundamental matter of principle, to the fact that the government was insisting that only the Leader of the Opposition can move amendments on this side of the chamber. Many members of the caucus to which I belong wish to produce amendments of their own. I do not know whether all of the independent members of the chamber might give up their right to move amendments, but it seemed to us to be a fundamental abrogation of the rights of a member of this body to prohibit him or her from moving amendments.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I have to admit that we conceded that point. I have to admit that it was our judgment that, in view of the time element that was involved here and the agreements that had been made elsewhere, we should concede that point. Therefore, we moved a step in the direction of the government by agreeing to the proposal that only the leaders could produce amendments, even though we received very strong and vigorous protests from members of our caucus as to the propriety of entering into such an agreement. However, for better or for worse, we did agree and we are prepared to stand by that agreement. We took that step to meet the view of the government that we should do here exactly what was done in the other chamber.

The second proposal that was made to us was that we on this side would only produce as amendments what was produced as amendments by our counterparts in the Progressive Conservative Party opposition in the House of Commons. It was said to us that the Progressive Conservative caucus in this house was to produce, through the mouth of its leader, the resolutions and amendments—and nothing but the resolution and amendments—introduced by the opposition in the other house. To that we took exception. It was our view that no doubt in many respects we will be producing resolutions which are similar to those in the other place, but we in no way wish to be bound.

We could not concede the constitutional propriety of agreeing that the opposition in this house should be bound to do precisely what was done by the opposition in the other house, because it was not our view that such a process was in conformity with our understanding of the role of the Senate or, indeed, of any independent democratic body, as we are so fond of telling people we are.

We said to the government, "You can do what you like." We could see, from a procedural point of view, their problem if they did not produce amendments consistent with those in the other chamber. We had no difficulty with that. However, it did not seem to us that we should be bound in the same way here, nor was it ever agreed by me—and it was certainly not agreed by my leader, as you have heard most emphatically from him—that any resolutions that we produce should be dealt with as a basket case. I think that is a rather appropriate expression to use at this stage in our proceedings, because a basket case is certainly what this constitutional debate has become at the present time. At no time did we agree to that proposition. It may have been assumed that we agreed to it. Obviously, this assumption was made, because the Deputy Leader of the Government is a man of probity and he would not have said that that was his view if he did not sincerely believe it. I give him full faith and credit in that respect. I accept his assurance without any doubt, but I have to say that it is not my view of the matter.

The point is underlined because I said to my leader, having read over this resolution, that the word "amendment" in paragraph 4 is in the singular and it ought to be in the plural, if my understanding of the procedure was correct. Accordingly, the Leader of the Opposition made the point—and you can find it at page 2307 of the Senate Hansard of April 15—that the word "amendment" should be in the plural so as to avoid any possibility of doubt or the kind of debate we are having here. No objection was taken to that. No one said to us, "That is not right. You have got the wrong end of the stick." As far as I could see, that was accepted by those on the other side of the house as being a correct, accurate and acceptable statement of the position.

You can imagine, then, my interest, if nothing else, when I read the Hansard of that day in which that correction had not been made, and in which the word still exists in the singular form rather than in the plural form. It seems to me that it would be quite wrong for us to agree that we had given any undertaking that the basket approach to amendments would be appropriate.

I have to say that, apart from any procedural matter, I have the strongest objection in principle to dealing with amendments to the Constitution in this way. Honourable senators on the other side of the chamber may want to deal with a miscellaneous group of amendments which have no relation to one another, logically or inherently, except that they are part of a very lengthy constitutional resolution, but how on earth can members of this house express an opinion? We are shackled.

If, for example, this package contains amendments dealing with the powers of the Senate, rights of women, the amending formula and all these various matters which have no logical, intrinsic connection one with the other, how in the name of goodness can people logically and in good conscience stand up and vote yes or no. It is not a question of giving a bill second reading when one is confronted with the dilemma of deciding whether there are more pluses or minuses, and voting accordingly. We are dealing with the Constitution of the country and with most fundamental principles. If we are being asked to consider resolutions on fundamental principles that have no relationship one with the other, all together, hugger-mugger in a basket, I believe it derogates from the probity of the people who sit here. I, for one, would not be prepared to support such a proposal.

I fully agree with the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition, that we are unaware of any understanding that this side of the house was obliged to submit resolutions in a basket and vote on them holus-bolus. We take the view that it is a matter of good judgment, common sense and prudence in discussing the affairs of the country, and in dealing with the wide group of disparate matters which one can expect will be moved from this side of the house, that we should be able to test in this chamber, separately and one at a time, these matters of principle as they are discussed. I believe that to do anything else makes a joke of the entire proceedings.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, one might have hoped that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition would have spoken in these terms of outrage and concern to his own caucus, to the leader of his party or to this chamber several weeks ago, days ago or even hours ago. Senator Roblin should be reminded once again of the unique situation we have here. This unusual situation has been admitted by all the national parties and their leaders.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: The Right Honourable the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party have agreed that in view of this unique situation, in view of the fact that any address to Westminster from the Senate and the House of Commons must go forward in identical form, because it must be a joint address, and in view of the many days and weeks of debate and discussion regarding the constitutional proposals, together with a decision to hear from the Supreme Court of Canada before any final vote, a unique format was warranted in order to expedite the passage of this measure through Parliament. More specifically, it was agreed that the amendments passed by Parliament should be made known to the Supreme Court by April 24. It was agreed that the Supreme Court must know the ideas of Parliament before it renders its judgment.

Honourable Senator Frith spoke very eloquently on this point several days ago when he reported upon the historic agreement achieved by the political parties and the leaders of the parties. This is not a matter of a wilful Prime Minister or the government unilaterally imposing a procedure upon both houses of the Parliament of Canada. We have an agreement made by the Leader of the Liberal Party, the Leader of the Conservative Party and the Leader of the New Democratic Party on behalf of both chambers of Parliament. We have been informed of that—

Senator Asselin: No, impossible.

Senator Perrault: —through representatives of all the parties in the other place. Yet today we have a situation where the leadership of the official opposition in the Senate is telling us that this agreement is contrary to all principles of democracy, where the opposition leaders feign outrage and condemn a procedural agreement which their own national party leader has affirmed is suitable, and to which every Progressive Conservative member of Parliament in the other place has agreed. Here is a party which the other day entered into a solemn agreement that two hours would be set aside to dispose of the various amendments in grouped form and now claims that the entire procedure is wrong and undemocratic and that it tramples on the rights of Parliament. Where were these speeches a few days ago—

Senator Flynn: They are there in Hansard, if you would just read them.

Senator Perrault: —when we had our discussion on the resolution? There is an element—

Senator Flynn: I said that last week.

Senator Perrault: —of absurdity here.

Senator Flynn: Only in what you say.

Senator Perrault: The opposition has initiated a spurious debate. A few days ago, the government in this place stated that it would not wish to restrict the right of the official opposition to move its package of amendments. We agreed that the package need not to be the same as the package in the other chamber.

Senator Roblin: Bravo; so it doesn't need to be the same.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Opposition knows that. We did not agree to some procedure which would trample on the rights of the opposition in this house. We did not say that the opposition here must march in lock step with the views of the Progressive Conservative members in the other chamber. But we did agree that, in view of the time available to us and in order to make certain that these matters were given fair consideration, amendments proposed both by the government side and the opposition side would be grouped together in order that they may be debated and in order to make known the mind of Parliament. These are the facts.

[Senator Perrault.]

Senator Flynn: Come to the point and try to be objective and practical.

Senator Perrault: I was party to the negotiations, and the Leader of the Opposition is aware of that fact.

Senator Flynn: You are aware of what I told you in your office.

Senator Perrault: Not once did the honourable senator ever express this view during any of the negotiations. We talked in terms of amendments—

Senator Flynn: Never.

Senator Perrault: —and in terms of the omnibus package produced by the government.

Senator Flynn: No, I never said that. I challenge you. I say you are lying.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senator, you disgrace the rules of Parliament by popping up like a jack-in-the-box.

Senator Flynn: I do not care; I should not have to listen to your saying things which are lies.

Senator Perrault: Please maintain your calm. Let us have some order.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Allister Grosart: His Honour is on his feet. Sit down.

Senator Perrault: There is no disorder on this side.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I suggest that we calm down and discuss this very important point in an orderly fashion.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have—

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I had the floor. Is the honourable senator raising a point of order?

Senator Smith: What are you saying here? I did not get up to speak to you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the honourable senator rising on a point of order?

Senator Smith: I rose because I thought the honourable senator was finished.

The Hon. the Speaker: If the honourable senator is not rising on a point of order, then the Honourable Leader of the Government should be allowed to continue.

Senator Smith: I want to make it very clear that I thought that the honourable senator had finished, otherwise I would not have risen.

Senator Perrault: I took my place because His Honour the Speaker was on his feet. If the honourable senator has a point of order, I would be pleased to sit down.

Senator Smith: I am not asking you to sit down. I thought that you were finished.

Senator Grosart: Or that it was time that he was finished.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in my view, the negotiations with the official opposition in this place have proceeded with uncommonly good grace. There have been none of the disagreements such as have emerged this afternoon, to the surprise of all of us on this side. We are proposing, in view of the fact that these omnibus packages must be produced at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, and the vote must be at 12 o'clock, that the most efficient way of handling the matter is to have the amendments grouped as has been done in the other place.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: You may disagree with your party's philosophy, but there is still this accord which was achieved by the leader of your national party.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: But in this place the opposition is saying that such a proposal is undemocratic, and that it tramples on people's rights. The position taken by the Leader of the Opposition here is clearly illogical and ludicrous.

Senator Flynn: What a joke, coming from you.

Senator Perrault: What we want is an orderly debate. We would like to listen with interest to the amendments proposed by the Leader of the Opposition and get on with the job.

Senator Flynn: I would like to correct two things. As reported in Hansard at page 2307, I said the following:

> Of course, I must say right away that we on this side of the House had not given any mandate to that effect. Legally we do not consider that we are so bound—

That statement is very clear. When the Leader of the Government said that he spoke of the omnibus amendment, he never used that word in the conversations that we had—never; a clear "never".

● (1450)

Senator Perrault: That is not accurate at all.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, to try to further clarify the situation, there is no question that during the conversations the Leader of the Opposition, as pointed out here in the chamber, made it very clear that he was not bound by the order of the other place or by the decision that was made. Clearly, the position taken by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, regarding some aspects of the agreement made in the other place, was also quite sound. I remember it exactly that way.

The difference that we have is clearly, in my view, a total misunderstanding on something we took for granted. I assumed that when we used the word "amendment" we meant amendment. I assumed we were bringing it together with the all-party agreement in that omnibus sense. However, Senator Flynn seems not to have that understanding.

I do want to take the opportunity to remind honourable senators that the position I took here in the chamber was consistent with the position that I am now taking. I quote from my introductory comments on the motion for the Senate order, at page 2281 of Hansard, where I said:

> Honourable senators, the purpose of this motion is to implement in the Senate the all-party agreement that Parliament should not vote on the motion for a joint address until the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled on its constitutional acceptability—

We referred to that purpose. I then said:

> Next, I wish to explain the key elements of the all-party agreement that was reached a couple of weeks ago. The first element is that the Supreme Court should have before it the form of the resolution to be voted upon—
> Next, the procedural corollaries to the purpose, and to those key elements, are as follows: In the House of Commons the foregoing historic agreement found expression in a unanimous house order that meant an end to amendments except omnibus amendments proposed on behalf of each party by the party's house leader. Each member of the House of Commons, for this exceptional occasion, subordinated his or her individual right to propose amendments to the right of his or her party to do so; so that he or she had to work out his or her individual wishes in the party caucus for eventual expression in the house by the party leadership.

Senator Flynn has an honest misunderstanding about what happened; obviously, I have too. I want to underline that I did not, in any way, I hope, mislead honourable senators as to what my understanding was when I said, quite clearly, that the very thing that Senator Flynn feels he was not agreeing to was, I thought, what he was agreeing to. That was the point I was trying to make at that time.

How can we settle this matter? We cannot debate it forever, when there is a misunderstanding. There must be a way of settling it. If Senator Smith has a compromise solution to this problem, let us hear it before I propose anything else.

Senator Smith: I think I have a solution. I do not profess to understand what has passed between the four participants in this debate so far. However, I got one clear impression as a result of the agreement in this house, and that was that we were committed to finishing the debate by a certain time, but I did not get any impression that this had to be achieved in a certain way, so far as amendments were concerned.

Whether I was right or wrong in that impression, may I suggest that, after all, as I understand it, the main objective of all concerned is to finish the debate by a certain time. Can we not proceed on the basis the Leader of the Opposition suggests, namely, that we deal with the separate amendments, as opposed to the omnibus amendment, as long as we can stick to the fundamental issue of finishing by 1 o'clock tomorrow? Is that not all we need?

Senator Roblin: That is all we need.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a personal problem to submit to the Deputy Leader of the Government. Of course, I was not here last week and I find that the arrangements which the Deputy Leader of the Government claims to have made with the Leader of the Opposition are very surprising.

In any event, I suggest that one or the other of the parties has misunderstood; they have misunderstood one another. But here is my personal problem: if you force me to give an omnibus vote you are going to affect some of my personal privileges, and here is why: it is quite possible that the government may include in its package, in its omnibus amendments, certain amendments which I would support, which I would like to support, but that the package as a whole may not interest me. Should he want to proceed that way, the Deputy Leader of the Government would force me to vote against principles which I would support in relation to a certain item contained in the package. The same thing goes for other members of the opposition.

It is quite possible as well that the Leader of the Opposition may include in his package certain amendments which I do not like, which I would not support, but that I find nothing repugnant in the package as a whole. You are then forcing me to forego my privilege to vote according to my conscience and you are forcing me to vote for the package which will be presented by the Leader of the Opposition. We have never been in such a situation. I have been in the House of Commons and the Senate for nearly 20 years but never have I seen such a situation. I have never seen the privileges of the members of the House of Commons or of the Senate affected in such a way. That is why, conscientiously, I fail to understand how it can be that you, the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition, have thought of denying me this personal privilege.

Senator Frith: Senator Asselin was perfectly right when he explained the situation which derives from the agreement made in the other place.

Senator Asselin: I am not talking about the other place, I am talking about this place.

Senator Frith: Oh yes, here, agreed.

Senator Asselin: We are not sitting in the House of Commons, we are sitting in the Senate and we have to take our own decisions.

Senator Frith: You are quite right. As I said here in English on Tuesday, and in French on Wednesday, there are exceptional circumstances, and the privileges referred to by Senator Asselin were suspended in the other place.

Senator Asselin: I cannot accept that my privileges be suspended.

Senator Frith: That is exactly what I said. That is why I do not understand how come this question was not raised during the debate and before the vote. I did say that there were exceptional circumstances and that we were, so to speak, suspending our privileges, as the honourable senator says. We made our own decision. It was not the decision of the other place; it was our decision to comply with the same principles. That is why, as I explained here and not there, that we find ourselves in the situation described by Senator Asselin.

Senator Asselin: That is not possible.

Senator Frith: It is more than possible. It is not something we made up, that I can assure you!

Senator Asselin: On a point of order. My leader cannot take away my privileges as a senator. I have the privilege to vote on an amendment or another, according to my conscience. Now, you are forcing me to vote against my views and my conscience.

Senator Frith: That is what the Senate has decided.

Senator Asselin: I cannot accept that. Those are my privileges. My privileges have been suspended, and I cannot accept it. I cannot understand how my leader could have accepted—

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, let us say that I put the motion and that the Senate decided.

Senator Langlois: Let him blame his leader.

Senator Frith: I put the motion and, as I clearly said, the results are just as described by Senator Asselin. It eventually became an order of the Senate. I am not the one who made the order. What does this mean then? You say no, that it was not an order? But it was an order! However, I have explained that this does not go against the explanation I gave in English on Tuesday and which I repeated in French later. This explanation can be found as I gave it twice. Have these facts been invented by someone?

Senator Asselin: I do not know, I was not here.

Senator Frith: Well, what do you want if you were not here? I explained this clearly, I hope. I said that what we were going to do was to apply the principles approved in the other place, since these are quite exceptional circumstances, as I clearly explained.

● (1500)

[English]

> In the house of Commons the house order meant an end to amendments. Each member of the House of Commons, for this exceptional occasion, subordinated his or her individual right.

[Translation]

And then I said that this was what we wanted to do here. It is unfortunate if this is not clear and if Senators Asselin and Flynn do not see my explanation in that light. In any case, it is true—

Senator Asselin: It is a shame, it is absurd. You are not going to persist in trying to have us admit that—

Senator Frith: No, it is not absurd. It seems to me that there is nothing absurd at all. It is only that these are very exceptional circumstances, as I have explained twice—not once, but twice.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Your leader agreed to it.

Senator Asselin: No, he said that he did not.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: In any case, what can you say? You say no! For my part, what I want to say is this: this idea has been explained twice in Hansard, in French and in English. Even though I explained twice the same principle which is now causing us a problem, there seems to be some misunderstanding; we must therefore try to settle this matter. However, I believe that all this is quite clear in Hansard.

Senator Flynn: Do you have a conclusion?

Senator Frith: There are two possibilities.

[English]

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, it seems clear that there is a misunderstanding here. I would think there would be general agreement that if there is a misunderstanding, there was no agreement.

Secondly, we are confronted with what is an order of the Senate. There are differences of opinion as to what that order actually says. I was not a party to any of the discussions, so I cannot, in any way, say who said what at any particular time, but I am surprised to hear it repeated over and over again that something that was decided by the party leaders was binding on the Senate or on members of those parties in the Senate. I do not believe that that is so. I am not bound by any agreement made by any leader of any party, any place.

I rise—if the time comes when I can have the attention of the Deputy Leader of the Government—to suggest that it is important that there now be agreement as to how we shall proceed. I have to say that, in my view, the whole problem has been caused by ineptitude and, perhaps, inexperience in the handling of this matter.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: That is disgraceful.

Senator Grosart: I beg your pardon? I am perfectly entitled to say that I think the matter has been ineptly handled.

Senator Buckwold: By whom?

Senator Grosart: By the leadership of the government in the Senate. There is nothing new in this. This has been said over and over again with respect to bills. What is everybody getting so excited about? I say that it has been handled ineptly. The reason I feel it has been handled ineptly is that the suggestion was made earlier that the normal way to proceed was for us to wait until we received a message from the House of Commons. That is the normal practice when a proposition is before Parliament that there be a Joint Address to Her Majesty. The decision was made that we would not proceed that way. I repeat that I think it was inept to make the decision not to proceed in the normal way, and that that ineptness has caused the problems that are before us now.

I suggest that it is possible to resolve the matter. I see no objection to dealing with these motions one by one, expeditiously, and under whatever agreement may be necessary to meet the time limit. Then, if it is the wish of the leadership of the government in the Senate, we should match up, if I may use that phrase, the decision taken in the Senate on the resolution with the decision taken in the other place. Of course, I can see that that is desirable. I fully understand that.

Having dealt with these motions, even with a limitation on debate on each one, we would deal with each motion separately and then have an umbrella motion, if you like, which would deem the Senate to have passed a similar motion to that passed by the House of Commons.

I have not discussed this with my leader, and he may not agree with me, but I think it is of the utmost importance that this matter be resolved. I would even suggest, if it is necessary, that the Senate adjourn at this point so that discussions can take place in an attempt to resolve this matter in a way that would be a credit to the Senate; and I believe that that is possible.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will not make any comments on the adjective used to describe how we came about this. It is not the adjective I would use. There were long and careful negotiations undertaken, and I must say that they were undertaken in good humour. Senator Flynn, in particular, as well as Senator Roblin, Senator Perrault and myself worked long hours over the period of a week or so to settle this matter.

I believe that the purpose—

Senator Grosart: I rise on a point of order. When I used the adjective "inept", I was not referring to what went on in the discussions. I was referring to the original decision which I and others protested. That is all.

Senator Frith: I understand. As I said, the decision and the wording of the order were meant to reflect two things: to adopt, as far as possible, the decision made in the other place; and to reflect the agreement reached by Senator Flynn, Senator Roblin, Senator Perrault and myself. It went through many versions. I tried to explain clearly what its consequences were when I introduced the motion, and I believe that the order expresses that intent and that it does so clearly. I believe that the only way out of this difficulty, since we treat an order of the Senate the same as a rule, is to have a ruling on it from His Honour. We can debate further to try to persuade His Honour as to how he should rule, but in my view the wording is clear and I have nothing to add to my position that there is an intention to establish both here and in the other place, the principle of omnibus amendments with all the undesirable, or, at least, unusual consequences that flow from it. This is an exceptional situation in which the three parties reached this agreement.

The agreement that was reached in the other place we tried to implement here. One of the key elements, as I explained, was this omnibus feature, and I believe that that is what the order means and what His Honour will rule it provides.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I wish to raise one point with respect to a comment made by the Deputy Leader of the Government to the effect that the only way to deal with the order was to have a ruling from the Chair. While I quite agree that an order should be treated in the same way as a rule, it seems to me that it is perfectly proper—and there is no reason why it should not be done if it is desired—to amend that order so that we can lay out some course of action to enable us to get out of this difficulty, about which I make no comment as to who or what is to blame.

Surely, our main task now is to find a way to get out of this difficulty and to comply with what I still think is the fundamental objective of everybody, namely, to finish this debate by a certain time tomorrow. If we can amend the order in a way which will meet the general wishes of the Senate and not impede the effort to reach that objective of time, then it seems to me that that might be considered as an alternative to asking for a ruling from the Chair.

● (1510)

Senator Frith: The reason I do not wish to amend the order is because I believe the order accomplishes what it was meant to accomplish, namely, as nearly as possible the implementation of the all-party agreement in the other place, which included the omnibus principle.

Senator Flynn: Not here.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn does not agree with me on that, but I have to be honest by saying that is what I understood we were doing, and that is why I do not want to amend because I think it says what it is supposed to say.

Senator Flynn: You were afraid to tell me that.

Senator Frith: Not at all.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, in further discussion of the point of order, I am not suggesting, by my course of action, that the Deputy Leader of the Government is wrong or that the order is wrong. In fact, when I suggest amending it, I must implicitly be suggesting that it is right; but, right or wrong, it does not seem to meet with general approval. All I am suggesting is that instead of arguing whether it is right or wrong, can we not amend it by agreement so that we can get on with what we need to get on with, that is, the attempt to reach the end of the debate by 12 o'clock or one o'clock tomorrow, whichever it is? I am not clear in my mind what time it is. That is not any aspersion on the deputy leader, my own leader or anybody else, but merely an effort to suggest the way in which we may resolve the difficulty.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, as one who is not involved in any discussions and, therefore, I am procedurally as virgin as the driven snow, I was impressed by the suggestion of the very senior legislator, Senator Grosart, that when this honourable house gets into any difficulty there is a very useful venue, and that is to have free and informal discussion, like the British used to say, "behind the curtains," rather than pushing it towards something. I think Senator Grosart's suggestion is a very wise one, and the wisdom of this senior legislative body is something that we could trust in this regard.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there is no question that more than one amendment could be proposed. There is no question about that.

Senator Flynn: Then there is a misunderstanding. I was going to suggest following the idea put forward by Senator Smith, that all the amendments would be dealt with, not in one vote but at the same time, and we would ring the bell only once. If the Leader of the Government wants to put the amendments which have been adopted by the other place separately—for instance, the supremacy of God, in one question; the equality of women, in another question; and so on—we would vote from 12 o'clock on without interruption. The vote would be called, and we would vote on each question as proposed. The Leader of the Government would separate his amendments the way he wishes, and I would move my amendments one by one the way I wish. The question would be resolved without the interruption of the bell ringing for each vote, and we would be able to deal with the amendments in a very orderly fashion. That was my understanding.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I guess the misunderstanding is wider than I thought. I could not believe there was any question about any misunderstanding. I am saying what I said, and Senator Asselin shakes his head as if I did not say it and perhaps this was made up by somebody, but look at what it says in paragraph 2:

> No amendments or sub-amendments may be proposed to the said motion except those moved by the Leader of the Government—

Senator Flynn: That's right.

Senator Frith: And I am still quoting:

> —and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate of Friday, April 24, 1981, as provided hereinafter.

Senator Flynn: I do not know if Senator Frith understood what I meant.

Senator Frith: I did not.

Senator Flynn: I said the amendments will have to be moved by the Leader of the Government and by the Leader of the Opposition, but it will not be an omnibus amendment by the Leader of the Government. If he wants it to be so, that is his own business.

Senator Olson: He says what he has to move.

Senator Flynn: Yes. Suppose I have five amendments. We will vote on all those amendments without having the bell rung between each question.

An Hon. Senator: Separately.

Senator Flynn: Yes. You can take a stand on any question, and by one o'clock we will be through. That is the objective. That you should want to vote on apples and oranges at the same time seems ridiculous. It may be that in the other place they wanted to do that; but that is no concern of ours. If the deputy leader and the Leader of the Government do not want to accept my proposal, I will ask His Honour to rule on this question, but I must point out that nowhere in the order is there any mention that there will be an omnibus amendment.

An Hon. Senator: Nor in the other place.

Senator Flynn: You do not change the rules of normal practice—that of being able to move separate amendments, for example—without spelling out the fact, and you cannot interpret the order that was passed as changing that fundamental principle of orderly parliamentary debate. If that were to be the decision, I think I would simply despair of this place.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators—

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I want to give my opinion on it, but if you have something to say, please proceed.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I briefly add this: I do recall, in the course of our discussion in the chamber, that the Leader of the Opposition made what he felt was a valid point, and I know those who support the opposition must have felt the same way. He said, "We want to have the option to have in our package of amendments perhaps different features than those advanced by our party in the other place." All honourable senators recall that discussion.

Senator Flynn: Sure.

Senator Perrault: It was construed, at one point, that the effect of the house order under discussion was that the opposition amendment package here would have to duplicate the Conservative initiative in the other place. The government agreed that variations should most certainly be permitted in the Conservative motion. Certainly it was assumed by most honourable senators that the Conservative senators in caucus would meet together to determine and to decide the amendments that they felt to be appropriate—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Perrault: —and because of time constraints and debating constraints, that these would be voted upon as a package.

Senator Flynn: "Time constraints"? I am suggesting to you that we can deal with it in half an hour.

Senator Perrault: We have listened to you very carefully, and certainly the Deputy Leader of the Government has described our understanding of the situation, and that remains our understanding. We felt that it was a rare accord achieved in the spirit of goodwill in a unique parliamentary situation.

Senator Flynn: Hah!

Senator Perrault: I want to assure honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: I agree with you that there was goodwill then, but there isn't any more.

Senator Perrault: What surprises me is that a procedure which has been approved by his own national leader—

Senator Flynn: That is not the question.

Senator Perrault: —and a voting procedure which has been endorsed by the party in the other place—

Senator Flynn: That is not my concern at all.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators in opposition surely attend the national caucus meetings of their own party, yet we have the surprising situation where they have disowned the agreement—

Senator Flynn: Blah, blah, blah!

Senator Perrault: —they have condemned the procedures—

Senator Flynn: Blah, blah, blah!

Senator Perrault: —and surely it is a cause for some mystification, to say the least.

Senator Asselin: So this place deserves to be dissolved and abolished.

Senator Roblin: Of course, we have not disowned what is going on in the other place. It is not our business to disown it, either in caucus or out of caucus. It is their business. We are just concerned with our interest here. If His Honour is going to take the matter under review, there is a textual interpretation which I respectfully direct his attention to in clause 5, where it says:

> Every question necessary to dispose of any amendments—

The word "amendments" is in the plural.

> —moved by the Leader of the Government or by the Leader of the Opposition—

That might have some bearing on the question of the number of amendments that might be expected to be moved by the Leader of the Opposition. It does not say he can only move one.

Senator Frith: The word in the preceeding clause is used in the singular twice.

Senator Flynn: I corrected that.

Senator Roblin: That is why we corrected that.

Senator Frith: Where?

Senator Flynn: In my speech.

Senator Roblin: The deputy leader asks where we corrected that. It is found at page 2307 of Hansard of April 15, in the second-last paragraph from the bottom. It says:

> Those are the essential points. There were a few diverging opinions about the text, perhaps Senator Macquarrie did notice them as well, including at the top of page vii the fact that the Leader of the Government may propose "amendments", but that the Leader of the Opposition may propose "an amendment". Obviously, this is a grammatical mistake, but I believe that the plural should be used both for the Leader of the Government and for the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Perrault: Those are the component parts of the amendments.

Senator Roblin: That is what the argument is all about, is it not? I believe Senator Smith has given us a practical suggestion. The main thing the government wishes to do is to make sure the Senate stays in step with the House of Commons and has the numbers to do that. The second thing they want to do is to ensure that no one drags his or her feet and that we settle the matter within the time frame previously agreed to. No one is walking away from that. What we are really saying is that we would like the opportunity to present our several amendments seriatim, one at a time, and vote on them one at a time in an expeditious manner at 12 o'clock tomorrow; and if it takes another 12 or 15 minutes beyond 12 o'clock, I should expect that to be the maximum. I do not see anything wrong with that, and I hope that His Honour the Speaker might find that to be a sensible arrangement.

● (1520)

The Hon. the Speaker: I would ask the honourable senator a question for my own enlightenment? He has spoken of a correction that has been made. Where can I locate that correction?

Senator Roblin: I am speaking of a correction that was requested. I refer you to page 2307 of Debates of the Senate for Wednesday, April 15, 1981. It was a request made by the Leader of the Opposition in his reply when the matter was first discussed. No objection was made to his request for a correction at that time.

Senator Deschatelets: Would the honourable senator please read it?

Senator Roblin: I have just finished reading it, but I will read it again. Towards the end of the first column on page 2307, where it starts to get interesting, it says:

> —the Leader of the Government may propose "amendments", but that the Leader of the Opposition may propose "an amendment". Obviously, this is a grammatical mistake, but I believe that the plural should be used both for the Leader of the Government and for the Leader of the Opposition.

No response was made to that. No objection was taken to it at the time, and I should think it was quite natural for the one who made the statement, and those who listened to him, as I did, to assume that the proposal was accepted; and I was rather surprised to find that the correction was not made when Hansard came out originally.

What is the point I am trying to make? My point is that we on this side of the house foresaw the nature of this discussion here today, in the sense that our position would be the one that is expressed here, and we would wish to make sure that the resolution accommodated the position we are trying to take. Had we been told on April 15 that we were going to meet some opposition to that, I daresay there would have been more argument on it at that time; but apparently our position, from our point of view, appeared to be accepted. So we were quiet; we were satisfied; we sat down. Now we find that such is not the case.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I would ask you to bear with me for a moment while I try to deal with this matter. It appeared that we were on the verge of resolving the business of this week in an amicable fashion, as apparently is happening in the other place. It seems to me that the principal point being made by the opposition is that indeed the order refers to a single amendment, in the case of the amendment to be moved by the Leader of the Opposition in paragraph 4—and indeed it does. They make the case that later, in the course of the debate, the Leader of the Opposition said exactly what Senator Roblin has just read to us—namely, he took objection to this word being in the singular rather than the plural.

Senator Roblin puts great weight on the fact that no response or objection was made from this side of the house when that was said. If we are to place much weight on response or objection being made to a statement, then we might look at what responses and objections were made by the Leader of the Opposition—or, for that matter, members on the other side—to Senator Frith's description a day earlier of what this order was designed to do.

It was not an order designed simply to limit debate to a given time, namely, noon of Friday, tomorrow. That would have been an easy order to draw. It was an order much more complex than that. In his statement on April 14 explaining the order to this house—I am reading from page 2281 of Hansard—he had already referred to some of his remarks on that day. But I want to refer to further remarks that he made, which I do not think he has yet touched on. They go over to page 2282.

While I do not think the order is ambiguous—and, if it were, Senator Flynn would not have been constrained to raise objection to the use of the word "amendment" in the singular—if the document—I do not want to get into too deep an argument with my legal confreres in this chamber—

Senator Flynn: You had better not.

Senator van Roggen: If the document is ambiguous, as he claims it is, perhaps we need to go to the surrounding evidence that exists. His surrounding evidence is one remark that "amendment" should have been plural, and that the government side did not respond to that. Let us consider what they did not respond to when this whole process was being explained by Senator Frith on the day before. They made no response to all of Senator Frith's repeated assertions that this was a most unusual circumstance—

Senator Perrault: Right.

Senator van Roggen: It is a very exceptional order, an order to meet very exceptional circumstances.

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator van Roggen: It is all there.

Senator Flynn: There was no text before us at that time. Try to be decent.

Senator van Roggen: I am being perfectly decent, thank you. I am saying—

Senator Flynn: Slave of the majority!

Senator van Roggen: I do not need any instructions from the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: I should not have to listen to stupidity of that kind.

Senator van Roggen: I am perfectly capable of being decent, just as much as the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: Go ahead.

Senator van Roggen: Senator Frith has read some of these remarks. He has explained that this had to be an exceptional order when it was drawn up and agreed to, that it was an order to meet very exceptional circumstances. Then, honourable senators, towards the bottom of the second column on page 2281 it says:

> —I shall not read every word of the motion. Essentially, the first paragraph sets aside those two days next week for dealing with the motion. The second paragraph provides that in this chamber, as in the other place, no amendments or sub-amendments may be proposed to the said motion except those moved by the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

A most exceptional provision. There is no question about that, I would say to Senator Asselin:

> The third provision is that the question on the amendment to the motion moved by Senator Yuzyk on March 26, 1981, not be put—except as herein provided—and we provide for that; that the order to resume the debate be called at 10 o'clock in the forenoon on Friday and, at that time, the Leader of the Government in the Senate be given an opportunity to propose to the Senate a motion in the wording adopted by the other place on the previous day.

Again, a reference to the other place and their procedure:

> We will then proceed to have the Leader of the Opposition propose any amendments in an omnibus form. Those amendments may be debated at the same time but without further amendment.

Where is the objection from the Leader of the Opposition at that time? Where is the objection from the other members of the opposition at that time? If we are to pay so much attention—

Senator Flynn: From which page are you reading?

Senator van Roggen: I am reading from page 2282.

Senator Flynn: Poor guy.

Senator van Roggen: It is the whole of the explanation of this order; the whole discussion in this chamber—

Senator Flynn: Pitiful.

Senator van Roggen: —was on a special order, imposing special restrictions on us, much more than just the limitation of debate, so that we would have the vote on a given day, and so that we would come as close as possible to the procedure in the other place. I was here that day and I was certainly left with the impression that that was the objective we were seeking.

Senator Asselin: You are happy with that?

Senator van Roggen: Whether I am happy or not, the leader of my party, the leader of your party, and the leader of the New Democratic Party in the other place, arrived at an exceptional deal between them.

Senator Asselin: But we are not in the other place.

Senator van Roggen: It does not bind us, but it was a deal made by the three party leaders—not by the house leaders. We should keep that in mind.

Senator Flynn: The Honourable Senator van Roggen has quoted selected parts of the debate on that date. He should have read what I said following that. I said:

> I confirm that the intention of the government is to have an agreement here that will reflect the agreement made in the House of Commons, but I also wish to confirm that we have not necessarily agreed to what is being proposed in this motion and that we reserve our right to contest the proposal, at least in principle, if not in practice.

Later, on page 2282, I said:

> This having been said, with the proposal duly corrected and placed on the order paper tomorrow, honourable senators will be able to assess exactly what is proposed, the position of the government, and, with the reservations that we have made, the position of the opposition.

There was no agreement. You say that we did not have any reservations, but we did have reservations. I did not want to start the debate and antagonize the deputy leader. We were at that time consulting on the proposed text, and we made several observations.

● (1530)

I may say that there were several changes made to the text in the course of our discussions. There were three or four proposals. The last one was not exactly the same as the first, but the intention, as far as we are concerned, was very clear: that we were not bound by what was done in the other place. Secondly, the idea of an omnibus amendment was never mentioned, and was never accepted. If you, Senator van Roggen, want to follow the line of the government, with the object of imposing closure on us, I think it is shameful.

Senator van Roggen: You say the word "omnibus" was never mentioned. It was mentioned right here in this house.

Senator Flynn: In the other place, but not here.

Senator van Roggen: Right here in this house.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but about what was done in the other place. Where do you find it in the text? I said that we had reservations.

Senator van Roggen: I would be very interested in hearing from Senator Frith if the changes which you negotiated with him subsequent to April 15—

Senator Flynn: Why do you want to impose closure on us? Why? What are your motives? Why do you want that?

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

Senator Grosart asked to speak before.

Senator Flynn: Why? Why do you want to prevent us from—

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, it seems to me most important that we resolve this matter. Some suggestions have been made. I do not think that they are suggestions that would cause anybody to lose face on either side. This has been going on for a very long time, and I feel confident that we can reach a conclusion.

Senator van Roggen took one side, but did not mention, of course, one aspect of it, which is that we are dealing with motions from both sides, so that to worry about whether something was in the plural or singular does not matter very much, because the principle that we have been debating applies equally to the government amendments.

Just to clarify, could I ask the Leader of the Government or the Deputy Leader of the Government, what objection there would be—assuming that we would have what are called omnibus amendments on both sides—to taking a vote seriatim on the component motions? My understanding is that that is all we, on this side, asked for. Then the purpose of matching what has happened in the other place could still be achieved, very easily.

What objection would there be to accommodating the Leader of the Opposition when there is an admitted misunderstanding as to what was decided? I ask again, what objection can there be to accepting this suggestion, that as the omnibus amendments come before us, a vote is called on each one, without debate or any restrictions? I would be fully in favour of that, and I believe the Leader of the Opposition would also be. We would just vote on them, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, with no bells or divisions. We would vote on each and resolve the whole problem. Why not?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, that suggestion is totally contrary to the order which was passed by a majority, on division, the other day in this chamber. Then both the government and the opposition spoke in terms of an omnibus package of measures.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Not in the order, you didn't.

Senator Perrault: Let me continue. The reason for some of the puzzlement, perhaps, in parts of this chamber, is this. When I spoke on April 15 on this matter, I said:

> After six months of debate and discussion in committee, in this chamber, and in the other place, it is obvious that a parliamentary consensus has been developed to make provision for the orderly disposition of the resolution on the Constitution and, perhaps, the Constitution issue itself.

[Senator Flynn.]

But now listen to the words of the Leader of the Opposition. Listen to what he said, as reported at page 2306 of Hansard:

> We are dealing here with quite an exceptional and unusual situation, one which will not recur very often, at least I hope not.

Then he went on to say:

> The recent settlement reached in the Commons had changed our perspective. Now it has been suggested to us in the other place, as we usually call it, that agreement should apply to us as well. . . . But I must admit that the Leader of Opposition in the House told me that we should implicitly comply with the conditions agreed to in the other place to dispose of this resolution.

Then he said:

> Of course, I must say right away that we on this side of the House had not given any mandate to that effect. Legally we do not consider that we are so bound, but perhaps to a certain extent we consider that we are morally bound.

Senator Flynn: Not to the omnibus proposals. Come on!

Senator Perrault: Please, with your usual patience, hear me out.

Senator Flynn: No. I will not listen.

Senator Perrault: Here we had a Leader of the Opposition, who accepted the fact, after being contacted by representatives of his party, that this was an unusual situation, and urged upon the Conservative members of this Senate the practice being followed in the Commons today, and that is for each party to advance its proposed amendments in omnibus fashion with the house leadership, government and opposition, moving the amendments. He conceded in this statement, which I have quoted, that in view of a unanimous all-party agreement achieved in the other place his perspective had changed. Where is that changed perspective today?

Senator Flynn: Quote the paragraph before that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I invite any honourable senator to read Senator Flynn's entire speech.

Senator Flynn: Quote the paragraph before that.

Senator Perrault: There is no doubt about the spirit and intent of the agreement which we achieved, and today, obviously, certain members of the opposition are trying to unlock that accord, whatever their motives may be.

Senator Flynn: I want to quote from page 2306 a passage that the Leader of the Government did not quote:

> We agreed that two things had to be agreed to. First, that the Senate would not come to a decision before the House of Commons; second, the duration of the Senate debate after the Commons decision. On that point, we had come to some agreement which was not finalized but which was accepted by both sides.

That was the essence of our understanding, and again I say that the word "omnibus" was never used.

Senator van Roggen: It was used in the other place.

Senator Flynn: It was not used in the other place either.

Senator van Roggen: Not in the order, but in debate.

Senator Flynn: Since when do you change the rules without mentioning it? I ask you again: Why do you object to the decision of the Senate being made in an orderly fashion and quickly on each and every amendment that we want to propose? Why, if it is not for partisan motives, and simply to avoid embarrassment to the government? Shame!

Senator van Roggen: We should stay with the agreement that was made. That is my point.

Senator Flynn: Very well, I stick to my agreements, and the agreement is as I have described it.

Hon. Paul Lucier: I hope the amendments are as important as this argument. We have been at this for two hours, and have not accomplished a thing yet. I would like to ask a question that I hope Senator Flynn or Senator Grosart can answer for me. Every time you vote you must assume that you have a chance of winning it, or you would not be putting amendments forward. What if one of them is different from what has been passed in the House, and they have adjourned? Where do we go from there?

Senator Flynn: Do you suggest that the Senate should never say anything different from what the House of Commons is saying? If so, then maybe you don't belong here.

Senator Lucier: Whether I belong here or not is not really your choice. What I am suggesting is that you answer a simple question. If an amendment goes through here that is different from the ones passed by the House, what happens then? It is a simple question. I do not know how that has anything to do with how I got here or whether I should be here or not.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Grosart.

Senator Grosart: The question was addressed to me, and I think there is a simple answer. The answer is what would happen if the vote here on the omnibus bill was different to what it was in the other place. The question, I think, is irrelevant. We can all understand that the government has a majority here. The government, no matter what the vote might be, can bring in a motion to pass an amendment exactly the same as that in the House of Commons at the final stage.

● (1540)

I repeat my question to the Leader of the Government, which he has not answered. What harm would be done if we just split this as we would an omnibus bill? We have had many omnibus bills here, and, when we go into committee of the whole we can move an amendment to one clause in a bill. Surely that is more cohesive than a group of motions put together for an exceptional purpose. I agree with everything that has been said to the effect that this is an exceptional situation, but I would like to suggest that, at this point, what was said earlier does not really matter now. The important thing, it seems to me, is the recognition that there has been a misunderstanding. I do not believe that there was a deliberate attempt on either side to mislead, deceive or misunderstand. However, we are talking about an agreement amongst senators, gentlemen and ladies, and there has been a misunderstanding. A simple solution is offered. I will repeat my suggestion to the Leader of the Government, that he adjourn the Senate at this moment and see if the four very reasonable people here can reach a decision. I believe that a decision could be reached in the corridors or elsewhere in half an hour. After all, it is teatime.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, this has been going on for some time. As a backbencher, I suppose I speak for all of us in expressing the hope that we can resolve what obviously is some confusion or misunderstanding on an order of this house. Earlier in the proceedings we asked for a ruling from the Chair. I believe His Honour was on his feet, ready to give that ruling. Perhaps that would be the solution at this time. His Honour was asked to rule on whether in fact this was a legitimate order of the house, and, if so, to rule on it. I am wondering whether that could be the next step, so that we can get on with the more important part of this debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: If you will allow me, honourable senators, if ever you require me to make a decision, unless you convince me that I am wrong, the only thing I can decide on is the order as I read it here. Unfortunately, I cannot refer to things which are not reflected in this order—such as, what happened between the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government, what happened in the other place, the possible outcome of a debate to the effect that, "Well, this is what we had in mind," or even—and I regret this, Senator Roblin—the grammatical error, which is a little more serious than it first appears. If I come to a decision, I will explain exactly what I understand to be in this order.

Do we agree, honourable senators, that I have to decide on the meaning of the order as it appears here, and not on the basis of discussions that took place between the representatives of the political parties and what happened in the other place? If you ask me to do that, I will tell you to find somebody else. I cannot make a judgment on that basis, because I am not aware of the facts. The only thing I know for certain is what is written here. I can read it and I can tell you what I understand from it. Therefore, I want to indicate to you that any debate outside this order, though it might be a very interesting debate, is one that I unfortunately cannot take into account in my decision.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Mr. Speaker, before you rule I think that our representatives both on the government and on opposition side ought to make an effort. Whatever decision the Chair may take, I have the impression of course that one side of the house will not be satisfied and that the debate will grow more acrimonious. I feel that the whole thing will end up in the air.

I call upon the generosity of our leaders on both sides of the house. As it has been suggested by other honourable senators, let them meet for a few moments while we continue the debate here, then they can come back with a solution. If they cannot agree then we will ask the Chair to make a ruling.

But before we ask Mr. Speaker to rule, I think an effort should be made in that direction. Since Senator Langlois pointed out that I was not here last week I admit it is true, but I think I am seldom absent from the Senate. I can put my attendance record up against anyone else's here. One thing for sure is that if the Leader of the Government and his deputy were to meet with the Leader of the Opposition and his deputy chances to reach an agreement would be better.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the issue does not really require a ruling until a motion in amendment is proposed. The question then is whether it is in order. I make this suggestion. The meaning of the order will have to be interpreted when Senator Flynn proposes a motion that is thought to be out of order because it is contrary to the provisions of the order, and that will not happen until tomorrow. In the meantime, we will have an opportunity to see if we can work something out. I think we have debated this matter thoroughly; each senator has said virtually everything that he wanted to say about it.

Senator Roblin: And more!

Senator Frith: Perhaps a little more, and I suggest that we leave it at that. We will have two opportunities to talk in the meantime. Let us get on with it and cross that bridge when we come to it. We can hope, in the meantime, that we may be able to find a way around the difficulty.

Senator Flynn: I think that is an excellent suggestion, and it will give His Honour time to prepare a ruling, if one must be made.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do we all agree on this?

Do you rise on a point of order, Senator van Roggen?

Senator van Roggen: I am not continuing the debate with our honourable friends opposite. I only wish clarification on the remarks His Honour has made. I wholly support the view His Honour has expressed—

Senator Asselin: Do you challenge His Honour's ruling in advance?

Senator van Roggen: Just let me speak; I will only be a moment. I understood His Honour to say that he could only deal with what was written here in our proceedings. I wanted to be clear in my mind that, by that statement, His Honour meant not only the order itself but also the statements made publicly in this chamber, as reported in Hansard, immediately surrounding the order, which I think are relevant. I may have understood from His Honour's words that he thought he could only look at the order itself. I would simply like to put forward the view that, while he cannot consider what went on in private between the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government, or between the deputy leaders, or agreements made in the other place, it is proper for him to consider the order itself and the debate relative to that order which took place in this chamber.

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Grosart: I rise on a point of order. His Honour has already clearly ruled, if I heard him correctly, that he will only deal with the order as it stands. It is improper for any senator to discuss the decision made by His Honour.

The Hon. the Speaker: In order to clarify my thinking, I will say that if there is an agreement made among all members of the house as to the interpretation of the order, then, of course, I have to take that into account. If, however, you ask me simply to refer to the debate dealing with matters on which there was no agreement, even if there were some statements made in the house, those statements do not necessarily modify any decision of mine. An agreement could modify it. If you can show me that, for example, paragraph 3 was interpreted by everybody in the house as meaning a certain thing, I will take that into account. However, I cannot go further.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF DEW LINE SITES—LOCATIONS

Question No. 48 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

List the location of the 21 DEW Line Sites in Canada which the U.S. Government proposes to close, as was recently announced in their government policy paper.

Reply by the Minister of National Defence:

The government policy paper referred to in the question was a military posture statement submitted to the U.S. Congress during the former Carter Administration, and it recommended that the DEW Line be reduced from 31 sites (21 of which are located in Canada) to 13 sites. However, no specific radar locations were identified for closure.

The question of DEW Line site closures was also aired during daily question period in the House of Commons on 2 March, 1981 and is contained in Hansard of that date pages 7769-70.

NATIONAL FINANCE

REFERRAL OF APPROPRIATION BILLS TO COMMITTEE—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I apologize for taking up the time of the Senate on a point of order, but since we are recessing I would like to deal with it briefly.

The contents of Bill C-59, the Borrowing Authority Bill, were referred by the Senate to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on March 12. The committee had a hearing on March 19 and reported back to the Senate. The bill then came to the Senate on April 7 and was discussed in the chamber on that day and on April 8. The discussion involved Senators Grosart, Roblin and Frith. The question arose as to whether or not the bill should then be referred to the committee when, in fact, the content had been referred.

I would like to quote a statement made by Senator Grosart, reported in Hansard of April 8 at page 2262, which reads as follows:

> The reason I suggest that it be referred to that committee is because it has become the usual practice—one might say custom, convention or tradition—of the Senate that any bill dealing with finance be reported to the Senate by the committee before the Senate deals with it.

While the bill was before the committee, Senator Grosart said that "the Senate should not consider a bill until it has been reported by the National Finance Committee."

I am sure that Senator Grosart did not mean to have that interpretation apply to the estimates. It has long been the custom of the Senate to refer the estimates to the National Finance committee, where they are considered, and the committee then reports back. Once the appropriations bill which arises out of the estimates comes to the Senate, it is not referred to the committee but is passed without reference, unless the appropriation bill is at variance with the estimates. So I trust that Senator Grosart and Senator Roblin were not suggesting any change in that well-established precedent.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

> That the name of the Honourable Senator Cameron be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Frith on the list of senators serving on the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA POST CORPORATION BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a report from the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

The report was read by the Clerk Assistant, as follows:

> The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to which was referred Bill C-42, intituled: "An Act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related Acts and to make related amendments to other Acts", has, in obedience to the order of reference of Wednesday, April 15, 1981, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.
>
> Your Committee also wishes to report that the Minister appeared before the Committee and responded extensively to a substantial number of questions.
>
> During the course of the Committee's hearing, in response to certain points raised, the Minister undertook to review certain aspects of the bill, including clauses 5, 54 and others, with a view to including possible amendments in any early amending legislation, such as an omnibus amending bill. The specific matters the Minister undertook to review are contained in the Committee's proceedings of this day.
>
> Respectfully submitted,

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Allister Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise because this was a rather unusual meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. The precedent which was established there is worth calling to the attention of the Senate.

The committee met under the able chairmanship of Senator Smith. In attendance were senior officials, including the deputy minister and the minister. Members of the committee raised objections to some of the provisions in the bill. We suggested to the minister that he might undertake to follow the practice which ministers have accepted in other committees, namely, to give the assurance to the committee that certain objections would be taken into consideration either when the omnibus bill dealing with amendments is brought in or when amendments are brought in in the near future.

Senator Smith referred in his report to two specific clauses which I would now like to mention briefly because they are matters of importance. I am sure that Senator Frith would agree that it was the consensus of the committee that these important matters would be taken into consideration by the government.

Clause 5 outlines the objects of the new crown corporation. Subclause 5(1)(b) allows the corporation:

> to manufacture and provide such products and to provide such services as are, in the opinion of the Corporation, necessary or incidental to the postal service provided by the Corporation;—

Objection was taken to the phrase "in the opinion of the Corporation". It was suggested that the inclusion of the phrase would make it impossible for any person who was aggrieved to complain or to seek redress in the courts on the grounds that the corporation had gone beyond its authority as outlined in the provisions of the act. If this phrase were to stand, a valid defence would appear to be that whatever decision was taken by the corporation was based on the mere opinion of the corporation and that no further justification was necessary. It was suggested that the courts would not normally go beyond that defence. It was suggested, therefore, that the phrase be taken out and that the paragraph should read, "to manufacture and provide such production services as are necessary and incidental".

Clause 54 is perhaps more serious. We discovered in committee that this clause gives very extensive powers of regulation to the executive on the initiative of the corporation. We found, for example, that new statutory offences could be created on the initiative of the corporation by regulation through Order in Council. If the alleged offender were charged with committing an indictable offence and found guilty, he could receive a penalty of up to five years' imprisonment. There is also a summary conviction clause. The objection raised was that these offences could be created merely by regulation, as opposed to statute of Parliament. We objected to this because of the possibility of a Crown Corporation creating a new offence, one which would not be an offence at the time the act was passed.

● (1600)

I pay tribute to the minister, who listened sympathetically and understood this procedure that we have adopted in other committees. He said he was perfectly willing—and I am paraphrasing him, of course—to apply the principle that consideration be given to these two suggestions from members of the committee, and to others.

Since this is an unusual bill, and an unusual step to be taken which would change the whole system of postal service as it has existed since 1867, I would suggest that honourable senators, who may be interested, may wish to read the proceedings of the committee.

Once again, I emphasize that a committee such as the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications can have a real influence on legislation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I support what Senator Grosart has said.

Speaking of paying tribute, I would like to pay very sincere tribute to Senator Grosart for what he did to make it possible for the committee to complete its study during one lengthy meeting today. It was because of his very careful homework that we were able to feel, at the end of the meeting, that we had given the bill proper study, and which, otherwise, would have taken a good deal longer. That, plus the work of the chairman and the co-operative attitude of the minister, produced the result that we have today.

Honourable senators, if I can have three minutes, I would like to put on record what Senator Denis would have said on third reading, had he been here today.

[Translation]

For over a century, the Canada Post Office has served the smallest towns and the largest cities, the isolated rural routes and the small communities so much so that our postal service has become a tradition; a tradition which links families, friends and organizations. Our postal service, or tradition, if you want, is the thread which has formed this vast and diversified country into a national fabric.

Our postal service is a communications system which interlinks all Canadian homes and connects Canada with all the countries in the world. The farthest point in the world is no farther than the nearest post office.

Senator Flynn: How sentimental!

Senator Frith: It is the greatest personal communications system ever designed.

The key word here is "personal". Generally, people do not like governments. They are too broad, too impersonal, too intimidating. However, everyone knows his Post Office. Even in the smallest town, no one may be mistaken. The post office is there, flying a Canadian flag and it is the meeting place of the whole community.

The Post Office draws people closer to each other. It is the strength which unites the community and gives everyone a sense of belonging.

However, our postal service is going through a period of evolution—and it is not too soon. Thus, the time has come for our postal service to start afresh, to change, to innovate. It must cope with the realities of the closing decades of this century.

The world in which we live is changing dramatically, especially in the field of communications technology. The Post Office Department must face the situation and adjust its methods to the requirements of our time.

Honourable senators, the time has come for our postal service to become independent, to show leadership and to manage its affairs more efficiently than a government department could do in the business community. Once it has become a crown corporation, our postal service will be able to better control its expenses, to better cope with the needs of its customers and the requirements of the market place and to be in a better position to develop new revenue sources.

Despite its importance, this quest for greater efficency is not all there is to it. We cannot ignore the fundamental principle of service to the nation as well as the need for creating a federal presence in the community. As always, the public interest must remain the foremost concern of the post office. These principles have been entrenched in the mandate of the new corporation.

Honourable senators, throughout the debate on Bill C-42 in the Commons, as well as in the Senate and during the committee hearings, we have discussed in depth what the establishment of this crown corporation will mean for postal users and corporation employees. To summarize my views on the new Canada Post Corporation, I would say that the corporation's main aim and concern will be to satisfy the needs of the public. From that it would logically appear that Canada will have a postal service that will ensure the reliable, timely, orderly and cost-efficent delivery of mail by people who enjoy their work and who are proud to serve the public.

Bill C-42 provides the structure that will make this possible. By granting passage on third reading of this bill, we will be providing the Canada Post Corporation with the means to fulfill its role.

With leave of the Senate, and on behalf of Senator Denis, a former Postmaster General, I would like to move third reading of this bill.

Senator Flynn: Was that Senator Denis's text?

Senator Frith: As I understand it, this text was prepared by Senator Denis, in cooperation with his advisers in the Post Office.

Senator Flynn: Touching!

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada; and

On the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay, that the motion be amended in Schedule B of the resolution by inserting immediately after Clause 28 the following:

"28.1 Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms set out herein are guaranteed equally to men and women."—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Lang.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, this is not the most auspicious time to be addressing this chamber. Perhaps, the atmosphere is not the most favourable for the reception of what I have to say. However, I think it must be said now since our time is running out.

I may say before I start, honourable senators, that I would like to warn the whips that they had better be careful as I get further into my speech; they may have some difficulty holding the quorum that now exists.

We are nearing the end of a long and very important debate. I suppose it is probably one of the most important debates that we will experience in our careers on the Hill. We have heard excellent speeches in this chamber; we have heard the matters debated in the media; and we have had the benefit of references to the Manitoba, the Newfoundland, and the Quebec courts. Unfortunately, I have not had the benefit of reading the judgment of the Quebec court. I found it almost impossible to acquire an English translation of the judgment. In order to get one, it was going to cost me something like $10,000, if the translation were to be done expeditiously.

● (1610)

Honourable senators, I do not wish to weary you today with a repetition of what has gone before me in this debate nor with too long a dissertation, but if I do seem somewhat overly long at times I hope you will realize that I have attempted to frame my remarks to shorten them rather than lengthen them. The subject is massive in its scope, and to winnow out the essential parts is a difficult job.

I am going to speak this afternoon under two heads, first of all, that of substance, and, secondly, that of the procedure involved in the passage of this resolution.

With respect to the matter of substance, I am going to confine myself to some thoughts on the Charter of Rights. On the matter of procedure, I shall discuss differing views on the nature of our Confederation, and I hope I can contribute something to the legal disputation that underlies those same differing views. I suppose that technically this afternoon we are debating an amendment to the resolution in connection with human rights. Therefore, I shall speak first of all to the question of a charter.

Charters of Rights and Bills of Rights have today become articles of conventional political wisdom. This is understandable considering the trauma following the atrocities committed during World War II. Thereafter, the United Nations pressed for such guarantees on a global scale. Here, as in other countries, special interest groups took up their causes, special interest groups such as those which appeared before the joint committee. Politicians applaud and support the objectives of most of these groups, but their real success has been in their ability to raise public consciousness and sympathy.

Notwithstanding that, I have the most serious reservations as to whether charters of rights or bills of rights do, in fact, secure to special interest groups, or indeed to individual members of the public, any rights that they do not now have by Canadian heritage or have not already earned themselves through building public awareness and acceptance.

True freedom lies in the heart of man and not in statutory legal inscription. Russia, and many other despotic states in Asia, Africa and elsewhere, have Charters of Rights; England, Australia and New Zealand do not.

I am also concerned that the codification of rights, particularly in an entrenched charter, can stultify the evolution of those rights over the long term. Most of the beneficial recent changes in social attitudes have been brought about by activists for just causes. Among their most effective weapons has been their ability to lobby politicians successfully.

Does a statutory charter, particularly an entrenched statutory charter, henceforth relieve politicians of this pressure and allow them to respond by in fact saying: "You had better take it to the courts." Special interest groups may find themselves deprived of their best sounding boards, governments and politicians. They will find that judges do not take kindly to lobbying.

To espouse a Charter of Rights has great populist rhetorical appeal, and politicians, of course, love their rhetoric, but it also inclines them to adopt the posture of a benefactor whose largesse is bestowed from above and falls gently on to the people. I do not need to remind Canadians that their real freedom has deep historical roots in the Magna Carta, habeas corpus and our long common law and civil law traditions, as well as many, many others. But, fundamentally, freedom lies in the basic belief that every individual has all rights unless such are circumscribed or removed by duly constituted legislative or judicial authority. Governments derive their rights from the people; not the other way around. When governments proclaim that they are "giving rights to the people" I, for one, become very suspicious.

Today we have a federal Bill of Rights, and provinces have Bills of Rights. These are ordinary statutory enactments subject to judicial interpretation, but also subject to relatively easy amendment in the event of hardships resulting from judicial interpretation. Many cases before the courts in this area are hard cases, and hard cases make bad law, but that bad law can be quite readily changed by statutory amendment. However, it is a different matter when a Charter of Rights is entrenched in a Constitution. Constitutional change to rectify hardships will be almost impossible, for practical purposes, and ameliorations will have to await possible further adjudication, either through appeal or subsequent litigation in the same subject area.

Of necessity, a Charter of Rights must be cast in words of vague generalities, incapable of exact meaning until judicial interpretation is given to a specific section and with respect only to the specific set of facts then before the court. The accumulation of jurisprudence under this Charter of Rights will take years and years.

The proposed charter will remove fields of jurisdiction from both the federal and provincial governments and place that jurisdiction with the courts.

To give you an idea of the types of litigation we can contemplate, it is interesting to note the kinds of cases currently running through the United States legal system under the U.S. constitutional Bill of Rights. I shall name a few just to give you examples: Pro- and anti-abortion cases; affirmative action cases, the most well known being the Baacke case; sex discrimination cases, particularly in the armed forces and sports; the rights of a suspect in search cases; discrimination in hiring practices, particularly in government hiring practices; cruel and unusual punishment and the death penalty; obscenity, pornography and freedom of speech; rights and responsibilities towards the mentally ill; pro- and anti-birth control cases; group rights to public support of its schools and allocation of taxes for that; union and management rights and hiring practices; environmental lawsuits; jurisdiction in interstate commerce; cases alleging police brutality; welfare investigatory practices; zoning by-laws and discrimination exemplified in single family dwelling requirements; confidentiality of press sources; and use of religions in the schools.

This is going to be a mammoth load for our judicial system to assume. I remind honourable senators that the heavy legal costs in the United States involved in the cases I listed above, apart from those borne by the United States government—that is, the costs to a litigant himself generally against the state—are underwritten by the special interest groups who thereby promote and sponsor their cause.

It is well to bear in mind that judicial interpretation under the proposed charter will, as often as not, involve the interpretation and even negation of federal or provincial legislation.

• (1620)

In this regard it is interesting to note that judicial decisions in the United States under their Bill of Rights and, particularly, in the sphere of interstate commerce, have produced a very pronounced swing in their constitutional balance towards Washington. Perhaps for interstate commerce here in Canada you could read "mobility rights".

One other matter that should be borne in mind is how this expanded role for the courts will affect each individual judge. The courts will, for many years, be in uncharted waters and, until a whole new body of judicial precedent accumulates, judicial decisions being in the amorphous area of rights will be highly subjective, and the social background, preconception and moral suasion of each judge will come into play. Judges will not be determining the law, but making it. Their decisions will not only be judicial, but will also have legislative effect and, indeed, political overtones, and with, as often as not, a federal bias, or provincial or regional bias.

Our courts can quite easily become politicized. We are standing into danger on that score in the current references and appeals arising over this resolution. As in the United States, we may see emerge activist judges and courts, liberal judges and courts and conservative or traditionalist judges and courts. This trend can eventually polarize even the members of a single court, as it has done from time to time in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Bearing in mind that the appointive power over Supreme Court judgeships is entirely federal, it would seem probable that eventually somebody, such as the Senate in the United States, will be required to vet judicial nominees to assure that they meet the political and ideological criteria of the government of the day. I suggest the distinction and reputation of our judges will suffer accordingly.

Recently the Chief Justice of Canada spoke out against choosing judges of the Supreme Court on a geographical basis rather than on the basis of excellence. To that concern will be added a concern that the selection of individual judges will become affected as much by the presumed constitutional and political effects of their supposed interpretations of the charter as by the excellence of their legal and personal qualifications.

I will conclude this by saying that, to my mind, the motivation of the government in pressing for the entrenchment of this charter in a Constitution, a charter that encompasses not only areas of federal jurisdiction but also provincial jurisdiction, does not primarily arise from concern for people's rights. We already have a federal Bill of Rights, albeit confined to areas of federal jurisdiction. To my mind, the primary motivation must be to entrench a centralist bias in our judicial system using the interpretative process now to be expanded into the new fields of federal and provincial constitutional responsibility encompassed in this charter. Such a bias will not be impeded by the exclusive federal prerogative over judicial appointments.

Honourable senators, may I now turn to questions of procedure and the underlying conceptual differences regarding the constitutional nature and structure of this country?

The Prime Minister remarked last fall—I believe it was immediately following the failure of the First Ministers' Conference—that there appeared to be two different views of Canada. He repeated this assertion within the last few days, and I must say that I believe him to be correct in his statement. I must infer, however, that those two views are from, on the one hand, the statements of the eight dissenting premiers, and, on the other hand, the statements of federal ministers and, indeed, from this resolution itself. To both of these, of course, must be added the speeches in both houses of Parliament.

I would classify one view, namely, that of the eight premiers, as the traditional compact theory of Confederation. I would classify the other view, namely, that of the government, as legalistic centralism. In my opinion, both are wrong, and I will attempt to give my reasons.

I do not intend to deal at length with the compact theory. It is well known to all honourable senators. It is a theory that is premised on the idea that Canada is merely ten provinces that have entered, at one time or another, into a treaty, one with the other, to seek their mutual advantage. That idea flies in the face of historical fact. More than that, it disregards the vision of a new country which animated the Fathers of Confederation, and which is so eloquently reflected in their speeches and the debates of their time.

The compact theory would impose, through its concept of universal unanimity, a rigidity and inflexibility that could paralyze us constitutionally and eventually lead to segmentation. I am somewhat relieved to see that the eight premiers in recent weeks are moving away from such a position.

The government's view of the Constitution of Canada, as exemplified particularly by the procedures it has now embarked upon, is almost as potentially dangerous to this country, I suggest, as the compact theory, particularly if these procedures are carried to their logical conclusion.

Baldly stated, the government's position is that to amend the Constitution as it affects the provinces, the Parliament of Canada need only pass a resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty, and having transmitted it to Westminster, the Parliament of the United Kingdom must pass it into the law of England unchanged. It is maintained that amendment has always been thus obtained in the past.

This, of course, overlooks the constitutional evolution of this country from its inception in 1867 to date. It overlooks 100 years of judicial constitutional interpretation; it disregards deliberations and reports of Imperial Conferences; it misreads the effect of the Statute of Westminster; and it disregards the pronouncements of our most eminent statesmen, including Laurier, Borden, King, St-Laurent, and many, many more who have been quoted in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: And Trudeau.

Senator Lang: It denies the existence of constitutional customs, conventions and usages that have been built up over that period. Above all, it disregards the constitutional rights of the provinces in our federal system. It says, in effect, that the provinces will be much better off under the new Constitution when no future federal government can do this to them again.

Senator Roblin: Touché!

Senator Flynn: The Lamontagne theory.

Senator Lang: I will not quote from the abundance of eminent authorities that stand against the government's perception of our Constitution. Many of them have already been quoted in this debate and are found in our law books and our historical books. Our constitutional papers are full of quotations antithetical to the government's view of Canada.

I would like to pass on to another point. There is a legalism here that affronts my common law background. It is a legalism that would read the B.N.A. Act literally and maintain that today, under section 56, the Queen could disallow federal bills after assent by the Governor General. Of course, that is just what section 56 does in fact say. But that is not constitutional law today; nor is any alleged literal jurisdiction of the U.K. Parliament over Canadian constitutional matters the constitutional law of today—and I hope to bring that out further.

• (1630)

If the resolution before us were instead a bill, many parts would be ultra vires of federal constitutional jurisdiction. The application of the charter to provincial laws would be ultra vires; the repeal of section 92(1) of the B.N.A. Act, respecting provincial constitutional amending powers, would clearly be ultra vires, notwithstanding its reappearance in modified form as section 53 of the Constitution Act. The inclusion of the Senate under section 54 of the Constitution Act is most likely ultra vires under the 1979 Supreme Court of Canada reference with regard to this chamber. The amending formula, as it affects provincial powers, would be ultra vires. Most of these are admitted by the government to be unconstitutional.

However, we are not dealing with a bill, but a resolution, and it is maintained that Parliament can pass any form of resolution it so wishes, as a resolution has no de jure effect. On the other hand, in a recent government paper entitled The role of the United Kingdom in the amendment of the Canadian Constitution, it is stated that it is "the convention that United Kingdom authorities do not exercise political discretion with respect to requests from the Government and Parliament of Canada for amendment of the Constitution of Canada."

Indeed Prime Minister Mackenzie King said in 1943 that such amendments are made automatically and without question on request.

If that is correct, then passage into law by the U.K. Parliament is a mere formality, much like Royal Assent. Is not Parliament, in passing an ordinary bill, acting de jure even though the bill awaits Royal Assent? If the answer to that question is yes, then it must follow that in passing this resolution, under these circumstances Parliament is acting de jure and the ultra vires provisions of the resolution stand to be struck down by the court. I do not think it is possible to maintain, on the one hand, that the U.K. Parliament's response must be automatic and unchanged, and, on the other hand, to say that the resolution has no de jure effect. That to me is double contradiction which cannot hold.

A few moments ago I mentioned that there appears to be a disregard for the nature and effect of the Statute of Westminster by the government and its advisers; or it may be there are some serious misconceptions. The Statute of Westminster was, in fact, a legal expression of the deliberations and conclusions of the Imperial Conferences of 1926 and 1930. It endeavoured to augment the autonomy of the dominions as proclaimed in 1926 by removing certain legal handicaps which to some degree still hampered their powers. The conferences and the Statute of Westminster proclaimed the culmination of the dominions' evolution from colonial status to full nationhood. That status, thus recognized, in my opinion is irreversible.

Section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster reads:

> Nothing in this act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

One could regard that section as a reconfirmation of Canada's colonial status. If so, it would be a shackle. One could also regard it as a mooring line, and a very necessary one. I do so regard it, and I will tell honourable senators why. I must, however, assume that the government regards section 7(1) as a shackle, as the repeal of that section is provided for in this resolution.

If honourable senators will bear with me, I hope to demonstrate where the government's strict legalism, combined with an inverse perspective of Canada's constitutional development, can lead us.

Under full colonial imperialism both English common law and English statutory law applied to the colonies. As the colonies developed their own legislative and judicial capacity, a common law legal doctrine evolved to the effect that colonial statutes or judicial decisions were void if they were repugnant to English statutes or common law respectively.

This doctrine created difficulties, especially through decisions of the Supreme Court of Australia, which held certain acts of the legislatures invalid because of repugnancy to the law of England. In 1865 England passed the Colonial Laws Validity Act to remedy that state of affairs, by providing that such colonial laws should not be invalid on grounds of repugnancy to the law of England unless they were repugnant to some act of the English Parliament which expressly or by necessary intendment applied to the colony, and then only to the extent of such repugnancy.

That was the state of the law when the B.N.A. Act was enacted in 1867. Consequently any dominion or provincial law enacted thereafter that was repugnant to the B.N.A. Act might be declared invalid to the extent of that repugnancy.

That fact ensured that the B.N.A. Acts were the supreme law of Canada. In 1931, section 2 of the Statute of Westminster was enacted. By section 2(1) of that act, the Colonial Laws Validity Act was suspended at that point in time. It was not repealed. By subsection 2(2) and for the future the doctrine of repugnancy was abolished in its entirety.

This meant that thereafter—that is, after 1931—the Parliaments of the dominions were empowered to pass laws, valid, notwithstanding repugnancy to the law of England, and were empowered to repeal or amend any English act insofar as the same was part of the law of the dominion. These powers were extended to the legislatures of the provinces by section 7(2), and by section 7(3) the newly conferred powers were restricted to the enactment of laws in relation to matters within federal competence and provincial competence respectively.

Had section 2(1) of the Statute of Westminster repealed the Colonial Laws Validity Act rather than suspend it, the situation which existed before that act was passed in 1865 would have been restored. In other words, laws made in Canada before 1931—or for that matter in any other of the dominions—which were repugnant to the statutory or common law of England might become invalid or, at least, open to challenge. To avoid that situation, suspension only of the Colonial Laws Validity Act was contained in section 2(1).

• (1640)

Now, section 2(1) of the Statute of Westminster standing alone would have preserved the supremacy of the B.N.A. Acts 1867-1931 because the legal effect of the Colonial Laws Validity Act was maintained up to that point. However, section 2(2) of that act would have rendered future amendments to the B.N.A. Act vulnerable to negation by the enactment of repugnant provincial or federal legislation. To avoid this, and at the request of Canada, section 7(1) was inserted with the object of preserving intact the legal supremacy of the B.N.A. Acts not only before 1931, which had been done under the Colonial Laws Validity Act, but also thereafter including the B.N.A. Acts as they might be amended to the present time.

In other words, the supremacy of the B.N.A. Acts, in the law of Canada, has been maintained from 1867 to date, by the Statute of Westminster.

Now, if we draw this out a little further—and I hope I am not trespassing on your time, honourable senators, but you will see what sort of a conclusion we can be driven to—when and if the Constitution Act, 1981 is passed into law by the United Kingdom Parliament, as an English statute, you will note that under item 17 of Schedule I, and insofar as it applies to Canada, section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster is repealed. What is the consequence of such a repeal? Please note that I use the word "repeal" because under item 17 that is what takes place. Section 7(1) is not suspended, as was the Colonial Laws Validity Act under section 2(1) of the Statute of Westminster, and remember again that the new Constitution of Canada will be a statute of the United Kingdom Parliament. Lacking the protection afforded by section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster, the new Constitution of Canada will be subjected to section 2(2) of the Statute of Westminster with the result that:

> No law . . . made . . . by the Parliament of a Dominion—

That is, in this case, the Parliament of Canada, or, because of section 7(2), by a province.

> —shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to . . . the provisions of any existing or future Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom—

And I say, including, if passed, that future act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, the new Constitution Act for Canada.

Now, those broad powers contained in section 2(2) of the Statute of Westminster, are restricted in two important ways. The suspension only of the Colonial Laws Validity Act under section 2(1) of the Statute of Westminster means that the B.N.A. Acts, 1867 to 1930, remain supreme as the law of Canada, and the repugnancy doctrine protects them from negation by legislation of the federal government or the provinces. Section 7(3) of the Statute of Westminster restricts those respective powers to matters within the competence of the Parliament of Canada or of any of the legislatures respectively.

Let me now sum up. The B.N.A. Acts of the English Parliament—and remember that the B.N.A. Acts are English statutes—have, to paraphrase the words of section 58(1) of this resolution—the section that tries to achieve the supremacy of the Constitution in Canada—the B.N.A. Acts have been the supreme law of Canada, and any federal or provincial law inconsistent therewith, to the extent of that inconsistency, were of no force and effect.

This supremacy was made possible between 1867 and 1931 by the Colonial Laws Validity Act wherein it retained the modified repugnancy doctrine but limited it to English statutes such as the B.N.A. Acts that by express words or necessary intendment applied to a colony.

When the Colonial Laws Validity Act was suspended by the Statute of Westminster, this supremacy was sustained into the future by the exclusion of the B.N.A. Acts from the effect of the future complete abolition of the repugnancy doctrine contained in section 2(2).

If section 2(2) becomes operative through the repeal of section 7(1), then we have a constitutional anomaly, if not catastrophe.

If, as and when the Constitution of Canada, as contained in the resolution, is passed into English law by the United Kingdom Parliament, and section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster is repealed, any province, or, for that matter, the federal government, can pass laws repugnant to the new Constitution, provided only that such laws are in relation to matters within their respective competency under the B.N.A. Act of 1931. In other words, the B.N.A. Acts, 1867-1930 only, remain supreme, and that because section 2(1) of the Statute of Westminster protects them.

That is an academic consideration, because, in fact, since 1931 there have been only four amendments to the B.N.A. Act which trench on provincial jurisdiction, and in each case the unanimous consent of the provinces went with those amendments.

It is a common law presumption that if a statutory enactment is repealed, the legal situation theretofore existing re-emerges. Thus, when section 7(1) is repealed, as is intended by this resolution, and not merely suspended, as was the Colonial Laws Validity Act, the amendments to the B.N.A. Acts from 1931 to date, including the proposed new Constitution of Canada are subject to being negated by valid repugnant legislation by either level of government acting within its particular area of competence.

The practical effect of all this is that the amendments to the B.N.A. Acts since 1931, which trenched on provincial jurisdiction, have all had unanimous provincial consent. For that reason they are probably secure from challenge in their anticipated exposure arising from the loss of the repugnancy protection which was created by the repeal of section 7(1) of the Statute of Westminster.

However, the proposed new Constitution is to be a United Kingdom statute, and admittedly it trenches on provincial jurisdiction, both in the Charter of Rights and in the amending formula. It has no such unanimous provincial consent, nor will it be shielded as the supreme law of Canada against repugnant legislation that might be passed in Canada by either the federal Parliament or the provincial legislatures acting within their respective spheres of competence.

The conclusion that one is driven to its that wheresoever the proposed new Constitution trenches on provincial jurisdiction, any province can pass valid legislation that has the effect of negating those sections that thus trench.

Section 58 of the resolution cannot secure supremacy for this new Constitution, because it is going to be contained in a United Kingdom statute. Its legal effect can be qualified by a province enacting a qualification applicable to itself, relying on section 2(2) of the Statute of Westminster, and provided it is enacted in conformity with section 7(3). When section 7(1) is repealed, as provided in this resolution, there is nothing to stop the passage of repugnant legislation. In other words, what I am suggesting is, that any province will be able to legislate itself out of any provision of the proposed new Constitution wheresoever it trenches on that province's rights and powers, and that legislation will be valid.

Now, honourable senators, if you want examples of legalism, I have given you one. I am not subscribing to it, but this is where the government's approach can lead it to, and I am just going to leave that thought with the government and their advisers. I will be interested to see how they can avoid the inevitable conclusion that their legalistic logic will drive them to.

As I mentioned earlier, there are indeed two views of Canada's constituent powers, both extremely dangerous, and, in my humble opinion, both wrong. But between these two extremes there is a view of Canada's constituent powers which accords with the facts of our history and the law, and that is fair, just and proper according to the standards of human decency.

I would like to quote, if I may, a man who, in the 1930s, held much the same narrow, legalistic approach to constitutional amendment as the government is now pressing. I might add that he did so against some of the best legal minds and academic authorities of his time, but he was also a political realist. I have an idea that someone in this chamber previously quoted him in support of the position taken by the government, but I am not certain who it was.

The man I wish to quote is W. P. M. Kennedy, who was my professor of constitutional law at the University of Toronto in the late thirties. I might add that, at that time, the present Chief Justice of Canada was a junior lecturer under Professor Kennedy in the same course.

At page 528 of Professor Kennedy's book entitled The Constitution in Canada he states:

> The simple facts are that the whole problem of constituent powers is one full of political dangers; and it would seem evident that real progress towards the creation of a method of constitutional change to be exercised solely in Canada must proceed from at least substantial provincial agreement. Such a proceeding is statesmanlike in that it would avoid raising once more the old battle-cries over provincial rights, and it would tend to create conditions for constructive national purposes. For the moment, however, it is well to point out that the Statute of Westminster implies that the Parliament of the United Kingdom will legislate at the request of the Dominion and thus is preserved the traditional method of constitutional changes on addresses from the federal legislature. There is, of course, in law no necessity for the federal legislature to consult the provinces; and it is idle to think that the Government of the United Kingdom would, today, refuse legislation homologating such an address or delay action until provincial agreement were reached. Such action, however, on the part of a Canadian ministry would be extremely unwise, worse than a mistake—a blunder; but it is well to recognize its legal possibility.

There is a third, and, I suggest, a correct constitutional view of this country. It is set forth in the decision of the Newfoundland Court of Appeal wherein it quoted an address delivered at the Harvard Law School in 1960 by the late Honourable Ivan C. Rand. I am going to ask your indulgence to allow me to quote rather extensively from this address, not only because of the authority of its author, but because of the pertinence of the subject matter. I would like this to appear as part of the record of this chamber:

> The question may be raised of the political and legal force of resolutions passed by Imperial Conferences and confirmed by legislation. It cannot, in my view, be less than this; that they are to be treated as creating constitutional commitments of a permanent nature, which once approved and entered upon become irrevocable as self-executing conventions, placed, by that fact, beyond repudiation. They have not become the subject of juridical examination, but that might happen. Should, for example, the British Parliament, of its own initiative, purport to repeal the Act of 1931, what would be the position of Canadian legislation and of Canadian courts? The answer must be that the purported repeal would not be recognized. Once such fundamental agreements have been reached, certainly when embodied in legislation, they become as executed treaties between peoples to be modified only by the agreement of the parties to them; and they bind equally discretionary action by the Sovereign. They are definitive surrenders of political and constitutional powers analogous to the exhaustion of executive power over a subordinate territory: By the grant of self-government, apart from express or necessarily implied reservation, the executive authority is so far spent. The acceptance of the convention concludes resort to conflicting statutory power; if that were not so, the bonds of colonial relation embodied in statutes could never constitutionally be dissolved, there could be no termination of statutory enactment, a link of that nature would be perpetual; even express renunciation could be revoked. Actual or constructive revolution would then be the only means of establishing a status of independence. But treaties can effect finalities in the transfer of titles or the recognition of sovereignty; and there is nothing in the nature of such a convention that prevents a similar result in the creation of a constitutional title to independence by which a status is created, the modification of which is withdrawn from future parliamentary competence. The relation between kingdom and colony is founded on the idea of ultimate evolution to independence; and the statutory removal of legislative subordination becomes a formal renunciation of suzerainty; the disappearance of paramountcy becomes the recognition and investment of sovereign power. Similarly the legislative competence confered in 1949 on Canada to amend the Act of 1867 is an irrevocable power; and with provision made for amendment of the remaining provisions of that Act,—

Those, I suggest, would be the exceptions contained in section 91(1).

> —the powers so conferred will enable Canada to determine her Constitution as she sees fit in a manner binding in its prescribed mode of enactment. In that respect it is to be contrasted with the absolute power of amendment given Parliament in 1949.

That is, apart from the exception.

Honourable senators will appreciate that Mr. Rand has said that the Imperial Conferences of 1926 and 1929, the Statute of Westminster, and section 91(1) are in fact self-executing conventions and are beyond repudiation—repudiation, I might add, by Canada or by the U.K. Parliament on Canada's behalf. Mr. Rand goes on, in the same address, to say the following:

> Legislatively, a unique situation has been created. The British Parliament has in effect become a bare legislative trustee for the Dominion; the constitutional organ for altering the provisions of the Canadian Constitution contained in the Act of 1867 remains so far the British Parliament; but the political direction resides in the Parliament of the Dominion; the former has conceded its residue of legislative power vis-à-vis Canada, to be no more than means for effecting the will of Canada. It might happen, although it is most unlikely, that the British Parliament should demur to a request for a legislative amendment, as, for example, involving important legislative effects not concurred in by one or more of the provinces; but that amounts to no more than saying that the Canadian people would not yet have agreed on the mode of modifying their internal constitutional relations. Once that means has been agreed upon, legislative independence, not only in substance but in form, will have been attained.
> In 1949 an important amendment was enacted by the British Parliament at the request of Canada by which the Dominion Parliament was endowed with authority, by its own enactment, to legislate, as it is expressed, in relation to the amendment from time to time of the Constitution of Canada, except—

Here follows the exceptions set out in section 91(1) that we all know. Having recited those exceptions, Mr. Rand concludes:

> Apart from those entrenched exceptions, the Canadian Parliament is now as supreme in relation to the same subject matters of the Act of 1867 as was its imperial predecessor.

One can conclude from these quotations that the real question has not been put to the courts in any of the three references to the courts of appeal in Manitoba, Newfoundland and Quebec. The real question, I submit, must be: What constituent power, if any, does the British Parliament hold today with respect to Canada?

● (1700)

Senator McIlraith set the groundwork to the answer in his scholarly address in this chamber on March 17. I will not repeat his arguments today, but merely sum up my understanding of his conclusion. First, the amendment from time to time of the Constitution of each province, except as regards the office of the Lieutenant-Governor, and with respect to those matters over which they have exclusive jurisdiction, has been vested in the legislature of each province respectively since 1867 under section 92(1) of the B.N.A. Act. Secondly, the amendment from time to time of the Constitution of Canada with respect to those matters over which it has exclusive jurisdiction has been vested in the Parliament of Canada since 1949 under section 91(1) of the B.N.A. Act, subject only to the limited range of matters excepted thereunder, namely, rights or privileges of any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or French language or as regards the requirement for at least one session of Parliament each year and a five-year limitation on the life of any Parliament.

Senator McIlraith concludes this by saying:

> It will be seen then that all that is left within the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom under clause 7 of the Statute of Westminster is the small range of matters outside the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislature and outside the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament or in other words those coming within the exceptions of section 91(1) of the British North America Act.

And with respect to those exceptions Mr. Rand said, as I quoted a minute or so ago:

> And with provision made for amendment of the remaining provisions of that act, the powers so conferred will enable Canada to determine her Constitution as she sees fit in a manner binding in its prescribed mode of enactment.

One must conclude that both the B.N.A. Act and the Statute of Westminster are irrevocable by the British Parliament, as self-executing conventions placed by that fact are beyond repudiation. The British Parliament has surrendered its constitutional and political power; its executive power is spent and the supremacy of the British Parliament in these matters is gone. The classical theories of Dicey and Austen have no bearing in this context.

If that were not so the bonds of colonial relations, as the Honourable Mr. Rand said, embodied in statutes could never constitutionally be dissolved. The proposed new Constitution is to be a statute of the British Parliament which will create the perpetual link that even if expressly renounced by the British Parliament, that renunciation in turn could be revoked.

I ask, honourable senators: Is this patriation? No, honourable senators, this is not the way to go either in law or in politics. In law it is reductio ad absurdum, and in politics, as Professor Kennedy said, it is a blunder!

My contention is that the only vestige of jurisdiction left with the British Parliament is that set out in the exceptions to section 91(1) of the B.N.A. Act, and those exceptions are specifically dealt with as matters of common federal and provincial concern in sections 133, 93 and 50 of that act.

Subject to that, the resolution before us is asking the Canadian Parliament to surrender its and the provinces' constituent powers to the British Parliament and asking the British Parliament to re-assume those constituent powers and re-enact them in a new form in a British statute. I do not think this Parliament has the legal or moral right to make such a request, and I do not think that the high traditions of the British Parliament should permit it to accede to such a request.

We can only turn once again to the fourth general principle of the white paper of 1965. It is undoubtedly the most definitive and contemporary authority; in my opinion it is in fact a constitutional convention. Therein it is stated:

> That the Canadian Parliament will not request an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relations without prior consultation and agreement with the provinces.

And I repeat "and agreement". The two sentences that follow in no way derogate from that statement. The second sentence says:

> This principle did not emerge as early as others but since 1907 and particularly since 1930 has gained increasing recognition and acceptance.

To me the plain meaning of that sentence is that the principle did emerge and was recognized and accepted, and that recognition and acceptance has been increasing from 1907 to date. The final sentence states:

> The nature and degree of provincial participation in the amending process, however, have not lent themselves to easy definition.

In other words, it is not easy to define whether federal-provincial conferences are a precondition to provincial agreement, whether provincial agreement can be signified by the premier of a province alone, or by an appropriate minister alone, whether a resolution of the legislature is required, and so on.

In passing this resolution we would be requesting an amendment directly affecting federal-provincial relationships without agreement of eight of the ten provinces.

In order to do so the government is asking us to roll back 114 years of constitutional development, back past section 91(1) in 1949, back past the Statute of Westminster in 1931, back past the Imperial Conferences of 1926 and 1929, back past the B.N.A. Act of 1867, back to 1864 when Dr. Charles Tupper, the Premier of Nova Scotia, introduced a resolution into the legislature of that province requesting that delegates be appointed to confer with delegates who may be appointed by the Governments of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island for the purpose of considering the subject of the union of the three provinces under one government and legislature. That is not my idea of Canada.

For all the reasons contained in my remarks, I cannot add my voice to such a request.

● (1710)

A few moments ago I referred to section 133 of the B.N.A. Act being one of vestigial remnants of U.K. jurisdiction because of the exception contained in section 91(1). In 1946 the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent, in reply to a query in the House of Commons as to whether section 133, regarding the use of the English or French languages in Canada and Quebec, could be altered without provincial consent, said:

> Legally I say it can. The situation appears to me to be this. There are persons and nations who reach a high estate in the affairs of men, and the high estate they reach imposes upon them high obligations . . . I feel—and I believe my fellow Canadians of my race and my religion can feel—that a better guarantee than anything that might be found in section 133 is to be found in that respect, for those who have been formed under the principles of British freedom and British fair play, to protect what are our essential rights.
> It is not the manner of those who have themselves had, and whose ancestors have had, the formation that comes from that long history which has brought us to this point in the civilization of mankind, to do things which the conscience of humanity at large would regard as dishonourable; and the conscience of humanity at large would frown upon an assemblage in this house that attempted to take from me and from those of my race the right to speak the language I learned in my infancy as one of the official languages in which the deliberations of this house may be carried on. So it is of everything else that is not within section 92. If it is fair, if it is just, if it is proper according to the standards of human decency, it will be done; if it is unfair, if it is unjust, if it is improper, all members of this house will say, "It is not our manner to do such things."

On motion of Senator Bielish, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.45 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

> An Act to establish the Canada Post Corporation, to repeal the Post Office Act and other related Acts and to make related amendments to other Acts.
> An Act to amend the Auditor General Act.
>
> An Act to implement conventions between Canada and New Zealand and Canada and Australia for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it being 6 o'clock, pursuant to rule 12 I leave the Chair.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER REFERRED TO SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask leave to move a motion relating to the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages which was tabled in the Senate earlier this day. If leave is granted, I will explain why.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We will have to give leave to find out why.

Senator Frith: I am now applying the Grosart formula which says that when you ask for leave to move a motion you must explain why you are asking for leave.

Senator Roblin: I think that is quite in order.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the report of the Commissioner of Official Languages for the calendar year 1980 was tabled by His Honour the Speaker earlier today, and honourable senators will remember that the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages was established primarily although not exclusively, to study the reports of the commissioner.

I conferred with the Senate joint chairman of the committee, Senator Murray, and he asked me to move this motion and sent me a note saying the reason for asking for leave now is that the committee wishes to have an early opportunity to examine the commissioner on his report, perhaps even on May 14, because the other place will be back by then and, although the Senate will not be sitting, the committee, of course, would have the right to meet anyway.

Accordingly, honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e):

> That the Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages for the calendar year 1980, tabled in the Senate on April 23, 1981, be referred to the Special Joint Committee on Official Languages; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the motion of Senator Perrault that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada, and on the motion in amendment thereto of Senator Yuzyk.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, first of all, I would like to pay tribute to Senator Lang who spoke at length earlier today. He was scholarly and delivered his speech in absolutely top form. Now we are going to come down from the highest peaks to, perhaps, the lowest denominator in society and, instead of a scholarly dissertation, you are going to get the homemaker's viewpoint that has not been expressed in this chamber.

Senator Frith: But we do not accept that that is coming down.

Senator Bielish: Thank you. I will not argue with that view at all.

I rise to place before this chamber my position on the proposed resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada. I should like to express my appreciation to the members of the joint committee who worked so diligently, and to the citizens of Canada who made submissions to the Joint Committee on the Constitution in the form of briefs, letters and personal interventions, often on very short notice. It is ironic to note that the joint chairmen of the committee—the Honourable Harry Hays, from Alberta, and Mr. Serge Joyal, from Quebec—should have lent their credibility to a resolution so contrary to the interests of their respective provinces.

I regret to say that I deplore the procedure, the pressures and the constraints of time, and the imposition of the totally unrealistic deadlines by the Prime Minister and the government, thus closing out the possibility of an opportunity for any form of consultative process by many Canadians as well as by national or provincial organizations. I deplore the arrogance demonstrated and the unilateral action consistently applied.

I support wholeheartedly the amendment proposed by Senatory Yuzyk, seconded by Senator Tremblay:

> That the motion be amended in Schedule B of the resolution by inserting immediately after Clause 28 the following:
>
> "28.1 Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms set out herein are guaranteed equally to men and women."

I am proud that our party has consistently championed the cause of equality for women.

Honourable senators, it is unthinkable that a government which is signatory to the United Nations Decade for Women: Equality Development and Peace 1976-85, which accepts the World Plan of Action and which as recently as July 17, 1980 signed the Convention of the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women, would not have originally included a guarantee of the equality of men and women in their proposed charter.

A quote from the recent U.N. Convention on the Elimination of all forms of Discrimination against Women says:

> —the full and complete development of a country, the welfare of the world and the cause of peace require the maximum participation of women on equal terms with men in all fields.

In preparation for the Mid-Decade Conference on Women in July, 1980, in Copenhagen, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, the minister responsible for the status of women, printed a statement in the form of a booklet entitled Toward Equality for Women. It outlined the government plan of action and contained notices of legislative process already under way, as well as promises of agreement and statements that the government will research, explore, review, study, et cetera. Two years have gone by. Recently, I sent out a tracer to find out exactly how much had been done, but so far the information has not been made available. It is incredible that our government will sign conventions, and then neglect to ratify them or do anything about the accompanying responsibilities.

Also in preparation for the Mid-Decade Conference, Perdita Huston, regional director for the Peace Corps for North Africa, the Near East, Asia and the Pacific, in Ideas Forum, a UNICEF paper, said:

> We have now entered the second half of the U.N. Decade for Women in Development, an idea spawned by the need for leverage and advocacy for women's rights and status in the world today. The themes of the Decade: Equality Development and Peace are laudable, to be sure, but what progress has actually taken place since 1975?
>
> How do women fare in their reach for equality, in their desire to be part of the development of their societies, and how are they affected by, or contributors to, peace or the lack thereof?
>
> "Not so well," say the women I interviewed in six developing countries.
>
> "Not so well," say the women of other nations, developed or semi-industrialized.
>
> "Not so well," say the statistics. And we are left to ask, "Why?"
>
> Why, too, we might ask, is the leadership of UNICEF so crucial to an improved awareness of the inter-relationship between the roles and status of women and the status of children in today's world?
>
> The first theme: Equality. What does the equality of women in society have to do with the welfare of the child? The answer is simple. How can mothers and children be considered separately? From the time of conception, it is the mother who nourishes the child; from its birth she is responsible for its survival, its health, its psychological welfare, its emotional well-being, its education—of values and social consciousness. She is responsible for a great part of the child's vision of the world in which it must participate, to which it must contribute and in which it must survive.
> But if the mother is regarded by society, treated by law and custom, as an inferior or unequal human being, how can the child's view of the world be just?
>
> In sum, the equality of men and women is essential to children's view of, and participation in, a harmonious society. If children are to be our future leaders, equality must begin at home—within the family—and supported by national law and custom.
>
> Development is a process that brings with it enormous changes in the very substance of people's lives. It touches their values, their cultural norms, and their perception of one another. It can bring an opportunity for personal growth and social harmony, or, tragically, it can tear the social fabric asunder.
>
> "Family" is children, women and men. They cannot be separated by anyone's policies. And, if the family, as the basic social unit, is to survive, women must be brought into the mainstream.
> They must be given the opportunity to provide for the basic needs of their children. To do so they must become full participants in development programmes. To do that, they must become equal partners in the planning of development policies. If they do so, if the family becomes a solid social unit, we will have begun to achieve the first two goals of the U.N. Decade for Women: equality and development, and we have a better chance to attain the third goal: a more peaceful world.

Honourable senators, I should like to beg your pardon for having to take you to another part of the world to further illustrate my point. Regardless of economic conditions or standards of living, the objectives, the goals and the means to attain them bear much similarity.

• (2010)

We are all aware that women in Canada, under the leadership of the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, planned to hold a conference on the Constitution in September 1980, which was then postponed to January 1981, followed by yet another postponement to May. The Joint Committee on the Constitution was in session and the second deadline date for receiving submissions was up. An ad hoc committee of Canadian women, calling themselves "Women on the Constitution", hurriedly called a meeting. On short notice, over 1,200 women, representing all the provinces of Canada, met in Ottawa on February 14 and 15, 1981. Above all, it showed that Canadian women were concerned, responsible and anxious to participate in the drafting of the Constitution, to ensure that their rights were not denied. Some weeks ago I received a copy of Women and the Constitution, put out by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women. No doubt, the information contained within it is excellent but the Prime Minister continued at his break-neck pace to act unilaterally, and the book may serve as a grim reminder of the kind of injustices that prevail at this time in history.

Honourable senators, the Canadian government can no longer ignore or deny equal rights for women and men; therefore, equality must be guaranteed.

Although I am relatively new in this chamber, I am fully aware of my responsibilities. The Constitution debates leave no doubt that the foremost function of the Senate is to represent Canada's regions at the federal level. My region—the west, generally, and the Province of Alberta, more specifically—supports the idea of patriation, of bringing the Constitution home to Canada. My region wants to see constitutional changes agreed to by both federal and provincial governments. The federal government is not just proposing to patriate the Constitution; but is also proposing that the British Parliament substantially alter it without the consent of the provinces.

A constitution is essentially an agreement which establishes the rights and responsibilities of both the federal and provincial governments, but the federal government is trying to change this Constitution without provincial agreement. It is proposing an amending formula which will give Alberta and seven other provinces second-class status. Nothing is more critical in the Constitution than the amending formula. It establishes the rules for any future changes. Under the Victoria formula, Ontario and Quebec would always have a veto.

Alberta proposed an amending formula known as the Vancouver consensus, which had the support of all ten provinces. Under its terms, all provinces would have equal constitutional and legal status. There would be no second-class provinces. No province could have its rights, resources or areas of jurisdiction taken away without its agreement. However, at the federal-provincial conference, the federal government gave little indication that they wanted to reach a consensus.

In making his presentation to the joint committee, another western premier said:

> I do not intend to review in detail the history of constitutional discussions over the last four or five years. I want to emphasize, though, that by September of 1980, after intensive negotiations, Canada's eleven governments had reached a significant measure of consensus on even the most contentious constitutional issues.
> It would be pointless to speculate, here, on the reasons why governments failed to reach final agreement at last September's First Ministers' Conference. The point I want to make is that a negotiated agreement was within our grasp, and could have been achieved—with more time, with flexibility, and with goodwill on all sides.

Henry Wise Wood, a distinguished western Canadian and a president of the United Farmers of Alberta, wrote:

> True progress can come only as a result of thoughtful, continuous, co-operative effort. The progress will necessarily be slow, but it must be continuous. Nothing can hinder it more than the mistakes of thoughtless impatience.

In its obvious determination to proceed unilaterally, the federal government may have closed the door to federal-provincial negotiation. In the strategy document of the federal government dated August 30, 1980, it is stated:

> Once this government enters the house with a proposal on a subject, the subject would not continue to be negotiated with the provinces.

On November 24, 1980 the Alberta Legislature passed a resolution by a vote of 70 to 1. It urged that:

> Federal-provincial constitutional discussion be resumed as soon as possible in order to ensure that the federal government and all provincial governments may participate equally and fully in recommending constitutional changes which will decide the future of Canada.

Alberta advocates a strong central government balanced by strong provincial governments. This view was made public in 1978 in Alberta's constitutional position paper entitled Harmony in Diversity, and was reflected as well in the amending proposal known as the Vancouver consensus. A country as large and as diverse as Canada needs strong provincial governments because they are closer to the people and can be more responsive to regional concerns.

• (2020)

On several occasions during the debate on the constitutional issue, Alberta's energy resources have been discussed. Alberta's ownership of its resources is an existing constitutional right. I was surprised and disappointed to read Senator Croll's presentation containing his scathing remarks about Alberta's premier, the Heritage Fund, and the energy question. I should respectfully like to refer the honourable senator to the British North America Act, 1930, which confirms the natural resources transfer agreements with the western provinces. The provinces were consulted and consented to this amendment, a legislative practice notably absent these days.

I appeal to honourable senators from Alberta, in considering this resolution, to represent their people, not their patron. I appeal to honourable senators from across the west to ponder for a moment the co-operative heritage of our region, and to ask themselves whether it would not be better, now that this pressure-cooker atmosphere has been created, to try for one last time to reach an accord on patriation and an amending formula, rather than to proceed unilaterally on patriation of the Constitution.

I appeal to the integrity of all honourable senators to assert your independence, to take your duty seriously and, when the time comes, to take your stand.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Bielish whether or not she checked her facts carefully to determine whether the provinces had agreed to the transfer of natural resources to the western provinces in 1930. I believe that she will find that there was not unanimous consent.

Senator Bielish: I will check that.

Hon. C. William Doody: Which province objected?

Senator Olson: The provinces did not unanimously agree.

Senator Doody: Which province objected?

Hon. Martial Asselin: You have asked a question to which you seem to know the answer.

Senator Olson: First of all, the honourable senator appealed to western Canada and then—

Hon. John M. Macdonald: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order to the effect that Senator Bell is scheduled as the next speaker, not Senator Olson.

Senator Olson: I merely asked if I could ask a question; that is all.

Hon. G. I. Smith: That great man of the rules always asks questions, but he never makes a speech.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: I hope Senator Olson received a satisfactory answer.

Senator Olson: I am satisfied. Senator Bielish answered very courteously. It was other honourable senators who created the trouble.

Senator Doody: That's right, we are the trouble-makers.

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I rise to exercise my freedom of conscience as a senator and as a Liberal, and I do so proudly, without the benefit of a charter of rights or of section 2(a) thereof. I do so in the confident knowledge that I am speaking on behalf of many people in British Columbia. Our present Constitution has enabled us, over the past 114 years, to develop in freedom and prosperity. If we need a few more days or even months to perfect its patriation, let us not be dismayed.

Our present Constitution is made in Canada. The Canadian constitutional monarchy, with a democratic parliamentary system of government, was written in Canada by Canadians insofar as the B.N.A. Act is concerned, and has evolved in our peculiar Canadian way. Our Constitution reflects the richness, diversity and unity of our country. The sovereignty of Parliament and the legislatures in their own jurisdictions, the independence of the courts and the freedom and protection of all the Canadian people are held inviolate by the monarch, under God.

> And He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

Psalm 72 thus typifies the spirit of Canada.

Only three things should be included in this resolution: the patriation of the British North America Acts; and amending formula, with the widest possible agreement; and a reconfirmation of Canada's allegiance to the constitutional monarchy.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bell: All else necessary can be accomplished in Canada, in good order, and at its appropriate time. Things that should not be included in the resolution are: a Charter of Rights; provisions for referenda; the currently proposed amending formula; equalization; resource amendments, and so on.

The narrow range of constitutional amendments which cannot now be made in Canada by Parliament comprise the last colonial vestige. These are changes to the Constitution, such as the exceptions under section 91.1 of the B.N.A. Act—the very narrow range which we cannot now amend in Canada.

Therefore, the only important question here is that of providing a suitable amending formula to which both the provinces and the dominion government can agree. Since Confederation in 1867, and in each subsequent confederating date of the other six provinces, the power to amend the provincial constitutions has been with each province. Since December 16, 1949 the power to amend the federal Constitution has been with the dominion Parliament.

The amending formula which is proposed is totally unacceptable to the Government of British Columbia, to the Legislature of British Columbia, and to the people of British Columbia.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bell: It creates classes of provinces. It introduces into our parliamentary system the device of referenda in perpetuity, thus diminishing the sovereignty of Parliament. It puts in doubt the means by which the Territories may become provinces.

The amending formula proposed in this resolution is immensely complicated. It contains six variations, and I would list them as follows: section 36 gives us unanimity for two years; section 45 is the Victoria formula; section 42(1) is another one, the provinces' choice; section 42.(3)(a) is yet another formula, the federal one; secton 41, a referendum; and section 46 is a permanent alternative formula of amendment by resolution. Honourable senators, it is immensely complicated. Section 41 will become section 45, and it is considered that it will likely become the permanent formula. It is also felt that this is so rigid that constitutional change will be virtually impossible.

I cannot accept an amending formula which makes second-class citizens of British Columbians; which profoundly changes the balance of power in this country; and which puts in the hands of the federal government a referendum power which only the federal government can use. Finally, and most importantly, I cannot accept any proposition which diminishes the power of Parliament and of the legislatures of the provinces.

I feel that a Charter of Rights should not be included in this resolution because it is not now part of our Constitution and, therefore, it must be excluded because it has no part in patriation. The Charter of Rights limits the power of Parliament and the legislatures and it infringes upon provincial jurisdiction.

I should just like to give you a few examples of this because I do not think that they have been looked at from the point of view of their effect in practical terms.

For instance, section 23 of the resolution deals with education. This is contrary to section 93 of the British North America Act, because that act gives exclusive jurisdiction to the provinces as far as education is concerned. That is a head-on, obvious infringement.

Section 19 of the proposed resolution states:

> Either English or French may be used by any person in, or in any pleading in or process issuing from, any court established by Parliament.

At first blush, it looks as if this deals simply with federal jurisdiction, but the administration of the courts currently is a provincial jurisdiction. Section 92(14) of the British North America Act states that the administration of justice is a provincial concern.

In the province of British Columbia, it escapes me how section 19 could be implemented. I do not have the latest figures, but let us say that there are 50 judges of the Superior and Provincial Courts of British Columbia. I doubt very much if there is one who could sit and hear a case conducted in the French language. If there are 2,000 members of the Bar, probably not more than one could count on the fingers of both hands could either prosecute or defend an accused in the French language. In time we all hope to become fluently bilingual; at the present time this is simply not a practical application. That does not even take into account the court reporters, interpreters, and so forth who would be needed. That is going to be difficult to put into place, no matter how willing one might be.

There are other specific limitations, but one cannot say how they will affect the provinces because the wording is so vague. As an example, section 2 deals with freedom of religion, freedom of expression and freedom of peaceful assembly. How could a provincial legislature hnow how this would affect store closings on Sundays, provincial aid to denominational schools, movie censorship, provincial libel laws, use of parks and public streets, and so forth? One would never know about these things until the courts made a decision because the wording is so vague. This could take time, because precedents must be built up over time.

Section 3 of the proposal states:

> Every citizen of Canada has, without unreasonable distinction, or limitation, the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein.

This could interfere with the qualification of voters and members of legislative assemblies.

Section 6 deals with mobility rights. This could interfere with provincial jurisdictions relating to professional qualifications.

In British Columbia, the Honourable J. V. Clyne, a former Justice of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, now the distinguished Chancellor of the University of British Columbia, points out that section 24 of the proposed resolution is bound to cause controversy and litigation. Section 24 of the proposed resolution states:

> The guarantee in this Charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed as denying the existence of any other rights or freedoms that exist in Canada.

• (2030)

He goes on to say:

> Section 25 is bound to cause endless trouble. For once the charter is specific—

This is the one dealing with aboriginal rights. He continues:

> —it refers to a particular document, the Royal Proclamation of 1763.

I do not know how many senators have looked at the Royal Proclamation. I have had two copies sent to me, and it is a fascinating document.

Section 25 reads:

> The guarantee in this Charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any aboriginal treaty or other rights or freedoms that pertain to the aboriginal peoples of Canada including
> (a) any rights or freedoms that have been recognized by the Royal Proclamation of October 7, 1763; and
> (b) any rights or freedoms that may be acquired by the aboriginal peoples of Canada by way of land claims settlement.

The Proclamation covers lands including Quebec, east and west Florida, Grenada, St. Vincent, Tobago, Hudson's Bay Company territory, and all the land and territories lying to the west of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and northwest.

I hope Senator Williams is listening because he may have very valuable land at his disposal.

The Honourable J. V. Clyne continues:

> There have been a number of judicial decisions on the subject (of Indian land claims) and the charter now leaves the question open as to the binding nature of those decisions and treaties when it declares that Indian rights are those recognized in 1763.

He concludes:

> To leave it to the courts to decide by making various assumptions in the meaning of the charter is an abandonment of legislative responsibility.

Section 24(1) is as follows:

> Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

The Honourable J. V. Clyne comments:

> In ordinary civil cases the courts may order specific performance of a contract, or grant an injunction, or award damages, but never before has it been suggested in Canada that it (the court) should exercise such wide powers as those afforded in this section. Parliament and the legislatures would no longer be supreme.

Honourable senators, under our present Constitution, sections 53 and 54 of the B.N.A. Act specifically provide that appropriating any part of public revenue shall originate in the House of Commons, and that money votes must first be recommended to that house by the Governor General. Yet, section 24(1) of the charter would seem to put that power into the hands of the courts. Boston had its tea party 200 years ago for a similar cause.

Section 24(2), in my opinion, appears extremely dangerous on entirely different grounds. It reads:

> Where, in proceedings under subsection (1), a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

The Honourable Minister of Justice's response to the Attorney General of Ontario on this point does not allay my fears. He assumes that the court's discretion in "having regard to all the circumstances" will ensure that relevant evidence will be considered. Insofar as this section could apply to the Criminal Code as well as civil actions, it could certainly strike a blow on behalf of the criminal.

To return to clause 26, it reads:

> The guarantee in this Charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed as denying the existence of any other rights or freedoms that exist in Canada.

The rights which exist today but not specified in the charter—such as property, employment and economic rights—suggests, by their subordinate placement, that they are of lesser importance and would be legally subordinate to the extent they were in conflict with the specified rights. If they are to be judged equally, the specified rights have no particular significance at all. That would seem to be perverse if it is intentional.

There are other sections in the charter which need a thorough review. I have selected only a few as examples. I hope I have convinced you that this is not the time or place to entrench in our Constitution this charter.

The main points regarding the charter are: It undermines the sovereignty of Parliament at a time when it should be strengthened. Parliamentary sovereignty is the cornerstone of our constitutional framework. Entrenchment alters our constitutional framework to such an extent that only a general election, with the people understanding the implications, should give Parliament such a mandate. It has no place in the Constitution now and, therefore, is not suitable for inclusion in a patriation proposal. Since civil rights are now within the jurisdiction of the provinces, under section 92(13), and much of the proposed charter infringes provincial rights, provincial legislatures must agree to any such charter. If an entrenched Charter of Rights were to be considered after patriation, this particular draft would have to be revised.

Other parts that should not be included in the resolution are the amendments dealing with resources and equalization. They are more properly the subject for constitutional amendment after patriation.

• (2040)

Parts of the resolution which could be dealt with under existing federal jurisdiction are legal rights which are already part of the Criminal Code and aboriginal rights which were guaranteed by the Crown. The federal Parliament has had exclusive jurisdiction, under section 91(24) of the B.N.A. Act, since 1867, and the power to amend since December 16, 1949. What needs to be done to further secure aboriginal rights can be done here and now without recourse to Westminster.

Women's rights is a very difficult topic to deal with. A great deal has been achieved under our parliamentary system. These advances should be a great source of pride especially to our colleague, Senator Bird, who chaired the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. The issue of women's rights in the future is largely economic and affects all people, or should I say "persons"?

In conclusion, in assessing the proposed resolution, it would be wise to understand that the country is polarized. This is evident in the distribution of members in the House of Commons.

Like many senators, I receive letters from all over my province as well as from across the country. I would like to read some typical comments from the letters I received yesterday from different parts of British Columbia.

The first one is regarding a poll done by two radio stations in quite a large riding held by an NDP member whose name I will not mention. This comment is to the extent that the listeners were in favour of the current constitutional proposal, and the writer says:

> Admittedly, they [the polls] were not exactly "scientific" but were a fair indicator. The results were 74 per cent and over 80 per cent respectively, against his support of Mr. Broadbent and Mr. Trudeau.

Further on this writer goes on to say:

> We were all astounded to hear him—

"Him" being the member of Parliament.

> —state that he does not feel any obligation whatsoever to pay attention to polls or any other communication from his constituents! That he would continue backing Mr. Broadbent and the Party and etc.

This writer goes on to say:

> He stated that "old Institutions, old Economic Orders and outmoded Symbols must go!" Leaving little doubt as to where he expects these debates to lead us; all without our consent. How can this be allowed to happen? Is it possible for a society to be too peaceful and docile? Have we placed too much faith and trust in politicians and our system?

Further on in the letter she states:

> —the majority of Canadians are opposed to what he—

"He" being the Prime Minister.

> —is doing, we seem to be powerless to stop him . . . But having always believed in the principles of democracy, I reserve the right to free choice. Presently, that right is being badly abused.
>
> Now we are putting our hopes and faith in those "old Institutions" that he—

The member.

> —hopes to destroy.

This is a typical letter. I have dozens of them in my files. I sound like the late Senator Joseph R. McCarthy.

• (2050)

There is this one, which says:

> I am not in favour of promoting separation in Western Canada for many reasons but I realize that it may be felt by many people that it is their only option. I think it should be realized that the Prime Minister is on a very serious collision course in his rush to impose a new Constitution on provinces that will not support it.

There is another one which says:

> May I express to you my very serious concern for the future of our country under our present Government of Canada? In particular, while I agree that we should have our own Constitution within our country, I am totally opposed to having it amended in England, on the advice of a Government that only represents a part of Canada—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bell: The letter continues:

> I cannot accept a situation where B.C. would be a second class province forever dominated by Quebec and Ontario. I do not think that court cases will stop the Prime Minister's plan—
>
> I was born in Canada . . . I served for five years and four months in the Canadian Army in Europe during World War II. While I am under some limitation now I just cannot fail to do what I can as a good citizen, or accept that my service in the army was a waste of time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bell: This one is signed by several people. It says:

> Canada as a nation should now be mature enough to make its own amendments—
>
> It is dangerous to entrench rights. This automatically negates all rights which are not entrenched.
>
> Westerners object to the fact that . . . Ontario and Quebec will be given a veto in perpetuity over any future constitutional changes.
>
> Western Canadians are patriotic, if frustrated, Canadians. But they are rapidly becoming angry Canadians.
> We are rapidly being pushed not to the brink of alienation but over the brink into something far more serious and sinister for this country.

Senator Guay: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I should like to say that I am a westerner, but I am not angry, and I am proud to support the Prime Minister in his constitutional proposals.

Senator Flynn: That is not a point of order. Just sit down and mind your own business.

Senator Bell: The Prime Minister has achieved his purpose for patriation, and this is a remarkable achievement. Eight premiers have reached agreement. We are now within sight of the goal. Let us not lose sight of this main point.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, may I ask a question of Senator Bell? The honourable senator stated that the resolution puts in doubt the means by which the Territories can become provinces. I wonder if she would tell me what section does that, and how it accomplishes that?

Senator Bell: That is a good question, Senator Lucier. I was referring to the fact that in the British North America Act provision was made for the Territories to enter specifically, and the means by which that could be done. In the new proposals there is provision for two years in which the Territories will be invited to the federal-provincial conferences which will be held to discuss how things are going to be implemented, the kind of amending formulas, and so on; and representatives of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon may be invited by the Prime Minister if it is felt that their interests are involved in whatever they are discussing.

Senator Lucier: I would like to know how that affects provincial status coming to either of the Territories. I do not understand that reasoning.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, it is a privilege to follow in the footsteps of all those honourable senators who have made such wonderful speeches both for and against this resolution. It is an honour, and I offer my thanks to all of them.

Honourable senators, the federal government has made a shambles of trying to give this country a visionary and viable energy policy. It has been pitifully ineffectual in developing an industrial strategy worthy of our fine potential. It has proven impotent in combatting the scourge of high unemployment and the shame of double-digit inflation.

With all these crucial economic and social problems being improperly and inadequately attended to, how could Parliament possibly afford to devote six months to the discussion of something so esoteric as the Constitution of this nation?

Men more cynical than I would tell you that the federal government had decided upon this course of action as a smokescreen, a devious ploy meant to draw attention away from its monumental failures in other areas. And that may very well be true.

But the fact remains, in my estimation, that we are not going to deal effectively with any of the major socio-economic problems that beset us until such time as we have solved our fundamental constitutional problems.

Now, what have we accomplished along those lines in the last six months? Precious little, I submit. Patriation and a Charter of Rights. These are the subjects that have occupied our time. And while they are definitely important, it would be wrong to suggest that they constitute the essence of the reforms that are needed. As a matter of fact, these two issues could well be looked upon as a diversion from the basic problem.

[Translation]

What we have to consider in this country—and as soon as possible—is a new distribution of roles and powers between the various levels of government. The debate does not deal with patriation, but rather with power. In that case, what about this resolution on which we are called to vote?

Do the provisions it contains make us progress substantially toward our ultimate goal? Do they significantly contribute to the understanding which we need so much? Are we witnessing the beginning of a sincere dialogue? Or are we still locked in a sterile exchange of bitter and uncompromising monologues?

I am very much afraid that the answer is not too encouraging. Patriation is an excellent start for what we have to do. In fact, it is a logical first step. It would allow us to assert ourselves and to announce our complete independence and sovereignty. We must finally feel that we are the only masters of our destiny. For both historical and psychological reasons, we have to get rid of all the relics of our colonial past.

However, this resolution unfortunately goes too far. If only it had dealt simply with patriation! But no. It was deemed appropriate to go further, and consequently, instead of doing something which will be positive, we may find ourselves following a course of action which will have a totally negative impact.

[English]

So much of the creative energy of this country has been and continues to be wasted on ridiculous posturing. So much of our economic, intellectual and emotional resources is being wasted on increasingly bitter and destructive struggles between the federal and provincial levels of government. The chasms that divide us are perilously deep. They are born of prejudices long harboured, hurts actively nursed and slights vividly imagined.

So, I ask myself, what is there in the resolution before us that will serve to improve the situation, bring us closer to a consensus, keep us from the brink of irreconcilable federal-provincial differences? The answer is, nothing.

As a matter of fact, the problems that have given rise to our constitutional differences are repeated here with stubborn wrongheadedness. The anger, the impatience, the arrogance, the disrespect—they are all distressingly present. Unilateralism and imposition. Failure snatched from the jaws of success.

[Translation]

No, honourable senators, this resolution is not the harmless document which the federal government would have us believe it is. What this resolution provides as an approach to the referendum issue is a denial of the basic principles which underlay our Confederation.

[Senator Bélisle.]

The federal Parliament alone will have the right to take the initiative and call for a referendum; the federal Parliament alone will decide the rules governing such a referendum; and the federal Parliament alone will draft the question to be put in that referendum. As this proposal now reads, the provincial legislatures could very simply be ignored. Ottawa could ignore them and not bother to consult them. You will admit with me that the provinces have every reason indeed to object.

Under the present Constitution we have two levels of government. With this resolution, and more particularly with its referendum provision, the influence of the provincial governments could indeed be reduced to nothing, they might even not be consulted and the appeal made directly to the people.

That is not what the Fathers of Confederation wanted and that is not what we should be trying to achieve either. We do not want a unitary state; we want a confederation, a union of sovereign entities jealously seeking to protect their rights.

So as you can see we have yet to find the perfect solution concerning the question of how we might proceed to amend our Constitution once it has been patriated. But if the federal government insists on the formula contained in this resolution, again we will be running the risk of making even worse the state of confrontation which already obtains between Ottawa and the provinces.

● (2100)

[English]

I come now to the matter of entrenching rights in the Constitution. This is no meaningless gesture calculated merely to impress. This is a measure of paramount importance. It takes power away from the people's representatives. It places limitations on the extent of control elected legislatures can exercise over their electors. This is nothing less than a fundamental change in the social contract between the governed and their governments—a change which entrusts to the judiciary the task of interpreting the terms of this new social contract.

This is not the type of basic change that should be brought about unilaterally, without the consent of some of the principal players involved in our Confederation—that is, the provinces. Yet, this is what is being done, and it is being done in the face of vehement objections on the part of the provinces.

Some object to the entrenchment of human rights because it raises false hopes; others because it places a political burden on the judiciary; and still others because it risks diminishing our reliance on the process of public discussion and democratic politics for resolving disputes concerning fundamental principles.

Now, the views of these people cannot be simply disregarded. They cannot be dismissed as without value or merit; they must be given serious and full consideration; and I, for one, do not feel they have been. That is the sort of fundamental change that must be considered in the context of complete constitutional amendment involving the redistribution of powers and responsibilities.

The provinces oppose the charter for these reasons but, more particularly, because it imposes upon them obligations in areas that fall within their own competence as determined by section 92 of the B.N.A. Act, notably minority language education and property and civil rights.

A charter of human rights is a matter of incredible importance to a nation and its constitution. It should, therefore, be well, considered, reasonably popular and as unifying as possible. It should reflect the enduring will of the people of Canada.
[Translation]

If you go by those criteria, you realize that the way in which this resolution attempts to entrench in the Constitution a Charter of Rights and Freedoms is indeed deplorable. Canadians have not had the opportunity to voice their opinion on the matter, to consider and discuss its implications and ramifications.

I want to point out to you that this charter will be enshrined in our Constitution not by Canadian legislation but by an act of the Parliament of another country and despite the firm opposition of a majority of provinces. The provincial legislatures which are just as sovereign as the federal parliament in the spheres of jurisdiction assigned to them by the Constitution would be subjected to changes in their powers, by the federal government, without having any say in the matter.

That is not the way such a task should be accomplished. Entrenching basic human rights in the Constitution should be done in such a way as to minimize all possible disagreements. Also, this task should be assigned to our greatest experts in the field. But above all, everything should be done here in Canada.
[English]

I really cannot see why the federal government is insisting on this Charter of Rights. I am not even sure that I am opposed to a Charter of Rights in our Constitution, but the one contained in this resolution will not come in for any accolades from me. It is thoroughly flawed. Rights and freedoms are insufficiently defined and all kinds of verbal garbage guarantees future confusion. What must be done to ensure that we carve into this Constitution of ours for all time, if that is the route we want to take, those rights and freedoms which we consider so fundamental that they deserve to be upheld even when temporary majorities find it generally acceptable to set them aside?

As it stands, this charter is a masterpiece of deception. Its intent is not precise and its wording is deliberately vague, allowing for broad interpretations by the judiciary. It attempts to be totally neutral, which means that in no time flat the Judaeo-Christian morality which is ours will be replaced by a hedonistic morality replete with the corrupting influences that that entails.

There is no definition given of the principles of fundamental justice referred to in the charter. God Himself only made it as an afterthought—the subject of an amendment reluctantly accepted by the government.

Senator Asselin: Because Ryan wrote to Trudeau!

Senator Bélisle: The right to life, which should be listed as a fundamental right, is considered merely a legal right, and the wording of that section deliberately ignores the unborn, the handicapped and the aged, whose lives are continually being taken and further threatened by liberal legislation.

Section 7 of the charter should proclaim that every individual has the right to life because this right is inherent and is the most fundamental right a human being has. A paragraph specifically protecting the right to life of the unborn should be added to section 15. It should read:

> In this charter, the term "every individual" means every living human being from the time of conception onward until its natural end, regardless of any physical or mental condition, distinction, or circumstance.

Modern scientific authorities agree that human life begins at conception. Such clearly established facts should, therefore, be recognized in a Charter of Rights.

● (2110)

This goes to say that there is no basic step more important at the constitutional level than the drawing up of a Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms. And it is exactly for that reason that we should not undertake such a basic task so long as we are not constitutionally independent and we do not have an absolute control over our constitution.

This is why I suggest that the way Parliament should proceed is to confine itself to patriating our Constitution. Once this has become our own, we will manage to find a truly genuine Canadian procedure for amending it and for entrenching human rights and freedoms, if we feel that it is the best way to protect them.
[English]

To suggest that now may be the last chance we have to obtain such an important change as a Charter of Rights in our Constitution is to express a profound lack of faith in Canadians and their ability to provide for their own future. If the government does not think Canadians can be trusted to make the changes necessary in our Constitution, what are we doing patriating it?

The purpose of patriation is to enable us to take charge of our own constitutional destiny. Forcing a charter of rights on us and using a foreign power to do it is as cynical a gesture as this federal government has ever, and will ever, visit upon the people of Canada.

Honourable senators, I will vote against this resolution, not because I am opposed to patriation or the idea of a Charter of Rights, but because I am opposed to the federal government violating the rights of the provinces. I am opposed to the use of force when it is not necessary and can prove utterly disastrous. A Charter of Rights needs general support if it is to receive the respect it requires.

I sincerely hope that this chamber, representing, as it does, the interests of the provinces in Parliament, will reject this ill-advised plan of the federal government. We will be delinquent in our responsibilities as senators if we do not. If we stand by and do nothing, while the federal power violates the basic rights of the provinces, we will have forfeited our right to exist. We will have merited all the criticism levelled against us. We will, in fact, have lived up to our reputation as a spineless rubber-stamp.

Let us patriate the Constitution without the Charter of Rights provided in this resolution. Let us take this charter and submit it to the provinces as the starting point for an in-depth study of how our Constitution might be improved.

Before doing this, we might want to correct some of the more apparent shortcomings in this charter. I have already alluded to some of those. Senator Yuzyk moved the motion in amendment presently before us to correct another. His motion will receive my support because no charter of human rights in the twentieth century can afford to leave any doubt that women are considered to be the equal of men before the law.

French Canadians, though they may be a minority in Canada as a whole, are a majority in Quebec. Because of this, we in Ontario have often felt that they do not understand the depth of the problem we face in Ontario. That is why it is so refreshing and inspiring to see two French Canadian Quebecers propose an amendment that would give us, as a right, the use of our language in the institutions of government and the courts of law.

"It is a mere symbol," you may say. "It is something that is already being worked upon by the provincial government of Ontario," you may say. Sure, all that is true, but we want this right recognized in the law of this land as an inalienable right of the French-speaking people of Ontario, so that they will be entitled to use their own language in dealing with their government and their courts.

There is quite a difference between a privilege and a right. When you have a right, you stand tall; you bargain from a position of strength; you depend on no one; your freedom is unimpaired. On the other hand, when all you have is a privilege, you are still a mendicant; you depend on the goodwill of others; you are at their mercy; you are not independent and you are certainly not free.

On the whole, I would say that we Franco-Ontarians have not been mistreated in Ontario. But, consciously or unconsciously, we have been constantly reminded that we are a minority that enjoys certain privileges as regards its language and culture merely as a result of the tolerance and goodwill of our English-speaking fellow-citizens.

This is what saps one's pride. This is what begins to grate on one's nerves after a while.

Ideally, the Province of Ontario, like Manitoba in 1870 and New Brunswick more recently, would have volunteered to have section 133 of the B.N.A. Act apply to it. But, for various reasons, it has not done so. Therefore, we are left with having a nudge. It would be perfectly consistent for the federal government to nudge Ontario in this resolution, since it is also having to do a bit of shoving in Quebec.

I want you to note, however, that the significance of the federal government's interference in Quebec is far greater. With regard to Quebec, the federal government is imposing its will in an area that falls squarely within what is properly provincial jurisdiction; that is, the language of education. This is not the case as regards Ontario and section 133.

[Translation]

First of all, let us have a look at the content of Section 133 which states:

> Either the English or the French Language may be used by any Person in the Debates of the House of the Parliament of Canada and of the Houses of the Legislature of Quebec; and both those Languages shall be used in the respective Records and Journals of those Houses; and either of those Languages may be used by any Person or in any Pleading or Process in or issuing from any Court of Canada established under this Act, and in or from all or any of the Courts of Quebec. The Acts of the Parliament of Canada and of the Legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those Languages.

If Section 133 does not mention Manitoba, it is because that province was only constituted in 1870, that is, three years after Confederation. But Section 23 of the Manitoba Act grants Franco-Manitobans the equivalent of what is provided for under Section 133. Which means that Franco-Manitobans enjoy more constitutional rights than Franco-Ontarians. And this, in spite of the fact that we represent more than half of the Francophones outside Quebec!

Why should Franco-Ontarians insist that Ontario be bound by the provisions of Section 133 of the British North America Act under a new Constitution? It is because we want constitutional protection similar to that granted to the Quebec English-speaking community. The history of Franco-Ontarians has clearly demonstrated that the Ontario Legislature cannot be relied on for the protection of our basic rights. Section 133 provides only for the use of French or English in the proceedings of the legislature and the courts under provincial jurisdiction.

The Premier of Ontario claimed that it would not be fair to include in the new Constitution the right to these services when adequate structures to guarantee these services do not exist. Mr. Davis said that he hesitates to support the full application to Ontario of Section 133, and I quote:

> —for there are several areas where the necessary structures are lacking.

In 1981, the Francophones of Ontario should be treated just as well as the Anglophones of Quebec and the Francophones of Manitoba and New Brunswick; and now I resume the quotation:

> I am sure that whatever promises we could make concerning that right would only lead to controversy and confrontation which would threaten the achievement of the very objective we have set for ourselves.

Let us see what the situation now is in the Ontario legislature and the provincial courts.

On July 22nd, 1968, the Ontario Legislative Assembly decided unanimously, and I quote:

—that every hon. member may henceforth, as of right, address this House in either of the two official languages of Canada.

I did so in 1954 but no mention was ever made of it in the official report of the Ontario Legislative Assembly; we are now in 1981 and even now no record is kept whenever someone speaks in a tongue other than English in Toronto. The week Canadian unity was debated in May 1980, proved those fears to be groundless: the walls of Queen's Park did not crumble when members spoke French. Of course, the official report at Queen's Park is not put out in both languages and there is no permanent simultaneous translation system. But that is an area which we Franco-Ontarians are willing to look into in conjunction with the government with a view to setting implementation targets.

With regard to the provincial courts, I might point out that considerable progress has been accomplished in the last few years where services to Francophones are concerned. The Judicial Organization Act was amended; Section 8 of the Jurys Act provided for the selection of Francophone jurors; and the Ontario Evidence Act gives official status to the French version of Ontario statutes. Since 1979 Franco-Ontarians have had the right to be tried in French in criminal law cases. The number of family courts and small claims courts handling cases in French has increased. It is true that a similar right has not yet been granted guaranteeing the rights of the Francophones in common law trials.

But here again we are ready to discuss ways to implement changes. Some laws have now been translated in French, for instance the School Act and the Highway Traffic Act. The Throne speech of March 1980 stated the possibility of recording wills written in French and we expect that this year at last we will be able to register wills and other legal documents drafted in French. My colleagues have no doubt all read yesterday's Citizen which reported that the premier has not yet found enough money to buy a French keyboard typewriter and that the Speech from the Throne delivered in Toronto yesterday had been corrected by a stenographer who added the accents as required. Is Mr. Davis really sincere?

We can see that the progress accomplished in the implementation of the equivalent of the content of Section 133 is such that a constitutional commitment is now possible; it would then be up to the government to agree on a timetable for its implementation. Now that the Ontario government has a majority, it can no longer evade the issue: it must show leadership in recognizing our basic rights. Franco-Ontarians rights must be recognized and entrenched in the final version of the constitution.

Sections 16 to 19 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms contained in the proposed Constitution Act of 1981 will only come into effect three years after the enactment of this proposition. In view of the progress accomplished so far it seems that such a deadline should be sufficient to enable the Ontario government to take the other necessary steps stemming from section 133.

[English]

Honourable senators, we Franco-Ontarians are not begging. We are not looking for privileges to be handed out to us because we are a submissive minority. We are agitating to have recognized by the rest of Canada what we consider to be a right. We want to be treated as well as the English-speaking minority in Quebec. Our people are better treated when it comes to the recognition of linguistic rights in Manitoba and New Brunswick, two provinces where we are not as numerous as we are in Ontario. There is something wrong there, and now is the time to correct it. If it is only a meaningless symbol, then why not provide us with it? It will mean much to us. It will provide a significant psychological uplift.

I urge you all to search your hearts when the time comes to vote on this amendment and to ask yourselves whether simple justice does not require that French-speaking Ontarians at least begin to have some of those basic rights enjoyed by English-speaking Canadians in Quebec and French-speaking Canadians in Manitoba and New Brunswick.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I meant to make a speech of a certain length, but someone took my turn, as I was supposed to speak before my honourable friend, Senator Bélisle, who proved quicker than I was and rose before I did.

I do not intend to stick with the plan of the speech which I was going to deliver in this house and I am wondering indeed whether I will deliver any.

Mr. Duplessis said once to one of his very vocal friends—a member who always wanted to speak but never seemed to have the opportunity to—"My friend, cheer up, the best speeches are those which are never made".

I have the impression that my best speech this evening will be to remain silent and considering the late hour to await the decision of the Supreme Court. Afterwards with the leave of my colleagues, I will resume the speech which I intended to deliver tonight.

[English]

Senator Flynn: What do you intend to do? Is there anybody, on your side, who wants to speak?

Senator Frith: No, they are not ready to speak.

Senator Flynn: Those who are not ready will not have the opportunity to speak. I am ready to proceed, but I do not know, exactly, what my status will be tomorrow with regard to the order of the house and with regard to amendments moved by the Leader of the Government. I suppose that I could speak tonight, we could adjourn the debate, and I could continue after the Leader of the Government has spoken tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I see no reason why that would not work. The only provision of the order which would interfere with that is the provision which says that at 10 o'clock, whatever else is going on, the Leader of the Government has his opportunity, and then the Leader of the Opposition. I think there is no reason why he cannot interrupt. We have already agreed that we will speak on whatever we have decided to speak on during this period. The honourable senator's suggestion is a good one, except that I suppose Senator Perrault will want to speak to his amendment, and then Senator Flynn may continue with reference to his amendments.

Senator Flynn: In those circumstances, it is quite agreeable to me. I will speak, possibly, until 10 o'clock; maybe not. In any event, I do not mind being interrupted tomorrow by the Leader of the Government to conform with the order, because I want this order to be respected, not only in the letter but in the spirit.

Senator Frith: I pass.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I am somewhat in the same situation as Senator Asselin. I would have quite a speech to deliver! Possibly I might even be able to speak for hours and hours without unduly rehashing what may have been said so far.

I cast a retrospective glance at what has happened since this resolution on constitutional reform has been before Parliament and I notice that the steam roller of Mr. Trudeau's constitutional obsession, pulled by the abulic Liberal herd has now covered only part of a final parliamentary stage in Canada. When I speak of the abulic Liberal herd I believe I owe an explanation to the Senate, particularly to my friends opposite. This expression comes from Mr. Trudeau himself. In 1963, when he was active within the New Democratic Party, Mr. Pearson made an about-face concerning nuclear weapons—I recall that he made that about-face during the 1963 election—Mr. Trudeau got mad and voiced his disappointment over the attitude of what he called the abulic Liberal herd. Perhaps the word abulic does not mean anything to many of you. The first time I saw that expression I looked it up in some dictionaries and discovered that it meant "lack of will power", because it was a complete change of direction. I draw a parallel with this resolution because Mr. Trudeau, after joining the Liberal party, is now using the same herd to make a complete about-face. It is a complete change of direction on constitutional matters, repudiating all the prime ministers since Sir Wilfrid Laurier and repudiating himself. It has been said—and I have no intention of quoting—it has been said that all prime ministers, Sir Wilfrid Laurier—maybe not Borden because perhaps he did not have an opportunity—but MacKenzie King, and his expert in constitutional matters, Ernest Lapointe, Bennett, St-Laurent, Pearson and Trudeau himself have always said that when it came to amending the Constitution of Canada in fields which both levels of government were involved in, the agreement of the provinces was required. The agreement of the parties involved was required. I note that Senator McIlraith recalled that stage by stage and asked: Were all those people wrong?

We have listened to outstanding speeches from both sides but I would say without hesitation and without partisanship that the best speeches we have heard were delivered by the dissidents of the Liberal majority.

I am referring here to Senator Thompson, Senator McIlraith, Senator Lang, Senator Deschatelets, Senator Cook. So I am saying that those speeches were well prepared, that it was a difficult situation because Mr. Trudeau imposed his will upon the party.

So that is where we stand in our proceedings. But I would like to note that the debate has slowed down in the last two weeks; four decisions were made during that period which changed the course of the debate and its final outcome.

The first is, of course, the decision of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland. The Supreme Court of Manitoba gave a majority decision in favour of the government, saying to those who support it that the approach is legal. We had the majority decision of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland saying "no", followed closely by the majority decision of Quebec, also in favour of the government, which changed completely the picture. Then we had the decision of Parliament to postpone the final vote on the resolution until the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled on it. Then we had the decision of the Quebec electorate on April 13, and finally, the decisions of the provincial premiers. None of those four decisions is final, and we will need the final decision of the Supreme Court. If it is unfavourable to the government, it will be the end of it, and if it is favourable, the House of Commons and the Senate, and then Westminster, will have to vote on it.

• (2130)

That is how we reach this final stage, agreed to by the government, that the House of Commons would vote tonight and the Senate at noon tomorrow on the amendments to the resolution. The majority of amendments that one could think of and that could have the support of Parliament do not affect the substance of the issue that the Supreme Court will have to rule on.

Nevertheless, I would like to say a word at this stage on the rulings by the provincial courts of appeal and on the issue that the Supreme Court will have to deal with. First, all the courts of appeal recognized that this resolution encroaches on provincial rights.

Senator Godfrey made a rather amusing distinction when he said that there was no problem so long as there is no transfer of provincial powers to the federal jurisdiction, and since all that is done here is to restrict provincial rights. That is a fact, the resolution we are considering does not attempt to take away some powers from the provinces to give them to the federal level of government, it only limits provincial powers. All the courts of appeal agreed on that point. However, the resolution provides the federal government with the means to change those rights later on. In other words, the government will not take anything away now, but it gives itself the means to do so later on. That is simply the federal position. But let us go back to the courts' rulings. The courts say that the federal government is infringing on provincial rights. But, those of Manitoba and Quebec, both by majority rulings, said that the government can do that by going to Westminster.

That is quite extraordinary in my view because, as Senator McIlraith previously and Senator Lang today have shown, there are aspects in this resolution on which Westminster has already relinquished its jurisdiction. It has said that it does not want anything to do with those issues. Despite that, Westminster is being asked to decide on matters which the federal Parliament could deal with, such as the Charter of Rights. That is no concern of Westminster. Westminster has relinquished its jurisdiction and its right or rather its obligation—that is the proper term, it is not jurisdiction, or right, it is obligation.

Secondly, Senators Lang and McIlraith have pointed out—and I would like to repeat it, in a slightly different way perhaps—that the Statute of Westminster and the 1949 amendment which patriated the exclusively federal parts of the Constitution have completely changed Westminster's responsibility. It was not Westminster which kept some rights in 1931. It was us, the federal government and the provinces, who asked Westminster to retain the responsibility for amending the Constitution. It was an act of the British Parliament, but in 1931, Westminster told all Dominions that it was their problem now, and that it did not want to interfere with it. But Canada asked Westminster to retain the responsibility, for both levels of government, to amend the B.N.A. Act.

Senator Haidasz: Why?

Senator Flynn: Why, because we could not find an amending formula and because it was not acknowledged, certainly not at that time, that the federal Parliament could act unilaterally. If this had been acknowledged, there would have been no need to ask Westminster to retain these rights and this obligation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: This is why we asked Westminster to retain these responsibilities—

Senator Robichaud: Yes—

Senator Flynn: What is it?

Senator Robichaud: I disagree with Senator Murray.

Senator Flynn: I see. But do you not agree, that, in 1931, we asked—it was not Westminster that asked us—the British Parliament to retain this responsibility?

Senator Robichaud: Yes, I agree.

Senator Flynn: In 1949, we told Westminster: "No longer concern yourself with the federal elements of the Constitution and deal only with what affects both levels of government." Once again, it was not Westminster that asked to retain this right. We are the ones who said: "Take care of this responsibility for us. Act as a referee for both levels of government." We are the ones who asked this of Westminster.

However, we are now being told that when this was done, we simply meant that when the federal government wanted it to do something, the British Parliament would have to do exactly as the federal government asked, whether the provinces agreed or not. This was a completely empty and stupid gesture if this was really the intent. It was never interpreted this way. Today, Senator Lamontagne and the present Attorney General and Minister of Justice are saying something else. We were speaking this morning of the type of factum submitted to the Supreme Court. Then, they said: You believe that you have certain rights? That is what you were told. All the premiers told you so. You were told this in the case of Bill C-60, for instance. You were told then that you would not be forced to accept the Charter of Rights before each Canadian legislature had agreed to be subject to it. However, everything you were told at the time was nonsense! This was only to delude you because we have just found out that you have no rights. This is the thesis of Senator Lamontagne and Mr. Chrétien. If the government is really suggesting that this is the legal position, I do not see how anyone can laugh more obviously, not only at the provinces, not only at the Canadian population, but also at the Canadian Parliament. We have always acted with this in mind, but when it comes to the responsibilities of the two levels of government, the federal government has no right to proceed unilaterally to change the provisions which affect the provincial level.

• (2140)

I do not know, even if I have more than forty years of experience, how the Supreme Court will solve the problem. There are sometimes surprises! But, if it does rule in favour of the national government the Supreme Court would have in my view to turn its back on its decision on the right of Parliament to abolish the Senate and replace it with a Chamber of Provinces. The Supreme Court will have to tell us: "You know, you could not abolish the Senate under a federal statute, but it was simply a matter of asking London, and according to your claim London could only say yes. It was simply a matter of using a procedural trick to achieve what you attempted with Bill C-60."

Well, if it is as simple as that, I wonder why, once they started with this proposal, and since they are imposing the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, they do not change in depth the whole system of distribution of powers. To me it looks silly, knowing Mr. Trudeau's centralizing tendencies, that he does not use this opportunity to change everything.

If Westminster truly has no other responsibilities, I am at a loss. In my view, Senator Lang aptly stated this afternoon that when Parliament proceeds the way they want us to proceed in this case, it goes against the provisions concerning constitutional changes in an area that affects provinces. The very fact of doing what we are asked to do is illegal. But I will go further. I have no hesitation in stating that Westminster, in its arbitration capacity, acts the same way as we do. Westminster has no more authority to act unilaterally than this Parliament. In the decision rendered by the Quebec Board of Appeal, I read that the Chief Justice commented that the British North America Act is a British Act that Westminster alone can amend.

With due respect, I submit that that statement is false even on the surface because that act is not exclusively British. The federal part has been patriated. Provisions have been enacted by this Parliament. It is a piece of Canadian law, of Canadian constitutional law. To contend the contrary is totally false in my view. It is not a British act. It is a Canadian act, as has been shown by Senator Lang. In that area, Westminster again acted on our request. It kept that responsibility at our request. It is not because it wanted to retain it. We were the ones who asked it to stay here as umpire between the two levels of government. It seems to me quite ridiculous to say that when someone asks someone else to act on behalf of two persons in order to sort out conflicts between the two levels of government, that one level of government may unilaterally ask to change that, without taking into account the objections of the other level of government.

Senator Robichaud: Could I ask a question?

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Robichaud: It is quite simple. Assuming that the Parliament of Canada, made up of the House of Commons and the Senate, presented an illegal resolution to Westminster and that Westminster accepted and passed that illegal resolution, to which court must one refer from then on?

Senator Flynn: That is what I am trying to explain. Perhaps I should be a bit more precise and explicit.

The fact is that if the federal Parliament when acting—assuming it were acting ultra vires, outside the bounds of its jurisdiction is subject to a decision by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I am sure my honourable colleague will not argue with me on that. The Supreme Court will be the umpire between the federal government and the provinces when there is a case of ultra vires, notwithstanding the issue of Westminster having to intervene and an amendment to the Constitution in the area of jurisdiction left to Westminster, including section 91(1), the exceptions. I say that having agreed to act on our behalf, Westminster de facto submits itself to Canadian courts and laws.

Westminster cannot pass a Canadian law—because it would be Canadian then—that would not be subject to a decision rendered by the Supreme Court if Westminster goes beyond its mandate and acts outside its jurisdiction. Assuming that Westminster were asked to pass provisions affecting the federal Constitution only, Westminster would be acting outside of its jurisdiction. It would no longer hold this power, it has surrendered it. One could certainly argue in our courts that Westminster does not have the authority to make such a decision. It is the same situation in the case of this resolution, if, as I maintain, Westminster does have the specific responsibility since 1949 and even since 1931, to delineate the powers of both levels of government, but not at the unilateral request of only one level of government.

Perhaps I could move to adjourn the debate at this time. I have said more than enough on this subject. The Supreme Court will rule on it. If the resolution comes back to us, it will mean the government will have succeeded in obtaining the green light. Then we will have no choice but to obey, I agree.

Obviously, it may be in that spirit that we will be able tomorrow to consider some amendments. If one is of the opinion that this resolution is ultra vires, is beyond the power of the federal Parliament, the problem of improving on the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, of changing this or that, becomes somewhat academic at this time, given the direction of the debate and given that we will not be able to take a final decision on the merits of the resolution until the Supreme Court has ruled on it. Obviously, if the Supreme Court rules that it is acceptable, then we will have to try and see whether we can improve on it. However, in the present context, it is a rather pointless exercise in my opinion.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to express regrets that the circumstances that prevailed in the other place have produced the kind of agreement that was accepted there. I can foresee in these circumstances that perhaps the limitations of time and means that we have agreed upon once the resolution comes back to us, if the Supreme Court says it is legal, will make it very difficult for us to decide within two days and solve all problems in this regard.

We may never have to face this difficulty if, as I believe, the proposal now before us is ultra vires and goes against not only the spirit, but also the letter of the Constitution and against what should be done to amend the Constitution in areas which affect both levels of government.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate now adjourn. This might be superfluous, of course, because of the order—

Senator Flynn: I shall move the adjournment myself because I think I want to go on tomorrow after the Leader of the Government has moved his amendments.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are you moving the adjournment of the debate?

Senator Frith: I wanted to propose the motion, but it might be superfluous.

Senator Flynn: The order of the Senate provides that, at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, the Leader of the Government in the Senate will have the floor. I therefore move that the debate be adjourned at this time with the understanding that I can go on tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Hon. the Speaker: Pursuant to the Special order adopted by the Senate on Wednesday, April 15, 1981, the Senate will now proceed to the Order of the Day for resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C., that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada and on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Yuzyk.

The Leader of the Government has the floor.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT BY SENATOR PERRAULT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) moved:

(a) by adding, immediately after the heading "CANADIAN CHARTER OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS" on page 3, the following:

"Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law:"

(b) by striking out, in clause 11 of the French version, line 36 on page 5 and substituting the following:

"déclaré coupable et puni;"

(c) by adding, immediately after line 40 on page 9, the following clause:

"28. Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons."

(d) by renumbering the subsequent clauses accordingly

(e) by striking out subclause 33(1) of the French version at lines 27 to 29 on page 10 and substituting the following:

"33. (1) Les droits, ancestraux ou issus de traités, des peuples autochtones du Canada sont, par les présentes, confirmés."

(f) by striking out, in subclause 45(1), lines 20 to 24 on page 16 and substituting the following:

"inces."

(g) by adding to clause 54, immediately after line 20 on page 20, the following paragraph:

"(c) the rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada set out in Part II;"

(h) by lettering paragraphs (c) to (h) of clause 54 as paragraphs (d) to (i).

SPEAKER'S RULING ON POINT OF ORDER SUSTAINED

The Hon. the Speaker: Under the same special order of the Senate, I now recognize the Leader of the Opposition, the Honourable Senator Flynn.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have before me five specific amendments and before moving them, I would like to ask Your Honour to rule whether I can move them separately or if I have to group them so that we would vote on them all at once.

I indicated somewhat yesterday why I felt that I have such a right. The only serious objection raised concerns the wording of the order of the Senate to the effect that I am entitled to a single amendment, while the Leader of the Government is entitled to several. This shows, of course, the inconsistency of such an interpretation and the fact that it is a grammatical error, as I mentioned it when it was proposed. In other words, I would be in an inferior position because, according to that argument, the Leader of the Government could move a series of amendments, while I would be entitled to a single one.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have nothing to add to the points we made yesterday. We are waiting for the ruling requested by the Leader of the Opposition.

● (1010)

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have looked into this matter for many hours, and I am not sure that I have found the eternal truth. Of course, there is a very special paragraph in the order wherein it is stated:

9. The provisions in this Order shall prevail notwithstanding any rule or practice of the Senate to the contrary.

If this paragraph were not there, I could not accept the series of amendments proposed in one amendment by the Leader of the Government because I think that the vote should be taken on each of the amendments separately. However, because of this special provision in the order, the practice does not apply to this special order.

Paragraph 9 of the order states:

The provisions of this Order shall prevail notwithstanding any rule or practice of the Senate to the contrary.

That is quite clear.

Paragraph 4 of the order states:

The Order to resume the debate on the main motion shall be called at 10.00 a.m. on Friday, April 24, 1981, and, notwithstanding any other motion in amendment thereto, the Leader of the Government in the Senate shall forthwith be given the floor to move any amendments to the said Address adopted by the House of Commons—

What is the amendment adopted by the House of Commons? It is the amendment as it was moved by the Leader of the Government.

I think I have to accept the series of amendments as an omnibus amendment, and I will have to do the same with amendments moved by the Leader of the Opposition. That means he can present many amendments, but I think that they will have to be voted on in one vote.

Senator Flynn: With great respect, Your Honour, we want to appeal your ruling.

The Hon. the Speaker: Call in the senators.

Honourable senators, the question now is: Shall the Speaker's ruling be sustained?

The ruling of His Honour the Speaker was sustained on the following division.

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the Speaker's ruling sustained.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, this decision of the house would impose on senators the obligation to pass judgment on a package of several questions which are not necessarily related. I think it would be an insult to your intelligence for us to present a basket of very different articles and ask you to pass judgment on the whole basket. Therefore, I have decided to select only one of the amendments that I had intended to move. I had one dealing with some amendments to the Charter, some meeting what the Leader of the Government has already proposed with regard to the supremacy of God, to which we would have added the family, and so forth. We also added a reference to the enjoyment of property. In any event, this is one of the amendments that was defeated in the other place, and, in light of the exercise that we just went through a few moments ago, we know very well what the result would be here with regard to that amendment.

• (1020)

We had also, in the other place, presented an amendment proposing a continuing constitutional conference of Canada. This also was defeated, but it is not of the essence of the debate we are now having.

There was a more important amendment which was also defeated in the house relating to the amending formula. To put it briefly, I would say that we were proposing the amending formula of the premiers that was also defeated, and so I am not going to move this one. I will probably ask leave to table the amendments, or to have them inserted in my speech in reply, in order that others may be able to judge what we had in mind.

Finally, not because it is the official policy of the Conservative Party but because it is the view of several members on this side as well as on your side—and I mention at this point Senators Asselin and Deschatelets—we have an amendment which would in fact extend to Ontario the provisions of section 133. Because of the principle of not imposing unilaterally anything in this act, as the government would want to do, we have coupled with the one applying section 133 to Ontario an amendment which deletes clause 63 of Part VIII and substitutes the following therefor:

63. (1) This Act, or any provision thereof, shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation to be issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces that have in the aggregate, according to the then latest decennial census, a population of at least fifty per cent of all the provinces.

I have had some copies of this amendment prepared, but perhaps I had better read it in its entirety.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT BY SENATOR FLYNN

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move:

That the proposed Constitution Act, 1981, be amended as follows:

1. (a) by adding to Clause 16 of Part I, immediately after line 32 on page 6 the following:

"(3) English and French are the official languages of Ontario and have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the legislature and government of Ontario;"

(b) by renumbering subsection (3) as subsection (4).

2. by adding to Clause 17 of Part I, immediately after line 3 on page 7 the following:

"(3) Everyone has the right to use English or French in any debates and other proceedings of the legislature of Ontario."

3. by adding to Clause 18 of Part I, immediately after line 12 on page 7 the following:

"(3) The statutes, records and journals of the legislature of Ontario shall be printed and published in English and French and both language versions are equally authoritative."

4. by adding to Clause 19 of Part I, immediately after line 20 on page 7 the following:

"(3) Either English or French may be used by any person in, or in any pleading in or process issuing from, any court of Ontario."

5. by deleting Clause 63 of Part VIII and substituting the following therefor:

"63. (1) This Act, or any provision thereof, shall come into force on a day or days to be fixed by proclamation to be issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces that have in the aggregate, according to the then latest decennial census, a population of at least fifty per cent of all the provinces.

(2) A resolution made for the purposes of this section may be revoked before the issue of a proclamation authorized by it."

I think that we shall have copies of this motion available for distribution.

[Senator Flynn.]

I will yield to the Leader of the Government at this time so that he can deal with his own amendments and, possibly, with this one, if he so wishes, and I will follow.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate very much the contribution which the honourable Leader of the Opposition has made thus far. I hope that we can have a productive morning.

I am pleased today to participate in this debate on Canada's constitutional future. We are nearing the end of a long process. I suppose that it can be said, honourable senators, that this process began in 1867. It began in real earnest, perhaps, in the late 1920s. From time to time between 1972 and the present time we have had constitutional conferences and meetings involving first ministers, in order to discuss the method by which we can achieve a truly Canadian Constitution. It has been a long process, during which time it seems to me that Westminster and the United Kingdom have been very patient with the senior member of the Commonwealth and our inability to determine the manner in which we want to patriate our Constitution. I hope that the process can be brought to a successful conclusion in the near future, and I know that this feeling is shared by many honourable senators.

The Statute of Westminster in 1931 confirmed Canada's status as an independent nation, as all of us know. Successive Canadian governments, whether they be Liberal or Conservative, have been working toward the patriation of that Constitution. Perhaps the efforts which have been expended during recent months by parliamentarians in both houses, and by many Canadians from coast to coast, can now be brought to a successful conclusion.

I think that all members of the Senate can take pride in the fact that many members of this chamber have played a very active role in contributing towards the constructive consideration of constitutional reform and change. At different times over 50 senators participated in the work of the committee. Senator Harry Hays, who was the joint chairman of that committee, deserves special credit and our gratitude.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Distinguished members of the opposition, such as Senator Roblin, made an equally outstanding contribution to the work of that committee.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Throughout the entire process—and appropriately so, given the constitutional position of the Senate and its role set forth by the Fathers of Confederation—honourable senators played an important role. The members in both houses have worked unusually long hours to produce a good resolution. There has been a level of informed debate commensurate with the seriousness of the subject before us.

The recent part of the journey, I suppose, began at the time of the Quebec referendum—that traumatic event for all Canadians, whether they lived in the province of Quebec or whether they lived in any other province. All of us recall the determination which followed that referendum. All Canadians felt determined that we would have to make federalism work more effectively, that we would have to achieve meaningful constitutional reform. I remember the successive statements made by the provincial leaders following that referendum, to the effect that, "We must find ways to build a stronger Canadian family. We will have to involve ourselves in the process of constitutional renewal."

Honourable senators will recall the long, hot summer of intensive federal-provincial meetings in which a wide range of constitutional issues were discussed, culminating in a meeting of first ministers in Ottawa last September. It was a good process, but, again, it was a process which led to deadlock. Agreement proved impossible.

I know many statements have been made about the alleged inflexibility of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and the government during those meetings, but one need only study the record of those federal-provincial conferences to know where the inflexibility really was. During those meetings there was flexibility on the part of the federal government. Honourable senators, that record of flexibility can be seen. I recall, for example, that in 10 specific areas offers were made by the national government to the provinces which would in no way diminish their strength, their power or their rights, but which would indeed strengthen those elements. One can only consider the issues discussed at that time with respect to family law, participation in the selection of justices for the Supreme Court, and the areas of resources and telecommunications in all forms.

The reply of the premiers at that time was, "You have offered us something, but it is not enough. You are not going to get your patriation, you are not going to get your Charter of Rights, until you put more on the table." I am sure that we all recall the words of the Prime Minister at that time. He said, "We are not going to trade fish for freedom."

Senator Flynn: A horse trader like him!

Senator Perrault: He said, "We are not going to decentralize this nation so that we have no nation at all. We are not going to Balkanize this country". Remember the notable statement made by one of the provincial premiers, who is now in the forefront of the campaign to oppose what Parliament is attempting to do. He said, "We really see the national government as an agent of the provinces, as a clearing house of the provinces. That is the proper role for the national government."

What we have here, honourable senators, surely is a vision of what Canada will be: we will either develop a loose collection of states with sovereignty association by instalment, until we have no nation left at all; or we will develop once again an authentic vision of a united country. This is really what we have been about in the past few weeks and months. We have been trying to find a way to build a stronger country. Once again there was deadlock among the 11 governments. It became clear that the national government must act if Canada is to enjoy even the most fundamental constitutional reform, namely, a patriated Constitution and protection of basic rights which Canadians have come to hold in common during the entire evolution of our history. Surely, we are the only federation or confederation in the world which has its constitution in another country. We are the only federation in the world which requires unanimous consent on the part of all its components in order to bring about change.

● (1040)

Senator Flynn: You do not agree with that?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, disagreement has come from the other side, and that is the right of the opposition, but these happen to be the facts.

Senator Flynn: But you said that it was not required.

Senator Perrault: I would be glad to discuss any point further. I am saying that the deadlock which has been produced by the need for absolute unanimity, made unanimity impossible, as the Leader of the Opposition surely knows, as a means to patriate the Constitution. I know that had that deadlock mechanism not been endorsed, the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate and his party would have followed the same course. So the belief, which reflected the wishes of most Canadians, was that the national government must act if Canada is to enjoy even the most fundamental of constitutional reforms. These reforms include a patriated Constitution protecting the basic rights and freedoms of individuals in relation to their governments, along with a Canadian amending formula.

It has been said by some opposition critics in the other place and in this chamber that the Canadian people are unhappy with this process. The last public opinion poll indicated that 85 per cent of the Canadian people want a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. An overwhelming majority in that same range want a patriated constitution.

Senator Flynn: It should be 100 per cent.

Senator Perrault: In my own province of British Columbia, despite the adverse speeches made by people from time to time, including the premier of British Columbia, 91 per cent of the people want a Charter of Rights and Freedoms entrenched; 71 per cent of the people want that entrenchment to take place within 12 months; and a great majority of them want these matters dealt with in the United Kingdom before the Constitution is patriated. Those are the facts.

Senator Flynn: Not so.

Senator Perrault: I am reminded of an observation made by the Right Honourable Joe Clark in Toronto shortly before the onset of these federal-provincial discussions, when he remarked in one of his greater speeches:

> The participants in Monday's conference speak for eleven governments. Parliament speaks for 23 million Canadians. If the First Ministers of the federation cannot make marked progress towards changes which fit the Canada of the 1980s, then the Parliament of the federation may have to assert a stronger role.

That is an official statement made by the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator van Roggen: It is the first time he was ever right.

Senator Perrault: Mr. Clark went on to say:

> But if it does, that must not be as the instrument of one government, but as the forum of all Canada.

Senator Flynn: Of one man.

Senator Perrault: Listen to what he said.

> Parliament, alone among institutions, reflects that country and can lift the discussion above the question of what governments need and focus on the question of what the nation needs.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Surely, this is the purpose of our efforts here today. It is time for the Parliament of Canada, whether one is serving in the Senate or in the other place, to look at this nation in light of its needs today and say what must be done in order to strengthen the country and not to be dissuaded by certain provincial voices who say, "Well, unless we receive this concession in this certain area, you will not receive our support for a Charter of Rights and Freedoms."

Most of the provincial premiers are not on the side of history today. It is the Parliament of Canada which is on the side of history and on the side of the Canadian people.

Senator Flynn: We will see about that in due course.

Senator Perrault: Last October the government tabled a proposed resolution in Parliament. This resolution was then studied by the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada which received over 1,000 submissions from Canadians across the country. I know there are many people who say, "Canadians aren't interested in the Constitution. They are only interested in the more important areas of jobs, inflation and so on, so why doesn't the government leave the good old B.N.A. Act the way it is, with the British being the custodians of our Constitution, and get on with more important matters?"

However, that committee received 1,000 submissions from thoughtful Canadians from coast to coast, of every party, of every ethnic background and religion. As a result of these representations, on January 12, 1981, the Honourable Jean Chrétien proposed further changes in this resolution which were very widely supported. They were supported by a cross-section consisting of such groups as the leading religious orders, women's organizations, native organizations and those concerned with the freedom and preservation of human rights in this country.

Additional amendments proposed by all parties in Parliament were subsequently made in the committee. All were designed to improve the measure. Finally, in February the government tabled in Parliament the motion which we are now debating. This motion and the proposals which I have made today in the form of an amendment reflect all the changes made by the special joint committee and, as a result, I think it can be said that we have a much improved constitutional proposal.

The basic substance of this resolution has clearly withstood the very severe test of parliamentary consideration and debate over a three-month period. Only a few additional changes are proposed and found to be desirable at this time, and these are found in the amendments to which approval was given last night in the other place and the amendments which have been proposed this morning in the Senate.

It is not suggested that this is a perfect measure, that the amendments meet all the present and future needs of Canadians. This is but a beginning of constitutional reform and change. I am pleased, for example, to propose an amendment which would incorporate in the Senate address the same changes, and I will explain briefly those changes in just a few moments. With regard to the process for making these changes, Parliament has agreed on the course to be followed.

In line with this, on April 15 the Senate adopted a motion which we finally, I believe, clarified this morning, providing for the arrangement for the Senate's disposition of the motion and any amendments to it. It is in accordance with this order that I have moved an amendment consisting of eight elements, four of which are substantive and four of which are technical. The first of the major elements is a preamble to the Charter of Rights which would recognize that Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God as well as the rule of law. I am sure all honourable senators will support that amendment. Reference to the supremacy of God has been proposed in response to representations made by Canadians of all faiths, whether they are of the Christian, the Jewish or any other heritage. Recognition of the supremacy of God is not restricted to one race or to one religion. This is a matter which I know many honourable senators are pleased to see dealt with in the proposed amendments. Reference to God is included, and I know it is something that all honourable senators can support.

• (1050)

I think the government has received a good deal of unjustified criticism on this point from opposition spokesmen—most of whom have convenient memories. People have forgotten that when the Canadian Bill of Rights was produced in 1961, the so-called "Diefenbaker Bill of Rights"—and the Honourable Senators Walker and Flynn will recall this—when that bill went to committee there was no reference to the supremacy of God. It was a Liberal, a former, distinguished, Leader of the Government in the Senate, then a member of Parliament, the great Honourable Paul Martin—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: —who moved an amendment to include a preamble recognizing the supremacy of God in the Bill of Rights, and Liberals were gratified when the Conservative Party supported that initiative.

Specific recognition that the charter is founded on the rule of law will be an important reminder to all legislators of their ultimate responsibility to their fellow Canadians, to ensure that they are protected from arbitrary government.

In addition to this preamble, it can be expected that future constitutional discussions will include the development of an appropriate preamble for the entire Constitution. Honourable senators are aware of the fact that there were very difficult drafting problems with the provincial premiers last year when an attempt was made to develop an acceptable preamble. A number of drafts were submitted by the provincial premiers and by the federal government, and the lack of consensus made it impossible to produce a preamble with general support across the country. We should have an appropriate preamble for the entire Constitution, reflecting more fully the nature, the founding principles, and the aspirations of Canadians. That is something that can be considered and dealt with when the Constitution has been patriated and when we have our own amending formula.

With regard to that amending formula, the government's intention was to enact, precisely, the formula that had been agreed upon in 1971 in Victoria, not because this is held in special esteem by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister or by the Liberal Party, but because it was the only formula ever developed in the history of Canada which, at one time, at least, had the support of all the premiers of the day. It was proposed as the best possible consensus, not as perfection.

Senator Asselin: Except Quebec.

Senator Perrault: It does not represent the first choice of the Right Honourable the Prime Minister or of most members of our party, but it was an attempt to say to the provinces, "This was the formula you felt best served your interests in 1971, and we offer it to you if all other alternatives are not available." We say, "Here is this formula, but you have two years of federal-provincial conferences to develop a formula which will be acceptable to yourselves and to the federal government and, surely, during two years of meetings we can achieve that modest objective."

The Victoria formula was agreed to by the provincial and the federal governments originally, including my own province of British Columbia.

When I listen to the Honourable William Bennett of British Columbia condemning the formula as some sort of eastern plot, as an attempt by a group of rapacious politicians in Ottawa to subvert the interests of westerners, I can only quote the words of his father in 1971 when, speaking to British Columbians, he said:

> British Columbia, as from the outset of the constitutional review, states the importance of reaching agreement on an appropriate amending formula coupled with patriation and was encouraged by the formula that was committed to writing and agreed to at our meeting.

The late Premier W. A. C. Bennett said that the Victoria formula was the best protector of western rights, and he urged the support of all British Columbians for the formula which is now condemned by his son as an attempt to thwart the ambitions or the rights and interests of the people of western Canada.

Honourable senators, you may say that times have changed. Yes, times have changed. Here was a premier more concerned with the protection of provincial rights than any other premier in Canada who chose the Victoria formula as a key instrument in reform.

I said, "Times have changed", and that is why there is a two-year period during which it is hoped that a new formula can be developed. That is why the constitutional proposals provide every possible mechanism to develop a different formula which will meet the needs of Canadians wherever they live.

As a result of strong representations made during consideration of the proposal by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, and outside the committee, one amendment proposed today would change the formula in respect of the western provinces to make that formula the same as it is in respect of the Atlantic provinces. Thus, the amending formula would be changed to drop the population requirement in western Canada and to treat western Canada in the same way as Atlantic Canada. In other words, amendments would be made with the approval of Parliament and any two provinces in western Canada, any two in Atlantic Canada, and the two provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

The third element proposed in the amendment package—and I am certain it will have the support of all parties in Parliament—would ensure that the Charter of Rights applies equally to men and women. That does not require any speech on my part or on the part of anyone else; we accept that.

Senator Donahoe: But you don't say that.

Senator Perrault: The change will remove any doubt about the intention that the Charter of Rights should apply equally to both sexes.

Senator Donahoe: Maybe, but the amendment does not say "men and women."

Senator Perrault: Finally, I am proposing an amendment that will ensure that the part of the proposed Constitution Act pertaining to aboriginal rights can only be amended through the general amending formula, thus giving greater assurance to the native peoples as to the entrenchment of their basic rights.

Senator Murray: Ask them.

Senator Perrault: Acceptance of these changes will enhance the protections already provided for in the government's constitutional motion for important groups of Canadians, and I hope that honourable senators will wish to approve all of these amendments.

Beyond this, I believe, there are no further changes which it would be timely to consider at this juncture, changes which cannot await further discussions on constitutional reform.

There is at least one impression abroad, that we are involved in a process that will lock in forever a Charter of Rights which may never be changed, amended or altered. That is not correct. When this Constitution is patriated, the process of change will be there with adequate protection through a Canadian amending formula.

The changes I am proposing have received careful examination and widespread support in the country, and I have no hesitation in recommending them at this time.

Honourable senators, a statement was made by the Leader of the Opposition a few moments ago. I note with interest that he has not moved a number of the measures proposed in the other place by members of his party, and I am certain that we are going to hear explanations later this morning of the reason. He has made reference to the institutional language rights and their relation to the province of Ontario.

● (1100)

He may be interested to know that the Prime Minister made a last minute appeal to the Premier of Ontario to bring about this change. That proposal was once again rejected by the Premier of Ontario, who is also the Leader of the Conservative Party in that province.

Senator Donahoe: So what?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator says, "So what?". May I give you the government's position on this matter, so that you can consider it?

The opposition proposes to apply the institutional language rights provisions of the charter to Ontario. Much as we would all wish to see these protections for the French language minority of Ontario included in the charter, the government has steadfastly maintained the position that it will not force institutional language rights on any province that does not request that.

I ask the honourable senator sitting in the back row, and who is so vocal today, whether he is prepared to stand up today and propose institutional language rights be imposed upon his native province. Does he want the people of his province to know that he wants the federal government to impose language rights on his province?

Senator Donahoe: My premier made no bargain.

Senator Perrault: That is correct, he did not make any bargain. I ask whether or not it is right for a national government to impose anything in this manner. Since only New Brunswick has thus far made such a request, that is why it is the only province included in clauses 16 to 20 of the Charter of Rights.

An Hon. Senator: You imposed education rights in my province.

Senator Perrault: Section 133 language rights continue to apply to Quebec and Manitoba, since these are historic, vested rights established in the Constitution.

Honourable senators, other remarks will be made by speakers for our party later in this debate. Time is getting along, and I do not wish to infringe upon the time of the Leader of the Opposition, but I should like to conclude by quoting from the remarks of Professor David Kwavnick of Carleton University who recently stated:

[Senator Perrault.]

> Inevitably, every measure which has the potential to unite us must begin by dividing us, precisely because the fundamental issues which touch the real long-term interests of the nation run up against the resistance of a deeply entrenched status quo.
> In Canada, we must confront . . . divisiveness to achieve the unity we all want. In this context, political wisdom is the ability to discern the real long-term interests of the nation while political courage is the willingness to act accordingly. And Canada exists today because wisdom and courage were found at crucial moments in our history.

So, perhaps we are being called upon to exercise a good degree of wisdom and courage at the present time. The nation is not without its problems, but perhaps it has the greatest potential of any nation on the face of the earth.

Honourable senators, in the full knowledge that the amendments do not represent ultimate perfection, but do represent improvement on the resolution which we have under consideration, I urge your support for them this morning.

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I thank the learned leader for singling me out for comment. I wish to tell him that for 20 years the Liberals opposed any Bill of Rights. He was not in the Commons in those days, but if Paul Martin at one time or another got up and said that he was in favour of God, I am sure everybody else had said so before. I can assure you that the Liberals were our greatest barrier. They did not want a Bill of Rights. I know that because I had something to do with the drafting of that Bill of Rights.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say in reply that the late Right Honourable John Diefenbaker said that his ultimate hope was to have a Bill of Rights entrenched in the Canadian Constitution. We are making reality of that great Diefenbaker dream of 1961, and previous years. Wherever Mr. Diefenbaker is—and I am sure he is in the sunny uplands—he would rejoice in what Parliament is doing today.

Senator Walker: He would also be glad from above to know that I am putting you right about the truth.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I said yesterday in the context of this continuing debate that four significant decisions had been taken recently: First, the decision of the courts and then the decision of Parliament to wait for the verdict of the Supreme Court before we take the final vote on this resolution. Third, the decision of Quebecers on April 13 last and, finally, the decision of the provincial premiers last week. As regards the court decisions, I do not want to dwell on the subject except for pointing out to the Leader of the Government that Mr. Diefenbaker never did want to impose forcibly the inclusion of a Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the Constitution because he always acknowledged that one could act unilaterally in that field. He had every respect for the rights of the provinces. That is the major difference between Messrs. John Diefenbaker and Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

In that respect, I said yesterday that the role of Westminster has changed completely since 1931, and especially since 1949. Westminster did not want to keep control over the Constitution, but at our request Westminster did accept to act as an arbitrator. Since 1949, in the four instances when the Constitution was amended through an Address to London—this has been repeated and I insist on saying it again—it was done with the unanimous cooperation of the provinces.

Getting back to the decision of April 13 last, yesterday evening I watched the vote being taken in the House of Commons. When I saw that not one of the members from Quebec rose to support the traditional position of Quebec which goes back to Jean Lesage, Robert Bourassa and earlier, I felt truly humiliated. In fact, this constitutional reform works mainly against Quebec. Because Quebec, having rejected the Fulton-Favreau formula in 1964, rightly or wrongly—today perhaps I would say wrongly—having rejected the Victoria formula in 1971—

Senator Frith: Not at the beginning.

Senator Flynn: Everybody knows that Mr. Bourassa had said yes and that later on he said no, just as Mr. Lesage had said yes and then said no. We are all agreed. But what I mean is that because they said no on both those occasions, if this resolution is legal, not only have we forced a patriating formula upon Quebec, but we have also imposed on that province the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the possibility of a referendum. We have provided the tools which will enable the federal government to gnaw at the rights of the provinces so that the position of Quebec is now twice as bad, with Mr. Trudeau's proposition which, to my mind, is directed more against Quebec than it would have been had Mr. Lesage accepted simple patriation with the amending formula in 1964, or had Mr. Bourassa agreed to the suggestion made at Victoria.

During the election campaign, Mr. Ryan told the Quebecers that they should elect him if they want Mr. Trudeau stopped in his tracks. In fact, we know full well that 90 per cent of all Quebecers oppose the unilateral move of Mr. Trudeau. They were caught between Mr. Ryan who, naturally, was against the unilateral decision, and Mr. Lévesque who also opposes it but who looked more aggressive during the campaign. The people in Quebec said no to Mr. Trudeau on April 14. Mr. Trudeau could not care less. It does not matter to him in the least. He is convinced Quebecers will continue to vote for him, even if he imposes something on them they have always refused. The situation is absolutely astounding, unbelievable.

Yesterday, I spoke of the shiftless Liberal herd in the other place. I saw them at work last night: they got up one after the other and not one of them supported the position adopted by all political parties in Quebec; not one of them had the courage to stand up and say no, you will not act in that way! Of course, there is still some hope: the Supreme Court, and, as I said yesterday, I am very confident.

Now to come back to the fourth decision, that of the premiers who got together, they were criticized but the fact remains that the premiers did come up with an amending formula. I fail to see how Mr. Trudeau would want to take a chance on the Supreme Court deciding against him, instead of meeting the premiers and trying to come to an agreement with them, at least on patriation and an amending formula.

It is unbelievable that he should think he is the only one who is right. It is incredible that he should say, I shall show them, one after the other. I shall use the majority in the house. Thank God, here in the Senate, the debate went on in an atmosphere of far greater freedom. I am happy to see that several senators opposite were not afraid to oppose the unilateral action of Mr. Trudeau.

In any event, we are now coming to the end of this intermediate stage. I find it amusing to see representatives of the media in the galleries because last night on the French network of the CBC, it was reported that the debate was over, that the resolution was on its way to the Supreme Court. The newspapers said the same thing this morning. The Senate has been totally ignored. This probably coincides with the interpretation of the role of the Senate given yesterday by Senator Paul Lucier, who said: "What shall we do if the Senate does not come to the same decision as the House of Commons?" What would happen? Of course, Senator Lucier's rubber stamp philosophy is a generally accepted one and this is unfortunately confirmed by the somewhat rigid discipline which prevails in this house even though to a lesser degree, I will admit it, than in the other place.

I asked earlier for leave to put on the record the amendments that I wanted to move. If there is no objection, I shall do so now. I intend to say a few words concerning these amendments. As I indicated, we would like to extend to Ontario the system already applicable to Quebec, New Brunswick and Manitoba. We would not impose this system directly, no more in fact than the balance of the charter, because we provide, in amending section 63, that the law may be enacted only after seven provinces, or at least two thirds of the provinces, whose population represents at least 50 per cent of the population of Canada according to the latest census, will have given their approval. The law will be enacted only after two thirds of the legislative assemblies will have accepted to implement the provisions of the legislation with respect to both the Charter and its provisions concerning linguistic rights, and so on, and not before. This seems to me like a reasonable amendment. Even then I would add that were the Senate to accept this amendment to section 63, the Supreme Court would perhaps consider the resolution in a more favourable way. There is no doubt that the proposal now provides for an absolute imposition, while, with this amendment, the proposed amending formula would provide for the coming into force of the legislation.

In any event, we are submitting this amendment because we have always held as a basic principle for amending the Constitution that the federal level could not act nor impose solutions unilaterally.

I hope that this alternative will be retained, especially in the interests of Quebec, which actually is very much affected by this proposal. The resolution makes a mock of Quebec. It tells Quebec: "You insisted on saying no in 1964 and 1971. Now, you will have to swallow not only an amending formula that you do not want, but also the charter and the referendum provisions".

I hope that the arguments on the legal aspects of the resolution expressed in this house—and I want to single out the contribution of Senator Lang yesterday—will prevail, and that the Supreme Court will rule that Mr. Trudeau has no right to act as he intends to do.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, may I ask—

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Before giving you the floor, I wonder if the Leader of the Opposition has any objection to these amendments being included in his speech.

Senator Flynn: This is just what I had asked earlier, if honourable senators agree.

The Hon. the Speaker: In the speech itself?

Senator Flynn: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Very well.

(For text of proposed amendments see Appendix "A", p. 2398.)

Senator Frith: I would like to ask a question for clarification and not for argumentation. The fifth provision would replace section 63 of Part VIII by something else. Am I right in assuming that if we vote for your proposed amendment we would be voting for two elements? First, there is the element about section 133 which concerns Ontario, and, secondly—

Senator Flynn: All the rest.

Senator Frith: There is much more than the imposition of section 133. It is another amending formula, is it not? The result is that the whole act, not just section 133, will not become effective until the approval of the seven provinces has been given. In other words, there are two aspects—section 133 and the amending formula of the premiers. There are those two aspects, are there not?

Senator Flynn: In other words, we are saying, "We are not imposing that thing on you unless seven out of ten provinces accept it."

Senator Frith: You are saying a little bit more than that. You are actually saying: we are not imposing anything in this act not even section 133 without the approval of the seven provinces or 50 per cent of the people.

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators—

[English]

Senator Argue: I believe I was next on the list.

Senator Asselin: I thought you made a speech.

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Frith: It was a question for the purpose of clarification.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I have a question of privilege honourable Senators. It is the second time since yesterday that someone has taken my turn. Is there actually an attempt to silence me?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have requested permission to put a question to the Leader of the Opposition for clarification. He agreed and I then asked my question. Was I right in saying that there were two elements. He said yes. That was only a question, not a speech.

[English]

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, with that important clarification, I would like to contribute to this debate. I realize that time is very limited, and I know there are other senators who would like to participate, so I will be as brief as possible.

• (1120)

This is, of course, an historic time for Canada, and I am honoured—as I know other honourable senators are honoured—to be part of this process. Canada is particularly fortunate at this time to have as its Prime Minister the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau, who has a broad vision of this country and its needs, who has shown himself to be an outstanding leader, and who took the leadership in the Quebec referendum to win for Canada at that time a resounding victory.

To be shown his wisdom, foresight and agility, one need only refer to Hansard of the other place for yesterday evening to see that, in the main, behind the proposed constitutional amendments are two of the national parties of this country; and if one wishes to appreciate the degree of support in this country, he has only to look at the votes taken in the House of Commons last night. It is pretty clear that an overwhelming proportion of the elected members of this country on the national scene support the proposition that is before us today.

Senator Flynn: You have no mandate.

Senator Roblin: No mandate at all.

Senator Argue: The mandate is there, because there has been a continuing endeavour over the years to bring the Constitution home—

Senator Asselin: No.

Senator Argue: It is not a change of policy; it is a continuation of a Liberal Party policy that has existed for many years.

Senator Flynn: Not so.

Senator Argue: I want to add my voice to those who have said that the senators have played a distinguished role in this process. Senator Hays, as has been mentioned, was a joint chairman of the committee. Senator Austin took a leading role. I should like to pay tribute to my leader in the Senate. I have worked with him for over a year in the cabinet, and I have worked with him in the Senate for a long time. He is an outstanding government leader in the Senate. In my view, the accomplishments of the Senate, in no small measure, are a tribute to his foresight, his courage and his vision with regard to the duties he has to perform.

The debate is going well. The vote is going well. A few weeks ago, to read the newspapers, to listen to the debate, one would have thought that the proposition that was put forward by the government was in deep trouble.

Senator Flynn: It still is.

Senator Argue: When the Prime Minister put forward his proposals for constitutional amendment, the outcry was that it was a one-man show.

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Argue: The outcry was that this man is rigid.

Senator Flynn: True.

Senator Argue: That he will not listen to suggestions for change.

Senator Flynn: That's true.

Senator Argue: I said in this chamber earlier, and I say again, that I have watched the Prime Minister in action. He listens very carefully to suggestions that are made. The fact that 67 amendments came out of that joint committee is a demonstration of the fact that this man and the government are able to look at all points of view and make important changes. Amendments were made in the other place last night. So I think we can be proud of the process. We can be proud to be living in Canada, because all of us have the privilege to take part in this process, and it has resulted in many changes. It has resulted in—

Senator Flynn: Closure.

Senator Argue: Well, now, closure—I suppose if it were left to the opposition, they would enforce on the majority their opinion that no vote should be taken. So it was Tory obstruction. However, there was an agreement. It was very wise, and I believe the Leader of the Opposition in the other place was part of that agreement.

I believe that we are forging an important consensus in Canada in support of this package, and supporting it, of course, are two national political parties, two provinces, and the decisions of two courts.

Senator Asselin: What about the CCF?

Senator Argue: I am confident that when the Supreme Court decision is known, there will be a further resounding majority support for the proposition that this resolution should be completed.

The provincial premiers came to Ottawa a few days ago. They were to agree on something. They agreed on almost nothing.

Senator Flynn: You are not serious.

Senator Argue: The surprising part of that agreement, for me as a resident of Saskatchewan, is that the Premier of Saskatchewan should be prepared to discard all of the things he had accomplished by way of amendment in the proposed proposition. He was willing to forget about equalization, which has been fundamental to the operation of this country. He forgot about any provision in the Constitution that would say that provincial governments, where the per capital income was lower than the average, would receive equalization payments. The Premier of Saskatchewan was prepared to forget about that.

He worked hard and diligently to get many amendments accepted on the question of resources, of provincial control and ownership of resources. He obtained indirect taxation as provided for in this resolution. He obtained shared jurisdiction over interprovincial trade. This was so important to the Premier of Saskatchewan that large ads were placed in the newspapers in that province, such as the one headed: "Your resources and the Constitution." I will read only one sentence:

> Since resources are so important to Saskatchewan, an amended constitution must guarantee the province's jurisdiction over resource management.

One would think that the fight over the Constitution was in Saskatchewan. The ads are out there and a lot of provincial money is being spent. So far as Ottawa is concerned, there have been no matching ads and no federal money.

When the Premier of Saskatchewan got to Ottawa a few days ago, he forgot about the question of resources in the Constitution. When he was answering a reporter, he had this to say:

> I have to swallow twice when I say resources can wait.

But he thought they were so important that he spent the taxpayers' money in Saskatchewan trying to convince the Saskatchewan electorate that he was on the right course, and Blakeney disowned Blakeney. The money was obviously wasted because he changed his course.

Senator Flynn: Trudeau did the same thing with the Constitution.

Senator Argue: He has apparently disowned—or he thinks it is of little value—this question of resources in the Constitution, because he said he is prepared to forget about it.

The next whipping institution was the Senate. Well, he went after the Senate. There were more paid ads, more expenditure of taxpayers' money. Here is what he said about the Senate, in part:

> Saskatchewan's position: We cannot support a resolution which entrenches in our Constitution such broad and unlimited powers for an appointed body. It is totally unreasonable and unacceptable that the Senate should be allowed to thwart the will of Canadians.

Then he forgot about the question of the Senate, because he said, "Well, you know, it doesn't matter so long as you get the Constitution home with some kind of agreement on an amending formula." He was asked about the Senate, and here is his reply:

> The difference this time is that if there is a substantial measure of agreement on the Constitution, I don't think the Senate will raise the same objections. How could it hold the same view in the face of widespread federal-provincial agreement?

The fact of the matter is that the Senate has never been obstructionist.

The fact of the matter is that painting the Senate as a body that would thwart the will of Canadians gives a false picture. It is inaccurate. I believe that the Premier of Saskatchewan has demonstrated that his ads were window dressing—a sham, but an expensive sham. He didn't support what was in the ads.

This is a debate on the Constitution. The constitutional proposals are going forward. They are going forward with broad support of the Canadian public—

Senator Flynn: They may never come back.

Senator Argue: The media is starting to say that this proposal is a good one, and if the Supreme Court should decide that the federal Parliament has the right and the authority to make this proposal, and to send it to the United Kingdom, then I forecast that it will pass there; the necessary legislation will pass, and it will come back to Canada. Canadians generally will then acknowledge that it was the Liberal Party, assisted by the New Democratic Party—

• (1130)

Senator Asselin: You speak like Broadbent did yesterday. It is the same thing.

Senator Argue: These are facts. You cannot make me responsible for the fact that the Tories are completely irresponsible and have been playing the cheapest kind of politics.

They talked about separatism in the west, and everybody got excited about it. The Prime Minister said he did not think separatism was a real threat out there, and was roundly criticized for saying this when it was being said that the separatists were out there running wild in their thousands.

The man who has been leading separatism in the west, a man by the name of Elmer Knutson, started out with some big meetings. The first one, in Calgary, had 1,500 people present. When he tried a little later to get 300 people in the same auditorium, he set out 300 chairs. All he got, however, were two dozen. Nobody was paying any attention to him, and so he went to the Conservative Party convention in Alberta as a registerd delegate, and they took him in.

Senator Flynn: They took you, too.

Senator Argue: With regard to the Conservative convention, I find this in the news report:

> Attorney-General Neil Crawford said in an interview he did not think the party could expel a member who advocates the breakup of the country although it expelled Calgary MLA Tom Sindlinger last fall for disagreeing with the party—

So it is all right to be a separatist, I guess, in the Conservative Party, but you must not disagree with Premier Lougheed's policies.

[Senator Argue.]

The distinguished Leader of the Opposition was in the House of Commons for years, and has been in the Senate for many years. He had a very distinguished leader in the House of Commons, namely, the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker. On July 1, 1960, Mr. Diefenbaker was proposing his Bill of Rights. He said, in part:

> All of us hope that when the bill of rights is passed it will represent a forward step. It will not go as far as I would have liked it to go.

Further on he said:

> To wait for a constitutional amendment is to wait for years to come—

Mr. Diefenbaker, I believe, would have been happy with the progress that is being made today.

Senator Smith: He was willing to wait.

Senator Argue: He would have been happy to see placed in the Constitution of this country a Charter of Rights. A charter that provides legal rights in this country.

Senator Smith: You are a great mind-reader.

Senator Argue: He would have been glad to see a charter that would provide rights for men and women on an equal basis, and also for ethnic people. I can tell you that for the ethnic people of Canada—and perhaps that includes almost all of us, since we are a people of so many diverse origins—the amendment that ensures them the right to preserve their culture is extremely important, as I think it is important to Canada.

I think we are travelling in pretty good company, led by the Prime Minister. There are others who have been in favour of a Charter of Rights, the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker among them. There are a number of leading persons in the New Democratic Party that do not agree with the Premier of Saskatchewan, including his national leader. The Premier of Saskatchewan had an emergency council of the party called, I have read, because he wanted to change their position. He lost that battle, as he has been losing the others. Tommy Douglas, a former leader of the federal national Democratic Party—

Senator Flynn: He was your leader.

Senator Argue: Let me read from the Prince Albert Herald.

> Tommy Douglas, former leader of the federal New Democratic Party and once CCF Premier of Saskatchewan, supports the federal government's plan to repatriate the constitution.
>
> In a private interview with The Herald, Douglas said he wants civil rights entrenched in the constitution in order to prevent "some provincial legislature" from taking them away.

He went on to say:

> Trudeau's two-hour speech on the government's constitutional proposals will go down in history with speeches by George Brown on Confederation, Sir Wilfred Laurier's speech on Canadian-British relations and John Diefenbaker's on the Bill of Rights.

Senator Smith: Why do you not say something for yourself?

Senator Argue: I am speaking for myself. Tommy Douglas has answered the Premier of Saskatchewan by saying that the Premier of Saskatchewan has taken a wrong position. Premier Blakeney has wasted public money in advertising certain changes in the Constitution, and then denying those ads himself.

We have only another few minutes to engage in discussion on this question.

Senator Smith: Are you going to take them all?

Senator Argue: If you want to help me take them all up by interrupting, go ahead. Otherwise, I will conclude quickly.

I believe that when the vote is taken in the Senate today, when the Supreme Court decision is made, when the decision of the United Kingdom Parliament is made and the Constitution comes back to Canada, together we will have been responsible for bringing our Constitution home, with all the far-sighted elements that are provided in it. This repatriation of the Constitution will be another great step forward in the development of this country, and in the establishment of national unity from coast to coast.

I am proud to have taken part in this debate today.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I did not think that in the end my friends opposite would make such partisan speeches as the one just made by Senator Argue, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

The fact is that we, in Quebec, have been experiencing a political reality for almost fifteen or sixteen years. Since 1966 or 1967, or since the Liberal Party has been in power in Canada, we have been facing the problem of separatism in Quebec.

Since then, as a result of confrontations and of a lack of cooperation on the part of federal authorities, especially the federal government, separatism has developed in Quebec. We had further proof of this in the last election—

Senator Frith: This is not partisan!

Senator Asselin: On April 13 last, Quebecers voted for the Parti Québécois. Why? Well, because it was the only party in a position to protect them against Ottawa's encroachment on provincial jurisdictions and especially on Quebec's rights. This is precisely why Quebecers re-elected the Quebec government on April 13.

However, this is not the gist of my comments. When I was a member of the Committee on the Constitution as a representative of my party, I pointed out on several occasions the unfairness of the non-application of Section 133 to Ontario. Honourable senators, I will always remember the many times I raised the matter, my friends on the government side simply told me to move a motion which would be voted on.

But I would tell them: "Well, as you are in charge of these committee proceedings, it is your responsibility as representatives of the government to move a motion calling for the application to Ontario of section 133 with regard to the use of the French language". They have always refused to do so.

Now I should like to thank the honourable senators of my party, who understand the situation, for their patience. I did not want to let this unique opportunity pass—it may not present itself again for 20 or 25 years—without the Parliament of Canada making its views known on such vital issues. That is why I am grateful to the leader of my party in the Senate, Senator Flynn, for moving this amendment on my behalf and on behalf of Senator Deschatelets who had agreed to second and co-sponsor this amendment mostly with a view to depoliticizing the issue.

Let all senators, whether they sit on the government or the opposition side, vote according to their conscience and in complete freedom! It is with this in mind that Senator Deschatelets has agreed to co-sponsor the amendment which the Leader of the Opposition has move on our behalf. As you know, I was prevented by the Order of the Senate, and so was Senator Deschatelets, to move the amendment; we had to proceed through the Leader of the Opposition. I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition shares our opinion about this.

I am also pleased that this amendment has been moved because I wanted to do justice to the honourable members of the other place who were unable to move a similar amendment in the House of Commons.

You know what efforts Mr. Robert Gauthier and other honourable members from Quebec as well as Ontario have made, what steps they took to have their caucus accept the possibility of moving in the House of Commons the amendment you now have before you. That right, that authorization was denied them. That is why, and I repeat it, that is, to do justice to my colleagues of the House of Commons for whom this was a gut issue, as it is for me also, we are moving the amendment to section 133 which stands before you.

It is also to remedy the injustice done to 600,000 Ontario francophones who cannot use their own language in dealing with government services, the courts of justice and Crown corporations. As far as the courts are concerned, only in criminal courts are French and English interpretation allowed and the judges can try francophone criminals in their own language. To be entitled to simultaneous interpretation in Ontario, you have to be a criminal if you are a francophone. This right does not apply in civil courts of law.

This amendment is also meant to show Quebecers are right in the outstanding way in which they treat their anglophone minority in Quebec. Never has a minority been dealt with so adequately as the anglophone minority of Quebec. During the election campaign, Quebecers showed they were fed up with the fact that the unfairness with which francophone minorities in the other provinces are treated is not being remedied. That is why also many Quebecers voted for the Parti Québécois, to protest publicly, officially, against this attitude of our representatives in Ottawa who have been refusing for so long to redress the injustices being committed against the French speaking minorities outside Quebec. That is why also we have moved the amendment that is before you.

Honourable senators, I know Senator Deschatelets wishes to address this amendment. I appeal to your goodwill, to your sense of freedom. Wrongs have to be redressed from time to time and important decisions must be made. Bilingualism is official in New Brunswick because the provincial government decided to comply with section 133. The Supreme Court also ruled that Manitoba had a duty to comply with section 133.

There are 600,000 French Canadians in Ontario and yet they are deprived of the right to use their language, despite the fact that a recent Gallup poll showed that most Ontarians were in favour of applying section 133 in the name of justice for Franco-Ontarians. If there is one place where injustices committed against minority groups in this country can be redressed it is certainly here in the Senate. It is often said that the Senate is an institution whose purpose it is to redress injustices and provide minorities with the rights and privileges that belong to them. This morning we have a unique opportunity to do this. I am certain that the Canadian people are going to examine and scrutinize very closely the vote that will be taken to see if the Senate is still pursuing its avowed objectives and aims, namely that of protecting the minority groups of this country who have been wrongfully treated such as Franco-Ontarians.

Senator Lamontagne: Honourable senators, I would simply like to ask one question of Senator Asselin. Does he not recognize that in its present form the amendment will in no way force Ontario to comply with section 133?

Senator Asselin: That is quite right. It does not force section 133 on Ontario. That was not our aim either. We have always been of the opinion that neither the federal government nor Parliament should act unilaterally. That is why we added a clause pursuant to section 63. It is as simple as that.

• (1140)

[English]

Hon. Jack Austin: I would like to ask Senator Asselin whether he can make up his mind between real justice for the francophones of Ontario and his notion of justice with respect to the provinces?

Some Hon. Senators: Order, order!

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, with leave I should like to speak for a minute or two.

I agreed to support this amendment of the Honourable Senator Asselin, through the Leader of the Opposition, for two reasons: first, this amendment will redress an anomaly, an injustice, considering that anglophones in Quebec have enjoyed such advantages since 1867. It goes without saying that at a time when we are proposing a new Constitution, in 1981, the largest minority in Ontario should, in all fairness, be able to address its legislature and testify before Ontario courts in the French language. Indeed I am very surprised that this constitutional resolution does not already provide for such a corrective measure and that we are forced today to proceed through an amendment.

Honourable senators, neither in the other place, nor in the Senate, nor in the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution have we had an accurate, reasonable and acceptable explanation as to why the Province of Ontario should not be subjected to section 133.

I was listening this morning to the Leader of the Government when he tried to provide certain explanations, but they certainly did not answer the following question which a majority of Quebecers are now asking: Why should this Charter impose unilaterally on Quebec provisions which infringe upon its exclusive right to legislate on linguistic and educational matters if by the same principle Ontario is not forced to accept at least institutional bilingualism? I have found no satisfactory or valid answer neither here nor in the other place nor in the joint committee.

Thus, honourable senators, today we have the opportunity to correct an injustice and I invite my honourable colleagues to give very careful attention to the decision they will make. For my part, it was not only a pleasure for me to support this motion this morning, but as a Quebec citizen, I believe that it was also my duty.

• (1150)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I was asked a question regarding the imposition of certain language rights.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to the order of the Senate, all debate is to stop at noon. If there is unanimous agreement that we continue the debate, then I am at the pleasure of honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Pursuant to the special order, I must now put the question on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Perrault, P.C. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Previously I indicated that because of the basket nature of these amendments, my party does not feel that it would be proper for us to voice our approval. Of course, there are some elements with which we agree but, under the circumstances, we must ask leave to abstain from voting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to rule 49(1)(c), any senator may decline to vote. However, I do not believe that the rule permits a mass abstention. It provides for individual assigning of reasons before the senators may be excused from voting.

Senator Flynn: I was merely attempting to simplify the procedure.

Senator Frith: Each senator must give a reason.

Senator Flynn: I just told you that the reason is the basket nature of the amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to rule 49(1)(c), each senator must indicate his or her intention to abstain and give the reasons for so doing, to which the Senate must agree. However, if honourable senators have another procedure to propose, I will listen.

Senator McIlraith: Honourable senators, in accordance with the provisions of rule 49(1) and 49(1)(c), I ask to be excused from voting on these amendments for the reason that, as honourable senators know, in a lengthy speech on March 17 in the Senate, I indicated my opposition to the main motion on grounds of principle concerning several parts of the main proposal. My voting either for or against these amendments as presented today, particularly in view of the speech of the Leader of the Government, might well be misconstrued as a change of view on the matters of principle I set out in my speech on the main motion. The substance and points of opposition still remain, and it is, therefore, in my view, desirable that I refrain from voting on the amendments before us.

The Hon. the Speaker: Shall the senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. According to the order of the Senate, the vote is to be put at 12 noon. Of course, the vote could be delayed if every single senator rises to ask for leave to abstain. I believe that the question should be put according to the order and that we should have our vote, during which honourable senators may abstain, if they wish.

Senator Cook: The rules say that we have a right to ask for permission to abstain, and I want to abstain.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators who do not wish to vote, do not have to vote. The point is that the rule which is being invoked is dealt with in the order which says that the order itself shall prevail, notwithstanding any rule to the contrary. The order provides for a vote at 12 noon and I suggest that we have that vote.

Senator Cook: Whether you vote or do not vote is part of the vote.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the rules do not permit a debate on a request to be excused from voting. As to the comments of the Deputy Leader of the Government, the abstentions cannot be called before the vote. Each senator has the right to abstain, but I do not believe that I can allow a mass abstention, as suggested by the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Flynn: I merely wanted to save time.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. It has been said that the order of the Senate supersedes our rules as they stand. I suggest this is not so because it is clearly defined in our rules that an order of the Senate is an order by majority vote. Our rules make it equally clear that the rules cannot be suspended by a majority vote, but only by leave of the Senate.

Senator Frith: Look at paragraph 9.

Senator Grosart: I am making my point of order, and the honourable senator may make his once I am finished. I say that the rules are very clear in stating that an order of the Senate may not be used as a means of suspending the rules.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, coming back to the question of Senator McIlraith's abstention, shall the senator, for the reasons assigned by him, be excused from voting?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if honourable senators must indicate their stand on this matter before the vote is called, then I wish to be included among those who wish to abstain from voting, for the same reasons expressed by those who spoke previously.

• (1200)

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, with great respect, may I suggest that the reason for this disagreement is not really very valid? If the vote is called when His Honour the Speaker calls the yeas and nays, then there is nothing that can prevent a senator from saying that he wishes to be excused from voting at that moment.

Senator Perrault: Correct.

Senator Molson: Then the vote will be called at noon, and the senator's privilege to decline to vote is still available to him. We are not breaking the rules; we are not breaking the agreement; we will just carry on in a smooth way.

The Hon. the Speaker: The solution proposed by Senator Molson seems very reasonable.

Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion in amendment moved by Senator Perrault please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Some Hon. Senators: The "nays"?

The Hon. the Speaker: The "yeas".

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Senator Molson: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the vote has been called, I should now like to ask to be excused from voting on any amendments to the resolution.

My reasons are that, while some elements of the amendments are desirable, particularly those applying to the extension of section 133 of the B.N.A. Act to the province of Ontario, which should be enshrined, I find it impossible to vote for the amendments en bloc or in an omnibus fashion, as I have already stated in this chamber that I am against the main resolution, in principle.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Lang: May I also ask to be excused from voting on this resolution today? I think I amply provided my reasons to this chamber yesterday afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Thompson: Honourable senators, I also ask to be excused. I could enlarge on my reasons, but I think Senator McIlraith and two other senators, Senators Molson and Lang, have expressed my reasons adequately.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I ask leave to be excused from voting, largely for the reasons elaborated on by Senator McIlraith, but also because of remarks that have been made, not in this chamber but elsewhere, that those who support these amendments might be inferred to be supporting the main resolution, and I have not yet decided whether I am prepared to do that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bell: Honourable senators, I beg to be excused from voting on the amendments for the reasons put forward. I believe that yesterday evening I made it quite clear that it would be impossible for me to support the main motion. Therefore, considering the aspect of consistency, I feel I cannot support the amendments.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Lafond: Since I cannot accept that a Charter of Rights and Freedoms for Canadians which is premature should be dealt with and ratified in Westminster, I will object to the resolution as such.

I therefore ask the Senate, pursuant to our Standing Order 49(1)c) to be excused from voting on the amendments to the resolution.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[English]

Senator Cook: Honourable senators, I also ask to be excused from voting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I want to make sure that, in the lumping together of senators' names who have asked to be excused, my name is not lost. I wish to be recorded as abstaining.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Flynn: I also ask to be excused, for the reasons I have already given.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, may I be excused?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Macdonald: Honourable senators, I also ask to be excused.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Asselin: For the same reasons, honourable senators, I ask to be excused.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Fournier: Honourable senators, I also ask to be excused.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I, too, ask to be excused.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bielish: Honourable senators, for the same reasons, I ask to be excused.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, for the same reasons, I ask to be excused.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I also ask to be excused, for the same reasons.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: With the consent of the honourable senators, I ask to be excused from voting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[English]

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I also wish to abstain from voting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Muir: I ask to be excused, honourable senators, for the reasons given by Senator McIlraith and by my leader.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Grosart: Honourable senators, I request leave to abstain because, for the reason I have stated, I believe the Senate is completely out of order in not following its rule that these motions be voted on seriatim.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Senator Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I rise to make a point clear. I insist on voting on Senator Asselin's amendment. I am not yet asking to be excused.

[English]

Senator Hicks: But we are not dealing with that one now.

Senator Deschatelets: Very well.

HONOURABLE SALTER A. HAYDEN

FELICITATIONS ON RETURN TO CHAMBER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, one of Canada's most distinguished parliamentarians is, of course, our own Senator Salter A. Hayden, the dean of this chamber. I know that I express the views of all honourable senators when I welcome him back and when I say that he looks extremely well and obviously restored to his usual good health and sound constitution. We look forward to a renewed and very productive relationship with him in the months and years to come. We have missed him very much.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It is with great pleasure that I join the Leader of the Government in welcoming you back, Senator Hayden. We missed you very much; we need you very much; and we hope that you will resume your duties—but do take it easy, if necessary, because we want you to be with us for a long time to come. All of us on this side are also happy to have you back.

Hon. Salter A. Hayden: Honourable senators, it was an unusual experience for me not to have been present in the Senate for a period of nearly six months. Usually my attendance has been regular and has conformed to the requirements of the rules. I am not admitting how many of the rules I may not exactly and to the full extent have conformed to, but I am happy to be here once again.

I can tell you that at times, knowing what was going on here, this is where I wanted to be because this is where the action is. However, it was not possible.

I have been very fortunate because I have no disabilities or illnesses of any kind. Some of my friends are shocked when I tell them that the only problem I have is that I have developed what is called a "veer to the left." I said, "Don't give that any publicity because my friends would be upset to think that it was possible for me, with my history and performance, to go in that direction." However, I did, and the problem has been one of adjusting. Determination helps somewhat. Some of my friends said, "Well, you don't suffer from any lack of that."

It was pleasant to receive your greetings tonight, and the letters and telephone calls, and the inquiries that were made, directly and indirectly, by senators. Several senators who happened to be in Toronto even visited me in hospital. They all came to the same conclusion, that there was still life in the animal and his thinking processes did not seem to have been adversely affected by the veering disability he seemed to have acquired. It is still there to some extent, but I have learned how to check it.

• (2005)

Enough of talking about myself and my illnesses. It is wonderful to be back and to be reunited with my friends. The Senate has a way of converting political opponents into friends, even very close friends, and they do not suffer any deterioration of their political outlook in the matters they put forward. This is a measure of their right to be friends with whom they choose. Over the years, I have wanted to be friends with everyone in the Senate. To me, the Senate has a very important place in the history of Canada and, therefore, the members of this chamber occupy a most honourable position.

As to what the future holds, your guess is as good as mine. I should like to feel that I could resume my position, with the duties and responsibilities it entails. However, I do not have complete control over that situation, although you would be surprised at the role determination plays in that regard. The decision in this regard has yet to be made.

The one thing I have definitely decided is that if I am unable, I am not going to attempt to do the things I have done to date. At the moment, I see no reason why I should not be able to carry on, but things are uncertain and can change very quickly.

Realizing all this, I reserve my position until some future time, and I shall govern myself accordingly. In the meantime, I hope to be reasonably regular in my attendance at sittings of the Senate and at meetings of the committees of the Senate on which I serve as a member.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sure that neither leader will object if I subscribe entirely to their statements which recite very well the feelings of all honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—PROPOSED OPPOSITION AMENDMENTS OF FRIDAY, APRIL 24, 1981, PRINTED AS APPENDIX

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before proceeding further I should like to make a brief statement.

During the last sitting of the Senate, on Friday, April 24, 1981, the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C. intended to move certain amendments to the motion that an Address be presented to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada. Those amendments were not moved, but, as indicated on page 2372 of Debates of the Senate, it was agreed that they should be included in Senator Flynn's speech.

Through inadvertence, those amendments did not appear in the Debates of that day, and it is now suggested that they be printed as an appendix to today's proceedings.

Is this procedure agreeable to honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Douglas D. Everett, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday, May 27, 1981, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may we have an explanation?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, we had arranged to have the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Ian Stewart, appear at 9.30 next Thursday morning. Unfortunately, he has had to cancel that appearance, and it is rescheduled for the following Wednesday at 2.30 p.m. We are hopeful that the Senate will permit us to meet at that time.

There will be a number of distinguished witnesses appearing before the committee next week. On Tuesday at 1.30 p.m. the Governor of the Bank of Canada will appear; on Wednesday at 2.30 p.m. the Deputy Minister of Finance will appear; and on Thursday at 9.30 a.m. the President of the Treasury Board will appear. It will be a most interesting week.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

REAL DISPOSABLE INCOME OF CANADIANS—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to inquire of the Leader of the Government respecting a statement made in the other place by a prominent spokesman for the present administration, namely, the Prime Minister.

● (2015)

As reported at page 9633 of Commons Hansard of May 15, the Prime Minister said that the real disposable income of Canadians had risen between 1970 and 1980 by 50 per cent—that is, that the real disposable income of Canadians had gone up. He went on to say that Canadians are 50 per cent better off on the average in 1980 than they were in 1970.

Honourable senators, I understand that sometimes the Delphic statements of the honourable gentleman require a little exegesis, and I suspect that one of the representatives of the cabinet on the other side can give us that explanation. What is the source of this statement of the Prime Minister, and on what basis does he rest his claim of the 50 per cent increase in the well-being of Canadians in economic terms in the 10-year period 1970-80?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister has very correctly pointed out that despite some adverse economic circumstances which afflict the world today—and certainly Canada is part of this general economic malaise—there are some very encouraging indices which indicate that, by comparison with many other nations, our unemployment performance, while not satisfactory, is certainly better than had been anticipated by some of the critics, and the disposable income of Canadians has certainly increased over a period of time. When the honourable senator asks the source of that information, obviously that question must be taken as notice, but my colleague in cabinet, the Honourable Senator Olson, may wish to comment.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, on the narrow question as to what is the source of the calculation in the conclusion that the honourable senator attributes to the Prime Minister, obviously I will have to ask for that information, but if my honourable friend would like me to give him—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Answer the question.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Why don't you try to answer the question? You don't know the answer.

Senator Olson: —a long list setting out the economic expansion and the increase in the standard of living that has taken place in Canada over this decade—a time when this party was in office except for a nine-month interruption; it is a proud and distinguished record—I shall try to do so.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I can assist him in his research by giving him some of the facts that could have been given in the other place by the Prime Minister. With respect to the question of unemployment that was introduced into the discussion by the Leader of the Government, I should ask him to observe that unemployment in Canada in the period from 1976 to 1980 was worse than in any other of the major countries for whom statistics are kept—France, Germany, Italy, Japan, the United Kingdom and the United States. So much for that argument. The source is Statistics Canada. These figures were given to us this afternoon by the Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, which is a pretty good source.

Let me tell my honourable friend something about incomes in Canada. Real wages—that is, the real spending power of money—in 1972, 1971 dollars, averaged $6,694 per employed person. In 1980 they averaged $7,234 per employed person, an increase of $540. That is a long way from the 50 per cent increase. If my honourable friend suggests that the new base of 1970 would provide a 50-per-cent increase, I would be delighted to see him prove it because I do not believe it to be so. The fact is that the real wages per employed person in the period 1972-75 went up by 3.3 per cent, and in the period 1976-80 they went down by 3.3 per cent.

Senator Olson: Has my honourable friend read the rules about how to ask questions?

Senator Perrault: I have a suggestion for the honourable senator. I rise on a point of order. We would welcome a debate in this chamber on the state of the economy. If the honourable senator wishes to introduce a resolution which would enable honourable senators—

Senator Asselin: Why don't you introduce it yourself?

Senator Perrault: —to participate in a full debate on this subject, we would welcome that initiative.

Senator Asselin: You are asking the opposition to do your work.

Senator Perrault: This government is not ashamed of its efforts to stimulate the Canadian economy and provide a better life for Canadians, but I find it appalling that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition would take almost vindicative glee in citing all the negative reports and rumours he has been able to dredge up from any direction. Let us have a full debate and, let there be a full opportunity for facts to be put on the record rather than mere allegations.

● (2020)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is pretty clear that we should have a debate on this, and that is fine, but my friend really ought to give a good example to the rest of those people on the other side who have been getting away with this kind of foolishness for a long time.

Citation 357 in the Fifth Edition of Beauchesne, which is to be found at page 129, says very clearly that the purpose of a question is to obtain information and not to supply it to the house. That is clear. This is Question Period, not a mini-debate period. The citation goes on to say that a question, oral or written, must not—and I guess my friend has forgotten the word "not"—be a speech, however short, nor be of unreasonable length. There are many other prohibitions. My honourable friend knows that he is violating every one of the rules by which we have tried to keep some order and decorum in this, as well as the other, house over a long period of time.

Senator Roblin: How convenient a memory my honourable friend has. If I learned anything about asking questions I probably learned it from him when he was on this side of the house not too long ago. His questions were among the most argumentative, repetitive and oratorical of any that I have ever heard. I would like to think I could match his standard of violation of what he calls the rules. Those are the rules of the House of Commons. We in this chamber have a much more flexible system of conducting our affairs, and I think a much happier system in terms of elucidating information—that is, unless I am asking questions of my honourable friend, because his specialty is not to give any information. If he would give information in the first place he would avoid an awful lot of effort on the part of the people on this side of the house to get the facts before the country.

People say it is a question of allegations and not facts. Well, they come from the Economic Council of Canada, they come from Statistics Canada. Those are facts enough for me. My honourable friend has undertaken, however, to justify the Prime Minister's statement, and I await his remarks with some interest.

Senator Flynn: The point of order was raised by the Leader of the Government, but the point of order follows a breach of the rules by the Minister of State for Economic Development. He can read his answer tomorrow and he will find that it was not an answer. If he had just stayed put and said, "I agree with the Leader of the Government, and I am going to take the question as notice," this probably would not have happened; but he added a statement which was merely hot air, an empty statement, defending the policy of the government generally, instead of replying to the question. If he had nothing to say he should have remained silent. He did not do that, and he is now reaping what he has sown.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, surely the position taken by the government here is a reasonable one. Again, with regard to Question Period procedure, questions should not—

Senator Flynn: Why do you not talk about replies, too?

Senator Perrault: I would urge the honourable senator to listen a minute, and muster up as much patience as he is able.

Parliamentary practice requires that questions should not deal with material demanding lengthy and detailed answers. Surely a scatter-gun assault on the alleged economic policies of the government is one that demands a rather lengthy and detailed answer.

Secondly, parliamentary practice requires that questions should not raise matters of policy too large to be dealt with in answers. Of course, the questions raised by the Honourable Senator Roblin are those that invite and require lengthy replies. They go to basic economic policy, and economic philosophy and practice.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: What was the Prime Minister's source?

Senator Perrault: Surely the proposal that honourable senators may wish to participate in a debate on the state of the economy is one with some merit.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is completely off base, and as usual he is quite wrong. There is no question of a lengthy reply being required. A mere factual reply was all that was necessary. The reason the people on the other side answer at such length is that they have to talk around the question because they have so much to answer for.

My question is a simple one: What is the source of the Prime Minister's statement that the people of this country are 50 per cent better off in economic terms now than they were ten years ago? That is all I am asking. Now, you can answer that in a few short words if you care to do so.

Hon. G. I. Smith: It takes them a long time to say they do not know.

● (2025)

INFLATION—BURDEN ON FARMERS

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I have a question I intended to ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, but in his absence I shall direct it to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

I should like to ask the minister what is being done by the government to deal with the emergency created by rising costs, low farm prices and stratospheric interest rates plaguing Canadian farmers.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there is a long list of actions taken—

Hon. Robert Muir: Give us a short, concise answer.

Senator Olson: If the honourable senator wants a short, concise answer, then I think that on balance the government has taken a proper mix of the most appropriate remedial action that can be taken at this time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. G. I. Smith: The minister is supposed to give us an answer—

Senator Olson: You wanted a short answer.

Senator Muir: An intelligent answer.

Senator Sherwood: Honourable senators, perhaps I could direct a supplementary question which would elicit a short, straightforward answer from the minister.

An Hon. Senator: I don't believe it's possible.

Senator Sherwood: Let me try. Will an emergency program, through the federal Farm Credit Corporation, be established to provide special refinancing for those farmers who are going under through no fault of their own?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, whether or not a special program for agriculture should be brought in through the Farm Credit Corporation, or any other delivery system, is a question that has to be answered in the larger context so far as government policy is concerned, because I am sure that my honourable friend realizes that some of the problems being faced and some of the increased costs resulting from credit costs are indeed not confined to agriculture.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We are all suffering; you can be sure of that.

Senator Sherwood: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary. I should say to the minister that in 1978 or 1979 a farmer did not foresee anything like the 20 per cent or more interest rates that prevail today. When he approached his banker to secure a loan, at that time, the bank was perfectly willing to lend the money. That money has now become a disastrous burden for many farmers. I am simply asking the minister, as requested by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, whether an emergency plan is under consideration by the government.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Minister of Agriculture has given a number of replies to a question similar in nature. His answer has been that there are some programs—if that is the right word, although I do not think it is—some amendments that may give some relief.

I want my honourable friend to understand very clearly that the problems associated with higher interest costs are not confined to agriculture. Indeed, there are some sections of the agricultural sector that are probably as well equipped as, or even better equipped than, some other sectors of the economy to pay those increased costs.

Senator Smith: Don't make a speech.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Minister of State for Economic Development would agree with his colleague the Minister of Agriculture that the banks should show some responsibility towards farmers who are losing their farms and should direct that responsibility towards helping the situation rather than making enormous profits, which is against the whole economic program of the government.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not quite sure what the question was. I believe it was whether I agree with the Minister of Agriculture. I agree with the Minister of Agriculture that there is a very severe problem. There is also another point, which is that there have been some rather significant increased profits showing up by the financial institutions, particularly the banks. It seems to me that you can take it from there and try to work out some policies that would relieve the situation.

I want to get back to my earlier point, which is that it is not, in my view, fair or equitable to single out certain sections of the agricultural sector as being in a more distressed situation than other people who also have to cope with higher interest charges.

ENERGY

SASKATCHEWAN—OIL WELL SERVICING ASSISTANCE GRANT PROGRAM

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. In April the Government of Saskatchewan introduced a new provincial oil well servicing assistance grant program. For obvious reasons, the Saskatchewan government requested that the federal government exempt, for corporate tax purposes, this new provincial incentive.

Given that this new incentive commenced on May 1, there has already been some confusion in the industry in Saskatchewan which has been exacerbated by the long delay on the part of the federal government in responding to this request. I understand that today the government has responded to the Saskatchewan government's request. Is the grant going to be exempt from federal corporate tax or not? A simple yes or no will suffice.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall have to take that question as notice and get the answer later. I do not have it right on the tip of my tongue today.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Have you not got a speech ready?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He has one ready, but he is not going to give it now.

THE ECONOMY

TAXATION—POSSIBLE BUDGETARY MEASURES

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. On the weekend the Minister of Finance, in preparation for the next budget, said that in light of the current strength of the economy he would have to review the prospect of tax increases. Will the Minister of State for Economic Development tell the Senate if it is the government's considered view that two consecutive quarters of real growth constitute sufficient strength in the economy to warrant the imposition of either new or added taxes?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): My honourable friend is now asking me to do something that his colleague in front of him does not want me to do: he is asking me to express an opinion.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Just answer his question.

Senator Olson: No, he is asking me to express an opinion, and you are constantly saying, "Just give us the facts."

Senator Smith: Just answer the question.

Senator Olson: Opinions and facts are not necessarily synonymous.

Senator Smith: I have noticed that, especially with your answers.

Senator Olson: My reply to the honourable senator's question is that one of the problems the government is also concerned with—as well as the Bank of Canada and others who are responsible—is the matter of rising inflationary pressure. Some of my friends were complaining about this earlier tonight, or at least they alleged, and I think there is some validity to the allegation, that some of that pressure on interest rates and inflation is owing to the size of the federal deficit. Certainly, if we are to correct that, there are two options: one is to cut the spending on one side; and the other is to make increases on the revenue side. Those are the considerations that the Minister of Finance was taking into account when he said that it was his responsibility to review that. But, even without that, I think it is perfectly normal for the Minister of Finance to assert that he takes that into account as he approaches each of his budgets.

Senator Nurgitz: I take it, then, from the minister's response that it is the government's intention, perhaps, to seek higher taxes from the economy.

Senator Olson: No. The honourable senator does not need to take that from what I said. He need only take the words that I said at their face value. There is no need to add to them. I said that the Minister of Finance must take that into account as one way of responding to the balance of economic conditions. That is what I said.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a very simple question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. To reduce inflation and interest rates, is the government planning to increase taxes in the next budget or else to set up wage and price controls? Has it made a choice? Will it let Canadians pay interest rates between 20 and 21 per cent and risk jeopardizing their homes and assets? Does the government at least have a program in this regard? Can the minister reply yes or no? What is the program of the government?

[English]

Senator Olson: The Minister of Finance has already stated on a number of occasions, and in case my honourable friend has not heard it I can repeat it, that he, the Minister of Finance, is not contemplating wage and price controls. But he has also indicated—

Senator Asselin: What does he want to do?

Senator Olson: He has stated repeatedly that he considers the inflationary pressure that is building up one of the highest priority problems within our economy, and that he is taking, or will support, appropriate action to cool that inflation to some extent.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Do I understand the reply of the minister to be that the government can do nothing to lower interest rates and to give some hope to Canadians that they can save at least the assets that they have acquired over the years? The government is not prepared to do anything. Is that what the minister is saying?

● (2040)

[English]

Senator Olson: No, my honourable friend cannot draw that conclusion from what I said.

THE SENATE

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS—PRINTING OF RESOLUTION RESPECTING THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As honourable senators have probably noticed, the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for April 24 are rather bulky because the constitutional resolution has been printed twice, and no doubt there is a good technical reason for that.

My question is: Is it intended to continue printing this resolution on a weekly basis, pending receipt of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, or can we dispense with printing it until after we receive that judgment?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Do you want to stop holding your nose?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is not an olfactory discussion. May I suggest that the honourable senator has advanced a constructive and useful idea. Inquiries will go forward with respect to the goals he desires.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

Hon. Jack Marshall: I should like to ask a question concerning a particular segment of the population which is afflicted by inflation and the increases in the cost of living. I refer to the widows of the veteran disability pensioners under the 48 per cent category. As a result of questions in the other place which were put to the Minister of Veterans Affairs, it was stated that the minister has placed before cabinet amendments to Bill C-40 which would eliminate the unfair phasing-in period of six and a half years for widows of disability pensioners to qualify for the pensions.

Would the Leader of the Government confirm that legislation to this effect will be brought forward before the summer recess? I request this particularly in view of the fact that the minister admitted in the Senate committee proceedings that he agreed with the thrust of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science to the effect that this is unfair to those widows in that age category who may never live to qualify.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question will go forward to the minister and the information will be brought here when it is made available.

Senator Marshall: I have a supplementary question having to do with legislation, which I would like directed to the government house leader in the other place. One of the difficulties he related was that the legislative timetable might not permit such legislation to be prepared before the summer recess. I wonder if the Leader of the Government would suggest to the leader in the other place that new legislation or amendments to Bill C-40 could be introduced in this chamber, where we could deal with it thoroughly, get to the bottom of it, and get this bill through in order to eliminate this inequity in the veterans' legislation as soon as possible.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it has been suggested on many occasions that bills be introduced in this chamber. In fact, that is a procedure which has been increasingly adopted in recent years. May I say that, with the co-operation of the members of the opposition in this place and in the other place, perhaps we may be able to achieve that worthwhile objective described by the Honourable Senator Marshall.

Senator Marshall: I am glad that the Leader of the Government agrees. There are other questions arising related to rumours that the Prime Minister would be appointing a separate Minister of Veterans Affairs. Recently I had a list of senators who are veterans compiled for me by the Sergeant-at-Arms in the other place. It appears—and it may be surprising—that between 25 and 30 veteran senators, very learned people, sit in this place. I wonder if the leader could suggest to the Prime Minister that the next Minister of Veterans Affairs could be appointed in the Senate.

Senator Perrault: There is no question, honourable senators, that there are many highly qualified veterans of Canada's armed forces on both sides of this chamber and in the other place. Perhaps the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, in his wisdom, will appoint a minister at some time in the future.

ENERGY

EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I would like to reply to a question raised on April 14 by Senator Balfour which concerned drilling activity in western Canada. I am able to inform him that, according to current data and the number of rigs making holes at this time, it is anticipated that some 6,800 wells will be completed in 1981, of which western Canada will account for 6,500 wells.

With reference to the honourable senator's question concerning a Custom's count of rigs leaving the country for the United States, no precise figures are available. The reason for this is that drilling rigs must be dismantled before being transported. Therefore, Customs officials consider their components to be "drilling equipment" and report on the dollar value only.

Honourable senators can make some extrapolations from that, but the precision that was requested in the question is not available in that form.

OIL AND GAS—OFFSHORE DRILLING—SUBMISSION OF CANADIAN SHIPBUILDING AND SHIP REPAIRING ASSOCIATION RE BILL C-48

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I should also like to reply to a question raised on March 19 by Senator Marshall which concerned assistance to the shipbuilding industry.

My colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has announced that consultations are planned which will lead to a new policy of shipbuilding assistance. These consultations are to include the industry, labour and the provinces. I am informed that several options for assistance will be considered before a new policy is adopted.

TRANSPORT

TORONTO INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—INTERRUPTION OF SERVICE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Grosart on March 25. His question was with respect to a "warning of the likelihood of increased air traffic control delays for travellers using Toronto International Airport" given by Mr. W. J. Robertson, President of the Canadian Air Traffic Control Association.

The warning by Mr. Robertson arose from a disagreement between management and controllers at Toronto International Airport over an adjustment in shifts. Some controllers cancelled their overtime shifts on March 24, 1981, and this resulted in a temporary restriction in the number of aircraft operating at the airport. The situation returned to normal on March 25, 1981. The responsibility to assign work, determine the number of employees per shift, and adjust shift schedules in an efficient manner rests with management. The disagreement in question was resolved through consultation between management and the Canadian Air Traffic Control Association.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HEALTH OF JAMES BAY CREE INDIANS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz on March 25 last respecting the health of James Bay Cree Indians and government policy.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development recently announced in the other place that he, in conjunction with the Minister of Justice, is undertaking a review of the implementation of the James Bay Agreement. One aspect of that review will be an examination of the dispute concerning the payment of CORE funds to the Cree Regional Authority. I do not want to prejudge the review which is now under way, but I would like the honourable senator to be aware that Canada has never denied its obligation to provide CORE funding. The dispute with the Cree Regional Authority has focussed on whether the CORE funding program stipulated in the James Bay Agreement referred to the program funded by the Department of Indian Affairs or a similar program offered by the Secretary of State.

Last spring and summer the Cree communities of Nemaska and Rupert House had serious outbreaks of gastroenteritis which were probably related to the lack of adequate water and sewage facilities as well as personal hygiene problems, and which unfortunately resulted in the death of several children. The Minister of Indian Affairs undertook to assist the Crees in implementing a remedial measures program, and on December 10, 1980 an agreement was signed with the Cree concerning the implementation of that program. It can also be reported that the construction of permanent facilities is now under way in both communities.

There have also been reports of two cases of tuberculosis in the community of Mistassini, but there have been no deaths as a result of tuberculosis and appropriate medical care is being provided by the Government of Quebec.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—NORTH SYDNEY TO ARGENTIA FERRY SERVICE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Doody on April 7 about the status of the continuance of the east coast ferry service running between North Sydney, Nova Scotia, and Argentia, Newfoundland.

This matter was raised in committee in the other place on March 31, 1981. The Minister of Transport made it clear that this ferry service would be in operation again this year and that no decision had been taken to discontinue this summer ferry service to Newfoundland.

The question has, however, been raised in the context of ongoing discussions between the Minister of Transport and the Province of Newfoundland concerning possible trade-offs under an overall Newfoundland transportation package. Under this approach, the elimination of federal contributions in one area of transportation can be used in other areas of transportation which may be of greater priority in the province.

The present annual subsidy for the Argentia service is between $8 million and $9 million. It may be that this transportation money can be put to more effective use elsewhere in the province.

● (2050)

It must be stressed that no decision has been made. At this point in time it is simply an option or alternative to be considered in light of federal and provincial transportation funding priorities.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE

EMPLOYMENT OF THE DISABLED AND HANDICAPPED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Finally, honourable senators, on April 9 Senator Muir asked a question on the employment of the disabled and handicapped.

In January of this year an interdepartmental ad hoc committee was established to develop a comprehensive governmental response to the report tabled on February 16, 1981 by the Special Commons Committee on the Disabled and the Handicapped. Some 30 departments and agencies are participating in the review undertaken by the interdepartmental committee.

It is expected that a cabinet decision will be announced before the end of the current session concerning the implementation of recommendations in the report entitled Obstacles.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, would the Leader of the Government tell us whether there is still a controversy on this very subject between the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of Supply and Services?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am not aware of any controversy between the two ministers, both of whom perform their duties with high standards of excellence. However, I will endeavour to obtain any further information which might help to enlighten the honourable senator.

Senator Muir: I fully realize that the leader loves both of those ministers, and I am sure they love each other very much. However, the question raised before was whether or not he had information regarding the hearings of the committee. I tried to be as helpful as I could and gave him the date of that hearing, along with the page number where the Minister of Supply and Services made one statement and then, later, the Minister of Employment and Immigration said he did not agree with the statement of the Minister of Supply and Services.

I would ask the Leader of the Government to have some of his staff check into the matter further in order to ascertain why there seems to be a difference of opinion between those two honourable gentlemen.

Senator Flynn: That's the way to do it; very good.

PUBLIC WORKS

NEWFOUNDLAND—STATUS OF FEDERAL PROJECTS

Question No. 20 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. What is the present status of the Federal Government's $15,000,000 project to provide CNR dry dock syncrolift facilities in St. John's Harbour, Newfoundland?

2. What is the present status of the Federal Government's $8,100,000 project to facilitate Bay Bulls Harbour improvements?

3. What is the status of the Federal Government's $6,000,000 project to upgrade the Trans-Canada Highway (Terra Nova National Park)?

4. What is the status of the Federal Government's $4,000,000 project for Fleet dock construction at Argentia, Newfoundland?

5. What is the status of the Federal Government's $13,200,000 project to provide a fisheries patrol vessel for the Province of Newfoundland?

6. What is the status of the Federal Government's $800,000 project to provide paving of the Mary's Harbour airstrip in Labrador?

7. What is the status of the Federal Government's projects to provide under Canada-Newfoundland DREE agreements; (a) Stephenville Mill conversion ($13,500,000) (b) Industrial Development ($23,985,000) and (c) Forestry Agreement Amendment ($10,400,000)?

Reply by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce:

1. The federal government in 1979 made a proposal to Canadian National involving the provision of a syncrolift type of dry dock with three dry dock berths at a cost not to exceed $15 million. After preliminary engineering was carried out by the Department of Public Works, it became apparent that costs would exceed this spending limit. CN and government officials then worked up a new proposal in which the new project cost of $21 million would be financed by a direct investment of $2.5 million from CN and $18.5 million from the federal government. However, the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador has recently advised that it has offered CN a guarantee of sufficient financing to replace the federal presence. Given this offer, it is felt that the matter of financing has now been adequately provided for and that federal financial involvement is no longer required.

Reply by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans:

1. To be answered elsewhere.

2. The project consists of construction of a dock and depot to service Fisheries and Oceans vessels.

Preliminary design has been completed. Scheduling of final design and construction will follow approval of the Fisheries and Oceans long range major construction program by the Cabinet Committee on Economic Development and Treasury Board. Appropriate submissions have been prepared.

The latest estimate for the project is $14.5 million.

3. To be answered elsewhere.

4. To be answered elsewhere.

5. A 205 ft. Department of Fisheries and Oceans Offshore Patrol Vessel (the Cygnus replacement) is being built at Marystown Shipyard Limited, Newfoundland for operation in the Maritimes Region out of Halifax, N.S. Construction and erection has just commenced with delivery expected by November 1981.

6. To be answered elsewhere.

[Senator Marshall.]

7. To be answered elsewhere.

Reply by the Minister of Public Works:

1. To be answered elsewhere.

2. To be answered elsewhere.

3. A study has been completed concerning upgrading of the Trans-Canada Highway in Terra Nova National Park. Further work on the project will depend on the availability of funds.

4. To be answered elsewhere.

5. To be answered elsewhere.

6. To be answered elsewhere.

7. To be answered elsewhere.

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

1, 2 and 3. To be answered elsewhere.

4. The Department of Public Works has the responsibility to program funds for capital works or major repairs to public wharf facilities. DPW officials advise that a proposal was identified to spend $1.0 million in 1981-82, and a further $2.0 million in 1982-1983 to undertake extensive repairs to the Fleet Dock at Argentina. A review by DPW headquarters indicated the project had insufficient priority to be included in the 1981-1982 Main Estimates submission.

There are therefore no funds identified in the 1981-1982 DPW Marine Program for this project.

Transport Canada is considering Argentia, among other locations, for the development of an offshore service base. If Argentia is selected, the project may involve reconstruction of the Fleet Dock, although there are no final plans for such work at this time.

5. To be answered elsewhere.

No $800,000 project for paving the Mary's Harbour airstrip was planned as such by Transport Canada. Rather, program approval was obtained (for approximately $1,500,000) for the construction of a new, 760-m, gravel-surfaced runway complete with maintenance equipment, equipment shelter, and non-directional beacon. The project commenced last year, and the runway was completed this past summer. It is anticipated that the ancillary facilities will be in place later this fiscal year.

7. To be answered elsewhere.

Reply by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion:

1. through 6. To be answered elsewhere.

7. (a) All equipment was due on site by June 30, 1980. The total work force at present is approximately 430. Abitibi has spent approximately $43 million, of a total commitment of $60 million. The agreement has been completed by the payment of $15,000,000 with the DREE share being $13,500,000.

(b) The Industrial Development Agreement, signed June 11, 1979, provides for an industrial park and access road at Corner Brook and an industrial access road at Stephenville. Construction of both access roads has been underway since last fall. Grading of the 10 km Corner Brook road, and the first 8 km of the 23 km Stephenville road should be completed by September. Tenders are now being called for an overpass at the intersection of the Stephenville road and the Trans-Canada Highway. The remaining work on both roads will be tendered as design work is finalized and construction should be fully completed by the end of the 1982 construction season. Tenders for the initial construction work on the Corner Brook industrial park will be called this fall.

7. (c) Forestry Agreement Amendment

1. Site Rehabilitation. The Bay d'Espoir 1980 projects started in early June. St. George's and Roddickton started in early July. In addition, three site rehabilitation projects are continuing in Saltwater Pond, Portland Creek and Milltown. The Grand Falls Nursery project is ongoing.

To date, one generation cut, three harvest cuts and two salvage contracts have been completed in Bay d'Espoir. In addition, cone collection projects have been completed in Millertown, Swift Current and Pasadena.

2. Stand Improvement. A roadside cleaning project started June 15 in Bonavista and Goose Bay. A precommercial thinning program got underway in Taylor Brook and Roddickton in early June and another is scheduled for Portland Creek in early July.

3. Cable Logging. Projects started in Bay d'Espoir in early June and will start in Roddickton in late July.

4. Company Projects. Abitibi commenced a stand improvement and a shoreline cleaning program in central Newfoundland in mid-June.

5. General. Present number of jobs is 134.

2. How many were accepted and how many were turned down?

3. List the qualifications as described on the application form of Air Canada which applicants have to fill out.

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

The management of Air Canada advises as follows:

No record is kept of applications received on a provincial basis.

2. 516 applicants were hired, leaving 27,099 unsuccessful candidates.

3. Minimum requirements for employment do not appear on the application form. However, included on the job description form attached to the application are the following requirements.

TRANSPORT

NEWFOUNDLAND—RAILWAY GAUGE CONVERSION—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Question No. 52 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

Has a request been made to the Federal Government from the Government of Newfoundland for assistance in funding the conversion of its narrow gauge railway lines to standard gauge and, if so, give (i) the details (ii) the present status of this request?

Reply by the Minister of Transport:

The Government of Newfoundland has prepared a report entitled "A Program for the Rehabilitation of the Newfoundland Railway" which recommends the conversion of the Newfoundland railway to standard gauge. This report has been submitted to various interested parties including the federal government for comment, but no formal request for funding has been made.

The concept of standard gauging is now being evaluated by TerraTransport and the province.

Question No. 61 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

1. How many Canadian Veterans reside outside of Canada and are in receipt of disability pensions?

2. Of those receiving a disability pension, (i) how many are in receipt of a pension below 48 per cent (ii) how many will now qualify under Bill C-40, and in both cases what is their country of residence?

3. What steps have been taken to advise Canadian Veterans who are living in foreign countries, and/or their widows, of their new eligibility as of October 1980 and April 1981 under Bill C-40?

4. Are all Canadian Veterans who are living in foreign lands aware that in order to qualify for WVA, they must return to Canada for 365 days?

5. Are all First World War Veterans who are living in foreign countries aware of the changes in the legislation, which removes the restriction that they must have served overseas for 365 days and can now qualify the same as Second World War Veterans?

6. How were they notified?

Reply by the Minister of Veterans Affairs:

3. Subsequent to Bill C-40 receiving Royal Assent, the following steps were taken to promulgate to as many veterans and their dependants as possible the increases in benefits available under this legislation:

a) Cheque stuffers containing a summary of all benefits available were included in all CPC pension cheques and all WVA cheques issued in the month of August 1980.

b) A complete summary of all the benefits available was included in issues of veteran's magazines, i.e., Legion, Air Force, Fragment, et cetera.

c) Arrangements were made for newspapers to receive press releases outlining the benefits available under Bill C-40. At the time of the legislative change, a press release in London, England was given wide circulation in the British press, and the High Commissioner's Office in London advised veterans organizations in the United Kingdom and Europe of the changes to legislation.

d) Printed information was forwarded to all District Offices of the Canadian Pension Commission and the Department of Veterans Affairs, including the departmental office located in London, England.

CUSTOMS TARIFF
IRISH FREE STATE TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1932
UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1932
UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1937

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John J. Connolly moved the second reading of Bill C-50, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South

Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932, and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-50, which deals mainly with the Customs Tariff, is a formidable document. It contains some 331 pages. There are 20 clauses, five parts, and nine schedules which cover 294 pages of changes in the Customs Tariff. I am informed that these tariff changes cover some 50 per cent of the imports which Canada makes from abroad.

Senator Hicks: You said "50 per cent of the imports which Canada makes from abroad." Do you mean from abroad or from these countries?

Senator Connolly: From abroad.

Senator Hicks: Including the United States and all other countries.

Senator Connolly: Yes.

Most of the tariff concessions made by Canada result from the Tokyo Round of negotiations on the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade which was signed in Geneva in 1979. These tariff changes are to be found, mainly, in Schedule II which occupies some 294 pages of the bill. I will speak to that a little later.

There are other tariff changes in the bill, to which I will also allude later, which have been proposed both by the present government and by the immediately previous government.

Honourable senators, my first observation is that this bill is primarily a financial bill. It is based upon three Notices of Ways and Means Motions which were given by the government in the other place—one by Mr. Crosbie on December 11, 1979, and the others by Mr. MacEachen one June 2, 1980 and October 28, 1980.

Obviously, the bill is a committee bill, and I think it can appropriately be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It is a financial bill. It is a taxing bill and, because of that, there are certain inhibitions upon the Senate which we will certainly be keeping in mind.

As I have said, the bulk of the bill is based on two tariff protocols which were signed by Canada in June of 1979, and they arose out of the Tokyo Round of negotiations under the GATT. Some 88 countries, including Canada, participated in those negotiations.

As honourable senators are well aware, the GATT is a multinational treaty and, because it is a treaty and because this bill results from the signing of a treaty, there is a certain inhibition on Parliament as a whole with reference to the content of the bill.

I would add that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has been engaged, and continues to be engaged, in a pre-study of this bill. The first report of the proceedings of that committee on its study appears under date of April 2 last. Honourable senators who are interested will find that the committee had very informative discussions with a good many officials from the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue, some of whom were actually members of the negotiating team at the Tokyo Round.

In addition, I should say that this very important measure, which deals with the trade of Canada, has engaged the attention of this chamber many times through the years. We have had debates on trade generally. In years long gone by we had debates on trade between Canada and the United States. When the European Economic Community was first formed, at the time the Treaty of Rome was signed, I believe, in 1957, the Senate had a lengthy debate on the prospects for Canadian trade in Europe as a result of the formation of the Community.

In addition to the general debates that have taken place in the Senate, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has taken an active role, formerly under Senator Aird and now under Senator van Roggen, in dealing with trade issues as they affect this country. The committee has made reports on trade with the Pacific Rim, trade with the Caribbean, trade with the European Economic Community, and it continues to be engaged in a study of trade relations between Canada and the United States. A number of years ago the committee issued one report on that subject and, as I understand, it is about to issue a second report.

Honourable senators, the Tokyo Round negotiations produced a trade package in three areas: Tariff concessions were made by the participating parties; non-tariff measures were agreed upon; and, in addition to that, the framework was established for the amelioration and the solution of world trade issues as they arose. Some of this subject matter was laid before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce at the first meeting it held on its pre-study of this bill.

● (2100)

This measure deals primarily with tariff issues and, particularly, with the concessions made in Canada to the other participating countries in the GATT. The committee, of course, wanted to know, among other things, what the quid pro quo was for the concessions which Canada was making under this agreement. Perhaps I could summarize them briefly by referring to the changes that have been made in respect of Canada's major trading partners.

The tariff concessions for Canadian goods going into Japan went from an average of 8 per cent down to an average of 5.6 per cent. For the European Economic Community and the countries involved therein, the drop was from 8.7 per cent to 6 per cent, and with regard to the United States the drop, on the average, was from 8.3 per cent to 5 per cent. Canada's concessions dropped from 14 per cent to somewhere between 8 and 9 per cent.

May I now say a few words about the background of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. It was a proposal which was established after World War II when the need for the reconstruction of many of the war-ravaged countries arose. The west was weary of recurring war. It realized the danger to every country arising from the development of new systems of weapons. It felt it imperative that it should organize for peace and stability.

I think it is appropriate at this time to refer to perhaps some selective history, some milestones in the steps that were taken internationally by various countries in an attempt to achieve this result. I believe that the Marshall Plan was the most significant of the first steps. The Treaty of Rome establishing the Economic Community in Europe was a very important step. Jean Monet's part in that great concept was of vital importance at that time. The Japanese peace treaty had a good deal to do with the development of events in the field of trade that followed the war. The establishment of NATO was a factor that provided some stability for the relations between the west and east. The Strategic Arms Limitation Treaties all had the same general purpose in mind. The Conferences on the Law of the Sea played a part. The Conference on World Environment also was important, and the new problems which have been engaging all the western countries for two decades now in respect of the economic plight of the countries along the equator which form the Third World were items in the consideration of the world leaders and national leaders of those days.

Out of these initiatives the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade was born. It was an attempt to bring some order into the supply of the material needs of trading peoples, to try to establish the economies primarily of the developed countries without ignoring the problems which exist and continue to persist in the underdeveloped world.

It is also appropriate, honourable senators, to make a few observations with reference to the GATT itself. In 1948-49, nine countries, including Canada, concluded the initial arrangement. They all agreed to develop the concept of freeing up international trade. That agreement provided a framework of rules for trade relations between these countries. A council was established to sit in Geneva to supervise issues emerging under the treaty between the trading partners. Its purpose generally was to liberalize and to stabilize trade. At present some 85 countries are party to the GATT, and they carry on approximately 80 per cent of the trade of the world. There have been six multiple tariff negotiations since the GATT was formed in 1948, and all parties in Canada have supported it.

These meetings have been held in Geneva, Annecy, Torquay and the last one, which began in 1973, was held in Tokyo. It is the result of that negotiation that we are dealing with this evening. Perhaps the most significant of all was the meeting described as the "Kennedy Round" which took place from 1964 to 1967. The concept enunciated by the then dynamic young President of the United States was to have an across-the-board approach to tariff reductions. As I have said, the long list of negotiations ends with the one just concluded in Tokyo.

It is unnecessary to remind this chamber of the importance of trade to Canada. Canada ranks seventh among the trading nations of the world. Its share of world trade is exceeded only by that of the United States, West Germany, Japan, France, the United Kingdom and Italy, in that order. Canada is unique among those trading countries in that it is without a large domestic market of its own as are the United States, Italy and France. Canada also is unlike most of the GATT members in Europe in that it has no membership in any regional trading group as have West Germany, the United Kingdom, France, Italy and so on. Canada's exports of goods and services amount to about 25 per cent of its gross national product annually. We have a great dependence for our well-being upon the trade we conduct abroad. I am told that the value of world trade in 1978 was worth some $1,200 billion. Of that trade, the European Economic Community did 33 per cent; the United States, 12 per cent; Japan, 8 per cent; and Canada, 4 per cent.

The objectives which Canada had at the Tokyo Round were to expand export opportunities in our resource industries from our agricultural, fisheries and our secondary industries. What were the achievements of the Tokyo Round? The negotiators who appeared before the committee believed there were great new export opportunities to be available to Canada. The average tariff cuts, which were agreed to by our major trading partners, were substantial. In the case of the United States, they were nearly 40 per cent; in the case of the European Economic Community, some 30 per cent; and in the case of Japan, some 31 per cent. There was an attempt to dismantle some of the non-tariff barriers. That issue has not been settled, and there is a discussion paper that has been before the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee of the House of Commons since October 1980. That committee is reviewing the problems connected with anti-dumping, with countervailing duties and with emergency safeguards that might be invoked by various countries to which we desire to export.

For Japan and the European Economic Community their tariffs on manufactured goods from now on will be, on the average, 5 to 7 per cent. For the same type of goods going into the United States, the average will be about 4 per cent, but there are certain exceptions to this rule. The United States tariff on things like chemicals, textiles and footwear is appreciably higher than the 4 per cent average to which I just referred. Ninety per cent of Canada's exports to the United States attracts a tariff rate on entry of some 5 per cent. Eighty per cent of our exports to the United States are duty-free, and they include the exports that we make under the auto agreement. To use a colloquial expression, there are "hang-ups" in respect of some of our exports in the petrochemical field and some machinery. Canadian protection on industrial items has been reduced to 9 per cent, and there is some criticism of this reduction from Canadian manufacturers.

Indeed, in committee we heard a list of various areas in which there are complaints about some of the concessions Canada made. The committee intends to hear some of those complainants, and deal with them with officials of the department in the hope that some remedial action may be taken either now or shortly.

In the field of fishery products, there was a good deal of complaining. I understand that Canada did not get much in the way of concessions from other countries for Canadian fish products. The explanation then given us, and which we will have to look at again, was that Canada really had very little more to give than what was given. I understand that Canadian whiskey will enter the United States, Japan and the European Economic Community much more readily than heretofore. Industrial raw materials are free, certainly as between Canada and the United States.

Honourable senators, while I am talking about what happened in other countries, the plain fact of the matter is that one has to understand what the other concessions are to justify consent to the proposals contained in this bill. This bill is only one side of the coin. It contains only the concessions that were made by Canada at the GATT negotiations.

I realize that this is not a popular time to be making a speech, and I apologize for keeping honourable senators away from the hockey game for so long, so I will close by attempting to give, as briefly as I can, a little index to this quite voluminous piece of legislation that is now before us.

Clauses 1, 7(1) and 8(2), and Schedules I, II and V deal with and implement the tariff reductions Canada agreed to in the Tokyo Round. Clauses 2, 4, 7(4) to (7) phase out the British Preferential Tariff on goods from Britain and Ireland, and withdraw it in one step from goods from South Africa.

I want to say a word about this because we can all remember times when, if anybody suggested we should phase out or reduce the British Preferential Tariff on goods from the United Kingdom, there would have been a great hue and cry in this country. Particularly is this true in view of the 1931 agreements that were made for Commonwealth trade at the Ottawa conference which Mr. Bennett called. But times have changed. In 1973, because of their membership in the European Economic Community, the United Kingdom and Ireland had to abrogate the preferential rates that were granted to Canada. Ours are now to be phased out throughout a period of one-and-a-half years. They will be phased out entirely by January 1982.

Honourable senators, for the over-50 other members of the Commonwealth, the British Preferential Tariff will remain in being. That helps, particularly, the newer members of the Commonwealth who belong to the under-developed world. Trade agreements with Australia and New Zealand remain in force.

To continue with my index, clause 5 provides for the withdrawal of Canadian concessions in the event any other country fails to live up to the commitments made in the Tokyo Round. This is simply a sanctions clause. I need not develop it here. If there is more to be said about it, an explanation can be given in committee similar to the one we have already had in committee.

● (2120)

Clauses 3, 6, 7(2) and 8(1), as well as Schedule III, implement a number of technical changes which were proposed in Mr. Crosbie's budget of December 11, 1979, and they deal with relatively minor items: nursery stock, processed nuts—I thought we had enough of them in this country—Bible recordings and gifts from $15 to $25.

[Senator Connolly.]

Clause 7(3) and Schedule IV extend, on a permanent basis, duty free entry for certain petroleum products such as gasoline and heating oils.

Clauses 9 to 11 repeal the trade agreement acts as a consequence of withdrawal of the British Preferential Tariff from Britain and Ireland to which I have already referred, as well as the cancellation of the South Africa Trade Agreement between Canada and South Africa. This was abrogated on notice, within the terms of the treaty, a number of years ago.

Clauses 12 and 13 transfer the authority for collecting excise tax on imported wines from the Customs Tariff to the Excise Tax Act. That is the act under which Canadian wines are taxed, and it seems appropriate to have the tax in one piece of legislation.

Clauses 14 to 17, as well as Schedules VI to XI, implement certain items that were introduced in Mr. MacEachen's budget on October 28 last. These budgetary changes resulted from two Tariff Board references, Nos. 156 and 155, and they provide for free entry for things like antiques, collectibles, hobby materials, cars over 25 years of age, scuba diving equipment—I am sure we are all interested in that one—and mountain climbing equipment. We are probably interested in that one, too. The other Tariff Board item, No. 155, provided for free entry for certain scientific and educational equipment not made in Canada, more particularly in respect of glassware used in hospitals. On this item, honourable senators, there is some complaint from some of the local manufacturers. I think there is only one in the country, and that will have to be investigated a little more thoroughly when we hear from these complainants, who are apparently ready to come and talk to the committee.

Clauses 18 to 20 provide for the coming into force of the various provisions of the act.

Honourable senators, the detailing of this kind of bill almost clause by clause, in one respect, I know, is very tedious, but I thank honourable senators for their close attention.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, may I ask a question?

Senator Connolly, if I heard you correctly, you said in your very illuminating address that as this was a taxing bill it would impose certain inhibitions on the Senate. I wonder if I heard you correctly, and whether you could tell me what those inhibitions might be.

Senator Connolly: Well, I suppose I should ask you if you want the 10, the 20, the 30, the 40 or the 50-minute answer. In view of the fact that Senator Roblin objects to long answers, I think I should be as short as I can.

Senator Roblin: I do not object to them from you. I like your answers.

Senator Connolly: I could tire you out, too.

I think there are inhibitions for the Senate in respect of tax bills, and I will only say it this way, because we have discussed it here before, and perhaps this is an over-simplification. I think it is clear that the Senate cannot increase the impost; not that we would ever want to. It is very difficult for the Senate to reduce a tax, because as soon as this is done the Leader of the Government has to stand up—I had to do it myself a number of times—and say that this interferes with "ways and means." This has been done by all leaders, regardless of who has been in office. That is the point that I referred to.

Senator Everett: Are you saying, then, that it would not lie within the competence of this body to refuse to pass tax legislation—not to reduce it or increase it, but, very simply, to refuse to pass it?

Senator Connolly: Of course, the absolute veto is in existence. The Senate can use its judgment on that.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have no intention of going into the details of this complicated piece of legislation. Still I want to congratulate Senator Connolly for delivering a speech which cast a bit of light on this bill which seems to be very complex to me—

Senator Frith: Just a bit of light!

Senator Asselin: Yes, a bit of light because, as he said, once in committee we may have to complete the explanations he gave us tonight in the course of his presentation. If Senator Connolly spent the whole of his Easter holidays trying to figure out this legislative labyrinth, I suggest he deserves all our admiration and we ought to commend him for that because he has fully discharged his responsibilities.

Of course we in the official opposition are not surprised to have before us this bill which we had been expecting for quite some time, as mentioned by Senator Connolly, since two administrations had looked into this problem. Quite some time ago, Canada launched negotiations on our customs tariff within GATT and at the Tokyo meetings.

Does opening up our trade in such a way benefit our country and the Canadian economy? Obviously, once this legislation is put to the test after adoption by Parliament we will find out that we did not provide for everything in the negotiations and in the agreements we concluded under the GATT agreements and in the Tokyo Round.

We were unable to predict all the disadvantages which Canada might feel as a result of those international agreements on our customs tariff. As I read my mail this afternoon it just happened that someone drew my attention to some provisions of this bill which, in some areas, will cause serious damage to foreign companies wanting to set up shop in Canada. Once this bill has been adopted they say they will have to give up any idea of operating here because competition from international companies which are already in Ontario or in other provinces in Canada will be too strong.

When the spokesmen of these firms appear before the committee, I, along with other senators, will have the opportunity to question them on the reasons for their grievances and representations. It is obvious that Canada, no more than any other country, can live in isolation.

As Senator Connolly remarked, Canada ranks seventh among the trading nations of the world and if we want to do trade with countries of the same calibre we must be ready to compromise. That is precisely the purpose of the bill: to compromise in the economic and trading sectors so as to secure foreign made goods and in exchange sell as much as possible of our own products on the international market.

I was not the one who was supposed to talk to this bill for the opposition but Senator Phillips who will probably be here tomorrow. Before adjourning the debate, I wonder, like Senator Everett did when he asked Senator Connolly a question, whether, considering the progress made with respect to this bill which has been the subject of studies by experts and by different departments, the Senate would dare to amend a piece of legislation as complex and difficult as this legislative labyrinth before us.

In any event, I agree with Senator Connolly that it should be referred to a committee. We will be there to study with the experts the various aspects of this complex piece of legislation and if it can in any way be improved upon, I am sure that honourable senators will fulfil their duty and obligation.

In the mean time, Your Honour, I move, on behalf of Senator Phillips, that the debate be now adjourned.

On motion of Senator Asselin, on behalf of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-54—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Thursday, March 12, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Barrow calling the attention of the Senate to the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject-matter of Bill C-54, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, tabled in the Senate on March 2, 1981.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators will recall that Bill C-54 has received royal assent. However, that bill is the subject of this inquiry because Senator Roblin wished to make an intervention on the subject. He did so, and I adjourned the debate in case anyone else wished to speak on the inquiry. I do not wish to say anything, and I do not believe that anyone on our side wishes to add to what is already on the record. Unless any other honourable senator wishes to speak on the matter, I suggest that the inquiry be treated as debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

PRELIMINARY REPORT ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-57 "AN ACT TO AMEND THE EXCISE TAX ACT AND THE EXCISE ACT AND TO PROVIDE FOR A REVENUE TAX IN RESPECT OF PETROLEUM AND GAS"

April 1981

On January 26, 1981, Bill C-57 intituled "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas" was tabled in the House of Commons. This Bill is intended to implement (i) the Ways and Means Motion (no. 1) relating to the Excise Tax Act tabled by the Minister of Finance on January 22, 1981, (ii) the Ways and Means Motion (no. 2) relating to the Excise Tax Act tabled by the Minister of Finance on January 22, 1981, (iii) the Ways and Means Motion relating to the Excise Act tabled by the Minister of Finance on October 28, 1980, and (iv) the Ways and Means Motion with respect to the taxation of petroleum and gas net revenues tabled by the Minister of Finance on October 28, 1980.

By resolution of the Senate on February 18, 1981, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was authorized to examine and consider the subject-matter of the Bill in advance of the Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

In accordance with the Order of Reference, your Committee has carefully considered Bill C-57 and in connection with such consideration has retained as its counsel, Mr. Thomas S. Gillespie of Ogilvy, Renault, Montreal. The Committee has heard representations from representatives of Quebec weekly newspapers, the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association, Dome Petroleum Limited, the Allied Beauty Association, the Canadian Petroleum Association, the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, Mobil Oil Canada, Ltd., the Brewers Association of Canada, the Association of Canadian Distillers, the Canadian Wine Institute, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants and the Motorcycle and Moped Industry Council. The Committee has also received a written submission from Gulf Canada Resources Inc. The Committee has also heard from representatives from the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue.

Bill C-57 consists of five parts. Part I proposes to reduce the rate of federal sales tax from 12% to 9% and introduces other amendments to the federal sales tax system; Part II contains the provisions for a new tax on natural gas and natural gas liquids; Part III deals with changes in the taxation of alcoholic beverages and tobacco; Part IV establishes an 8% tax on petroleum and gas revenues under a separate Act; and Part V prescribes the commencement dates for all of them.

Part II will amend the Excise Tax Act to impose a new tax on all natural gas and gas liquids produced in Canada. The Bill proposes that the tax come into effect November 1, 1980 for sales in Canada and on February 1, 1981 for sales outside Canada.

The Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act (Part IV of the Bill) introduces a new tax of 8% on revenue from the production of oil and gas in Canada. The tax came into effect on January 1, 1981. It is imposed on net revenue from the production of petroleum or gas in Canada and the processing of petroleum to any stage up to and including crude oil or its equivalent and on any amount paid in respect of a royalty or other interest in such production.

This preliminary report is limited to the areas discussed with the foregoing groups. A further report or reports may be tabled.

DOME PETROLEUM LIMITED

Dome Petroleum Limited carries on in Canada the business of exploration for and the production of petroleum products, including the transportation, separation and processing of oil gum, natural gas and natural gas liquids.

It owns and operates a fractionation plant at Sarnia, Ontario which receives natural gas liquids from various processing plants in Alberta. This plant now produces approximately 50,000 barrels per day of propane, 35,000 barrels per day of butane, 25,000 barrels per day of natural gasoline and 20,000 barrels per day of ethane-propane mix. The present plant represents a total capital investment of $65,000,000 and it is anticipated that another $65,000,000 will be expended on expanding its Sarnia facilities.

On October 28, 1980, the Minister of Finance tabled a Notice of Ways and Means Motion establishing a natural gas and gas liquids tax. However, there was exempted from the tax gas used in plants which processed marketable pipeline gas and natural gas liquids. The fuel gas used in the fractionation of natural gas liquids was exempted as long as the fractionation process took place in a "gas reprocessing plant" as defined. This motion would have excluded Dome Petroleum's Sarnia fractionation plant from the definition of "gas reprocessing plant" in that the Sarnia plant, as well as Chevron's Fort Saskatchewan plant, are unique inasmuch as they merely separate natural gas liquids into their individual components but do not separate natural gas liquids from marketable pipeline gas. In the case of the Sarnia plant, the marketable pipeline gas is removed from the natural gas liquids at various processing plants in Alberta and the liquids arrive at Sarnia free of any marketable pipeline gas. As a result, Dome's Sarnia fractionation plant and Chevron's Fort Saskatchewan fractionation plant would have been subject to tax on gas used in the plants.

On January 22, 1981, the Minister of Finance tabled a second Notice of Ways and Means Motion which appeared to change the policy set forth in the earlier motion by purporting to remove the exemption for gas consumed in the process of natural gas liquids in all plants which process marketable pipeline gas and natural gas liquids, thereby apparently removing the discrimination against Dome's Sarnia plant and Chevron's Fort Saskatchewan plant.

The Committee was advised by Dome's representatives that this second motion, as reflected in Clause 43 of the Bill (pages 49 and following), failed to remove the discrimination against these two plants.

The Committee was advised that all other gas reprocessing plants in Canada are involved in the initial process of removing natural gas liquids from the gas stream and then fractionating them. As such, they currently use secondary heat recovery or are in a position, after making certain modifications, to use secondary heat recovery generated in the initial processing function such that the incidence of tax for such other plants will be minimal or nil. Neither the Sarnia nor the Fort Saskatchewan plants generate or are able to use secondary heat recovery as neither plant is involved in the initial processing function of extracting natural gas liquids. As a result, the Sarnia and Fort Saskatchewan plants will be the only fractionation plants that will be taxed under the provisions of Part II of Bill C-57 and will therefore be placed at a competitive disadvantage with the other plants serving the market.

Department officials have argued that the tax is not discriminatory because the exemption applies for processing of raw gas to marketable state, not to the fractionation process; that it was Dome's choice to build its fractionation plant in Sarnia to obtain competitive advantage; that the application of the tax results from Dome's decision as to where to locate its plant, not from the provisions of the Bill; that the economics of Dome's overall operation is still favourable to fractionating near Dome's markets notwithstanding the provisions of Bill C-57.

Dome admits that it is recovering all of its waste heat at its Empress and other plants but that waste heat can only be allocated to the "tax free" part of the operation. Other plants have the additional opportunity of allocating part of the waste heat to the taxable fractionation function and thus reduce or avoid altogether the incidence of tax on natural gas or gas liquids.

Dome has not discharged the onus upon it to show that it (and Chevron) has been discriminated against. Pending the introduction of any additional evidence, the Committee is not prepared to recommend any amendment to the Bill in this respect.

QUEBEC WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS AND THE CANADIAN DAILY NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS ASSOCIATION

Advertising material is subject to tax imposed by the Excise Tax Act. Newspapers are exempt from tax under that Act.

Amendments are proposed to Part III of Schedule III to the Act (subclause 29(2) of the Bill) which would remove from the exemption available to newspapers:

(i) any single issue of a newspaper if more than 90% of the space therein is devoted to advertising;

(ii) all issues of a newspaper in any calendar quarter if more than 75% of the space per issue in more than 50% of the issues of the newspaper in that calendar quarter is devoted to advertising;

(iii) programs, advertising supplements or advertising inserts that are supplied by or on behalf of an advertiser to the publisher of a magazine or newspaper;

(iv) programs, advertising supplements or advertising inserts that, being substantially the same, are for distribution in two or more separate magazines or newspapers;

(v) programs, advertising supplements, advertising inserts and other advertising material if they meet any one or a combination of the following conditions even if for distribution in only one newspaper:

  (a) they are printed in a format different from the rest of the newspaper;

  (b) they are not sequentially numbered in a manner consistent with the rest of the newspaper;

  (c) they are composed of one or more sheets folded separately from any other section of the newspaper.

The Bill contains certain modifications in its application to publications made prior to January 22, 1981 (subclause 29(1) of the Bill).

Officials of the Department of Finance have advised that these amendments are proposed to correct a bias that existed prior to the tabling of the Ways and Means Motion and which resulted in a significant loss of tax revenue. That is to say, advertisers were subject to sales tax on material printed and distributed door to door in any other manner other than by newspaper. On the other hand, if the material were placed inside a newspaper, it would be part of the newspaper and exempt from tax.

Both the Quebec weekly newspapers and the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association have resisted the 75% test and the taxation of advertising supplements.

Advertising Newspapers

The Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association deems the attempt to define a newspaper by its percentage of editorial content unacceptable. The Committee notes that the definition contained in the Bill relates to advertising content, not editorial content. Furthermore, the Committee recognizes the difficulty in making a distinction between a bona fide newspaper and an advertising newspaper other than putting a limit on advertising content.

The Quebec weekly newspaper publishers have, by amended recommendation, suggested that the 75% threshold be raised to 80%. They have argued that the weekly newspapers must compete with daily newspapers published on Wednesdays or Saturdays. Daily newspapers published on those days traditionally carry much more extensive advertising than on other days of the week. The weekly newspapers are disadvantaged because the daily newspapers may average the advertising content of their editions over a six-day period whereas the weekly newspapers cannot. They have also advised the Committee that if subject to tax, many of the Quebec weekly newspapers would become unprofitable and go out of business.

The Quebec weekly newspapers supplied the Department of National Revenue with a résumé of financial information concerning the impact of the imposition of sales tax to the cost of production of ten weekly newspapers (distributed free of charge). From a review of the data submitted, the Department of National Revenue concluded that of the ten newspapers in question, nine would appear to meet the 75% advertising content criterion with only one exceeding this criterion. The particular newspaper would not necessarily be taxable in all calendar quarters as the advertising content of each quarter's issues is the determining factor rather than a yearly average. Based on the figures submitted, the tax liability of the publisher of the taxable newspaper would appear to be approximately $4,500 per calendar quarter.

Officials of the Department of National Revenue admitted to the Committee that all newspapers, including the newspaper exceeding the 75% advertising content criterion, were, in their view (and without taking into account the criteria contemplated by the Bill), bona fide newspapers and not advertising newspapers.

The profit margin of the vast majority of weekly newspapers in Canada is small. The imposition of such a tax could mean the difference between a weekly newspaper being profitable or unprofitable. A high advertising content is necessary for these newspapers (particularly those distributed free of charge) in order that they may compete with the daily newspapers and maintain their profitability. It is therefore recommended that the Bill be amended insofar as it may apply to weekly newspapers to allow for the advertising threshold to be raised to 80%. Daily newspapers could remain subject to the 75% test. While it is admitted that the raising of the threshold may encourage advertising newspapers to escape tax by inserting enough "editorial" content to meet the 80% test, the Committee considers it far more important to give the weekly newspapers as much protection as reasonably possible.

Advertising Supplements

The Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association has argued that the Courts of Canada have long held that advertising is as integral a part of the newspaper as news itself. Furthermore, it has been held that newspaper supplements, though not physically attached to the newspaper, are also an integral part of a newspaper.

They argue that the proposal to tax advertising supplements represents a significant incursion by the government into the publisher decision-making process. They insist that a newspaper publisher must continue to have the right and the obligation to determine the content of a newspaper for which that publisher is responsible if the publisher is to maintain independence from economic sanction by advertisers or political sanction by government. The right and obligation to determine content of a newspaper extends to all content, including advertising. The government should not intrude into this process; such intrusion represents a derogation from the principle of freedom of the press.

They suggest that all advertising revenues, including those received for newspaper advertising supplements, appropriately contribute to meeting editorial and other overhead, as well as the newspaper publisher's profit. An important part of what the advertiser is seeking and is paying for, and normally paying a substantial premium for, compared with door-to-door circulation, is to have the supplement be part of the newspaper. Furthermore, daily newspapers are purchased. The reader makes an independent decision as to whether or not the content of the daily newspaper is wanted by the purchaser in the form presented. In this respect, newspapers are distinguished from other material which is distributed by other means. The consumer can exclude the newspaper's product from his or her environment. If the purchaser does not want the mix of material found in a newspaper, the reader has the right to ignore the newspaper.

It has also been suggested that the proposed amendments relating to advertising supplements will give a competitive advantage to the large daily newspapers inasmuch as they would have the printing facilities to prepare programs, advertising supplements and advertising inserts which would be distributed with their newspaper only. The smaller daily newspapers and the weekly newspapers do not have such facilities. Furthermore, it is uneconomical to distribute such programs, supplements and inserts in only one small newspaper. To be competitive, such programs, supplements and inserts must be distributed in two or more smaller newspapers.

In its testimony given to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association refused to distinguish between advertising newspapers and bona fide newspapers on the basis that the Courts have made no such distinction. They admitted before this Committee that if any abuse existed, it existed with respect to the distribution of catalogues with newspapers.

On the other hand, the Quebec weekly newspapers have admitted that there is a distinction between an advertising newspaper and a bona fide newspaper and have admitted that there have been abuses.

The Committee recognizes that there have been inequities and recognizes the Bill's attempt to have tax applied on a more uniform basis. The purpose of the Bill is not to intrude in the freedom of press; its purpose is to amend the Excise Tax Act in such a manner as to prevent bias and maximize tax revenue.

The Committee therefore recommends no amendments be made to the Bill with respect to newspaper supplements and inserts.

THE ALLIED BEAUTY ASSOCIATION

The Allied Beauty Association (ABA) is a national trade association of manufacturers and distributors of beauty supply products in Canada. Their products are sold to approximately 15,000 beauty salons across Canada. In exceptional circumstances, their products are sold to individual consumers. Most of the products sold to beauty salons are consumed by the salons and not resold to the salons' customers. The distributor members of ABA acquire their products from integrated manufacturers or Canadian distributors of products manufactured outside Canada.

Federal sales tax is paid by the producer or manufacturer at the time the goods are delivered to the purchaser or by the importer when goods are imported into Canada. Subclause 1(3) of the Bill proposes an amendment to the definition of "manufacturer or producer", the net effect of which is to shift the imposition of federal sales tax to the wholesale or distribution level of trade in the case of the cosmetic industry.

Officials of the Department of Finance explained to the Committee that the proposed amendment results from an uneven imposition of federal sales tax in the cosmetic industry. In the case of integrated manufacturers, federal sales tax is imposed upon the sale price which includes all costs of manufacturing such as marketing, the protection of proprietory rights, etc. However, some firms in the cosmetic industry have been able to arrange their affairs so that federal sales tax is being calculated on bare manufacturing costs which would exclude such costs as marketing costs and costs to protect proprietory rights. In such cases, a product would be manufactured by the manufacturer who would sell the product to a pseudo manufacturer-distributor-wholesaler. Federal sales tax would be imposed on the manufacturer's bare costs only, the pseudo manufacturer-distributor-wholesaler bearing all other costs. Federal sales tax would thereby be imposed on a substantially lesser amount. Officials have admitted that all such arrangements were made at arm's length and there was no suggestion of artificiality or abuse. Furthermore, they agreed that no member of the ABA was involved in such practice.

A similar inequity existed with respect to goods manufactured outside of Canada. Sales tax would be imposed on the price charged to the importer and not on the price charged by the Canadian importers to Canadian wholesalers. This inequity encouraged many articles to be manufactured outside of Canada.

The ABA agreed with the proposed amendments insofar as they would apply to imported cosmetics but have suggested to the Committee that the proposed amendments are discriminatory insofar as they apply to cosmetics manufactured in Canada. They argued that if the tax base were to be shifted to the wholesale or distribution level of trade, it should be applied to all industries, not just the cosmetic industry. In particular, the ABA felt that they would be prejudiced by the proposed amendments as beauty salons would be encouraged to buy their products directly from integrated manufacturers.

On April 14, 1981, amendments were tabled which would exempt sales tax from being imposed at the distributor-wholesaler level for members of the ABA who would sell their cosmetic products exclusively and directly to beauty salons for use in the provision of their services and not for resale. The Committee welcomes this amendment.

PETROLEUM AND NATURAL GAS

The Committee received many representations from this industry respecting the impact of Bill C-57.

Canadian Petroleum Association

The Canadian Petroleum Association expressed its concern to the Committee with respect to the impact of the National Energy Program on Canada's ability to achieve oil self-sufficiency.

(i) Petroleum And Gas Revenue Tax

The base for the petroleum and gas revenue tax (PGRT) is the revenue derived from the production of oil and gas less operating costs.

The Canadian Petroleum Association recommends that the computation base for PGRT be modified from the provisions in Bill C-57 and be the oil and gas resource income computed in accordance with the Income Tax Act before deductions for exploration and development expenditures and earned depletion. This would require a re-examination of the proposed 8% rate of PGRT.

The Committee notes that these proposals are based on the premise that the oil and gas sold in Canada be moved to world prices. Until such policy is established, it would not be appropriate to implement these proposals.

They also recommended that marginal or stripper wells be exempted from PGRT as any level of tax could result in abandonment of such wells.

The PGRT is based on production revenue after taking into account operating costs. The deduction for operating costs to some extent recognizes the fact that stripper wells are less profitable. If the PGRT were based on production revenue from each well, there would be no problem. However, as drafted, the PGRT does not so apply and could result in the closing down of some marginal wells.

The Provinces impose royalties on all wells, including stripper wells. They have the ability to charge royalties on a well-by-well basis and charge less royalties for less productive wells.

The response of officials from the Department of Finance to the suggestion that the federal government do the same as the Provinces is that the federal government does not have the data or the administration available to deal with the question on a well-by-well basis.

In the view of the Committee, these wells should continue in production as their contribution on a collective basis is significant to Canada. Our tax and royalty systems should not be so onerous as to force the abandonment of marginal wells. If such proves to be the case, relief should be afforded these wells.

(ii) Natural Gas And Liquids Tax

The Canadian Petroleum Association have suggested that in order for Canada to develop to the fullest extent possible all forms and stages of oil production, the use of natural gas in all stages of oil production, including secondary and tertiary production of conventional crude oil, extraction and separation of bitumen and production of synthetic crude oil from oil sands, and the upgrading of heavy oil, be exempted from excise tax. They suggest that the imposition of this tax is counter-productive to bringing oil production on stream.

The Department of Finance has taken the position that the tax is a substitute for price increases in Canada. To tax the natural gas used in oil production has the same effect as if the price of natural gas had been increased. Operating costs are the same and it would not be logical to make any exception.

The Court of Appeal of Alberta has addressed the narrow question as to whether or not certain natural gas owned, produced and to be exported by the Crown in the Right of the Province of Alberta is subject to this tax, having regard to the Provincial Crown ownership and the protection afforded Provincial Crown property by Section 125 of the British North America Act. The question addressed by the Court of Appeal did not relate to gas owned by persons other than the Crown in the Right of the Province of Alberta. The Court of Appeal held on March 20, 1981 that the proposed tax on exported natural gas owned, produced and to be exported by Alberta was ultra vires the Parliament of Canada. This decision is being appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Independent Petroleum Association of Canada

The Independent Petroleum Association of Canada (IPAC) is a Canadian trade association representing the "independent" sector of the Canadian oil and gas industry.

IPAC, as Mobil Canada, supports the principle and aims of the NEP but not the methods to achieve those aims.

They have argued that the NEP will reduce cash flows of Canadian oil and gas companies by 20-25% from expected 1981 levels. They suggested that the NEP would affect most severely the independent companies with predominantly Canadian production, who operate in the Western Canadian Sedimentary Basin and who are primarily dependent on the netbacks received directly from that production. The netbacks will suffer in particular from the 8% PGRT.

IPAC suggests that the proposed fiscal measures, including in particular the PGRT, will make it significantly more difficult and perhaps impossible to finance the NEP's stated objective of oil self-sufficiency. The reasons for this include:

(1) industry netbacks being the principal source of reinvestment in exploration will decline in current and constant dollars from the 1980 level;

(2) the earnings growth to attract investors will be reduced under the NEP;

(3) because of the negative financial impact of the NEP, it may not be possible to finance the level of activity required to achieve self-sufficiency.

At the same time, other jurisdictions such as the United States will be more attractive to investors and explorers.

As a result, IPAC has recommended a full scale Parliamentary examination of all elements and impacts of the NEP due to its far ranging implications to Canada's energy, economic and national security. Furthermore, domestic crude oil and natural gas prices should be increased significantly and the PGRT and excise tax on natural gas and natural gas liquids be withdrawn. They suggest that the federal government's revenue need from Canadian petroleum sources should be derived through revision to the present income tax system or a refinery gate tax.

Mobil Oil Canada, Ltd.

Mobil Canada emphasized that it respected the objectives of the government in the National Energy Program, namely, energy self-sufficiency, a larger Canadian presence in the oil industry and increased federal revenues from the production of oil and gas in Canada. However, they felt that any proposals, an integral part of which is contained in Bill C-57, would fail substantially in achieving these objectives and would be counter-productive to Canada's energy goals and economic prospects. They felt that the NEP and the PGRT would slow down the development of oil and gas in Canada because the cash flow to the industry would not provide the funds essential to the development of recently discovered major reserves.

Mobil Canada recommended that the government consider further federal-provincial industry discussions and negotiations for the purpose of implementing a workable energy program. More specifically, they felt that the movement towards international price levels for Canadian oil should be accelerated; that the PGRT and excise tax proposals should be abolished; that Crown royalties should be deductible for income tax purposes; that the resource allowance should be removed; and that depletion should be eliminated while retaining the pre-1981 amortization system for exploration expenses and allowing the immediate amortization for development expenses, including land acquisition costs.

Mobil Canada testified that the combined effect of the elimination of depletion allowances and the PGRT would raise the effective tax rate to Mobil from 50.6% of financial statement income before taxes to approximately 80% of the same income. Mobil Canada's income before taxes in 1980 was $308,000,000 and their income after taxes for the same year was approximately $155,000,000. They projected their income before taxes for 1981 to be $226,000,000 and their income after taxes for the same year to be only $35,000,000.

Subsequent to their presentation, Mobil Canada forwarded to the Committee an addendum to their brief illustrating the impact of the proposed NEP on their taxes, the computation of netbacks for crude oil and natural gas production and illustrating the comparative profitability in oil exploration and development for Canada versus certain other countries. A copy of the addendum is attached hereto. If the figures submitted are correct and representative of the effect of these taxes, the Committee feels there should be a full review of the effect of these taxes.

Gulf Canada Resources Inc.

Gulf Canada's written submission closely parallels that of the Canadian Petroleum Association.

They feel it inappropriate to introduce measures to drastically cut petroleum industry revenues while artificially depressing the price of domestic oil. Under the current crude oil price schedule, the NEP will reduce the petroleum industry's cash flow by 20-30%. As a result of reduced cash flow, Gulf Canada has been forced to decrease its investment plans by $900,000,000 over the next five years.

Of particular concern to Gulf Canada are the following:

(1) The PGRT will make production from marginal wells uneconomic.

(2) The PGRT will dampen the incentives granted to enhance oil recovery programs.

(3) The NEP provides for a higher price for enhanced recovery heavy oil but the imposition of the PGRT makes the development of heavy oil produced by primary means uneconomic. As in the case of conventional oil, the PGRT will have a dampening effect on heavy oil tertiary recovery projects.

They recommend that Canadian domestic oil prices should rapidly move toward imported oil price levels and that these prices should be made available immediately to all types of new oil.

Gulf Canada also recommends that natural gas or gas liquids used in the production of gas, oil or oil equivalent be exempt from the tax on natural gas and gas liquids.

Conclusion

The PGRT and the Excise tax on natural gas and natural gas liquids implement only part of the National Energy Program. Other aspects of the NEP are reflected in Bill C-48, in amendments to the Income Tax Act introduced by Bill C-54 and will be reflected in other legislation yet to be introduced.

Furthermore, other factors such as negotiations between the federal government and the energy producing provinces will have an important impact on the matters raised before the Committee. The Committee concludes that until all such matters are taken into account, it is not able to make any recommendation or comment, other than indicated above, with respect to the submissions made by the Canadian Petroleum Association, Mobil Oil Canada, Ltd., Gulf Canada Resources Inc. and the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada.

ASSOCIATION OF CANADIAN DISTILLERS, BREWERS ASSOCIATION OF CANADA AND THE CANADIAN WINE INSTITUTE

Apart from objecting to the high level of tax imposed on the spirits trade in Canada, the principal thrust of the submissions from the three associations was that the proposal to index alcoholic beverage excise levels automatically was self-inflating because the alcoholic beverage consumer price index includes tax increases.

The Department of Finance argues that the proposed formula is not self-inflating, that it is simply designed to maintain the federal government's share of the total revenue generated on the sale of alcoholic beverages.

The Committee is concerned about an increase of taxes on an automatic basis without reference to Parliament. Without reference to Parliament, control of the tax is lost.

The Committee objects for the same reason to giving power to the Governor in Council to adjust or alter the formula in such manner as he may, by regulation, prescribe.

THE CANADIAN INSTITUTE OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS

The CICA prepared a brief concentrating on the technical aspects of the proposed legislation. Some of the more important aspects raised and recommendations given are set forth below.

Cosmetics

Subclause 1(1) of the Bill proposes to add the words "whether possessing therapeutic or prophylactic properties or not" to the definition of "cosmetics". As a result, health goods which meet the definition of "cosmetics" are denied exemption from sales tax by virtue of their classification as cosmetics. The CICA recommends that health goods should not automatically be denied exemption because they possess both "cosmetic" and "health good" attributes.

The have recommended that this phrase in the definition be amended to read "whether possessing incidental therapeutic or prophylactic properties or not".

Department officials argue that the distinction between "cosmetics" and "health goods" is very often arbitrary. For example, toothpaste containing fluoride is considered to possess therapeutic or prophylactic properties and is therefore exempt from sales tax whereas toothpaste without fluoride is taxable. The proposed amendments to the Act are being made to ensure a more even and equitable tax burden.

The Committee agrees that the CICA's recommendation would prevent unwarranted exemption being granted to goods possessing incidental health attributes while recognizing a distinction between health goods and cosmetics.

Marginal Manufacturing

It has been suggested that subclause 1(3) of the Bill extending the meaning of manufacturing to include "marginal manufacturing" is an intermediate step in moving the federal sales tax to the wholesale or some other level. Rather, the CICA regard the proposed changes as refinements of a tax which is imposed on, and collected from, manufacturers.

The CICA suggest the wording in this paragraph is too broad, particularly the phrase "or otherwise prepares goods for sale". For example, if a dealer were to wash a car before delivering it to a customer, this could be deemed to be manufacturing and the sales tax could be imposed on the vehicle's selling price to the customer rather than its cost to the dealer.

The Department of National Revenue—Customs and Excise has released a special edition of Excise News wherein it identifies a number of activities which, administratively, it considers do not constitute manufacturing for purposes of this definition. Furthermore, district offices have been responding to specific situations and have issued rulings designating certain activities as being beyond or within the scope of the definition. The CICA notes that there is no legislative authority for an equitable resolution of some of the problem areas raised. They recommend that more certainty be provided in the definition as to what is and what is not manufacturing. They submit that this can be accomplished by deleting the phrase "or otherwise prepares goods for sale". Furthermore, they suggest it would be appropriate to provide the Department of National Revenue—Customs and Excise with regulatory scope and mechanisms to define the application of this paragraph.

The Committee agrees with the first suggestion that the phrase "or otherwise prepares goods for sale" be removed from the Bill.

The Committee does not agree with the latter suggestion. The Committee has always been in favour of legislation by statute rather than legislation by regulation where Parliament has the opportunity to review and, if necessary, amend proposed or existing legislation. In some instances, legislation by regulation is desirable but the Committee is not convinced that regulations are necessary in the present instance. Officials from the Department of Finance have advised that the Department of National Revenue will monitor problems raised by this definition with a view of providing a more precise and equitable definition which could be introduced by subsequent amendment to the Act. Should the phrase not be removed from the Bill, the Committee would prefer to have the Act amended once the Department has had sufficient experience with the problems raised by the definition.

Exemption For Printed Matter

The Committee agrees with the CICA's suggestion that the discretion granted to the Governor in Council by subclause 29(2) of the Bill to designate, unilaterally, that any printed matter or class of printed matter does not qualify for exemption from sales tax is inappropriate. As a matter of principle, the Governor in Council should be given the right to exempt matter from tax, not to designate matter as taxable.

Products For The Deaf

The CICA recommends that goods referred to in Section 6.1 of Part VIII of Schedule III should be granted unconditional exemption from sales tax. The requirement for a written order by a registered medical practitioner is unnecessary as the goods enumerated in this section are, by their very nature and design, only for use by the deaf.

The officials from the Department of Finance correctly point out that products for the deaf may be ordered by governments, the courts, corporations and other persons and that they should be taxable when ordered by persons other than the deaf.

Handicapped Persons

Section 18 of Part VIII of Schedule III grants exemption for "specially constructed appliances made to order for a person having a crippled or deformed foot or ankle". There does not appear to be any justification for a specific limitation in this exemption and the Committee agrees with the CICA's recommendation that the exemption be broadened to apply to specially constructed appliances made to order for a person having a crippled or deformed elbow, wrist, knee, hand or hip.

Refunds And Deductions—Limitation

As a general rule, an application for a refund or a deduction from any of the taxes imposed by the Excise Tax Act must be made within four years after the time the refund or deduction first became payable—subsection 44(6). Exceptions to the four-year rule are contained in proposed subsections 44(6) and (7) and reflected in subclause 15(3) of the Bill. In the circumstances set forth in these subsections, a taxpayer must make his application for a refund or deduction within twelve months of the later of the time the taxes became payable or the time the refund, deduction or amount first became payable.

The CICA suggest two situations where the Minister could frustrate the four-year limitation period under subsection 44(6). If a taxpayer settles his refund or deduction claim with the Minister, then he may presumably go back four years from the date of his application with respect to his refund claim. However, if the taxpayer takes his claim to The Tariff Board and is successful, proposed subsection 44(7) restricts his refund to the twelve-month period referred to above. Thus, the Minister by refusing to negotiate a claim and forcing a taxpayer to go to The Tariff Board or Federal Court, could reduce the period for which the taxpayer could claim the refund or deduction. Furthermore, the addition of ministerial applications and interpretations to subsection 44(7) would also allow the Minister to reduce the time period for which the taxpayer could claim a refund or deduction.

Subsection 44(7) affects not only the taxpayer who is the subject of The Tariff Board declaration or court order or ministerial interpretation but also other taxpayers claiming a refund as a result of the declaration, order or interpretation. There is no provision for informing the public of all decisions of the Minister respecting the interpretation or application of the Act. Thus, taxpayers would be unaware and could have their time limit for applying for a refund or deduction expire unknowingly.

The CICA have recommended that the limitation period of four years apply in all cases.

The response of the Department of Finance is that the provisions of the Excise Tax Act are more generous than the provisions of the Income Tax Act. Under the Income Tax Act, a taxpayer must file a Notice of Objection within 90 days from the date of mailing of the Notice of Assessment. No such procedure is necessary to protect a taxpayer's rights under the Excise Tax Act. Furthermore, they argue that to extend the period to four years would give the opportunity for taxpayers to make windfall profits. A manufacturer selling a product to a customer will collect federal sales tax from the customer and, should the manufacturer recover such sales tax, he will not pass it on to his customer. However, there are instances when the customer may realize that he has overpaid sales tax and may wish to be refunded directly or through the manufacturer. In such instances there would be no windfall profit for the manufacturer. The Committee agrees that taxpayers should be given full opportunity to obtain a refund within a four-year period.

Annual Return

Clause 20 of the Bill requires a licensee to submit information "in such form as the Minister may prescribe". Based on draft returns seen by the CICA, there is considerable doubt as to the ability of taxpayers to extract the required information on a retroactive basis. Many taxpayers will have to make major modifications to their information system.

It is understood that this problem will be resolved by the Department of National Revenue prescribing a form to be used as applying only from a date to be chosen, which date will give taxpayers sufficient opportunity to be aware of the information required and to be in a position to give it.

Other Recommendations

The CICA's brief contains numerous suggestions for amendments of a technical nature. It would be impractical to comment upon them all in this report but the Committee recommends that the Department of National Revenue—Customs and Excise and the Department of Finance carefully consider these recommendations with a view to introducing appropriate amendments to the Bill.

MOTORCYCLE AND MOPED INDUSTRY COUNCIL

The Council has suggested to the Committee that the provisions respecting marginal manufacturers are arbitrary and unclear.

It is the custom of the trade to break down motorcycles and mopeds and ship them to dealers in a broken down state. The dealer assembles a vehicle for a cost of approximately $75 before selling it to a customer. If the assembly is made in a dealer's retail premises, the dealer is exempt from tax; if it is made elsewhere, he is deemed to be a marginal manufacturer. The Council is concerned that a dealer may sell a product without assembling it to avoid paying the tax and to have the vehicle assembled elsewhere may be hazardous. Officials from the Department of Finance have indicated that the Department of National Revenue is aware of the problem and is prepared to look at each circumstance in order to ensure that the Act is administered in as equitable a manner as possible. It is also understood that discussions are being held between the Council and the Department of National Revenue respecting an exemption for products that are re-assembled which would solve the major problems of the industry.

OTHER

Reports that the marginal manufacturing provisions may lead to marginal manufacturers manufacturing outside Canada have come to the attention of the Committee. Of particular concern is the sheltered workshop where the handicapped assemble, package or otherwise prepare goods for sale.

The Department of Finance doubts that there will be many instances where marginal manufacturing operations in Canada will be affected. Goods shipped into Canada in an assembled state will usually involve higher transportation costs.

Furthermore, the added value represented by the assembly operations will be taxable.

The Committee recommends that these reports be studied and amendments made to the Bill if it can be established that marginal manufacturing activities will shift from Canada to elsewhere.

Respectfully submitted,

A. I. BARROW
Deputy Chairman

IMPACT OF NEP ON TAXES

During the six years preceeding the NEP, Mobil Canada's income and taxes paid thereon were as follows:

Years	Income $ Millions	Income Taxes
		Federal	Provincial	Total
1975	158.4	79.0	11.0	90.0
1976	173.7	85.2	13.4	98.6

1981	226.7	119.7	22.4	142.1
1975-80	Average Income Tax Rate $= \frac{696.3}{1375.2} \times 100 =$			50.6%
1981	Income Tax Rate Excluding PGRT $= \frac{142.1}{226.7} \times 100 =$			62.7%
1981	PGRT As % of Income $= \frac{49.0}{226.7} \times 100 =$			21.6%
1981	Taxes (Including PGRT) as % of Income $= \frac{191.1}{226.7} \times 100 =$			84.3%

Note: The above calculation illustrates the impact of the NEP on taxes. The 12.1% increase in 1981 rate (exclusive of the impact of PGRT) over the preceeding 6 year average (62.7% versus 50.6%) is almost entirely attributable to the redefinition of earned depletion in the Income Tax Act. PGRT is expected to increase taxes in 1981 by a further 21.6%.

COMPARATIVE PROFITABILITY OF INVESTMENT IN OIL EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT

Recently proposed Canadian energy policies will severely impact on the financial attractiveness of oil exploration and development investment opportunities. Compared to other countries, investment in offshore resources in Canada will be generally less attractive even at the most favorable price level accorded other production, i.e. oil sands prices. Other countries permit production to be sold at international prices and provide accelerated amortization of investment for tax purposes. Only giant fields in Canada with reserves of one billion barrels or more would approach the profitability standard of the poorest of the other countries studied. With expected field size and lower price levels, e.g. the prices established for conventional onshore production, investment in offshore resource development would not be attractive.

Profitability of investment in onshore oil exploration and development in the United States is substantially greater than in Canada. This is due to decontrol of oil prices which more than compensates for higher unit investment costs than in Canada.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, May 20, 1981

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE SENATE

REQUEST FOR PERMISSION TO PHOTOGRAPH SITTING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod has received a letter from Mr. R. N. Hilton, Senior Training Officer of the Correctional Service of Canada, requesting permission for a photographer to take photographs of a sitting of the Senate.

Mr. Hilton is completing a program entitled "The Government of Canada", which will be used in providing new employees with an understanding of the relationship between the law-making process and the Public Service. Additional photographs of the Senate are required to provide a complete representation of the role of the Senate within the parliamentary process of Canada.

No one can give permission for photographs to be taken in the Senate chamber except the Senate itself. Therefore, I ask honourable senators if they are ready to grant Mr. Hilton's request.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps this is a question which should be brought before the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration for determination. If it is decided that the taking of photographs should be permitted, the timing for such photographs should be arranged, in conjunction with members of the Senate, through the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I understand that honourable senators agree with Mr. Hilton's request?

Senator Flynn: Let it be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Senator Frith: I believe the feeling of the Senate is that the request should be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, where it can be dealt with and recommendations made on the question of whether we should grant the request and, if so, under what circumstances.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

DIRECTOR OF COMBINES INVESTIGATION AND RESEARCH

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the distinguished Leader of the Government. I am adopting his own method of showering people with compliments, even if they do not deserve them. We have been informed that the Director of Combines Investigation and Research has been dismissed from his duties. I do not know whether the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Honourable André Ouellet, is supposed to make a statement in the other place to explain this decision. If the Leader of the Government can give us an explanation, I would appreciate it if he would make it available now.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the information made available to me indicates that this was a voluntary resignation, not a discharge from a position. I understand that a request to resign was received by the minister and the resignation was purely voluntary. However, the question will be taken as notice so that a more complete explanation can be brought to the Senate.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government also tell us whether this has really been a resignation or whether it was requested? Is this also the opinion of Senator Frith?

[English]

CROWN CORPORATIONS

CANERTECH—MANDATE

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I, too, have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It arises from the news release dated May 11 last to the effect that the Minister of Energy was to open the head office of Canertech, the new crown corporation, in Winnipeg on May 12.

In checking various references to Canertech made in the other place by the minister, his parliamentary secretary and others, I saw no indication that Canertech has ever been mandated specifically to develop environmentally sound or environmentally preferable alternative energy technologies.

Is the leader able to verify this impression?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is a determination on the part of the government, as part of its National Energy Program, that the people of the regions of Canada be fully informed of the details of the program and the availability of the program to meet particular needs. With respect to the scheduled opening of an office in Winnipeg I have no information, but I will take that part of the question as notice.

However, as I said earlier, there is a determination on the part of the government to make certain that the details of the energy program—including agencies associated with the program, such as Canertech—are made known fully in all parts of Canada, and there will be an active federal government program in this regard.

Senator Sherwood: Honourable senators, Canertech has been given an initial budget of $20 million. Obviously, within that amount the corporation will not be able to dedicate equal attention to the various alternative technologies.

By way of a supplementary question I will ask the leader if he will inquire specifically as to why Canertech has not been given a precise mandate to assign budget priority to the pursuit of the most environmentally attractive alternative technologies.

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice, honourable senators.

Senator Sherwood: As a further supplementary, will the leader, in making his inquiries, determine whether that crown corporation has been asked to examine, as a potential game plan for its operations, the recommendations of the Special Committee on Alternative Energy and Oil Substitution?

Senator Perrault: Well, the report of the special committee is important and contains many useful proposals that have come about as a result of all-party consideration of the energy challenge. Under the circumstances, however, I think a statement with respect to this corporation should be brought to the Senate, and that will be requested and presented when available.

[Senator Flynn.]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

STRIKE BY FRANCOPHONE JOURNALISTS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. Is he aware of the fact that for the last several months the news service of the French section of the CBC has been paralyzed by a major strike of its journalists? Because of this, Canadian francophones are deprived of an extremely important news service. It seems that the journalists have exerted pressure upon their employer and the present government. It also seems that the government was utterly confused in their reply concerning this important issue.

Can the minister tell us whether the cabinet will decide to appoint a mediator in this conflict so that the francophone population of Canada can get news services in French?

• (1410)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no immediate information as to the up-to-the-minute situation. The question will be taken as notice.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, can the minister inquire whether the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications has received representations from CBC authorities or the journalists to have a negotiator appointed in the near future? When does he expect to be able to provide a satisfactory answer to my question?

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope that a reply concerning this matter can be brought to the Senate tomorrow.

ENERGY

EFFECT OF NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Development. In his delayed answer to my question yesterday concerning the number of drilling rigs which have fled Canada to the United States, the honourable senator stated that customs officials report on the dollar value only. My question is: What is the reported dollar value of drilling equipment that has left Canada for the United States since the introduction of the Lalonde energy policy?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I presume that Senator Balfour is asking for the dollar value since October 28, 1980. I will try to obtain that figure. I do not have it with me at the moment.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

BELL CANADA—APPLICATION FOR RATE INCREASE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate regarding the recent rate increases applied for by Bell Canada which would increase that corporation's revenues by 14 per cent to $550 million. These increases will hit hardest those people with low incomes and, particularly, single people who must have a telephone in case of emergency. Their rate will go up from $8.45 to $11 a month. Would the Leader of the Government tell us if the government is taking any action, other than the application hearing before the CRTC, to offset this lack of good corporate citizenship?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator states an application has gone forward, and that is precisely the fact of the matter. The rates are those being sought by Bell Canada, and there is an opportunity for interventions at any hearing, as the honourable senator is aware. It would be improper for the government at this point to pre-judge the situation or to intervene in any way. Indeed, it would be contrary to the law.

Senator Marshall: It is very obvious that it is only an exercise in futility; that the CRTC is, in most cases, going to grant the application for an increase. It not only has to deal with Bell Canada, but also with CN/CP, Air Canada, Canada Post Office, and all those supposed good corporate citizens. I think it is time there was an investigation into the reasons why they are able to increase their profits at the expense of the people of Canada. It should be stopped. The Senate could take some initiative by trying to investigate it.

Senator Perrault: It is regretted that the honourable senator has attacked an independent body such as the CRTC in this way. The history of the CRTC demonstrates it is not a body that automatically grants increases to telephone companies or other entities.

The honourable senator states there is a case to be made in opposition to the rate increases sought by Bell Canada. Perhaps he will intervene in the hearing before that commission, and present his views and statistics. He may wish to encourage other consumer organizations to do the same thing. I suggest that is the proper course to take, rather than one of encouraging the government to undertake some action which is contrary to the law.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government is not answering my original question. Regardless of what the CRTC says, the cabinet has the last word. There should be an investigation made beyond the normal routine that goes on time and time again. It is time the government recognized the hardships faced by the citizens of Canada, and did something about these extraordinary increases which really are unfair.

● (1415)

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the hearings have not yet been held, and the honourable senator is asking whether the government is going to intervene in opposition to whatever decision is made with respect to Bell's request for a rate increase. Surely it would be most improper at this stage for the government to indicate that it is going to intervene to affect a decision which has yet to be made.

THE ECONOMY

INFLATION—INTEREST RATES

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. Since yesterday, has the government decided to do something to reduce interest rates?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, there were a number of valid explanations given by the Minister of Finance, and I am sure they are well known to the honourable senator.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Answer the question.

Senator Asselin: Just answer my question.

Senator Olson: It seems to me that it would be useful for the honourable senator to at least try to be consistent. One of the problems we are experiencing with some unanticipated increase in inflationary pressure is that since this government came to office—

Senator Flynn: A short answer only.

Senator Olson: —there has been a very significant increase in economic activity in this country. In fact, the 8 per cent real growth in the economy during the last quarter of 1980—

Senator Flynn: Come on! Not a speech.

Senator Olson: —was substantially higher than was anticipated in the budget, and the Minister of Finance has frankly admitted that. As a matter of fact, the performance of the economy in the first quarter of 1981—a growth rate running at somewhere between 4 per cent and 6 per cent—was also above—

Senator Flynn: Order.

Senator Olson: —the anticipated level at that time.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: If the honourable senator would like more information, I can give him some facts.

Senator Flynn: We don't want a speech.

Senator Olson: This is strictly factual.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: On a supplementary. Naturally, the minister has memorized his lesson, as have all the other ministers since they started being asked questions about interest rates and inflation. They all give the stock answer: "Just wait and see: time will take care of everything!" I appeal to the compassion of the minister. Does he not know that homeowners are now being forced to sell their homes because they cannot meet the interest rates being charged by the banks?

Is he not aware, also, that many businesses are being forced into closing shop, going bankrupt, because the government refuses to act on interest rates, because they have no policy but to let time solve all those problems?

Is that all the minister has to say in reply to the important questions I put to him about homeowners who borrow at excessive rates of interest, who are unable to meet their payments? Businesses as well will be forced into bankruptcy. Is that the answer of the minister: that the government could not care less, that its only policy is to let time take care of things?

[English]

Senator Olson: Yesterday the honourable senator's office wanted information. Now that I have come prepared to give it to him, he does not seem to want it.

Senator Asselin: Would you answer my question?

Senator Olson: What we have just heard is another dissertation from the honourable senator who referred to Statistics Canada, but when he spoke about housing, he forgot to include some other important factors. In the month of April there was a large increase in total housing starts in this country. It followed a strong 14.8 per cent increase during the first quarter of the year. As a matter of fact, housing starts in April rose by 38.5 per cent in urban areas. That did not apply to selected regions only; it is happening all across the country. Of course, my honourable friend knows that this kind of activity does, in fact, lead to some inflationary pressure because of the significant increase in economic activity across the country. Whether or not the government wants to take credit for this is another matter.

● (1420)

I do know that senators opposite were complaining some months ago that housing starts were down, that economic activity was down, and so on, yet we were trying, despite that kind of debate in this chamber, to increase economic activity in the country. Now they come along and ignore the fact that it is happening and tell us the other side of the problem. I think anybody knows that if you have these significant increases in housing, and in many other important sectors of the economy, inflationary pressure builds up and goes along with them.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I note that the minister did not answer my question. I also note that the government will do nothing to lower interest rates. Also that this government reneges on all the promises made during the 1980 election campaign to the effect that under a Liberal administration Canadians would again know happier times.

[English]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will not deal with the details of that assertion, except to say that it is completely incorrect.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, may I try to elicit an explanation? When the minister says that housing starts have increased, despite the increase in the rate of interest, is he suggesting that the increase in the rate of interest has no bearing at all on inflation, and that it is a useless performance to increase the rate of interest, since it does not do anything to curb inflation? Is this what the minister suggests?

Senator Olson: There is another conclusion my honourable friend ought to draw from the remarks I made, and that is that there is obviously a demand for more housing in this country, a demand to increase the inventory, and it is also obvious that in spite of the change in the interest rate there is a very strong demand for new housing starts. I could go through the details of it. It is not exactly uniform across the country, but that surge, or increase, is in fact taking place in all regions of the country.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but my understanding is that when the government permits the interest rate to rise, the objective is to curb the rate of inflation. It seems that at least in this area of housing starts it has no bearing at all. Would the minister therefore admit that the increase in the rate of interest does nothing to curb inflation?

Senator Olson: Well, honourable senators, that question is based on a false premise. The Honourable Leader of the Opposition says, "when the government permits the interest rate to rise".

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

Senator Olson: Is my honourable friend advocating some kind of restricted financial market? Is he advocating that the government introduce legislation so that they may either permit or not permit it? If that is what he is advocating, it represents a change in what I presumed his policy was. My honourable friend knows exactly what the various stages are in the setting of the interest rate. The process is based on the market. It takes place every Thursday. Is he advocating that the government intervene in that process? If he is, that would be a rather significant change in what I think his policy has been.

Senator Flynn: I would ask the honourable minister what he has to say about the Honourable Walter Gordon's statements of yesterday concerning the policies of the government in this respect. What he said does not mean that we have necessarily to intervene directly. There are many ways in which this sort of thing could be done. But it is the government's responsibility. The situation, after all, is of your making; the results are of your making. We were in power for only nine months. The situation today has to be ascribed to the Liberal government that we have had in this country for over 12 years. That is too long.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend will realize, of course, that though they were only in office for nine months, some significant and severe repercussions flowed from that period that are taking quite a long while to correct.

Senator Flynn: You lied to the Canadian electorate; we didn't.

Senator Olson: To get back to the other part of your question—

Senator Flynn: You lied.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): That is unparliamentary.

Senator Flynn: When I say that the government lied, that is not unparliamentary, it is simply the truth.

Senator Olson: The truth according to St. Jacques, I guess.

Honourable senators, the other part of the Leader of the Opposition's question, which had at least a suggestion of intelligence in it, was with regard to what I had to say about the remarks made yesterday by the Honourable Walter Gordon about a number of alternatives. In fact, this morning I have been so busy that I have not been able to study those remarks in detail. I know that he has great expertise in some of these matters, but I would also caution him that sometimes his views and our views do not exactly coincide.

• (1425)

Senator Flynn: No, there has been quite a change since the time of Walter Gordon.

Senator Olson: Well, I cannot complain about that.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a supplementary question, if I may, to the Minister of State for Economic Development with reference to the high interest rates.

Has he tried out the explanation he offered the opposition questioner a few moments ago on his colleague, the Honourable Eugene Whelan, about the way increased housing starts cure the effect of high interest rates upon farmers?

Senator Olson: If a question of that nature were directed to me, I would attempt to give an intelligent reply. The question was directly related to the cost of housing and that sort of thing. I was trying to demonstrate that there has been a significant increase in the demand for housing, and I gave the figures.

Senator Smith: I have another supplementary question. By what means does the honourable senator connect the increase in housing starts with any helpful effect on those who are suffering from foreclosures, near foreclosures or forced sales?

Senator Olson: I am having some difficulty in making myself understood by the opposition. One conclusion I could reach is that I am not explaining myself well. The other conclusion is that the opposition is incapable of understanding the relationship between the two. What I said—and I can say it again—was that there has been a very strong increase in the demand for housing, supported by the figures, in spite of the interest rates, which somewhat contradicts the structure in which the question was framed in the first instance.

Senator Asselin: It does not, no.

ENERGY

QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE—GOVERNMENT COMMITMENT AS TO COMPLETION

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, at the risk of being inundated by a spate of irrelevant words, I direct my question to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): You are setting a bad example.

Senator Donahoe: Just before the parliamentary recess, the National Energy Board was urged by the Alberta Petroleum Marketing Commission, the Quebec government, the IPAC and the CPA to adjourn hearings on the Quebec and maritimes pipeline. The members of the board refused that request and said that the hearings should continue.

My question is: Is the minister at this time able to reiterate the clear commitment of the government, as enunciated previously by himself and by the Minister of Energy, confirming that this line will be built and that it will be completed on schedule?

Senator Olson: I think the answer is yes, if that is all you wanted to know. There are, of course, some responsibilities that the Parliament of Canada has given to the National Energy Board for the purpose of hearing an application and taking into consideration the details of that application before a permit is issued. I would not think that the honourable senator would want the government to intervene in a process that has been set up by Parliament.

Notwithstanding that, we certainly are committed to having that done, for the reason that was given at the time, which is to endeavour to substitute gas for oil in as wide an area of Canada as possible.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You don't intervene when it's a project you favour; but you would not be above intervening if it were something to which you objected.

Senator Donahoe: We do not forget the statements made in the other place as to the decision of the National Energy Board being made before the hearings were held or completed, so I take what my honourable friend has just said with a grain of salt.

I have a supplementary question. The people who made the request to the National Energy Board—the companies and the groups concerned—obviously doubted the economic viability of the line. I believe that was because there is reference in the budget to $500 million being made available for pipeline construction, but the government has declined to be specific about how much money it will allocate to any particular pipeline. The government refuses to say whether that money will cover only capital costs or will help defray operating costs as well. My question is very simple. Is the minister equipped and willing to clarify that matter at this time?

• (1430)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, obviously, the construction of a major extension to the gas distribution system of this country would affect not only the main line but also a number of other laterals and other incentives which have been offered through the National Energy Program to encourage the use of gas and offset the necessity to import crude oil. All the details as to the economic viability of some of those laterals have not been worked out. I am sure that my honourable friend realizes that it takes a little time to work out such matters.

There were other questions raised in the application vis-à-vis the hearing that was held some months earlier respecting what was then called the Q & M line but what is now called the TQ & M line which also require further explanation by the applicant. While it does take time to work such matters out, the government's resolve has not diminished to see that the line is put in place in order that there may be a significant increase in delivery capabilities to alleviate the need to import oil for that part of Canada.

Senator Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a further supplementary question. Did I understand the honourable minister to say that the extension of the so-called Quebec pipeline into and through the maritimes is merely a lateral to the main system?

Senator Olson: The honourable senator should not take that understanding at all from what I said.

Senator Donahoe: That is what you said.

Senator Smith: That is what I heard you say.

Senator Olson: I did not. I said that there was a main line plus the laterals.

Senator Donahoe: The laterals were a side issue.

THE SENATE

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS—PRINTING OF WRITTEN QUESTIONS—PRINTING OF RESOLUTION RESPECTING THE CONSTITUTION—MOTION

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On January 24, 1980 the then Chief of English Minutes and Journals, Mr. Richard Greene, sent a memorandum to the then Speaker of the Senate, Senator Grosart, making certain representations with respect to matters to be included in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and Debates of the Senate.

Altogether, there were four recommendations and, to me, they make a great deal of sense. For example, Mr. Greene pointed out that during the Fourth Session of the Thirtieth Parliament, a total of 74 questions appeared on the Order Paper and an average of 11 pages of questions were printed each sitting day during the session. I note that today's Order Paper contains five pages of questions. The House of Commons prints such questions once a week.

Mr. Greene has suggested and recommended that questions asked pursuant to rule 20A(1) be printed on the day they are sent to the Clerk of the Senate and that all questions be printed once a week until they are answered. This would occur on the last sitting day of each week.

On March 6 I sent to Senator Frith a copy of this memorandum. My question is: Has any consideration been given to the recommendations contained in Mr. Greene's memorandum?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I suggest that the proper procedure to follow on this question of printing would be to refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration? I am sure that the committee can find a way of reducing these costs and that the members of the committee will give serious attention to the recommendations we have received with respect to those costs.

Perhaps this is the appropriate time to answer a question asked by Senator Godfrey last evening concerning the printing of the full text of the Address respecting the Constitution in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. Senator Godfrey's question was:

> Is it intended to keep printing this resolution on a weekly basis, pending the receipt of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, or can we dispense with printing it until after we receive that judgment?

Therefore, honourable senators, I am prepared to move:

> That the motion adopted by the Senate on February 19, 1981, whereby it was ordered that the full text of the motion for an Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada be printed in the Orders of the Day for the first sitting day of each week, be suspended, and, that the abbreviated version be printed until the Leader of the Government in the Senate names a day on which the said motion shall be debated, pursuant to the Order of the Senate of April 15, 1981.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question to the one posed by Senator Godfrey, and I direct it to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Has the Leader of the Government considered, as an alternative method in reducing the number of times a question has to be printed in the Minutes or records of the house, the idea of producing answers to such questions quickly?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It would be a good method of practising for the day when the access-to-information legislation comes into force.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, these questions are constantly on the minds of those who serve on the government side in this chamber. I suggest that all these matters could be considered at an early date by the Internal Economy Committee. There is a good deal of merit in the proposals advanced.

Senator Godfrey has done a service to the entire Senate by taking this line of questioning in this matter. I know that he has received willing assistance from our distinguished Speaker and the officers of the Senate, including Mr. Greene.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, is the Honourable Leader of the Government suggesting there is no merit in the suggestion that an alternative means should be explored, namely, that of answering questions promptly?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): We are doing that.

Senator Smith: Do you want me to read some of them?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, in our assiduous search for detail and accurate replies, we often take longer than anyone would wish to produce the required information.

A constant effort is being made to provide the information as quickly as possible.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it may be of interest to know whether or not the motion proposed by the Leader of the Government is acceptable.

Senator Flynn: Leave is granted to move the motion of the Leader of the Government.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, without repeating the words of the motion, I so move.

Senator Flynn: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the motion moved by the Honourable Senator Perrault seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn?

Senator Flynn: No, let Senator Frith second it.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator Perrault, seconded by Senator Frith—

Some Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VIA RAIL—AIR CANADA—REPRESENTATION OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES ON BOARDS OF DIRECTORS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to questions asked by Senator Flynn and Senator McElman on March 25 and April 1 concerning appointments to the boards of directors of VIA Rail and Air Canada.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Didn't you get a job, Charlie?

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator may wish to apply. We do not want to railroad him into anything.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You would like to, though.

An Hon. Senator: Give him a one-way ticket.

Senator Perrault: In the caboose.

On May 4, the Honourable Jean-Luc Pepin announced that Clarence Surette, of Grand Falls, New Brunswick, had been appointed to the board of directors of VIA Rail Canada Inc. for a one-year term.

After a long career with the Bank of Montreal, Mr. Surette became industrial commissioner for the newly formed Grand Falls Region Development Commission Inc., in 1975. Mr. Surette is also director of the Atlantic Provinces Chamber of Commerce and a director of the Stabilization Committee of the Caisse D'Entraide in New Brunswick.

It may also be of interest to honourable senators to learn that Ross Phillips of Calgary has been reappointed to the board of directors of Air Canada for a one-year term.

I will complete the information from the minister, although this goes beyond the terms of the question.

Senator Flynn: What else is new?

Senator Perrault: Mr. Phillips is president of Benning Investments Ltd., Calgary. He has served on the board of directors of the national airline since 1978 and is chairman of the corporation's investment policy committee. The chairman of the 15-member board is Pierre Taschereau of Montreal.

Honourable senators, we have gone beyond the call of duty in this particular reply today.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Did it take you three months to find out who was chairman of Air Canada?

Senator Perrault: In his zealous quest for the very best person available for the position.

Senator Flynn: He has been there for three years.

Senator Perrault: I was talking about the other appointment.

ENERGY

REVIEW OF NUCLEAR INDUSTRY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): On April 9 the Honourable Senator Macquarrie asked when the internal review of the nuclear industry would be made public and if the review process is designed to investigate the diminution of safeguards as a method of improving foreign sales of reactors abroad.

The government has been conducting a review of the nuclear industry in Canada, and various background papers covering all aspects of the nuclear fuel cycle have been prepared and will soon be made available to the public upon completion of their translation. It is hoped that these will contribute substantially to a well-informed public discussion of all aspects of nuclear energy generation and use.

At the international level, Canada, historically, has been a firm proponent of stringent nuclear safeguards. We will continue to strive to encourage the highest possible standards, and we will certainly not compromise those standards for purely commercial purposes.

Canada is an active participant in two current International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) activities aimed at improving international non-proliferation standards. These are the Experts Group on International Plutonium Storage (IPS) and the Committee on Assurance of Supply (CAS).

CUSTOMS TARIFF
IRISH FREE STATE TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1932
UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1932

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Connolly for second reading of Bill C-50, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, The Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932, and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, last evening, on introducing Bill C-50 the sponsor referred to certain concerns and discontent within the fishing industry. Before the Easter recess, I had asked an official of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to prepare some information for me. Unfortunately, that official is involved in meetings today, but it is my hope to discuss the subject with him tomorrow morning and to proceed tomorrow afternoon with my remarks. In the meantime, it is my understanding that if the Senate is agreeable, we could be favoured with the lofty wisdom of the Honourable Senator Godfrey. I shall deliver my humble remarks tomorrow.

● (1450)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, my intervention in this debate will not be lengthy; it will not take two minutes. It simply refers to the question that Senator Everett asked Senator Connolly last night.

You may recall that Senator Connolly said that certain inhibitions were put on the Senate with respect to money bills. In his reply to a question by Senator Everett he said:

> It is very difficult for the Senate to reduce a tax,

This subject came up in this chamber on December 18, 1975, and I think I should put the remarks made at that time on the record today. Because of a remark made by the Deputy Leader of the Government at that time, I asked a question and I referred to the highly regarded book on the Senate by Robert A. Mackay which went into the subject rather extensively. I quoted from that book as follows:

> Yet it is abundantly clear that whatever the rules of the Commons, the Senate has made good its claim to have legal authority to amend money bills, and, of course, to reject them.

In reply to my question, Senator Perrault referred to section 1 of the Ross report of May 1918 which states:

> The Senate of Canada has, and always has had since it was created, the power to amend bills originating in the Commons appropriating any part of the revenue or imposing a tax by reducing the amounts therein, but has not the right to increase the same without consent of the Crown.

It is important to note that Senator Perrault went on to say:

> That is the position which I happily hold, together with the Deputy Leader of the Government in this chamber.

I just wanted to put that on the record so there is no question of there being feelings of inhibition on any committee as to whether or not it can amend a money bill.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That has always been the view on this side. I must say that the view of the Leader of the Government, as expressed by Senator Godfrey, was contested at one time by his former deputy leader, Senator Langlois.

Senator Godfrey: I should explain that Senator Langlois went on to explain that day that he had not really meant what he had said the previous day.

Senator Flynn: I don't remember that.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to make a small contribution to the debate on Bill C-50, which was so well introduced by Senator Connolly. My comments will relate basically to the fact that, although we profess a very real interest in developing trade relations with underdeveloped countries and in encouraging every possible trade interchange between Canada and those areas of the world that need help, this particular bill, and the agreements that have been signed under the GATT treaties, really contribute very little in that respect. I am sure the Government of Canada is well aware of this and I would hope that the Prime Minister, in dealing with North-South relations, will also consider the importance of some freedom in trade relations, and allowing Canadian importers to bring in goods and services from those parts of the world that desperately need the business which could be generated.

In a discussion I had with some officials, I was advised that the Tariff Board is studying ways of improving a preferential system for developing countries and that we can expect recommendations soon. As a matter of fact, it was indicated that they may recommend free entry for some items now dutiable, and that is very encouraging.

However, speaking as a westerner, I think I should draw the attention of the Senate again to the concern of my part of the world with the very restrictive quotas on the import of textiles and footwear. I know that the Senate discussed this question quite extensively a few years ago, basically from the point of view of the Quebec industry, and made a significant contribution. As a westerner, I should like to say that this country is paying a very real price in dollars as a result of the restrictive quotas which were imposed.

I received some information from the Research Branch of the Parliamentary Library which indicates that the primary feature of the bilateral quota agreements is that administrative control over who obtains export licences is given to the governments of exporting countries.

Originally, when quotas were placed on the importation of textiles and footwear from certain countries, the importer would make arrangements with his supplier and, if he had a quota, he would get the goods. However, that arrangement has been changed and, as I have indicated, the issuance of export licences is now decided by the exporting countries. This means that Canadian importers must deal with licenced exporters and are no longer free to place import orders with the least expensive supply sources of textile and clothing. In other words, you go where you can get it and, in fact, the export supplier directs you to the company from which you will buy the product.

Basically, economics being what it is, the quotas are arranged not so much by dollars but by quantity so that, in fact, you find your importers bringing in higher-priced merchandise and the result is a disappearance, to some very marked degree, of lower-priced goods which generally have been consumed by low income families in this country.

As my final comment on this subject, I would mention the study done by G. P. Jenkins entitled Cost and Consequences of the New Protectionism, which states that the case of the Canadian clothing sector indicates an overall cost to the consumer in 1979 of $467 million. That is the price we pay as consumers for what I feel is a restrictive import policy of the Government of Canada. Admittedly, it is designed to protect an industry that needs protection, but, on the other hand, that industry is costing the Canadian consumer a great deal to support.

• (1500)

I draw these facts to the attention of the Senate, when it is dealing with this bill, in order to indicate that, although we are making substantial progress in reducing tariffs under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, we still have a long way to go. The fact that we have these kinds of restrictive policies respecting the importation of textiles and footwear is a matter of real concern to westerners, who feel they are paying a high price to support these industries that are located, for the most part, in eastern Canada.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

SPECIAL INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

CONCEPT AND DESIGN OF PROGRAM—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Murray calling the attention of the Senate to the government's Special Investment Tax Credit Program for areas of greatest disparity, announced in the Budget address of October 28th, 1980, and to interministerial confusion in the concept and design of the program.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to take a moment to explain why I will ask that this order be stood. It is an inquiry introduced by Senator Murray, and although I am ready to proceed with my observations on its subject, I will not because Senator Murray is not here. I think it more appropriate to wait until he is present.

I am informed that Senator Murray's father has passed away. I am sure you will not think it presumptuous of me to express, on the record, our sympathy to him. Anticipating that he will be back next week, I hope to proceed with the inquiry then.

Honourable senators, for those reasons I ask that the order stand.

Order stands.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ZIMBABWE CONFERENCE ON RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold rose, pursuant to notice of Thursday, April 2, 1981:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Zimbabwe Conference on Reconstruction and Development held in Salisbury from 23rd to 27th March, 1981.

He said: Honourable senators, I apologize for speaking twice on the same day, but by having me do so you will probably be rid of me for the next three or four months. It is just as well to take the dose all at once.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): We will provoke you, don't worry.

Senator Buckwold: Thank you very much, Senator Flynn.

Honourable senators, my inquiry, to call the attention of the Senate to the Zimbabwe Conference, has been on the Order Paper for several weeks. Actually, the conference took place, as you know, from March 23 to 27. That is almost two months ago. However, because of the lengthy debate on the Constitution and because of other priority items, the Deputy Leader of the Government has kept putting me off, with the significant result, I think, that the speech now becomes shorter and shorter owing to the fact that the relevance of the conference is much less timely than it was then.

I did feel that I wanted to speak about Zimbabwe and about the conference in order to bring the members of the Senate up to date on developments in that formerly strife-torn country, Rhodesia, which suffered through seven terrible years of guerrilla-racial warfare.

Let me begin by saying that the Government of Zimbabwe called a Conference on Reconstruction and Development, inviting the nations of the world to participate and, in fact, inviting those nations to bring with them pledges of financial assistance to support programs which had been prepared by that very able government.

● (1510)

Let me bring you back to the fact that in late 1979, through the diplomacy of expert foreign ministers and, I think, the genius of Lord Carrington and some of the British officials, guerrilla warfare ended as a result of the Lancaster House agreement and an orderly transition from a racial to a multiracial society was agreed to, a constitution was prepared which provided a house of 100 members, of whom 20 would always be white, and a Senate of 40 members, some elected and some appointed, and a promise was made by all sides to do whatever they could to have an orderly transition in a very difficult regime. The nations of the world said at that time that they would be prepared to help. Elections were held in February and independence was declared on April 18, 1980—just over a year ago.

At the end of March, Zimbabwe called together the nations of the world. Forty-five nations responded, along with 27 international agencies representing almost all the major nations of the free world, including two of the communist countries but not Russia or other major communist countries. You could almost compare it to a campaign to raise money for a local parish. The groundwork was done. Proposals were made to the governments of various countries of the world regarding projects in three different areas: first, the rebuilding of the war-torn country and the resettlement of millions of refugees; secondly, land resettlement and rural agriculture; and, thirdly, the necessary technical assistance to upgrade this country which is rich in natural resources. I had the honour of being named chairman of the Canadian delegation, and I was the only parliamentarian on the delegation. The other very capable members were senior civil servants of interested departments. Of course, we were significantly aided by the Canadian High Commissioner to Zimbabwe.

The conference was a great success. Perhaps the following comment will amuse you. The first speech was made by Lord Soames, the last British Governor of Rhodesia, who came wearing another hat representing the United Kindgom, imploring the nations there represented to put their money where their mouth was. They had all promised assistance, and now was the time to support this government which had shown itself to be responsible by having made an orderly transition from a racial to a multiracial society. He quoted an old Chinese proverb he had heard on a recent trip to China, which went something like this: If you are not going to lay an egg, don't make a noise like a chicken. That was a very good start to the conference. In other words, it was not words they needed, but money.

As I said, the homework was well done. The chairman of the conference was Dr. Bernard Chidzero, who had been educated in Canada and had a very warm feeling for Canadians. He was especially courteous to me and the other members of our delegation.

I had the privilege, as I have said, of speaking for Canada, and I was proud to be able to announce a $50 million bilateral aid program over a five-year period. In addition, I had with me a cheque for $3 million which I presented to the Minister of Finance for the use of that country. That was a $3 million no-strings-attached cheque. I can assure you that the Canadian High Commissioner watched me very carefully as I made my way through Zimbabwe with that cheque, but I can also assure honourable senators that it was properly deposited with their Minister of Finance.

[Senator Buckwold.]

You might be interested in some of the remarks I made at the conference, which I will make as brief as I can. I said:

> We are most impressed by the pragmatic and sensible approach which the Government of Zimbabwe has taken with respect to development issues. The conference documentation which has been expertly prepared by the Ministry of Economic Planning and Development gives us a clear picture of what the needs are. The three items on the ZIMCORD agenda—port-war recovery programs; land settlement and rural and agricultural development, and training and technical assistance—are certainly vital areas. In its development assistance activities to date, Canada has tried to respond to Zimbabwe's needs in precisely these areas—through a $3 million Canadian cash grant for reconstruction and resettlement, which I had the personal pleasure of presenting yesterday;—

Another affirmation that it was presented.

> —through a $2.9 million Canadian grant of food aid for use in the resettlement of displaced persons; through a $3 million Canadian line of credit for road-building equipment; through a special grant of $600,000 Canadian to the repatriation of refugees; and through our special program for the training of Zimbabwean civil servants.

That represented a total of $9.1 million that had already been expended.

> Because Canada feels strongly that our relationship should be based on more than financial assistance, we have, in addition, made available more than $1 million Canadian for the identification of opportunities for industrial co-operation.
> Looking towards the future, the Government of Canada has committeed a minimum of $50 million Canadian in bilateral development assistance to Zimbabwe over the next five years, beginning April 1, 1981, and in light of the Canadian government's commitment to raise its official development assistance to 0.7 per cent of GNP by 1990, there is a good prospect that our efforts in Zimbabwe can be increased still further. However, we would like to impress that your ability to utilize these funds will play an important role in determining the level of our future assistance.

This was very well received, and I can tell you that, in total, the Government of Zimbabwe got commitments for $2½ billion Canadian, which was about their objective. Of that amount, about $1 billion were new dollars that had not previously been committed in one way or another. Financially, it was considered a great success.

There are some challenges ahead. I think honourable senators would be interested to know what Zimbabwe is like. First of all, Salisbury is a beautiful city with a very temperate climate. Its elevation is over 5,000 feet. The British have left a legacy, as they have in so many countries, of a very efficient infrastructure, good government services and good health services. It is one of the few areas in Africa where it is safe to drink the water. Hygiene standards are high. You can eat the food without any danger of contamination. The hotels are first class. I certainly recommend Salisbury as a pleasant place in Africa to visit. The country itself is very rich. It is the only African country, other than South Africa, that ended up with a surplus of food this year, that being a million tonnes of maize available for export. One of the major problems is how to export, because the starving nations around it—Mozambique, Tanzania and many of these other countries that some of us have visited, especially Somalia which is faced with 1½ million refugees with very little food—really do not have the funds to be able to buy that surplus maize, nor can Zimbabwe afford to give it away. Added to that, of course, is the tremendous problem of transportation. How do you get it to these areas? They are just not geared to being able to move that much needed food to those parts of the world which are desperately hungry. The country is rich in mineral, agricultural and, indeed, manufacturing resources. It is amazing how the country survived the economic boycott, the sanctions imposed during those years of guerrilla warfare.

The Honourable Robert Mugabe is the Prime Minister. He was known as an avowed Marxist, and it was with some trepidation that the nations of the world learned that he would become the Prime Minister. He has, in fact, proved himself to be very moderate. His major opponent, you will recall, was Joshua Nkomo, whom I also met and who represents basically another tribal group. There are still some serious problems concerning the relationship between some of the tribes from different areas of Zimbabwe.

Zimbabwe is a country with seven million blacks and 230,000 whites. Together with other members of our delegation, I had the opportunity to meet with many of the white community, and I can tell you that they are determined to make the system work. There has been a very orderly transition.

The cabinet, which, of course, is dominated by blacks, still has two significant portfolios filled by whites. The Minister of Agriculture, whom I met, is white. Through his good offices I visited a prosperous white farm approximately 100 miles from Salisbury. Five thousand white farmers produce 80 per cent of the nation's food, so honourable senators can imagine the productivity and expertise of the white farmers. The real challenge is to make sure that the Mugabe government resists the temptation to break up those large, efficient, productive white farms into small units and for Zimbabwe to find itself, as so many other African countries have done, with a shortage of food when it is well able to produce a large quantity.

Senator Roblin and I were in Zambia some months earlier, and we found that such a situation had occurred, where a productive country had been turned into one which suffered from food shortages because of policies which did not lead to the development of the agricultural potential of the country but, in fact, had the reverse effect. So far, that temptation has been resisted in Zimbabwe, and there is a movement of peasants, and others who would like to own some land, to areas where the land has not been utilized, such as undeveloped and vacant land. There is much of such land in Zimbabwe, but the government has pledged that the white farmers will be encouraged, by the Minister of Agriculture and through strong marketing boards, to continue to be the major food producers.

So there has been a great deal of progress in Zimbabwe. Some of the white farmers told me that those of their children who had left the country were beginning to return, although there are still some people who are leaving. I believe, however, that things have settled down and very soon we could see a reverse migration, with people returning to Zimbabwe.

Therefore, Zimbabwe is a country that is rich in resources and that has immense potential. It has been a symbol to the world that it is possible to bring together two warring factions to form a strong government that will work for all of the people.

I mentioned that Mr. Mugabe, the Prime Minister, had Marxist tendencies. In fact, he had declared himself to be a Marxist. Yet in every speech to the conference he indicated his support of private endeavour, and he has taken a cautious outlook on the development of industry and agriculture in his country. He has not maintained any significant relationship with communist countries; one of his major supporters has been the United States of America. Therefore, some of the fears held by the nations of the world, particularly the free nations, that Zimbabwe would suddenly become another Marxist dictatorship have now disappeared, and personally I am satisfied that Mr. Mugabe is a realistic, socialistically inclined but responsible leader of a strong African nation.

Hon. Martial Asselin: How many white ministers are there in the cabinet?

Senator Buckwold: There are two white ministers in the cabinet.

In conclusion, I should like to indicate the major problems that I feel are likely to face Zimbabwe in the near future. The first, of course, is the resettlement of the country, the rebuilding of the devastated areas. There is also the problem of technical training, of being able to ensure that people are available to carry out the government's programs. In addition, there is the problem of the country's relationships with its neighbours.

It is interesting to note the relationship between many African countries and South Africa. They are the avowed enemies of South Africa. Everywhere you go you hear critical speeches condemning what is happening in South Africa, and there are militant expressions of what will happen, that the black majority of South Africa must be free. Indeed, financial and military support is often given. On the other hand, many of those countries depend on South Africa for the existence of their trade. A country like Zimbabwe does 70 per cent of its trade with South Africa.

In a recent United Nations debate, in which an attempt was made to impose sanctions on South Africa until such time as there is some relaxation of its present policy, many of the very nations who led the assault indicated that they themselves could not afford to take part in the imposition of such sanctions. In fact, the situation would be similar to Canada's refusing to do business with the United States. The economies are so intertwined. Most of Zimbabwe's exports go to South Africa, and most of its imports come from South Africa. So, although there is this real dichotomy between the two countries—and it will become more severe in the years to come—nevertheless, such trade relationships exist either openly or surreptitiously in many of the African countries. One sees South African goods in those countries because the economics of the area force upon the country that kind of trade relationship.

Those are some of the problems facing Zimbabwe, a very rich country, a country which all of us might look at as an example of what can be done and, hopefully, will continue to be done.

With the amount of money that was pledged at that conference and the kind of goodwill that was expressed by the nations of the world, a major concern of many of us is as to whether Zimbabwe will have the competence, administratively and technically, to be able to utilize those funds and that good will for the benefit of the people of Zimbabwe, so that they can achieve the great potential which is certainly theirs.

Hon. Frederick W. Rowe: Before the honourable senator resumes his seat, I wonder if I might ask a question. I regret that I was not in the chamber when he began his speech. What is the approximate size of the cabinet?

Senator Buckwold: I am not sure of its exact size, but it is in the vicinity of 20 members.

Senator Rowe: So the ratio of two to 20 is probably roughly the ratio of whites to blacks?

Senator Buckwold: Yes. The whites were guaranteed 20 members. Mr. Ian Smith is their leader. Unfortunately, I did not meet him, as he was not present at the gathering. Basically, the ratio is about the same, yes. I should perhaps mention that some members of the cabinet are senators.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I have listened attentively to the eloquent and erudite exercise on the part of Senator Buckwold on Zimbabwe. However, one thing puzzles me. I should like him to enlighten us on this. He says that Zimbabwe is rich in natural and human resources, but at the same time we in Canada, with only 24 million people, although also rich in all sorts of resources, have to supply them with millions of dollars. I am not against that concept, but I would like the honourable senator to enlighten us on the matter and reconcile the two points of view.

● (1530)

Senator Buckwold: The honourable senator asks a question that many of us ask. The fact is that although Zimbabwe is rich in resources, those resources are undeveloped. In addition, one has to bear in mind the hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of damage that were done during a vicious, seven-year guerrilla blood war. Added to that is the fact that there is a very real differential between rich and poor. The average wage of a white industrial worker is 10 times that of an industrial worker who is black. You must then add to this that there are millions of peasants living in abject poverty, so the distribution of wealth has become a very significant factor with regard to future relationships. We must also bear in mind that we do not want to frustrate the expectations of so many people who have fought and whose families, in some cases, have died for the privilege of having a multi-racial society.

A large amount of funds from around the world is going to be required in order to bring up these standards in Zimbabwe. Those 7 million blacks that I talked about are, to a very large extent, living well below the poverty line. The minimum wage has just been raised, by the way, industrially, to about $130 Canadian a month, which is considered to be a very significant increase and which will help many of those people. There is also a tremendous illiteracy problem. Most of the people live in small villages in rural areas.

Although it is true that Zimbabwe has immense resources, most of them have not been developed, and they need to be developed in order to raise standards and so that there can be a better distribution of income to make life more tolerable for those who live there.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I wonder if Senator Buckwold would entertain another question. I was interested in his statement that representatives of 45 countries attended this conference. Would it be possible to get a list of those countries, together with their contributions? It seems to me that the Canadian contribution of $50 million is indeed a large amount; but we can only consider it in the perspective of what others have given. If it is possible to obtain that list, I would like to have it.

I wonder if the honourable senator could answer another question, now, however, on one specific item. If I understood him correctly, he said that two countries from the communist world attended. Could he tell us which countries they were, and what their contribution was?

Senator Buckwold: The only one that I can name off hand is Yugoslavia. There was one other country, the name of which I will get for you, but its contribution was relatively modest. I will, of course, be glad to supply you with the other information you have asked for.

The American contribution was $225 million, over a three-year period. Our contribution, of $50 million over five years, represents only $10 million a year. Quite frankly, I hope that in due course the Government of Canada will be able to be more generous. This was not an extravagant gift. We might also keep in mind that these are bilateral gifts, in terms of which the funds are mostly expended in Canada and the products made here are delivered to the requirements of the Zimbabwe government.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): What is the portfolio held by the other white minister? You told us, I think, that there are two white ministers, one of whom is the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator Buckwold: I would have known two months ago, if you had let me speak then.

Senator Flynn: You mean that Senator Frith prevented your speaking?

Senator Buckwold: I should not have said that it was Senator Frith. It was the Leader of the Opposition who kept the debate on the Constitution going so long.

Senator Flynn: I wanted to interrupt it!

Senator Buckwold: The only white minister I came into contact with was the Minister of Agriculture; but I will find out for you the portfolio of the other white minister.

Senator Asselin: What is the meaning of the name "Zimbabwe"?

Senator Buckwold: It is an African word for that area, as named by the original natives. It was referred to by that name before the colonials took over. By the same token, "Salisbury" has been changed to "Harare", which, again, was the native name for that particular part of the country. What the actual meaning of the name "Zimbabwe" is, I am not sure, any more than I know what the meaning of "Ottawa" is, which is getting to be more questionable all the time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is now considered as having been debated.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I take this opportunity to thank the senators who accompanied me to Romania and Bulgaria during the recess. NORTHERN PIPELINE

FINANCING—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I should like to advise honourable senators that I have officially received from the President of Northwest Alaskan Pipeline Company confirmation that the sponsoring companies and the producing companies of the pipeline in the Prudhoe Bay area have reached agreement with regard to a financial plan and package that will be presented to the financial community for the financing that is necessary in order to do all of the construction of both the pipeline and the conditioning plant in Alaska.

Although I have received some of the details, I have not received all of them. Therefore, I am not prepared at this time to go into the terms and conditions of the agreement that has been reached. I can tell you that it appears to be a viable plan with respect to both equity and debt which will be assumed by the sponsors and the producing companies. Hopefully, it will be accepted as to debt financing by the financial community. Approximately, it works out to a 30 per cent commitment of debt and equity by the producing companies and 70 per cent by the 15 sponsoring companies in the pipeline consortia. There will be more details available within the next 24 to 48 hours, but as far as we are concerned it is a major step towards the completion of the entire line.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe we will all be much relieved if this project is carried through to completion because of its particular reference to Canadian gas export problems.

When my honourable friend is inquiring into the details of this matter, can he find out whether the arrangement proposed is on all fours with the conditions laid down by the United States Congress some time ago? I heard him say today that the producing companies would be taking part in the financing, but, if my memory is correct, they were barred from this role by the resolution adopted in the United States Congress.

Can my honourable friend tell me if my assumption is correct, that it is not on all fours with the United States resolution? Perhaps he could go a little further and hazard an opinion as to whether there is any problem in getting the terms and conditions changed in the United States Congress.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can, and it is not a matter of opinion only, although that opinion was expressed to me by some of the leaders on both sides of the house in both houses of Congress last summer. It is a fact that there is a law that prevents these producing companies from participating in the equity position of the pipeline, but we have a commitment from the United States administration that they will sponsor a resolution to be presented to Congress which will change that to conform, I presume, to at least the ratio of equity that is involved in the terms of agreement that has now been reached between the producing and the sponsoring companies. I cannot predict—and I suppose it is improper to do so—what Congress will do. That is a decision they will make when the resolution comes to them, but certainly with the commitment that was made last summer, and repeated by the new administration when President Reagan and a number of his senior secretaries visited Ottawa, I think it is fair to say that they have given a commitment that they would be willing to support a resolution which would amend the law to conform to a reasonable and, hopefully, workable agreement between the equity positions of the sponsors and the producers.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, May 26, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Leave is granted, but I would like the deputy leader to tell us what the agenda is for next week.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the reason I believe we should sit as usual next week is as follows: First, with regard to business coming from the other place, they have allocated two opposition days for this week and two for next week, and that will have the effect of reducing the amount of business coming before us. However, I count some 30 to 35 bills that are "in the works" in the other place. I know that the other place plans to sit on Tuesday evenings, Friday mornings and Friday afternoons in an attempt to deal with the less controversial bills and, therefore, have them ready for the Senate. When we put that possibility in the context of lengthening hours of daylight, the fact that the end of June is not very far off and the fact that the summit meeting will be taking place in July, it is my hope that we will be ready to deal with any of those bills by sitting regular hours, certainly until the end of June or until the end of the session. Then, when the more controversial items come before us, we will be in a position to deal with them. There is also the fact that there are at least two inquiries on the Order Paper that I hope we will be able to proceed with next week.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I suggest that the projection of the deputy leader with regard to legislation is not very convincing. I suggest to him that perhaps our committees have sufficient business before them to require our sitting next week.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): It would help us get some bills through.

Senator Frith: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for adding yet another reason for our being here next week. He has again answered his own question.

Senator Flynn: I wanted it on the record.

Motion agreed to.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science have power to sit at 9.30 o'clock in the evening on Tuesday next, May 26, 1981, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: By way of explanation and before honourable senators are asked to grant leave, I will say that we try very hard to plan our work in such a way that the committees do not sit while the Senate is sitting so that we do not deplete attendance in the Senate. I am advised that in this case the committee has called a special witness who can only attend that evening. The committee feels that the witness is important to their work and it is very eager to hear him. The Chairman of the committee, Senator Bonnell, is not in the chamber at this moment, but I was advised that Senator Marshall may be able to give a further explanation, if the one I have given is not adequate to convince honourable senators to grant leave.

• (1415)

Hon. Jack Marshall: It has to do with a request by the Dieppe Veterans Prisoners of War Association who have grievances with regard to the pensions they are receiving as a result of their incarceration in prisoner-of-war camps. They asked to appear before the committee, and we agreed to that request.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I would like to make an observation. In the past, when the Senate was not very busy on a Wednesday afternoon, we arranged to conclude the sitting at 3 o'clock so that committees could meet regularly thereafter. I would suggest that we try to do that again in the future. For example, I was supposed to attend four different committee meetings this morning, but fortunately one of them was cancelled. As I say, I think we should try to follow the procedure that we tried out a year or so ago, of adjourning at 3 o'clock on Wednesday afternoons and having committee meetings afterwards.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATES—EFFECT ON SMALL BUSINESS

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for my good friend, Senator Olson, P.C., M.P.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): "M.P."?

Hon. David Walker: "Good friend"?

Senator Asselin: Today the interest rate stands at 19.06 per cent, up from 18.98 per cent last week. Even prior to today's increase, the President of the Bank of Montreal, Mr. William D. Mulholland, expressed his concern that very heavy financial casualties can be expected, particularly in the small business sector, should this interest rate escalation continue.

Does the minister agree with Mr. Mulholland that small business is particularly vulnerable to escalating interest rates? Is the government anticipating a rash of small business failures, and is it about to introduce policies to avoid such an eventuality, or is it preparing policies so as to be able to deal with such failures when they occur?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I shall discount the last question completely, because we are not preparing legislation to deal with failures after they have happened. We think that industries—especially small businesses—should continue, and continue in a viable way, because they are an important sector of the whole Canadian economy.

As far as the other part of the question is concerned, the Minister of Finance has expressed concern a number of times with respect to the higher cost of operating small businesses. He has also indicated, however, that there has been a significant increase in economic activity in Canada, even beyond what he had anticipated in his budget of October 28 last and what has followed since. There has been inflationary pressure from the international sector, and there has also been an escalation, although the rate of increase has slowed down.

I am interested in the comments made by the officer of the bank. If the banks have any proposals that would be useful in bringing about a situation in which they would in fact charge a lower rate, in the interests of supporting the small business sector—he suggested that perhaps they need some relief from this additional cost of doing business—we would study them with a great deal of interest.

Senator Asselin: As a supplementary, I am sure that the minister is aware that the interest rate one year ago was 11.83 per cent. Today it is 19.06 per cent. Bankruptcies for the first quarter are up 14 per cent from last year.

• (1420)

My question to the minister is this: Is the minister considering implementing the option proposed by Mr. Mulholland, and others, of a rapid increase in oil prices, allowing the government higher revenues with which to reduce its deficits, thereby removing some pressure on the dollar and allowing the Bank of Canada to reduce its prime rate?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is interesting to note the manner in which my friend poses the question. He indicates that it is Mr. Mulholland's view that oil prices ought to increase. It would be interesting to have my friend's opinion with respect to whether oil prices should escalate more rapidly than is outlined in the National Energy Program.

Senator Asselin: You should know.

Senator Olson: I notice he carefully avoided saying that.

Senator Asselin: If you know it, explain it.

Senator Olson: From some statements made by him and by some of his colleagues in the past, it is obvious that they disagree with Mr. Mulholland's view.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: The chairman of the Economic Council of Canada also says that.

Senator Flynn: We said that we would not be as hypocritical as you.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Hypocritical, but not as hypocritical.

Senator Flynn: More frank.

Senator Olson: On a number of occasions my friend opposite has been extremely critical of even the rate of increase within the National Energy Program. It now seems to me he is advocating that there would be some desirable results derived from following Mr. Mulholland's advice. It would be interesting if my friend would indicate whether or not he supports that conclusion after an analysis of the economic situation in the country.

Senator Asselin: Am I right in saying that once more the government will do nothing to help reduce interest rates?

Senator Olson: No, that would be a very wrong conclusion to reach.

TRANSPORT

AIR FREIGHT RATES BETWEEN NORTHERN COMMUNITIES

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and arises from the recent increase in air cargo rates from Churchill to Keewatin.

I have information which indicates that general freight rates for transportation of air cargo from Churchill to Keewatin increased by 400 per cent in 1980-81. The minimum charge for a small package moving between Churchill and Eskimo Point, which is a distance of approximately 162 miles, has now been increased to $22. In contrast, however, the Air Canada rate for a similar package between Winnipeg and Halifax, a distance of approximately 1,600 miles, is $19, and the CP Air rate from Winnipeg to Vancouver, a distance of 1,157 miles, is $19 per package.

This 400 per cent freight rate increase is necessitated by the fact that small airlines do not have the authority to operate on a charter basis from communities in the south to communities in the north.

At the present time the cost of shipping an item from Churchill to Repulse Bay is $1.36 per pound, the highest freight rate in force.

Last year the cost of shipping 170 pounds from Churchill to Eskimo Point was $23.43, and on May 1, 1981 that rate was increased to $95.20 for the same weight.

Would the Leader of the Government ascertain whether anything can be done to lower the cost of shipping goods between these communities?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Adams for bringing this information to my attention. He has provided me with a revised schedule of rates which, indeed, indicates substantial increases. Inquiries will go forward immediately to determine what prompted these very large increases.

ENERGY

MARINE DIESEL FUEL—INCREASE IN PRICE

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. On May 1 last the price of a barrel of marine diesel fuel increased by $17.15. There was a request from the Dominion Marine Association that Canadian shipowners be exempted from this surcharge. The surcharge was intended to be on international consumption, as I understand it. That request was refused.

Is the Minister of State for Economic Development able to indicate whether the government is prepared to reconsider its decision to refuse that exemption?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question directly, but I will refer the matter to the proper authorities.

Senator Donahoe: I have a supplementary question. It was brought to my attention that the industry itself calculates that much of its $500 million business with the United States will be jeopardized as a result of this surcharge. As a consequence of that, I ask the minister if he can indicate to us when the industry may expect the government to proclaim the remainder of its policy designed to promote the expansion of the Canadian merchant marine.

Senator Olson: That question will also be taken as notice, although I am not quite sure there is a direct relationship between the two.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What has that got to do with it?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Anyway, you can reply.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HEALTH OF JAMES BAY CREE INDIANS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. My question stems from a delayed answer he gave on Tuesday evening concerning the James Bay Cree Indian problem. His answer was in response to a question I had asked in March.

First, I want the leader to know that, while he may subscribe to the department's efforts to re-write the facts of that case, he would do well to review the answers which the departmental staff have prepared for him, so as not to read into the record what I consider to be utter falsehoods.

The answer I was given correctly noted that last December the Minister of Indian Affairs undertook to assist the Crees in a remedial measure program against the outbreak of gastroenteritis.

My first question to the leader is whether he would inquire as to why the department has seen fit to approve only the sum of $300,000 for this remedial program, as compared to the $1 million that was committed by the minister.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question must be taken as notice. I do not have further information on that subject. However, in connection with the James Bay Agreement, the Honourable Senator Nurgitz asked a question on April 14 concerning government practice respecting agreements.

The government is firmly committed to fulfilling all obligations which it assumed pursuant to the James Bay and Northern Quebec Agreement and will do likewise with regard to all future land claims agreements.

The so-called "leaked memorandum" referred to by the honourable senator a few days ago was an internal working document which does not necessarily reflect the position of the Minister of Indian Affairs. In any case, a careful reading of that memorandum indicates that the writer's reference to funding of agreements relates to general problems in the process of implementing land claims, and not to specific problems relating to the James Bay Agreement.

As honourable senators may know, the Honourable Minister of Indian Affairs recently announced in the House of Commons that he has instructed his department to carry out a comprehensive review of the implementation of the James Bay Agreement in order to respond meaningfully to the grievances put forward by representatives of the Cree and Inuit.

It is true that there is imprecise language in the agreement. That is largely due to the fact that the final James Bay Agreement was negotiated under most severe time constraints.

The information requested, however, will be sought and will be brought to the Senate as quickly as it is available.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I should like once again to refer to the delayed answer I received on May 19. Perhaps, while the minister is seeking the information I have requested, he could verify the following, dealing specifically with the James Bay project. In the response given to me in the delayed answer, the minister was correct in saying that the construction of permanent facilities is now under way in both Nemaska and Rupert House, but what he failed to point out is that the Cree themselves have paid for all of the construction to date.

While the minister is ascertaining the shortfall in the commitment in terms of the remedial medical program, will he be able at the same time to determine what has been considered by many to be the failure to produce on the commitment for the housing portion of that agreement?

As a further supplementary, may I say that the leader asserted in his answer that there were two cases of tuberculosis in the community of Mistassini, but that the appropriate medical care is now being provided by the Government of Quebec.

● (1430)

I want to point out to the minister that doctors who have been working on the site appeared before the Commons committee this week and indicated that adequate health care is not being supplied by the Government of Quebec. Furthermore, their testimony was that approximately 30 cases of tuberculosis have been reported in Mistassini alone, that only 700 of the 2,200 residents have been tested for TB, and that only 20 per cent of the children are even near being up to date in terms of immunization.

Would the Leader of the Government also make inquiries regarding the obvious discrepancy between the testimony of the medical people given in the Commons this week and the response which obviously the department gave to him to give to us on Tuesday night.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, additional information will be sought. However, it does appear that Senator Nurgitz has a source of information which may indeed be helpful to the government. If there is evidence of a widespread outbreak of tuberculosis or other ailments there, I hope the honourable senator will co-operate with the government by sharing his information and providing any evidence and data which he may have so that we can pursue the question and do what must be done in order to alleviate the situation.

Senator Nurgitz: Since the request has been made, I refer the Leader of the Government to the report of the committee, which I am sure will be forthcoming within the next few days, on the testimony of those medical people who appeared before the Commons Health Welfare and Social Affairs Committee this week. I believe that will provide ample evidence of a rather disgraceful form of conduct, which I am sure even he would find to be awfully bad.

DIRECTOR OF COMBINES INVESTIGATION AND RESEARCH

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition asked a question yesterday concerning the resignation of the Director of Combines Investigation and Research.

I want to state, in the strongest possible terms, that the honourable gentleman mentioned, Mr. Robert J. Bertrand, the outgoing Director of Combines Investigtion and Research, was not dismissed from his post. He was re-assigned to the post of President of the Anti-dumping Tribunal. He was not pressured into resigning. He was not asked to resign. He was not in any way persuaded to leave his former position. I understand that Mr. Bertrand's new appointment is one which he himself accepted. Indeed, I understand he sought the position. I hope that this answer will serve to clear up any misunderstanding on the subject, either in this chamber, in the other place or in the media.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary on this matter. I heard what Mr. Ouellet said in the other place, and I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if Mr. Bertrand's change of position was initiated by him or by the minister, because we know very well the technique used to kick someone upstairs.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, there seems to be an almost unwholesome pursuit of some sort of conspiracy theory with respect to Mr. Bertrand. Let me suggest to the official opposition in the Senate that if it wishes to ascertain the facts it should talk to Mr. Bertrand and ascertain from Mr. Bertrand his wishes in the matter. Mr. Bertrand sought the position—

Senator Flynn: When he was asked to leave.

Senator Perrault: He was not asked to do anything. It is rather unworthy of the Leader of the Opposition, in the face of the evidence and the facts, to pursue this rather destructive line of questioning with respect to Mr. Bertrand.

Senator Flynn: Destructive of what?

Senator Perrault: It is destructive of the facts; it is destructive of Mr. Bertrand's reputation—

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Perrault: —to infer that somehow he has been eased out of his position.

Senator Flynn: No, no. Mr. Ouellet said—

Senator Perrault: Mr. Bertrand is an honourable servant of the people of this country, and has served for a great many years in various positions and posts. He sought this position, and the government was pleased to have him re-assigned to the position of President of the Anti-dumping Tribunal, which is a very important position.

Senator Flynn: It all depends on under what circumstances his position was changed.

STRIKE OF FRANCOPHONE JOURNALISTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Asselin asked a question concerning the CBC dispute. I have received a great body of information which is really too long to incorporate in my remarks. A mediator was appointed some time ago. NABET walked off the job today, as some honourable senators may have discovered when they turned on the radio this morning. There is a long chronology of events beginning on April 16, 1980. Perhaps I should review some of those dates, in order to give honourable senators an idea of the government's efforts to achieve an agreement.

On April 16, 1980, Mr. St-Hilaire was appointed as conciliation officer to assist the parties in their negotiations.

Between May 13 and 15, 1980, conciliation commenced on May 14 and continued through May 15, 1980.

On May 20, 1980, the conciliation officer's report of May 16, advising that he was unable to effect a settlement, was received.

On May 27, 1980, Mr. Pierre Dufresne was appointed as conciliation commissioner.

On June 13, 1979, conciliation commissioner proceedings began.

On July 11, 1980, conciliation commissioner hearings were adjourned until September 4, 1980.

On September 4, 1980, conciliation commissioner hearings resumed.

On October 2, 1980, conciliation Commissioner Dufresne's report was received and released to the parties.

To bring the matter down to the present time, on October 10, 1980, the parties acquired the right to strike/lock-out action.

Between October 23 and 28, 1980, the union staged 24-hour strikes.

On October 29, 1980, the employer locked out the striking newsroom employees for 24 hours.

On October 29, 1980, the parties met in post-conciliation commissioner negotiations.

On October 30, 1980, the union commenced full strike action.

In November-December, 1980, the parties met in post-conciliation commissioner negotiations on several occasions without making any progress.

On January 16, 1981, a request was received from the union for mediation assistance.

On January 19, 20 and 21, 1981, Mr. Guy de Merlis, Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service's Conciliation and Mediation Branch, met with the parties.

On February 3, 4, 11, 13, 16, 19, 23, 25, 27 and 28, 1981, Mr. Guy de Merlis met with the parties.

On March 1, 1981—I am almost finished—while meeting with mediator Guy de Merlis, the company tabled a final offer which the union agreed to place before its membership.

On March 6, 1981, the union membership rejected the company's final offer.

On March 8, 1981, mediator Guy de Merlis met with the union.

On March 15, 1981, mediator Guy de Merlis met with the parties. The company presented a revised final offer and the union agreed to review and inform the company and the mediator on the outcome of its review.

On March 17, 1981, the mediator met with the parties and suspended any further mediation sessions until such time as either party indicated a willingness to compromise on the revised final offer tabled by the employer, and rejected by the union.

On March 24, 1981, the union membership rejected the latest company offer.

On April 28, 1981, the mediator met with the parties again.

On May 13, 1981, the mediator again met with the parties.

On May 20, 1981, the mediator met with the union. And so on.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: May I ask the Leader of the Government a question? Is there any indication with regard to what is coming next? Today is May 21. Is there any indication in the last paragraph of that report of what is likely to happen next?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, we are really dealing with a situation which may change hour by hour. Efforts are being made to try to effect a settlement.

Hon. Martial Asselin: It has been the same for a few months now.

Senator Perrault: I presume that Senator Asselin has received many letters from CBC listeners who want normal service restored. If he has copies of any letters, perhaps he would make them available to the government.

Senator Asselin: That's unfair—

Senator Perrault: I say that seriously. If any information or letters of protest are available to the honourable senator, I would like to give that information to the Minister of Labour.

Senator Asselin: I am sure the government has received some correspondence.

Senator Perrault: Yes, we have received correspondence. I have reviewed this chronology of events to indicate the efforts which have been made to try to bring about a settlement. It has been a very difficult and vexatious situation, and, certainly, any ideas that the official opposition may have, which may lead to a settlement, will be sincerely welcomed by the government.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Is it the government's intention to let the situation get worse?

[English]

Senator Perrault: All I can report at this time is that NABET walked off the job today. The technicians are not manning the CBC facilities. If later information is received, it will immediately be given to honourable senators.

ZIMBABWE CONFERENCE ON RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, there were two questions asked of me yesterday by Senator Frith and Senator Molgat further to my remarks on Zimbabwe. If I am allowed, I should like to respond to Senator Frith's question. He asked me to supply the names of the white cabinet ministers in the Government of Zimbabwe. There are two such ministers, one being the Honourable David Smith, formerly the Minister of Finance in the Ian Smith government, who is now the Minister of Trade and Commerce; the other being the Honourable Dennis Norman, the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator Molgat asked me for the names of the Communist countries which sent representatives to the conference. One of those countries was Yugoslavia, which I mentioned, and the other was Romania. At the moment I am not aware of the contributions of those two countries, nor am I aware of the individual contributions of every other country. However, I have asked for that information.

LABOUR DISPUTES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we leave the CBC matter I should point out that there have been a number of other meetings held with respect to other sections of the CBC operation. I would ask leave of the Senate to have the entire record of these negotiations printed in today's proceedings. I have only read part of the record, primarily that relating to the newsroom employees in Montreal, Quebec City and Rimouski. There are other aspects of these negotiations which should be made known to honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

Hon. Jack Marshall: I wonder if the Leader of the Government would ask for hastened action with respect to the question I asked this week relating to veterans affairs. Today he replied to two questions which I asked only two days ago. The other question I raised is a simple one.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the request for that information has gone forward. As soon as it is received, it will be brought to the Senate.

THE SENATE

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS—PRINTING OF WRITTEN QUESTIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received a letter from the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration in response to a suggestion made yesterday by Senator Godfrey. The letter reads as follows:

The question of reducing the cost of printing has been raised again by Senator John Godfrey this week in the Senate chamber. As Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration I thought you might be interested in being informed of the present status of this matter, which has been of concern to the Committee for quite some time, and is still under active consideration.

As Senator Godfrey indicated in his remarks, consideration was given by the Committee to suggestions made before it for the reduction of the cost of printing of Senate publications during the First session of the Thirty-first Parliament, but the study was interrupted when Parliament was dissolved.

The matter was again raised in Committee by Senator McElman on October 23, 1980, and the Committee requested additional information from the Clerk of the Senate.

On November 6, 1980, the Clerk of the Senate reported on a number of areas including Mr. Greene's suggestions, where savings in costs could be arrived at by eliminating certain details in printing of Senate publications. Members of the Committee also at that time cited other examples where savings could be affected. It was agreed that the Clerk of the Senate, based on these discussions, would submit a number of recommendations to the Committee for approval of the Senate.

This matter is on the Committee's agenda for consideration at the next meeting of the Committee scheduled for Thursday, May 28, 1981.

You may wish to inform the senators that the Committee is very much interested in recommending to the Senate an acceptable formula which will considerably reduce the cost of printing, and that is to be accomplished in the very near future.

The letter is signed by our distinguished colleague, the Honourable Alasdair Graham, the chairman of the committee.

CUSTOMS TARIFF
IRISH FREE STATE TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1932
UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1932
UNITED KINGDOM TRADE AGREEMENT ACT, 1937

BILL TO AMEND AND TO REPEAL—SECOND READING

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Connolly for second reading of Bill C-50, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal the Irish Free State Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932, and the United Kingdom Trade Agreement Act, 1937.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the sponsor of Bill C-50, in his introduction, dealt with and gave an excellent explanation of its various clauses. In my remarks I shall attempt to deal with the concerns expressed by different groups and the possible effects of the tariff reductions on those groups.

[Senator Perrault.]

The Minister of State (Finance), the Honourable Pierre Bussières, in his introduction of Bill C-50, in the other place, stated the objectives of the Tokyo Round of GATT negotiations to be the promotion and development of industry, agriculture and fishing in Canada and the increase of the national income. Honourable senators who are interested can find the minister's remarks on page 6513 of the House of Commons Hansard.

The Minister of State (Finance) then proceeded to state that the effect of the tariff reductions contained in Bill C-50 will be to lower the cost of production as well as the cost of many consumer goods. He further stated that the tariff reductions would be phased in gradually. These statements seem to be contradictory. On the one hand, the minister sees great benefits from the reduced tariffs, and, on the other hand, he is delaying the phasing-in of the tariff reductions until 1987. This would seem to be cutting off a little bit of the tariff tail each year.

If the cost of consumer goods can be lowered, why not do it now? Inflation is already running at an annual rate of approximately 12.6 per cent, and I am sure that consumers would welcome any relief they can get. Certainly small industries, hard hit by record interest rates—and interest rates are a major factor in the cost of production—would welcome any relief they can get. The same principle applies to our basic industries, agriculture and fishing.

I was in Prince Edward Island last week, and talking to a quite established farmer who deals largely in potato production, but who also carries on other forms of farming. He told me he had been to the bank to arrange for the necessary money to finance his operations for the year. He gave the bank manager a list of the funds required and the reasons for the requirements. The bank manager said that he had forgotten one major item. The farmer inquired as to what that item was. The bank manager replied that it was $55,000 for interest on the loan for one year.

That, honourable senators, is in excess of $1,000 a week; it is roughly $200 a day for each operating day. These costs of production must then be passed on to the consumer.

If, as the government alleges, Bill C-50 will result in lower prices, why are we not acting on it at once? Perhaps the explanation is the fact that the government has some doubt, some considerable concern, about the effects of Bill C-50. The effects of the bill are already being felt in agriculture.

The tariff on pork has been reduced to zero—or free entry—effective January 1, 1981. Traditionally Canada has been an exporter of pork. In the years 1975 and 1976, Canada imported pork from the United States. The pattern has now returned to its more traditional form and Canada is once again exporting pork to the United States. Meanwhile, within Canada, pork production has undergone various changes.

The Lévesque government, in conjunction with DREE funds, has given extensive aid to the Quebec pork producers. That province now ranks number one in pork production, while Ontario has slipped back to the number two position and Alberta has slipped to the number three position. The Atlantic provinces, with the exception of Prince Edward Island, are deficient in pork production.

The market for western hogs in central Canada has been effectively eliminated. Formerly, 150 carloads of dressed pork entered central Canada from western Canada each week. Today there is hardly one passing the Lakehead.

● (1450)

Canadian hog producers are presently awaiting the announcement on stabilization payments. The industry maintains it is entitled to stabilization payments of around $160 million to $175 million. I expect the government to make the announcement soon. I am under no illusions that the payment will be as high as those in the industry feel they are entitled to. Once this payment is made, then we get into difficulty with the United States. The GATT arrangements do not allow for the export of a subsidized product. The American hog producers will certainly object to the stabilization payments. We can expect protests and retaliatory action. It is only a question of the form the retaliation will take. In 1975 the Americans closed their border to both Canadian hogs and beef for a period of six months. We cannot expect our Canadian hog producers, who maintain they are operating at a loss, to give up their stabilization payments for a GATT agreement. I point this out to illustrate to the chamber that the agreement can produce a lot of unnecessary and, perhaps, undesirable side effects.

Beef production can also be affected. Canada and the United States have lowered their beef duty from 2½ cents a pound to one cent a pound, effective immediately. Yet, both nations are effectively using non-tariff barriers to restrict the trade. Canada has effectively used DES as a means of restricting American beef imports, but even at that, we have heard the Minister of Agriculture this week complain that large fat American beef was coming into Canada. I do not know what type he expected to come into Canada other than the fat American beef, but I was interested to hear, when he pointed out that 24 per cent of our beef now comes from the United States. That means one roast or one steak in four comes from the United States.

Formerly, in this chamber we heard a great deal about the western beef producer and his problems. Lately, there has been a rather ominous silence in this regard. Perhaps it is time we had another look at that situation.

Canada also imports beef from Australia and New Zealand. The beef is mostly frozen and used in hamburgers, bologna and other prepared meat products. That pattern, too, is changing. We are now importing more steak from Australia and New Zealand. The steak finds its way into the fast food industry, and the Canadian market there is being lost as a result of duty-free imports.

The Minister of State (Trade) said we are conducting further negotiations with Australia and New Zealand to increase the trade between our two areas. Honourable senators, we should inquire as to what area the government is negotiating in. Certainly we do not need additional beef taken in from these two countries, and I am not so sure as to what products we do import. We could probably get that information from the committee.

Fisheries will also find it difficult to derive any great benefit from Bill C-50. I recall a CBC radio series on the GATT negotiations dealing with fisheries. The operator of a fish cannery in Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, was pointing out that there is very little reduction in duties being charged by other countries on Canadian fish. The duties being charged by other countries usually run in the vicinity of 15 per cent. This means that many of our surplus species, such as mackerel and herring, cannot be canned and exported. Fish which are normally frozen and filleted are caught on a quota basis which is set by the federal government, and it is difficult to increase your production when you are operating under a quota system.

Yesterday I advised this chamber that I wished to discuss the fisheries problem with officials in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. The individual I was in contact with was most helpful. It would be impossible, within a reasonable time constraint, to relay all of the information provided to me.

Briefly, I would like to refer to the major problems and concerns of the fishing industry in regard to Bill C-50. Historically, the Canadian fisheries have always felt that they have been subjected to unfair tariff protection in other countries, especially in Europe. It might be of interest to honourable senators to realize that our canned fish exports last year totalled $100 million—a considerable benefit to Canada. In meeting exports to other countries and their 15 per cent tariff, Canada must compete with countries such as Iceland, which is exporting into the same market at a 3 per cent tariff. In order to overcome this, the Canadian government is presently negotiating with the European Common Market for a reduction in tariffs. In return, the EEC nations demand a quota on fish caught in Canadian waters. It is very unlikely that this agreement will be completed in the near future. A new president has taken over in France today and, regardless of his views, he will certainly need time to study the matter before entering into any agreement.

The fishing industry is also concerned about the amount of fish caught in Canadian waters and then taken to other countries. They are caught under two systems. One is the national allocation system whereby countries with which Canada has a bilateral fisheries agreement receive the quota for a specific species and, in return, allow the importation of another species which has been processed in Canada. There are also the over-the-side sales, where the inshore fishermen catch their fish and sell it to foreign draggers which are anchored off our shore. The catching of fish within our waters is controversial, and there is no easy or absolute answer to the problem. The trawlers have one requirement and the inshore fishermen have another. Here again, I am sure the committee will wish to have a further look at that item.

• (1500)

There is also a problem with regard to the production of manufactured goods. Much of our trade consists of raw materials which are exported to other countries where the goods are manufactured and are imported into Canada as finished products. I fail to see how the lowering of tariffs will increase our manufacturing. Manufacturing costs are increasing each year and, as a result, there will be the tendency for manufacturers to build one large and efficient plant. If there are no tariff barriers in Canada, many of these plants will likely be built in other countries where the market is greater, and the market itself will justify the large cost of building a new plant.

Many of our manufacturing plants are subsidiaries of foreign-owned companies. If there is no tariff, it is difficult to imagine a head office in another country deciding to expand a Canadian plant to deal with a limited market. Of course, there are other factors which would affect the decision, and, here again, I return to the high interest rates. If it is necessary to pay an interest rate in excess of 20 per cent, I am sure that many smaller Canadian plants will be forced to close. The ultimate result will be one large plant.

An alternative would be to specialize in smaller industries such as the electronics industry which is developing in the Ottawa area. Here again, this industry requires government assistance for its development. If that assistance is provided, will the complaint arise that the product is subsidized and thus meet non-tariff barriers? We seem to be going around in circles with these problems.

Already we are receiving protests and objections based on the fact that Canadian producers are helped by our subsidized oil prices. Certainly with our oil price at between $18 and $19 per barrel, while other countries are paying the world price of $34 to $35 per barrel, Canada has a definite advantage. The Americans are paying a higher price but are remaining competitive. The Europeans and the Japanese pay approximately three times what we pay for a gallon of fuel. I can understand why they are beginning to question our subsidized fuel policy. The European nations, in particular, seem to be increasing the intensity of their objections, and it would appear that Bill C-50 is putting us on a collision course with our fuel policy.

The United States government has an income tax program which benefits firms exporting products to other countries. The so-called DISC program, which was initiated by President Carter, has been in effect for some time. Perhaps the sponsor of this bill could tell us what representations Canada has made to the United States with regard to the DISC program, and if it is to be continued in the United States, will the government introduce a measure to assist Canadian industries?

Tariff Item 47810-1 requires special consideration. Because of my profession, it is one that interests me considerably. For a period of several years the Department of National Revenue collected duties on dental materials on the basis that the department considered that the words "surgery" and "surgical materials" under this tariff item did not include dental surgery or dental surgical prostheses.

Senator Frith: At what page are we in the bill?

Senator Phillips: I do not have the bill with me, but it is near the back. On November 9, 1979, the Tariff Board, in ruling 1377, ruled that the term "surgery" did include dental surgery and dental prostheses. In effect, the ruling stated that the tariff had been illegally collected for a number of years. Following the Tariff Board's ruling, the firm of Johnson & Johnson, which does a little more in Canada than merely importing, sterilizing and packaging surgical gauze, approached the Department of Finance for protection. The Canadian Dental Association opposed the tariff, pointing out that the cost of dental materials had already risen by 27 per cent.

The Department of Finance persisted in its view that the tariff should be collected. Interestingly enough, it explained the tariff to the Canadian Dental Association by saying that it was starting a study on the matter to determine the effect, but would be putting the tariff into effect while the study was going on, which is a rather unusual procedure. I believe that the Department of Finance is attempting to prove that its officials were right, even though it has been demonstrated that they were wrong for a period of nine years.

I am tempted to ask what happened to the millions of dollars which had been collected over the years from tariffs on dental materials. I suppose I should ask if the money would be returned, but were I to ask that question I am sure some one would ask whether it should be returned to the dentists or to the patients. So I think I shall skip that subject. I hope that the committee will consider this item. The Progressive Conservative members in the other place moved an amendment to eliminate the tariff, but it was defeated.

There is a certain amount of irony in this situation. The tariff item allows for aural, nasal and other medical or surgical prostheses, materials for reconstructive surgery and certain other items, but the dental material is taxed.

• (1510)

The next tariff item, 48200-1, states that hearing aids and similar appliances will be imported duty free. In the past, honourable senators, I have been known to suggest that this government has difficulty hearing and listening, and I presume the reason hearing aids will come in duty free is because the government is now, finally, going to get around to listening and needs these appliances duty free.

Then, of course, the fact that the government is trying to create a new image leads me to believe that that is the reason why materials used in plastic surgery come in duty free, but materials used in restoring a mandible are subject to duty.

The sponsor of the bill mentioned the elimination of the British Preferential Tariff for Britain and Ireland, and that is a natural step after the entry of those two countries into the Common Market. South Africa, of course, is no longer a member of the Commonwealth, so it loses its preferential tariff also.

Senator Connolly, in introducing the bill, mentioned various studies and committee meetings that the Senate has held in the past on the subject matter of Bill C-50. I hope that these past studies will not allow the committee to avoid having a new, detailed look at Bill C-50 and the various problems that face different industries. I am particularly concerned, honourable senators, about the non-tariff barriers. It appears to me senseless to spend years negotiating on tariff reductions if various governments can use an excuse to bring in a non-tariff barrier.

Honourable senators will be interested to know that the OECD has started a study on non-tariff barriers. This will take years, and I am sure that any ill effects will be felt long before that study is completed.

May I suggest that Canada should have a team of experts to negotiate on the non-tariff barriers? I will briefly refer to two cases to illustrate the need for such experts.

Canada, in selling lumber to Japan, sent over its own experts from the lumber industry. They were able to persuade the Japanese to accept their standards and to convince them that Canadian lumber had a future in the building industry in Japan. Then the Japanese industry began to demand the inspection of the lumber in Japan, and because our people were experts and were familiar with their product they were able to convince Japan to drop this idea.

Recently Italy asked permission to import seed potatoes from Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. The European Common Market was unwilling to give consent, and we sent the Minister of State for Trade to Europe to discuss this matter. I am not sure that he was an expert on seed potatoes—I do not know of anyone who ever bought seed potatoes in Cornwall—and he came back and reported that the European countries refused to give consent for the export of the potatoes. That is the difference between sending someone who is familiar with the subject and knows the industry and sending a minister and one or two bureaucrats.

Honourable senators, I know this subject matter has been at the stage of negotiation for a good many years, but I hope the committee will still find time to do a detailed study of it.

Hon. John J. Connolly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Connolly speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Connolly: Honourable senators, first of all, I should like to thank Senator Phillips for the obvious great care he has taken in looking into certain aspects of this bill. I am bound to say that some of the problems he has raised in connection with specific industries are important for the industries themselves, and from the point of view of the concessions that are proposed in the bill, which mainly result from the agreement that was signed by all the member nations of the GATT. These problems have to be looked at very seriously by the committee. In the committee's pre-study of the bill I remember someone—I think it was Senator Buckwold—talking about the problems confronting the dental profession with regard to the importation of materials for use by dentists. The fisheries problem I mentioned the other night, and it, too, has had some discussion. However, I should say to Senator Phillips that, as a result of his helpful speech, probably it can be said that these matters will be brought to the attention of the committee and those who will appear before it to represent the viewpoint of the government in respect of these concessions.

On the question of non-tariff barriers I am also bound to say that this has been a serious problem that has confronted those who have been active in the GATT negotiations over the years. Non-tariff barriers have also been of great concern to some Senate committees. I recall particularly the concerns expressed by members of the Foreign Affairs Committee in dealing with Canada-U.S. trade, because of the fact that some of the non-tariff barriers that are used, say, in the United States make it very difficult for Canadian products, in some cases, to get into that market.

I said in my speech the other night that at the present time a study is being made by the Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs Committee of the House of Commons of the question of non-tariff barriers. A position paper has been before that committee since last October. I do not know how soon the committee will be reporting, but I am almost certain that the conclusion will be that every effort must be made by international agreement to reduce these non-tariff barriers, because sometimes they can be as serious as, if not more serious than, tariff obstructions to the free flow of trade. During the Tokyo Round much time was spent on this subject, and a proposal is before the GATT member nations, as a result of the treaty, which will make it a little easier for exporters from any of the countries associated with the GATT to have their positions heard by an official organization in Geneva under the GATT treaty and to try to resolve some of the problems that arise as a result of the use of these non-tariff barriers.

• (1520)

I would again thank Senator Phillips for his thoughtful intervention and, certainly, as the sponsor of the bill, I will see to it that copies of his speech are placed in the hands of the appropriate officials of the department so that the committee will be able to obtain answers to the questions he has raised. Indeed, neither Senator Roblin nor the other members of the committee, including myself, will ask questions on behalf of Senator Phillips, since he can ask them himself if he so desires.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Connolly moved that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE DAVID LEWIS

TRIBUTES TO FORMER LEADER OF THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, David Lewis was a colleague of many of us in this chamber when we served in the other place. He was a man who earned the respect of all those who came in contact with him whether or not they were in agreement with his political views.

A great Canadian, Mr. David Lewis had a commitment to Canada that went far beyond his political activities. He was a man of principle who fought very diligently for his concept of social democracy.

As honourable senators are aware, David Lewis was a Rhodes Scholar. He was the son of a Polish immigrant to Canada. He worked for years in the background of his party, giving up much to build the organization of that party. Mr. Lewis was brought up in Quebec and was a man who understood well both of our linguistic traditions, as well as those of other cultural groups which make up our nation.

David Lewis devoted his life to Canada, and we can all be grateful that he did so in such an unstinting and selfless fashion.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am very pleased indeed to join the Leader of the Government in paying tribute to David Lewis' contribution to Canadian political life. He was an extremely endearing person with deep convictions about the principles he fought for. When still young he studied at Oxford as a Rhodes Scholar. Later on, he was secretary of the CCF Party and eventually became leader of the New Democratic Party. He was an extremely convincing debater, indeed he was an excellent lawyer, and his career deserves to be remembered as well as his contribution to Canadian society.

As Leader of the NDP, in 1972 he achieved the best or at least the most important goal the NDP could reach, that is, the balance of power. At that point, he had the choice between allowing the Trudeau government to stay in power or giving Mr. Stanfield the opportunity of forming a new government. He chose Mr. Trudeau. I wonder if history will prove him right. Personally, I know that he often wondered about it later on. All that to say that in politics, a man is at times in a position to take a decisive step which, should he decide otherwise, might change the course of the history of Canada and perhaps even that of his own political history. Be that as it may, I am sure all Canadians will agree with me in praising David Lewis for his achievements in saying that he was a great Canadian who did a lot in parliamentary, social and political affairs, that we all owe him a debt of gratitude, and that his life was indeed a full and fruitful one.

• (2010)

[English]

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: Honourable senators, I cannot refrain from joining in the tributes paid to David Lewis. I knew him longer than anyone in Parliament. We were contemporaries at McGill, where I was two or three years ahead of him. We debated against each other as students. I must admit that I could not match him in oratory or eloquence.

David Lewis had a remarkable career. He came to Canada from Poland in 1921. He knew neither English nor French, but within 10 years he had acquired a knowledge of both tongues, and had become one of McGill's leading debaters. As has been pointed out, he was awarded a Rhodes scholarship a little more than 10 years after he came to Canada. He became, and was to the end, a very loyal Canadian. He loved his country. He was genuinely interested in the welfare of Canadians. His background was one of relative poverty so he understood the poor of the country. He was heart and soul with them.

There was no hypocrisy in his adoption of the policies and the party which became his. It was with complete sincerity.

David Lewis went to Toronto for a period of time to practise labour law. He appeared before me in a number of arbitrations, one being a major arbitration concerning employees of Hydro Ontario who were about to go on strike; the government prohibited the strike and referred the matter to arbitration. Mr. Robarts, the Premier at the time, appointed me arbitrator. Of all the lawyers who have appeared before me in arbitrations, which I have conducted for over 40 years, he was by far the most brilliant, the most eloquent and the most convincing.

Honourable senators, we have lost a great Canadian but we are all the richer for his having been with us particularly during periods of difficulty and controversy over the years. He was an optimist, even in the period of depression during the thirties when he and I were associated in various endeavours. And he died an optimist because he had faith in Canada.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with your permission I would like to join with those who have paid tribute to David Lewis, a man I knew both in the labour movement and in the House of Commons. There is no question of course of discussing his political ideology. Those who believe that political truth is one-sided or absolute are either naive or dumb. In fact, everyone searches for political truth, and it is probably one of the most complex truths there is. At David Lewis's funeral this morning, the words of the poet came to my mind: "There is no greater beauty than a child falling asleep". If I may clumsily adapt those words, I would say: "There is no greater beauty than a man who goes to his eternal rest having contributed to make this world a better place to live". That certainly was true of David Lewis, who fought relentlessly and with an undaunted tenacity for justice. Both in the labour movement and in politics, he remained loyal to his ideals and it was with exceptional abilities that he served so admirably his fellow men.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Last Sunday, following a magnificent reception he had given for the wedding of his daughter, on which we congratulate him, the Minister of Justice went to Montreal to meet with militant Liberals and he told them that he was immediately challenging the new French Parliament to mind its own business and not to meddle into Canada's affairs.

Why he should give such a warning is not known because, since coming to power, the French government led by Mr. Mitterrand has made no statement against Canada or its government.

I would like the Leader of the Government to tell us why such a statement was made in such circumstances and whether it reflects the attitude of the Canadian government toward the new French government.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Asselin has quoted from remarks alleged to have been made by the Honourable the Minister of Justice at a meeting in Montreal. I do not have before me the complete text of the alleged speech. However, an inquiry will be made in order to ascertain whether a speech was made and, if so, whether a copy is available, and, on the basis of that inquiry, hopefully a reply can be brought to the chamber.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I thank the minister for his answer and I hope that he will be able to give us the comments of the government because the minister belongs to the Canadian government and is bound by cabinet solidarity. When making such statements to militant Liberals, he is reflecting the opinions of the government that he represents.

[English]

[Later:]

Senator Perrault: As far as relations with France are concerned, I think honourable senators are aware of the fact that a very warm message of congratulations was conveyed by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, on behalf of the government and people of Canada, to President François Mitterrand following his election, and the Right Honourable the Prime Minister suggested that there are many ways in which France and Canada can co-operate and work together.

I must say that the Government of Canada is looking forward with keen anticipation to Mr. Mitterrand's presence at the forthcoming summit meeting in Ottawa. I know that all Canadians share the view that we should develop cordial relations with the new President and with France.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN— PENDING JUDGEMENT BY SUPREME COURT OF CANADA— ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. Martial Asselin: In another connection, the minister also addressing Liberal supporters, and he was reportedly exuberant, spoke in the following terms:

> If the Supreme Court of Canada decided in favour of the legality of the unilateral patriation of the Constitution by the federal government—

And by the way, I wonder whether this was not a discreet message sent by the minister to the Supreme Court while it is dealing with the matter, the minister then added the following:

> If the provinces reject the decision of the Supreme Court, if they question the legality of the step taken by the federal government, we will strictly adhere to the Canadian Constitution and see to it to restrict provincial powers and jurisdictions in some areas.

Could the minister tell us how the federal government could restrict provincial powers in certain jurisdictions and areas, and could he also tell us if the speech delivered by the Minister of Justice reflects the views of the Canadian government?

● (2020)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Again, honourable senators, the honourable senator is quoting from remarks allegedly made by the Honourable the Minister of Justice. Significantly, Senator Asselin did not refer to any text in his presentation, but perhaps he has memorized the remarks attributed to the Honourable the Minister of Justice. In any case, as I said earlier, inquiries will go forward. I will have a word with my colleague. I will discuss with him the question of these alleged remarks, if, indeed, he made the remarks quoted by the honourable senator.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): It was on TV.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I take note of the minister's statement and realize that he hastens to contradict what Mr. Chrétien said in Montreal last weekend. He certainly does. In the light of this contradiction, I wonder if the minister would be ready to say that the views expressed by Mr. Chrétien last weekend are not those of the Government of Canada, considering, as he said, that the Prime Minister has already indicated that he was looking forward to meeting President Mitterrand of France as soon as possible to deal with the issue of relations between Canada and France. Could he explain the reason for this uncalled for provocation on the part of the Honourable Jean Chrétien, who said that as far as Canada is concerned, Mr. Mitterrand and his government should mind their own business.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, let us place this line of questioning in its proper context. My honourable friend appears to have quoted from a tattered newspaper clipping which he has on his desk. The honourable senator has been in Parliament long enough to know—without casting any aspersions on the Fourth Estate—that newspaper quotations are not regarded as the best source of evidence in Parliament.

Senator Flynn: We heard him on TV.

Senator Perrault: I committed myself to an endeavour to obtain a text of the Honourable the Minister of Justice's remarks in Montreal—if, indeed, he made such a speech. I would think it to be highly irresponsible of me to attempt to reply to alleged quotations from a newspaper clipping which has been brought into this chamber by the Honourable Senator Asselin, much as I respect him. I am not contradicting the former minister.

Senator Asselin: You are.

Senator Perrault: I have yet to see the text of what the Honourable the Minister of Justice actually said. It seems to me that this refusal to comment until a text is produced is the responsible approach of the government under circumstances of this kind.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: I would like to raise a question of privilege. I have never quoted from a newspaper clipping. The minister says that I am quoting from a newspaper clipping before me. I have never quoted a news report in this House. I am simply asking the minister whether he is aware that the Minister of Justice is reported as having made such a statement in Montreal, and whether it reflects the opinion of the government. That is simply what I am asking him. If he tells me that it is not the government's opinion, I will simply suggest that he is contradicting the statement of the Minister of Justice. He will then have to inquire and report to us whether the Canadian government is actually suggesting that Mr. Mitterrand and his government should mind their own business, even though that government has made no statement whatsoever regarding Canada since its election.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I think it was a valid presumption on my part—

Hon. G. I. Smith: A presumption, anyway.

Senator Perrault: When I observed that I was not certain whether such a speech had been made, a newspaper clipping was held aloft and waved in the chamber by the honourable senator.

● (2025)

Let me repeat, in the clearest possible terms, that an inquiry will go forward to the Minister of Justice to determine whether such a speech was made. If, in fact, such a speech was made, the minister will be asked whether or not he would like to clarify his remarks.

The honourable senator asked for an opinion from me about certain legal aspects of these alleged remarks. I would remind him that questions asked in respect of any matter should not involve a reply requiring legal opinion.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Honourable senators, I am not asking my honourable friend for a legal opinion at all. I know that this is not the place to do so. I also know that he would not be able to give me a legal opinion, because of his background. This is not what I am asking him.

But could he give us a clear and accurate statement from his government on our future relations with France and tell us whether that statement will be consistent with what the Minister of Justice stated in Montreal or whether it will simply be a denial of that statement.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I hope that we can conclude on this note. Following the election of François Mitterrand, the Prime Minister issued a very clear statement which expressed the hope of Canada that there be close co-operation between Canada and France. If Senator Asselin would like a copy of that statement, I shall be pleased to provide him with it.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON

Hon. Jack Marshall: I have a supplementary question. I wonder if the Leader of the Government could extract from the Office of the Prime Minister information as to whether discussions will take place on the relations between Canada and France concerning the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. There are serious implications with regard to both the 200-mile limit and the eventualities of the Law of the Sea Conference.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—PENDING JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I suppose my question is really a supplementary to one of those asked by my colleague, Senator Asselin.

In any event, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government by what unusual sense of proper practice did the Minister of Justice, on television—which I happened to see twice over the weekend—say words to the effect—and I will not attempt to quote them exactly—that if the Supreme Court of Canada should decide against the federal government, the Government of Canada will seriously consider what I took to mean working to rule, and would thus take away from the provincial governments things which the federal government had recently given them. More particularly, what did the honourable gentleman mean when he said that the federal government might take away from the provincial governments things which the federal government had recently given them?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at this time I am not prepared to attempt to reply to a question based upon professed recollections of some television broadcast.

Senator Smith: If the honourable gentleman wishes to doubt my word, I would be glad to get him a script.

Senator Perrault: Good.

Senator Smith: Perhaps he ought to get the script himself.

Honourable senators, this is the first time in a number of years that I have heard somebody say to me that he doubted the substance of what I said I had heard. Of course, I have heard some strange things from the honourable gentleman opposite, so I should be prepared for anything, even if it is so close to being—what gentle word can I find to substitute for "insulting"?

Hon. George J. McIlraith: Be careful.

Senator Smith: Does the honourable gentleman wish to say something?

Senator McIlraith: I simply said, "Be careful."

Senator Smith: I am being careful. First, I would like the honourable gentleman to explain how it is that a member of the Government of Canada, while the question of constitutional change is before the Supreme Court of Canada, can find a precedent which would allow him to begin discussing that matter, which is sub judice in the strictest sense of the word?

• (2030)

Senator Perrault: Surely, honourable senators, for a Conservative senator to suggest that there should not be free speech in this country is not consistent with the great Conservative tradition in this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Perrault: What we have here appears to be an uncommon attempt by the Official Opposition to pillory a very competent Minister of Justice. I think it is unfair.

Senator Smith: Isn't that awful!

Senator Perrault: I think it is unfair to haul into this chamber as "evidence" what appear to be tattered newspaper clippings which are alleged to carry fragmentary accounts of some speech supposed to have been made in Montreal.

Some Hon. Senators: No, no!

Hon. Martial Asselin: I never referred to clippings.

Senator Perrault: And here we have another honourable senator, who happened to tune in a television broadcast, alleging that he has further evidence.

Senator Asselin: On a point of order, honourable senators—

Senator Perrault: I presume—

Senator Asselin: A question of privilege.

Senator Perrault: I presume that—

Senator Asselin: Wait a minute! I never mentioned any clipping of any newspaper when I asked my question. When the honourable senator says that I quoted from a newspaper clipping, he is wrong and he should withdraw that remark; I never did that.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I presumed that Senator Asselin was quoting from something because as he spoke he waved a newspaper clipping. Perhaps he was sending semaphore signals.

Senator Asselin: Never, never. I never quoted a clipping.

Senator Perrault: Was that sheet of paper being held aloft as a sign of surrender? The honourable senator had a newspaper page on his desk from which he quoted.

Senator Asselin: That was the Journal.

Senator Perrault: No, that was not the Journal. Secondly, honourable senators, regarding the Honourable Senator Smith—

Senator Smith: Yes?

Senator Perrault: —the fact that in some random fashion he caught some radio or television report with one ear and wishes to use that as the basis for an attack upon the Minister of Justice surely is beneath him and all he has stood for in his parliamentary career.

Senator Smith: Well, it may be that the honourable gentleman is saying that the Minister of Justice is beneath an attack by me. I don't have that poor view of the ability and importance in Canada of the Minister of Justice. I think he is a very able man.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: I don't have that view at all. I am sorry to hear his colleague in the cabinet so describe him, and I think the Minister of Justice will be sorry to hear himself being described that way by one of his colleagues too.

However, I was not listening with one ear: I was listening with both ears, and I was looking with both eyes, because I was so startled by such a voyage into, not only the uncharted but the forbidden that both my eyes and my ears were fully alive to what was going on.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: It was not random; you heard it twice.

Senator Smith: And in my view it was not at all random, because I listened to the news on the other major television network and there I heard the same thing.

I am saying again that the honourable gentleman need not try, and will not succeed if he does try, to hide behind his usual screen of useless and irrelevant words, even to the extent of running down the status of his colleague. The fact is that this distinguished gentleman, the leader of the administration of justice in Canada, departed from one of the longest standing and most observed rules—

Senator Donahoe: One of the most fundamental rules.

Senator Smith: —that when a case has been placed before the court and is being considered by that court, it is not discussed—

Hon. David Walker: Ever!

Senator Smith: —in public by either the lawyers or the people who are involved in it. And when that happens from the mouth and the lips of the leader of justice in Canada—the alleged leader of justice in Canada—then, indeed, it is worthy of the most vigorous denunciation.

As for the honourable gentleman talking about free speech, well, there are some rules of free speech, although I have never observed that he observed any. In fact, his speech is not only free, but nobody would pay even a penny for it anyway.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator may be apprehensive as to the decision of the court. I want to tell the honourable senator, however, that neither the Minister of Justice nor any of my cabinet colleagues have commented at all on the merits of the matters before the court. There may have been some speculation unknown to me about the events following a decision by the court; I do not know. In any case, honourable senators, we have experienced so often in this chamber the opposition's predilection for selective recall—

Senator Smith: "Selective recall"?

Senator Perrault: Yes—engaged in so often by the opposition.

Senator Flynn: Engaged in by your side.

Senator Perrault: May I suggest that the responsible course of action is to obtain an accurate transcript of the broadcast? All radio broadcasting stations are obliged to keep their tapes for a thirty-day period of time.

Senator Smith: This was a television broadcast.

• (2035)

Senator Perrault: A sound recording of the television statement is available from the station from which the honourable senator apparently heard some remarks made by someone. Perhaps he could do us all a service by bringing a transcript of those remarks to this chamber so that they can be judged on the basis of merit and not rumour.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I would be delighted to fulfil the request of the Leader of the Government, unless of course that wonderful institution, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, says that it does not have to answer questions from senators, as has been its usual response to questions from this chamber.

As for the honourable gentleman's remarks about apprehensiveness over the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, I look for its decision to be based on what it considers to be proper and reasonable, not with either hopefulness or apprehension. I wait, in full confidence that whatever its decision, it will be in accord with what it considers to be justice.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It looks like we are off to a good week.

ENERGY

CANADIAN OIL SUBSTITUTION PROGRAM—QUEBEC AND MARITIMES PIPELINE COMPLETION DATE

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Minister of State for Economic Growth.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What is economic growth?

Hon. Lowell Murray: It was 0.1 per cent last year. Congratulations.

Senator Sherwood: The Minister of Energy finally announced yesterday that the government will proceed with its Off-oil Conversion Program, which was first announced in the budget introduced in October. My question to the minister is this: Will the government promise to consult the Consumers' Association of Canada and other organizations which have expressed doubts as to the likely fashion in which the program will be administered, before finalizing the details and administration of the new program?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, that is not a very difficult undertaking to make, because I believe that there have already been some consultations. However, if the honourable senator is asking that a specific meeting be arranged between the government and the Consumers' Association of Canada, I shall carry that representation to the minister. I do not believe that either he or I ought to give that kind of undertaking.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Why not, for goodness sake?

Senator Sherwood: The program has also been criticized by Energy Probe, which doubts the possibility of promoting conversion from what it sees as essentially one scarce fuel to another. Did the government consider supplementing those funds which it has already committed to energy conservation before agreeing to spend $650 million on off-oil conversion?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, before one can answer that question, one must agree with the premise to it, and neither I nor the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources agrees that the program involves a switch from one scarce commodity to another. The fact of the matter is that Canada has a very substantial supply of natural gas and the potential to develop more electricity. These are the two major energy sources which would be used in the substitution for oil. That being the case, the other part of the honourable senator's question does not apply.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, I have a question which I would like to direct to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It relates to the matter raised by my seat-mate.

[Senator Smith.]

Hon. G. I. Smith: Then you will probably get the same answer.

Senator Donahoe: In proclaiming certain details of the off-oil conversion program, with which the government has said it will proceed, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated that the emphasis in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia will be on conversions from oil to natural gas. The minister outlined a schedule for the extension of the pipeline, but he described only the various areas of Quebec which it is expected to reach by autumn 1983. Would the Minister of State for Economic Development indicate whether it is still the government's intention that the pipeline to Nova Scotia be completed by 1983?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am not sure of the exact date. Obviously, other regulatory bodies, such as the National Energy Board, will have to complete their hearings, and a permit to proceed must be issued before the project can get under way. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was talking about something somewhat more firm in that it has already been approved by the regulatory board.

● (2040)

It is certainly the determination, and it continues to be the determination, of this government to give Canadians from one coast to the other access to natural gas.

Senator Donahoe: Before I address a supplementary question to the minister, I would point out that the National Energy Board has no responsibility whatever for forming the details of the off-oil conversion program. Having stated that premise, I would ask the minister, in the absence of a definite commitment by him with respect to time, if he will acknowledge that not knowing exactly when this conversion will take place, and when this gas will be available, puts the Atlantic region in a very difficult position? Having announced a conversion program from oil to gas to apply in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, without telling us when the gas will be available, we are in the position that, as for now, no gas is available, and the government is unwilling to tell Atlantic Canadians when gas will be available.

My question then of the Minister of State for Economic Development is: Will the minister determine if this program will be indexed to 1980 costs so that when natural gas is finally made available—if it is—Atlantic Canadians will be able to enjoy the same advantages that other Canadians can begin enjoying right now?

Senator Olson: I will take that question as notice in order to bring a more precise answer from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. However, I believe the minister has already made some comments to that effect.

TRANSPORT

CANADIAN PORTS POLICY

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to address two or three questions to the Leader of the Government in the Senate relating to the new Canadian Ports Policy announced on May 25.

I welcome the announcement and the indication that, at long last, some autonomy may be offered to the Port of Vancouver.

Would the Leader of the Government advise us what plans the government has with respect to the possibility of autonomous port operations for the Ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert?

Hon. G. I. Smith: What about Halifax, while you are at it?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the announcement which has been made with respect to the Canadian Ports Policy is of great importance to every port of this nation. The document entitled Canadian Ports Policy is the result of consultation with many levels of government, and with individuals in shipping, transportation, port management and many others.

Let me say at the outset that most local port authorities, including Vancouver's, have extremely limited discretionary power at the present time. Indeed, as honourable senators may be aware, all port authorities must seek the approval of Treasury Board. Some of these legislative requirements are antiquated and have inhibited the modern development of Canada's ports. They have certainly inhibited effective management. For example, any contract in excess of $50,000 requires Treasury Board approval. This was enacted in 1936. Extensions of negotiations of new leases have required federal government approval. Surely it is time to change an antiquated regulation of that kind.

It is now proposed that local corporations have delegated authorities in contracting property management as well as in financial management. The corporations' day-to-day operations will not be impeded by having to seek Ottawa's approval. With this new power, port contracts would be awarded much more quickly, allowing for efficient administration and management.

A corporation's corporate plan would be subject to the approval of the proposed Canada Ports Corporation, but this procedure would be little more than a formality.

As far as the situation in Vancouver is concerned, undoubtedly the Port of Vancouver would meet the criteria which are being established for a new Canada Ports Corporation.

The situation in Prince Rupert could be somewhat different. It could be more of a "marginal" situation in that northern port. However, I can say that enabling legislation would permit ports such as Prince Rupert to achieve greater autonomy as they demonstrate financial viability, growth potential and proven ability in management.

The present situation, as perhaps honourable senators are aware, is that the Vancouver Port Authority, the Prince Rupert Port Authority and other port authorities in this country are simply advisory bodies which, in effect, operate as divisions of the National Harbours Board and whose general managers report directly to the Chairman of the National Harbours Board. Under the new proposals local corporations would be more flexible in management. New regulations would permit modern-day effective practices which would improve their competitive abilities, and they would be more responsive to the needs of shippers and of the local commercial environment.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I read that in the paper today.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Why did you ask about it?

Senator Marshall: He asked.

Senator Perrault: I can assure the honourable senator that he did not read all of this in the newspaper this morning. I hope he realizes the importance of this proposed new approach to port development in this country, coming, as he does, from one of the important coasts of this nation. I am not reading from a press release.

Senator Austin: I raised the matter of autonomous operation in the Port of Vancouver, honourable senators, because the document that was issued on May 25 under the title. Canadian Ports Policy—

An Hon. Senator: Page 12, paragraph 3.

Senator Austin: I do not understand the interventions on the other side because I know that my Conservative friends from British Columbia also have great concern for the achievement of an autonomous port in Vancouver.

In any event, I would direct the attention of the Leader of the Government to the first paragraph on page 5, which concerns me since it states:

> The Act would further be amended to provide the new board with the powers to establish local port corporations at National Harbours Board ports—

A fair reading of that paragraph shows that it is not the intention of the proposed legislation that the Governor in Council would establish an autonomous port, but that the new Canada Ports Corporation, in its wisdom and discretion, and after consideration, would decide whether the Port of Vancouver would be autonomous. I can assure the government leader, although he needs no assurance in this respect, that great concern will arise in our home city if there is not a clear level of assurance by the government that more is intended than that the members of the new Canada Ports Corporation would decide whether, in their wisdom, an autonomous operation were called for.

Having drawn that to the attention of the Leader of the Government, I would ask him whether, in the appointment of members to the autonomous local port corporation in Vancouver, consideration would be given to appointing, among others, representatives from some of the users of the port. For example, I would refer to Senator Argue's producers of grain and, in Alberta, producers of raw materials so that the port corporation has some consumer representation. I know that Senator Argue has been very keen to see consumer representation in other areas of his jurisdiction.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators are aware, of course, that this blue book, which is the source of the quotation by Senator Austin, will form the basis of approximately two months of consultation before the bill, which will give legal status to the recommendations, is presented to Parliament. Therefore, there will be clarification of many of these points in the weeks to come. The views of those in port management, shippers, trade unions, and those in business are being sought.

I can give the assurance that, under this proposal, the Port of Vancouver will have effective independence.

● (2050)

There is certainly a relationship between the local corporation and the Canada Ports Corporation. The Port of Vancouver meets the requirements of policy for local and regional significance and interest and it is financially viable. So, there is no question about the Port of Vancouver.

A local port corporation would be established in the manner described in the blue book, responsible for the management and operations of the port. The board of directors of the local port corporation would be made up of local businessmen with authority to make decisions and plan locally for future development. The local corporation will have the authority to appoint a Chief Executive of the port, as well as other personnel responsibilities. The local corporation will have the ability to establish commercial tariffs for commercial business locally, enabling better business decisions to be made more quickly to develop new business and retain existing business. The local corporation will have delegated authorities in contracting, property management, as well as in financial management. The upper limit of $50,000 is clearly unrealistic in 1981. The upper limit of borrowing would have to be set after the national corporation comes into existence, but theoretically, at least, the upper limit of the local corporations could be as much as the central corporation.

The Ports of Vancouver and Prince Rupert in British Columbia will benefit from greater regional representation on the board of the Canada Ports Corporation, which will be responsible for national policy and development.

Hon. Martial Asselin: You are not answering a question; you are making a statement.

Senator Marshall: Refer it to committee.

Senator Perrault: I want to say this about the appointments to the board and representation.

Senator Asselin: That is a speech.

Senator Perrault: The new Canada Ports Corporation will replace the National Harbours Board and will have 11 or more members. To accommodate regional interests, consultative bodies will be established which will work with the local corporations, the Canada Ports Corporation, the minister and other interested bodies. On those consultative bodies would be representatives from the municipalities and provinces. So, it does admit the possibility of a very broad range of representation.

In addition, all corporation chief executive officers would be ex officio members of the Canada Ports Corporation.

Honourable senators, there is a great deal of material here. I do not want to burden the Senate by going through all of it, but I commend to honourable senators—

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You mean there is more?

Senator Perrault: —the excellent report which has been prepared entitled Canada Ports Policy.

Senator Asselin: You are reading the report.

Senator Perrault: I assure honourable senators that the document is of great importance to all Canadians.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Before I adjourn the debate, may I ask the Leader of the Government if what is proposed now is somewhat the same sort of situation that prevailed before 1936?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, it is a distinct improvement on the situation which existed prior to 1936, and I suggest a substantial advance over Bill C-6, which briefly saw the light of day.

May I quote for honourable senators a report from the Economic Advisory Commission of the City of Vancouver which said this about the program—

Senator Asselin: May I rise on a point of order. If the minister has a copy of the statement, can he not table it so that we can look at it and reply to it tomorrow afternoon?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I was asked a question by Senator Austin—

Senator Flynn: That was a long time ago.

Senator Perrault: —in his diligent pursuit of information. I was asked what the reaction of local authorities was to this proposal. May I close with these words—

Hon. David Walker: As long as you close.

Senator Perrault: —from a memorandum from the Economic Advisory Commission of the City of Vancouver:

> It is our view that a new ports policy, emboyding a decentralized approach to NHB port management and administration: (1) accords well with recent government policy initiatives; (2) would confer very significant advantages for Canada's ports; (3) is broadly analogous to approaches adopted for many of the world's largest and most successful port operations; and (4) has increasing support among the ports of the nation and their respective communities.

This is a day of rejoicing for Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, of course, I am happy to know that the answer given by the honourable gentleman conforms so closely to the arguments of his colleague, the Minister for State of Economic Development, that questions and answers should be brief and to the point.

Senator Perrault: It was as brief as I could make it.

Senator Smith: Since he was fortunate enough to be able to bring his music with him with reference to the Port of Vancouver, I must ask whether he also has his music with him with reference to some of the other very important ports in Canada such as Halifax; St. John's, Newfoundland; Saint John, New Brunswick and Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, may I say that a number of those ports will qualify for precisely the same very much improved status, and I know that the Honourable Senator Smith will welcome this.

Senator Smith: I will welcome it if it is really improved, but I am surprised that the Leader of the Government, whose responsibility extends to all of Canada, could find it so necessary to know all about what is going to happen with respect to the Port of Vancouver, and was not able to say anything, except what he finds printed in the blue book, about the ports located on the eastern coast of Canada.

Senator Perrault: I remind the honourable senator that Senator Austin is an outstanding representative of the province of British Columbia and asked precisely about the situation for the Port of Vancouver and the Port of Prince Rupert. I am surprised that the Honourable Senator Smith did not leap to his feet and ask the question before my learned colleague did from British Columbia.

Senator Smith: I asked a question and you can't answer it. That is obvious. Perhaps the honourable senator who asked that question wrote the answer, too.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am encouraged to ask in this context whether any change is planned for the status of the Port of Churchill located in northern Manitoba?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, matters relating to the Port of Churchill are constantly on the mind of the government. It may be that an announcement will be made in due course with respect to ports and associated matters.

Senator Roblin: I know that it is constantly on the minds of the government, but I wish they would get it off their minds and get it on to the action desk. If in some respects Churchill does not fit the definitions my honourable friend is quoting to us tonight from the interesting document we have all had a chance of looking at will he say whether the Port of Churchill will qualify with respect to the advisory boards or management boards, which will include representatives of users, provincial governments and others?

Senator Perrault: The interests of Port of Churchill will be very much included.

Honourable senators, no one knows at the present time which ports will qualify for the status I described earlier. In that event, it would be irresponsible for me to suggest which category the Port of Churchill may find itself in after the legislation has been written.

Senator Roblin: When does my honourable friend think he will be able to tell us what will be done at the Port of Churchill?

Senator Perrault: With the co-operation of honourable senators in opposition, perhaps at long last we can place this measure on the statute books early this fall—but only with the co-operation and support of the honourable senators in opposition, and I know that that will be forthcoming.

Senator Smith: I will be glad to draft the bill for you.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

HEALTH OF JAMES BAY CREE INDIANS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government arising out of a question I put to him on May 21, 1981. In answer to a question I put to him on that date the Leader of the Government stated:

> However, it does appear that Senator Nurgitz has a source of information which may indeed be helpful to the government. If there is evidence of a widespread outbreak of tuberculosis or other ailments there, I hope the honourable senator will co-operate with the government by sharing his information and providing any evidence and data which he may have so that we can pursue the question and do what must be done in order to alleviate the situation.

Honourable senators, I have with me substantial data consisting of evidence given by government experts, provincial and federal, as well as other experts in the field. I obtained a preliminary transcript of the proceedings of the House of Commons Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, which outlines all of this.

My question is: When will the government act? Will it take something less than two months to get a response to this question?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I wish to thank the Honourable Senator Nurgitz for his constructive attitude toward questioning in this chamber and hope that the Honourable Senators Asselin and Smith would bring similar documentation to assist the government with respect to the questions they have asked.

Hon. G. I. Smith: You mean you just hope we do not.

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. I think the minister does not have the right to make any comment on the motives of an honourable senator who is asking questions to members of the government. I think the statement he has just made, namely that Senator Smith and myself do not put our questions in an objective manner, imputes motives we do not have and the minister should withdraw his remarks.

• (2100)

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would not wish to create the impression that Senator Asselin is not assiduous in his duties, but there is a considerable difference between the mass of documentation just provided by Senator Nurgitz and the newspaper clipping that was waved here earlier this evening.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Nobody waved it.

Senator Asselin: I did not quote from any newspaper.

Senator Smith: The honourable senator is suffering from—

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Buckwold.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I believe I have the floor.

Senator Flynn: You can ask for it, but it doesn't meant you have it.

Senator Buckwold: I was called by His Honour the Speaker.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

SALE OF GRAIN TO U.S.S.R.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my question is for the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board. Before I ask it, I would like to assure the Leader of the Opposition that the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board has not spoken to me. He has not planted the question.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): He just winked at you.

Senator Buckwold: No, he doesn't even wink at me. He may smile occasionally.

Canadians generally, and farmers in western Canada and Saskatchewan particularly, were delighted to hear the announcement by the minister of the very substantial sale of grain to the Soviet Union.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: I stand not only to ask a question but also to take advantage of the situation to compliment—

Senator Flynn: Question. Question.

Senator Buckwold: It's coming—to compliment the very able minister—

Senator Flynn: Question.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Question.

Senator Buckwold: —the very able minister on achieving this contract—

Senator Flynn: Question.

Senator Smith: Question.

Senator Buckwold: —and to ask him—

Senator Flynn: Question.

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Smith: Question.

Senator Buckwold: Boy, I have never heard such a bunch of parrots as those across the way. I have never heard anything like it. They must have practised over the weekend to get it all together.

My question to the very capable minister—

Hon. Martial Asselin: Question.

Senator Buckwold: —who has brought us such encouraging words is this: Would he elaborate—

Senator Flynn: On what?

Senator Buckwold: —on the contract and would he explain—

Senator Flynn: For God's sake, no.

Senator Buckwold: —some of the possible costing implications, the prices that may be obtained and any problems that he foresees in delivery—

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Good question.

Senator Buckwold: —and to bring to the attention of this chamber and to the farmers of Canada the importance of this particular contract?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The question suggested a speech from the minister to whom it was addressed. I would ask His Honour to decide if the minister can reply to the question as put because it involves a speech, and this is not the occasion for a speech nor the procedure that follows.

Senator Perrault: The question was very spontaneous.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Nobody will muzzle the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if it is your wish that I apply the rule as it appears in the Rules of the Senate insofar as questions are concerned, I am ready to do it at any time, but it will apply equally to both the question and the answer.

[Translation]

Senator Asselin: Mr. Speaker, when the minister replies to the congratulations and the questions of Senator Buckwold, he should tell us whether he got his contract with the Soviet Union because, when he was appointed Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, he lifted the economic sanctions which we, as a Conservative government had imposed against the USSR for invading Afghanistan. Is it in recognition of this action that he finally got this contract with the Soviet Union?

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. This is the fourth question. I believe that Senator Buckwold had every right to ask three questions at the same time. He put three questions to the minister.

Senator Asselin: As for me, I have asked one!

Senator Robichaud: Senator Asselin is now asking a fourth question. I believe that we are perfectly entitled to grant senator Buckwold the privilege of one answer to the four questions.

Senator Flynn: He had already replied!

[English]

Hon. Jack Marshall: We have a new Speaker in the chamber.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Buckwold for his question. This has been a very important achievement which has come after many years of business transactions between the Canadian Wheat Board and Exportkhleb, the grain marketing and purchasing agent for the Soviet Union. I did, of course, play a major role in removing the grain embargo, and assisted in finalizing the agreement. The Canadian Wheat Board, with Exportkhelb, played the major role in working out the terms of the agreement. It is the biggest grain sale in Canadian history. The prices will be decided in the future, and that usually means that prices will rise. I estimate the value of the sale is likely to be more than $5 billion.

Senator Perrault: Fantastic!

Senator Argue: Compared to major transactions by giant corporations, or even by government standards, this has to be one of the largest business transactions in the history of Canada.

A transaction involving the Canadian Wheat Board means that the wheat farmers of Canada do not have to pay anybody a commission. The Wheat Board received no commission. The total cost of the operation of the Wheat Board for Canadian farmers amounts to less than three cents per bushel. So it is a very efficient operation.

The quantity provided in the first year is the minimum of 4 million tonnes. This minimum quantity increases by 500,000 tonnes each year until the fifth year when it becomes a minimum quantity of 6 million tonnes. This is not a sale of a fixed 25 million tonnes but a sale over a five-year period of a minimum of 25 million tonnes. The Wheat Board has given Exportkhleb the assurance that these minimum quantities will be provided.

As far as prices are concerned, I understand the pattern of dealing in this kind of grain is that the prices are agreed to on each particular transaction over the five-year period when the transaction takes place.

Over the past 25 years, which is the history of the sale of grain into this market, every single bushel of grain has been sold for cash and the relationship of the Wheat Board with this very large purchaser has been excellent. There is usually very little difficulty in deciding on exact grades, and at times grades that are purchased will change because of their availability.

This is a large sale; the largest in history. These are minimum quantities which indicate once again to western wheat producers that the challenge for them is to grow within the next five years the largest quantities of grain they can. I am confident that markets will be available for these large quantities, so I am delighted to be in a position to talk in such an optimistic manner about a transaction that means a great deal to the 140,000 wheat producers of western Canada. It is a wonderful thing for Canada. These large sums of money going into western Canada, especially into the hands of farmers—

Senator Asselin: Because they lifted the economic sanctions.

Senator Argue: —are not deposited and hoarded. If these monies are not spent in advance, they are spent very soon after receipt and the purchasing power, as a result of these sales, flows through the whole Canadian economy and provides jobs, and has a multiplier effect of about four.

This agreement is a tremendous accomplishment for the Canadian Wheat Board. It is a tremendous day for western producers.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (2110)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am not one to minimize the importance of this transaction, because I think the minister is quite right when he says that it is a most important sale—indeed, the most important sale in terms of quantity and value we have seen in this country. I agree with him. To coin somebody else's phrase: What is good for western Canada is good for Canada. I wish he would see other problems in the same light.

Leaving that aside for one moment, there are some points I would like to ask him about in connection with this transaction. The first is the price. We have an indication in the press—I am sorry if I quote the press. I will refrain from waving the clipping around: I will be discreet and hold it behind my back. I have to admit that it was the only place I could get the information, so the minister will have to excuse me if I use it. It is a nice little piece of information. It refers to the market price of No. 1 Canadian wheat at $226.97 per tonne.

This is not a sale of wheat alone: it is a sale of wheat, oats and barley. I understand from what the minister said that the precise prices and quantities of each grain will probably be subject to separate negotiation each time a major transaction takes place. So we can hopefully assume that we have sufficient price escalation possibilities in this so that we do not get trapped in any unfortunate circumstances.

I would like to know: What details can the minister give us about this first sale of—whatever it is—four million tonnes, is that correct? How much of that is wheat, oats and barley, and what is the price set for each variety of grain, based on whatever standard grade is being used?

Senator Argue: This is a long-term agreement, defined as a five-year agreement, with the minimum quantities per year as I have outlined. I am unable to say with any precision, and I do not believe that anyone could, what the relative quantities of wheat and coarse grains may be in this total purchase, because I do not think it has been decided. Undoubtedly, the majority of the grain involved will be wheat. Also, one can say that undoubtedly some proportion of the sale of four million tonnes will be coarse grain. That will depend on the availability of coarse grains, barley in particular, in Canada. There is likely to be some sale of Durum wheat as well as spring wheat. If my information is correct, no pricing has taken place on any of the quantities. It is a master agreement under certain terms for the five-year period. These separate arrangements from time to time as to precise quantities for a precise sale, and as to a precise price for that particular sale, will be determined when they are made; but the minimum quantity to be sold is four million tonnes within the first year.

As I understand it, the market price, as we know it, will be the governing price for these transactions. In other words, the transactions will reflect the market at the time the precise transactions are made. I do not have a crystal ball as to what the future may hold at any given time with regard to prices. I have a favourite expression, which I think is usually right, namely, that the experts are always wrong. After all, who is an expert, and so on? So I will not try to forecast what a given price will be, whether it will go up or down. I do feel that the long-term trend in grain prices in the world is upward, but in that upward trend those prices will fluctuate, sometimes, perhaps, by very large amounts. The world demand for grain in recent years has been increasing more rapidly than the increase in the world production of grain. So long as that trend continues, I think the chances are that grain prices will continue to get better and better; but the precise prices for precise quantities, with these minimum amounts, will be decided when those transactions take place and arrangements are made.

Senator Roblin: I asked my question about pricing for a particular reason. I appreciate that no one should be talking prices in any loud tone of voice. You do not like to talk prices before you strike your deal, and you have not struck your deal for your particular transaction at this time. I want to know if the minister will undertake to let us know what those prices are at the time the deal is struck, because the Canadian farmer has a vested interest in knowing that the bargaining done on his behalf is consonant with the market trend and the market price at the time. So I would be interested in knowing if the minister can give us that information.

I must confess—it is no confession; it stands out all over me—that I am not an expert either when it comes to predicting these prices. I do suggest that the minister may be right over the long term, that the market will increase. It had better, because we are basing all our plans, hopes and production figures on the expectation that it will. But it is also quite likely that it will not be a straight line up. There will be many down turns, and we may very well see one this year. I don't want to predict one either, but there is a possibility of a very good wheat crop, certainly in North America and also, I believe, in Russia, so we cannot be sure about what will happen.

My main point is that I want some assurance from the minister that we will be able to examine the results of the price negotiations of the Wheat Board when that information can fairly be made available.

[Senator Argue.]

Senator Argue: I can assure the honourable senator that I will obtain that information when, in the normal pattern of Wheat Board operations, it wishes to make it available. I am certainly not going to ask the board to divulge information about its own transactions that might in any way put the board at a competitive disadvantage, since grain companies are not disclosing their prices. But I will certainly convey Senator Roblin's request to the board.

I wish to say to the honourable senator that I think he would be in error if, by his line of questioning, he would seem to infer that the Wheat Board will not do a first-class job of getting the best available market prices at the time those transactions are made. I can say that with confidence, and I have confidence in the board. I would hope that the word would not start getting around, because it would be completely false, that the Wheat Board is sort of underselling the market, or something like that, because, as far as I know, that does not happen and it has not happened. The Wheat Board, I believe, will get the best possible price, considering the market and price conditions, at the time that the particular transactions are made.

Senator Roblin: I want to tell my honourable friend that he is zeroing in on the point when he says that there are some people who say that the Wheat Board undersells the market and that is why they sell the grain. I do not happen to share that view, but I think it would be important, if we could do so appropriately, without showing too much of our hand, to establish that point, because, as my honourable friend knows, from discussions he and I have had on this subject in other places with other people, it has become quite a point of interest. If it could be done appropriately and we could establish that the Wheat Board pricing system is as we say it is, then I believe it would be a good move, because the allegation will undoubtedly be that in view of the large quantities being transacted, special discounts will be in order. The minister shakes his head. I sincerely hope he is right.

Senator Argue: You can take it from me that I am right.

Senator Roblin: I have no complaint to make about the Wheat Board's marketing operations. Nothing that I know about them would lead me to have any lack of confidence. But if we could establish those facts, it would be very helpful to Canada's position in discussing world wheat trade in other circles.

Senator Argue: It should be established right now that the Wheat Board gets the best possible price, that it does not engage in the kind of things that the honourable senator seems to be inferring.

Senator Roblin: Other people infer, not me.

Senator Argue: But the senator is putting it on the record. He is saying that these are the things that should be answered. He is creating the doubt. So far as I am concerned, I have faith in the Canadian Wheat Board, from all that I know of its operations. I believe the farmers have faith in the board. This deal is a good one, and the prices will be good prices in relation to the market when those transactions are made.

• (2120)

Senator Roblin: Well now, we were getting along just fine until this last outburst from the minister. I do not want to be accused of the things that he is implying with respect to my questions here. I am interested in establishing the bona fides of the Canadian Wheat Board in a way that will be acceptable in the world wheat community. That is certainly not an unworthy ambition, and I think that if my honourable friend can help me to do so he will be doing the country a favour.

Senator Smith: Honourable senators, I wish to join in this debate, begun in the guise of a question, only for a short time, and then I wish to raise a point of order.

So far as this transaction is concerned, as one who comes from one of the regions of Canada that are farthest from the source of the wheat which is to be sold, or which has been sold and is to be delivered, I wish to add a word of congratulations to the minister and his colleagues of the Wheat Board. I want to assure him that as a Nova Scotian I agree with him that the prosperity of the west is a good thing for Canada, including my part of the country. I offer him and his colleagues my very warm congratulations on having been able so vigorously and well, even at long last, to follow the trail blazed by the Honourable Alvin Hamilton so many years ago when he showed just how wheat could be sold to countries as far distant as Russia, though he did not sell to Russia. I have no criticism whatever, and only good wishes. I trust that wheat will be sold not only in the quantities that are hoped for but also in even greater quantities.

I say again that I believe that the wealth of the west is good for Canada—for my part of Canada as well as for the other parts of Canada—and I hope the honourable gentleman will agree that when we come to discuss the wealth that we may hope for in Atlantic Canada, he will feel able to take the same kind of view about that.

Now, on the point of order. It must be obvious to any honourable senator that this is no way to conduct Question Period, and I have a great deal of sympathy for the Minister of State for Economic Development in his endeavour to bring Question Period into focus as a question period.

I do not suggest for a moment that there was any conspiracy between Senator Buckwold and the minister. I accept Senator Buckwold's assurance without the slightest grain of doubt or reservation; but, of course, it was not very hard for him to know, without any suggestion from the minister, that the minister would love to have the chance to make a statement about this matter, so he, wishing his minister well and hoping to give him the opportunity, thought it would be just as well to ask him a question in order to give him that chance—and he did.

All the minister needed to do, however, was to rise in his place at the proper stage in the proceedings of this house and say, "I would like to have leave to make a statement about the recent contract made for the sale of wheat to Russia." I am sure that that leave would have been granted; someone on this side could have replied; and the matter could have been disposed of in complete compliance with the rules and with the consent of everybody and not have destroyed the valiant efforts of the Minister of State for Economic Development to bring some better order, some better system, into the Question Period.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, on the point of order, although the honourable senator has indicated that he agrees with or accepts my explanation that there was no collusion between the minister and me, and I appreciate that, there was the implication that I asked no questions. I, in fact, asked questions that were along the same lines as those Senator Roblin followed with, namely, the pricing of the agreement, the ability to deliver, a question on transportation—which, by the way, was not answered—and similar implications of the deal. Those are legitimate questions, and I do not know what the uproar was about that arose suddenly, because in asking my questions I congratulated a very able minister on a job well done.

Senator Smith: Nobody has suggested—or, at least, I did not suggest, and I did not hear anybody else suggest—that the honourable gentleman did anything of the nature to which he is unnecessarily replying, as though he were replying to an accusation. All I am saying is that the minister could have achieved what obviously was a very desirable object from his point of view—and, indeed, from the point of view of the rest of us—by asking leave to make a statement. I am sure my colleagues and I, and all other senators, would have granted such leave to the minister to make as long a statement as he wanted to about wheat in Canada, provided the opportunity to reply was made available to someone on this side of the house.

All I am saying is that if we want to encourage the vigorous efforts of the Minister of State for Economic Development to have Question Period follow the rule book in some sort of recognizable shape, then we ought to try to do so. This is one of the occasions when obviously we did not do it, although the cause was a very worthy one, and one on which I have already given my congratulations to those who brought it about.

That was my only point. My purpose was not to criticize the honourable gentleman who asked the question. His motives were worthy. The only criticism one could make of him is that perhaps he unnecessarily departed from the course of action so vigorously advocated by his colleague, the Honourable the Minister of State for Economic Development.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I am glad we have come so far, and I am amazed at the progress that is being offered by my honourable friend.

Senator Smith: I have always offered it. No one would accept it.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—CURRENT SITUATION—STATEMENT BY GOVERNMENT LEADER RE GOVERNMENT REFUGEE POLICY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

A number of senators have expressed real concern about the situation in Lebanon and the apparent confrontation that is developing between Israel and Syria.

Does the Honourable the Leader of the Government have any information that he can share with the members of this house as to the latest development in that part of the world?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Canada has an annual refugee plan which includes close co-operation with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees. At the present time the policy of that commission is directed towards local resettlement in the region with eventual repatriation when conditions permit. The agency is advising all countries that special refugee settlement programs are not needed at this time. This policy accords with current Canadian perceptions about the situation. Canada contributed $4 million to the U.N. High Commission for Refugees general programs for 1981, a percentage of which would go to those programs in Central America.

However, the Canadian government will consider individual requests for assistance to resettle refugees for whom local resettlement in countries of asylum is impossible. The government's program for 1981 makes provision for the acceptance into Canada of up to 1,000 refugees from all of Central and Latin America.

Special measures to assist persons affected by the strife in El Salvador were announced on March 19 in the other place by the Minister of Employment and Immigration Canada, the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy.

Finally, regarding Salvadoreans being deported from the United States as illegal immigrants, we have informed the United States authorities of Canada's interest in being made aware of Salvadoreans scheduled for deportation who appear eligible for entry into Canada under the relaxed criteria outlined by Mr. Axworthy.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I appreciate the information that the leader has provided to the chamber about the refugees from El Salvador, but I was inquiring about Lebanon.

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, at least it can be said that the government this evening volunteered unsolicited information.

Honourable senators, I must apologize to the honourable senator. I have some information with respect to Syria and Lebanon. However, in view of the lateness of the hour and the extent of Question Period, I hope that information can be provided for honourable senators tomorrow afternoon.

JUSTICE

REPORT OF KERSHAW COMMITTEE TO BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS—PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT ACT—APPLICATION BEFORE FEDERAL COURT

Question No. 56 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Orville H. Phillips:

[Senator Bosa.]

Is the Attorney General of Canada, or any agent thereof, a party to an application or action in the Federal Court of Canada involving, either directly or indirectly, the Report of the so-called Kershaw Committee to the British House of Commons and, if so (i) has the Attorney General of Canada intervened in the case (ii) why?

Reply by the Minister of Justice:

No.

The Attorney General had intervened in an application which in an indirect manner can be said to have involved the Kershaw Committee's Report. The applicant alleged that an official with External Affairs had engaged in partisan political behaviour in making comments on the Report at a meeting of the Canadian Bar Association. The application involved s.32 of the Public Service Employment Act. The Attorney General is always served with applications made in relation to that Act and the Attorney General intervenes as a matter of course in all cases pursuant to that Act. However, the applicant has withdrawn the application.

STATE IMMUNITY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-19, respecting State Immunity in Canadian Courts, which was presented on Thursday, May 21, 1981.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg moved that the report be adopted.

He said: As honourable senators will recall, the bill which is the subject of the report of the committee clarifies the situation of Canadian citizens in dealing with foreign states and their agencies in matters of contract and in other matters.

Canadians have, at times, found difficulty in gaining access to the courts in actions against foreign states or in enforcing judgments flowing from such actions. While preserving the immunity of foreign states to actions by Canadians in matters related to their normal non-commercial activities, the bill makes it clear that a foreign state is not immune from the jurisdiction of a court in proceedings relating to any commercial activity of that state. Similar legislation was enacted by the United States in 1977, the United Kingdom in 1978, and most of the member states of the Council of Europe.

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs studied the bill at four meetings. It heard the evidence of officials of the Departments of Justice and External Affairs, as well as the evidence of an independent and outstanding expert in international law, Professor Jean Castel of Osgoode Hall Law School and editor of the Canadian Bar Review. We appreciate their help and guidance.

On the basis of the evidence received, the members of the committee proposed the six amendments listed in the committee's report. In proposing its adoption, I shall deal with the amendments briefly.

The first amendment changes the definition of "foreign state" by defining the term "political sub-division". That term is meant to refer to provinces, states or equivalent entities. In the bill it was worded in such a way that it could have been interpreted as applying to municipalities.

The second amendment is of a technical nature. On comparing the French and English versions of subclause 4(4) the committee realized that the two versions did not entirely correspond. Upon questioning the officials from the Departments of Justice and External Affairs, it was discovered that neither version accurately reflected the wishes of the policy-makers. The subsection, as redrafted in both official languages, now says what it was meant to say.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Which subsection, if you please?

Senator Goldenberg: This is subclause (4) of clause 4.

Senator Roblin: Thank you.

Senator Goldenberg: The third amendment is to the French version only in order that it might more accurately reflect the wording of the English version.

The fourth amendment, a partial redraft of subclause 11(2), the committee considered necessary for the sake of clarity.

I will simply say a few words about the last two amendments because they provide answers to the concerns of the committee. Subclause 11(4) deals with the property of a foreign central bank. Under the wording of the bill as drafted, the money held for the account of a foreign central bank or monetary authority is immune from attachment and execution. The members of the committee felt that, as the bill read, the money could be held for the account of a foreign central bank and would be immune, even though that money was being used in a commercial activity. The subclause as redrafted provides that, if money held by a foreign central bank is used or intended to be used for a commercial activity, it would not enjoy the immunity from execution and attachment that is otherwise provided by subclause 11(4).

The sixth and final amendment is to clause 14. This is a rather important amendment because the committee was concerned that clause 14, as drafted, allows an inappropriate delegation of Parliament's authority to the Governor in Council. As drafted, the Governor in Council may by order, on the recommendation of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, restrict or extend any immunity or privileges under this act in relation to a foreign state. The committee was influenced by the view expressed by the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments that it was inappropriate to delegate to the Governor in Council the power to extend an immunity. We had no objection to enabling the Governor in Council to restrict immunities in certain cases, but not to extend them beyond what Parliament has provided for in the bill.

Honourable senators, that is the substance of the amendments unanimously adopted by the committee.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

NOVA SCOTIA

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—HISTORICAL FACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA REFERENCE CASE—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, April 14, 1981, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Smith calling the attention of the Senate to some of the historical facts relevant to the claim of Nova Scotia to minerals off its shores which distinguish that claim from the British Columbia claim as dealt with by the Supreme Court of Canada in Reference re Ownership of Offshore Mineral Rights (The British Columbia Reference case), (1967) Supreme Court Reports, 792, and (1968) 65 Dominion Law Reports (2d), 353, and submitting that the said decision does not decide the ownership of minerals off the shores of Nova Scotia.

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I yield to the Honourable Senator Smith.

Hon. G. I. Smith: I thank the Honourable Senator Petten for his courtesy.

Honourable senators, I will not say very much on this particular inquiry at this time, because certain things have happened which seem to make it more appropriate to speak on something else. I shall content myself tonight, as I intended to in any event, with congratulating the Honourable Senator Frith on the quality and quantity of his research and scholarship as evidenced in his remarks which were made some time ago, and which, like my own, have perhaps been overtaken by events to some extent.

In congratulating him, I am sure that he will understand that I am not expressing any degree of agreement with him. I have taken some time to follow him into the fields where his remarks led in the belief that I would be able satisfactorily to refute—to my own satisfaction, at least, if not to anybody else's—some of the salient and fundamental arguments that he had made.

Some events have occurred since I concluded that I would like to make such a speech on this inquiry. There are two energy bills now before Parliament; one of them has been—perhaps both of them have—for some considerable time. I do not at all plead ignorance of that fact in explaining my delay, but almost over the weekend, or over the last few days, a startling event has occurred which seems to me to make it more appropriate to concentrate what I hope I will be able to say about this matter upon the two energy bills that are before us, or one of them, rather than to deal with it in relation to this inquiry. That event, as I hear it from many, many sources, although I have not seen it in black and white yet in the shape of an amendment, is the alleged assertion on behalf of the government that it intends to amend one of these bills by inserting a clause which—if I were inclined to be careless about parliamentary language I might find some very descriptive words, but I shall content myself by saying it seems to me to be an extremely unjustified attempt to usurp what belongs to Nova Scotia, namely, Sable Island. It seems to me that it would be more appropriate to talk about that attempt to take from Nova Scotia what in 1975, or 1976 I think it was, the Government of Canada in writing agreed belonged to Nova Scotia. So I will relieve honourable senators from the necessity, or whatever they might call it, of exercising patience in listening to me tonight, and reserve that pleasure for them when we come to deal with these energy bills.

● (2140)

Therefore, honourable senators, repeating my congratulations to Senator Frith for a noble effort to make a good case out of not very much, I think we might treat this inquiry as having been fully debated.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

EXCISE TAX

PRELIMINARY REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-57—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 19, 1981:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Preliminary Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject-matter of the Bill C-57, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas", tabled in the Senate on 19th May, 1981.

He said: Honourable senators, on Tuesday last, May 19, I gave notice that I would call the attention of the Senate to the preliminary report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject-matter of Bill C-57. I would therefore just like to touch upon some of the highlights of that report.

The committee received representations from the following: the Quebec weekly newspapers; the Canadian Daily newspaper Publishers Association; Dome Petroleum Limited; Independent Petroleum Association of Canada; Mobil Oil Canada, Ltd.; Brewers Association of Canada; the Association of Canadian Distillers; the Canadian Wine Institute; the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants; and the Motorcycle and Moped Industry Council.

The committee also received a written submission from Gulf Canada Resources Inc. and heard from representatives of the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue.

Part I of the bill proposes to reduce the rate of federal sales tax from 12 per cent to 9 per cent, and introduces other amendments to the federal sales tax system. Part II contains the provisions for a new tax on natural gas and natural gas liquids. Part III deals with changes in the taxation of alcoholic beverages and tobacco. Part IV establishes an 8 per cent tax on petroleum and gas revenues.

I will deal first with Dome Petroleum. Dome Petroleum argued that its Sarnia fractionation plant as well as Chevron's Fort Saskatchewan plant were being discriminated against as such plants were not exempt from natural gas and natural gas liquids tax. All other fractionation plants in Canada would benefit, or were in a position to benefit, from an exemption for gas consumed in the processing of marketable pipeline gas and natural gas liquids. They could use secondary heat generated by such processing to fuel the fractionation process. Dome would have to use gas which is subject to tax in its fractionation process because Dome cannot transfer the secondary heat from its processing plants out west.

The committee is not prepared to recommend any amendment to the bill pending introduction of further evidence by Dome to show that it and Chevron have been discriminated against.

With respect to the Quebec weekly newspapers and the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association, subclause 29(2) of the bill proposes amendments to Part III of Schedule III to the Excise Tax Act which would remove the exemption from sales tax available to newspapers if more than 75 per cent of the space per issue of a newspaper in more than 50 per cent of the issues of a newspaper in a calendar quarter is devoted to advertising.

The committee recommends that the bill be amended insofar as it may apply to weekly newspapers to allow the advertising threshold to be raised to 80 per cent.

The bill proposes that advertising inserts in newspapers be subject to sales tax.

The committee is not prepared to recommend that amendments be made to the bill with respect to newspaper supplements.

With regard to the Allied Beauty Association, the committee welcomes the amendment introduced on April 14, 1981 to the act which would exempt sales tax from being imposed at the distributor-wholesaler level for members of the Allied Beauty Association who sell their cosmetic products exclusively and directly to beauty salons.

In terms of petroleum and natural gas, the committee heard many representations respecting the effect of the National Energy Program in general and the bill in particular.

The committee feels that the measures contained in the bill implement only part of the National Energy Program; other aspects of the NEP are reflected in Bill C-48 and in amendments to the Income Tax Act introduced by Bill C-54, and will be reflected in other legislation yet to be introduced. Furthermore, other factors such as negotiations between the federal government and the energy producing provinces will have an important impact on the matters raised before the committee.

The committee concludes that until all such matters are taken into account, it is not able to make any recommendation or comment with respect to submissions made by the Canadian Petroleum Association, Mobil Oil, Gulf Canada, and the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada.

With regard to the alcoholic beverages industry, the bill proposes to index alcoholic beverage excise levels automatically. The committee is concerned about an increase of taxes on an automatic basis without reference to Parliament, because, without reference to Parliament, control of the tax is lost.

The committee objects for the same reason to giving power to the Governor in Council to adjust or alter the indexing formula.

The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants presented a brief concentrating on many technical aspects of the proposed legislation.

In respect of cosmetics, the committee agrees with the CICA's recommendation that health goods should not automatically be denied exemption from federal sales tax because they possess both cosmetic and health goods attributes. Only such goods possessing incidental therapeutic properties should be taxable.

In respect of marginal manufacturing, subclause 1(3) of the bill extends the meaning of "manufacturing" to include "marginal manufacturing". A marginal manufacturer includes someone who "prepare goods for sale".

The committee agrees with the CICA's recommendation that this clause be deleted as being too broad. The committee does not agree with the CICA's alternative suggestion that the Department of National Revenue be provided with regulatory scope to define the application of the marginal manufacturing rules. The committee is in favour of legislation by statute rather than legislation by regulation. Should the phrase not be removed, the committee would prefer to have the act amended once the department has had sufficient experience with problems raised by the definition.

In terms of the exemption granted for printed matter, the committee agrees with the CICA's suggestion that the discretion granted to the Governor in Council by subclause 29(2) of the bill to designate, unilaterally, that any printed matter does not qualify for exemption from sales tax is inappropriate.

With respect to handicapped persons, the committee agrees that the exemption for "specially constructed appliances made to order for a person having a crippled or deformed foot or ankle" should be broadened to apply to appliances made for persons having other crippled or deformed joints.

In respect of refunds and deductions, the committee agrees with the CICA's recommendation that taxpayers should be given full opportunity to obtain a refund within four years after the time the refund or deduction first became payable.

● (2150)

With respect to the marginal manufacturing provisions, reports that they may lead to manufacturers manufacturing outside Canada have come to the committee's attention. The Department of Finance has indicated it doubts that there will be many marginal manufacturing operations in Canada affected. The committee recommends that these reports be studied and amendments made to the bill if it can be established that marginal manufacturing activities will shift from Canada to elsewhere.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to add a few words to those of Senator Barrow. Bill C-57 is one of the centrepieces of the present legislative program of the government. Indeed, the bill is very important in terms of its potential impact on the Canadian economy. We do not have the bill in its final form before us, as honourable senators will realize; we are dealing with a pre-study of the bill.

At the present time I suspect that serious efforts will be made in the House of Commons to obtain substantial amendments to the bill, some of which will be accepted and some of which will be rejected. No doubt, in short order, we will be presented with the finalized version of the bill and, I suggest, that it will require further consideration by us.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): According to my information, it was reported on April 15, as you suggest, with amendments.

Senator Roblin: But it is still in Committee of the Whole in the house, and it has not had third reading, so, it may have some way to go yet.

Senator Frith: That is right.

Senator Roblin: In any case, I thought it advisable for me to make a remark or two at the present time, while recognizing that I will probably have a good deal more to say when the bill itself finally reaches us.

One of the problems exposed in our consideration of this bill came to my attention in respect of an undertaking by the City of Winnipeg. I refer to a plant run by physically and mentally handicapped people which supplied packaging services to firms in the Manitoba economic area. Because of their disabilities, these people are not employable in the normal sense, but in packaging various goods which were sent to them by distributors in the Manitoba area they were doing something very useful.

Up to the present this particular activity has escaped the net of the sales tax. This is the reason why it was economic for Winnipeg merchandisers to make use of the services of these handicapped people and their packaging plant. This has been the case for many years. There is some concern lest the extension of this tax, which formerly did not apply, to the handicap workshop may upset its economic viability. It has been stated by some people who use those services that as a result of this change they will be looking for packagers outside Canada to perform the service because, by so doing, they can secure a more economic packaging service than they would have after the sales tax comes into effect and influences the price these marginal suppliers will have to pay.

It is alleged by the government that this event will not take place. Senator Barrow has referred to the matter, and we have, perhaps too accommodatingly, said to the complainant that we would look into the matter and that if there is any problem we will see whether something can be done about it. I hope that when the bill itself comes before the committee we will be able to persuade the people concerned to come and see us and develop the matter thoroughly. So far, they have only written a letter. I am sure we all agree that it would be a sad situation if a workshop for handicapped people could no longer carry out its viable economic activity because of a change in the tax law such as the one suggested, and as an actual result the work itself would be done outside the country. I place this problem before you, because I am sure it will attract your interest and attention. I hope we can give it more study.

The other comment I should like to make has to do with the 8 per cent tax that is being applied to oil and gas at all locations in the country, and I should like to indicate some of the concerns I have with respect to it. My first concern deals with what are called the marginal wells. Marginal wells, as perhaps everybody knows, are wells which for one reason or another produce very little and, thus, their economic viability is always in question. The result is that there are wells in existence which produce as little as ten barrels per day, and their production is related to the cost of raising the oil.

The trouble is that every well in the country becomes a marginal well sooner or later. I think we all recognize the fact that wells have a habit of running down. Many of the wells in western Canada have been pumping oil for a long period of time, and many of them are running down to their marginal state. Somewhere along the line all the oil will be exhausted or, if it is not exhausted, the wells will be unable to pump sufficient quantities to make it worthwhile.

I suggest that considering our present oil situation, where every barrel seems to count, it would be rather silly of us to terminate the life of these wells before it is actually necessary. We find, however, that the application of the 8 per cent tax threatens the lives of these wells. This tax is not a normal income or profit tax, as we understand them, but is more in the nature of a royalty.

Not so long ago, Husky Oil announced that it had decided to close down scores of heavy oil wells which it had in Saskatchewan—and perhaps in Alberta, although I am not sure—for this very reason. Because of the impact of the 8 per cent tax on their operation, it was no longer worth their trying to raise more oil, even though it was there and they were taking it out of the ground the day before the tax came into effect. With the introduction of the 8 per cent tax it is no longer a feasible proposition. Any one of you who reads the business section of the morning paper will know that Pan Canadian Oil has just done the same thing. If my memory serves me, some 80 of the wells they had in operation in the western provinces were closed down today because it no longer pays that company to bring this oil up if it must pay the 8 per cent tax.

Surely this is bad policy. We were told in the committee that it was impossible for the government to differentiate between various rules and that they simply had to apply a flat rule, and that was that. Yet we know very well that the provincial administrations to some degree differentiate between wells. It seems to me possible that an arrangement could be worked out whereby we could identify these marginal wells and make sure that they are not put out of action because of this tax.

Whatever else you may think of the tax, surely it cannot be the intention of the government to lower the quantity of oil available in this country by freezing out these marginal wells. That cannot be good policy from anybody's point of view. Surely, it is not beyond the bounds of ingenuity to find some way to keep these wells going into the future.

It is my intention to see that this matter is raised again when the bill itself comes before the committee. I hope that something can be done to see that this sort of unproductive tax policy is dealt with in a constructive way which permits the maximum production of oil.

While we were in committee, not only did the question of marginal wells come up but also some comparisons of the relative profitability of being in the oil business in Canada and certain other places.

Before I get to the comparisons, I would like to draw the attention of the house to the information that was submitted by the Mobil Oil Company on the question of marginal wells. If these figures are correct, and I believe that they should be subject to verification before we accept them holus-bolus, they indicate the kind of thing that is happening. The impact of the 8 per cent tax on the Mobil Oil Company of Canada Limited is dramatic. I am not one of those who have any interest in trying to persuade this house that the large oil corporations in Canada require any special attention from us. They are big; they are powerful; they have enormous resources and a great waiting capacity and they can see many of these situations through.

The figures are quite interesting. In 1975-80, the period before the 8 per cent tax was invented, the average income tax rate in the total Mobil Oil operation was 50.6 per cent. I am sure that now their activities go much further than just oil drilling, but I will not go into that. It went from 50.6 per cent income tax before the 8 per cent tax, and when you add on the 8 per cent tax you have a total of 85.3 per cent.

● (2200)

That is a very substantial increase in taxation, no matter what business you are dealing with. It is bound to have a marked effect on these larger companies exploring for oil in the country.

I would like to have some further information of the same kind concerning the smaller Canadian-owned oil companies because I believe their position is also of interest to us.

At the same time, the Mobil people gave us some figures concerning their producer net-back which is the cash they keep in their pockets. They submitted a very interesting table concerning heavy oil exported from southwestern Saskatchewan. Its laid-down cost to the American buyer at Joliet, Illinois, is $43.60. That is the total amount of money paid to the Canadian oil system by the people in Joliet who want to buy it. In this particular example which was submitted to us, the producer's net-back was a loss of 84 cents. Undoubtedly, this is a marginal well, and it indicates the strange things which happen when you get into the business of trying to trace down who gets what in the oil business and what the effect of taxation is, particularly from marginal wells.

The full price was $43.60, and they lost 84 cents on the deal. The federal government received $17.76; the province received $22.38; the U.S. government received six cents—they seem to be a little low—transport costs were $1.01; operating costs were $3.21; the market fee was two cents; and the producer's net-back was 84 cents. So far as the producer's net-back was concerned in this instance, that is what happened to a barrel of oil worth $43.60. I believe we will find that the root of this problem is the imposition of the 8 per cent tax.

It seems to me that these anomalies require further consideration, and the committee made such a recommendation. In my opinion, the committee had the wisdom to report these figures to the house and stated that, if they are correct, we should take another look to see if we can do something to bring some measure of equity into this situation. On behalf of the committee, I certainly endorse that view. I think it would be well worth our while to keep this matter in mind.

While we were on this general topic, the question was also asked of the Mobil people, who gave us further figures, as to what the relative profitability was of drilling for oil in various parts of the world. That is a matter of some concern to us. While we do not want to give away any more of our oil to outsiders than we have to, we are not an eleemosynary institution. It is our natural resource, and we want to keep as much of it as we can for ourselves.

Senator Frith: What is that word?

Senator Roblin: "Eleemosynary"—an excellent word. I mean a charitable institution. Canada is not one; my honourable friend is not one; I am not one; and the government is not one.

Hon. Richard A Donahoe: The word is used in the B.N.A. Act.

Senator Roblin: Is it?

Senator Donahoe: Yes.

Senator Roblin: Well, I will have to read it again although I have full confidence in my honourable friend's advice since it is usually accurate to a very high degree.

However that may be, we have to consider the question of comparability in respect of the profitability of drilling for oil in various parts of the world. We would be silly if we did not take this into account, and I think we must.

The relative on-shore profitability—that is, drilling for oil in the one-to five-million-barrel fields in Canada or the U.S.A.; that is, in Alberta or down in Montana—is quite illuminating. In terms of 1981 values, the profit per dollar invested in the United States is $1.53; and the profit per dollar invested in Alberta is 23 cents. If we want to know why drillers are going to Montana and why so many of the small Canadian oil companies find Canadian national energy policy less attractive than they have been led to believe, that has to be part of the reason. If you can get $1.53 in the United States compared to getting 23 cents in Alberta, that is a pretty strong motive for going somewhere else rather than staying here in Canada. Even if these figures are not correct, but if their relative relationship is anything close to reality, we can certainly understand why we are having problems with drillers and why we are having problems with small Canadian oil producers who are leaving the country and spending their money in the United States.

I am not one of those people who think this is a doom and gloom situation. I believe that one has to approach the question with considerable caution because it is a very difficult and involved matter. We have people with vested interests making claims and statements, and we have perhaps emotional responses which, in the course of time, may cool somewhat, and I do not discount any of them. Even after making full allowance, it seems to me that there is sufficient evidence before us, at the present time, to lead us to think that perhaps these policies are not going to be as effective as we hoped they would be with respect to either Canadianization or security of supply within our own country.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to ask you to listen to me much longer. I have other interesting figures here concerning the comparative costs and the comparative rewards for drilling for oil in the North Sea off the coast of Norway, in the North Sea off the coast of Britain, in the ocean off the coast of the United States, and in the ocean off the coast of Canada. Assumptions are made based on whether it is a major field such as Hibernia or a small field such as the ones in northern Canada. There is a series of interesting calculations about rewards for drilling in these various jurisdictions. We have been told that some are so much more punitive than we are in Canada. The figures are worth looking at. They do not indicate that. They indicate that that is not the case at all, and that we are just as tough as the Norwegians or any other nation in the oil exploration business.

My conclusion is that I believe the committee has done a workmanlike job in the aspects which have interested me as well as the aspects which have been mentioned. I feel that there is sufficient evidence to urge us to be cautious in our consideration of this matter when the bill itself finally comes to this chamber. I hope we will be able to make some proposals, even if the government persists in its policy of 8 per cent, as to how we can remove what appear to me to be the obvious lunacies in the way this is impacting on the Canadian oil industry at the present time; as to how we can avert the harm it may do to our endeavours to achieve security of supply in Canada; to promote the well-being of this industry; and as to how we can be fair to Canadian producers and not too outrageous to the foreigners we took to our bosoms not too long ago by inviting them to come and look for our oil.

I do not know if Senator Argue will find anything in The Gazette about this particularly interesting matter. If he does, perhaps he can read it to us.

That is all I want to say on this subject at the present time except that I do hope it receives further consideration.

Senator G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I will not worry you very long, but there are many points in the report which are of great importance. I certainly concur in what has been said by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and, indeed, with what has been said by Senator Barrow. One thing he drew attention to, which I think needs very particular attention and emphasis, is the provision for indexing a tax. It seems to me that that is one of the most objectionable and, indeed, I would say reprehensible, proposals that has come before this house in my time. This really means, as the honourable senator has said, that Parliament abandons its control over the levying of tax.

I know, honourable senators, that you are as fully able to deal with figures as I am, but just by way of illustration, let me draw to your attention the fact that if many of the goods taxed today had been subject to this kind of taxation over the last five years, for something the government was getting 10 per cent of which cost $100 in 1976 today it would be getting 10 per cent of $200, since that would be the price. That is a very modest increase compared to some that have occurred.

It just seems to me the most iniquitous thing that one could possibly put into taxation—that is, whenever the price of something goes up, so does the tax. What could contribute more to inflation than that? What could be abandoning the traditional control, the historical control of Parliament, over levying taxes on the subjects of the Crown than that?

I particularly want to emphasize this, because I recall when the sponsor of the bill was speaking in support of it, or perhaps another bill, he was saying that because it had some connection either with a treaty or with finance that there were certain inhibitions that we had to observe, and perhaps there are, but one of the inhibitions we do not have to observe is to pass something that we think is wrong. It seems to me that we should make it clear to those who are sponsoring this bill in this chamber, and in the other place, that we are not prepared to yield to the suggestion that taxation, no matter on what item it may be, is going to be imposed by indexation, and that Parliament is going to yield its right to say what and how much tax should be imposed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it may be that we will all be prepared to wait for Bill C-57 and treat the intervention made on this inquiry as a sort of aperitif to that fuller banquet. But just in case someone else wishes to speak on this inquiry, I will move the adjournment of the debate. We might find out if anybody else wants to speak on this subject tomorrow. I know that many of us will wish to speak on this subject when the bill itself gets here.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF LEADER OF THE GOVERNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Perrault, is on government business in the city of New York today and cannot attend the sitting this afternoon. He will be present at the sitting tomorrow.

EXCISE TAX

PRELIMINARY REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-57—CORRECTIONS TO OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we begin our proceedings, I should like to make a couple of corrections to Hansard with regard to the statement I made last night concerning this bill. I would thank my colleague, Senator Barrow, for bringing these to my notice.

At page 2458 of yesterday's Hansard, about two-thirds of the way down the page, I refer to the increase in taxation suffered by a certain company. The figure I quoted was 85.3 per cent; it should be 84.3 per cent.

At the top of page 2459, in the first full paragraph, I talk about the net-back to the oil companies in respect of a certain area of the country. I want to make it clear that that net-back of 84 cents represents a loss. It does not show as a loss in Hansard, and I wish to make that clear.

In the last paragraph of the first column on page 2458 reference is made to "various rules." That should read "various wells," because I was talking about oil wells in that connection.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Not marginal rules?

Senator Roblin: Marginal wells.

On the same page I said that if my memory served me "some 80 of the wells they had in operation . . . were closed down". I should have said "some 70 companies whose wells they operate are closed down", so the closure in southern Saskatchewan is of 70 companies. I might say, just as a matter of information, that the amount of oil lost in this procedure will be something in the neighbourhood of 4 million barrels a year.

I thank honourable senators for allowing me to make those corrections.

Senator Frith: Are the wells you referred to in southwestern Saskatchewan, in the Lloydminster area? Is that what you are referring to, the heavy oil area near Lloydminster?

Senator Roblin: I made two references, and one was to Home Oil Company. Those wells were heavy oil wells. The other ones I referred to in connection with Pan Canadian Oil—I am not sure, but I strongly suspect that they are a mixture. There may be some heavy oil wells, but the bulk of them may be of some other sort. I cannot give you positive assurance on that.

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled:

> Notices of Ways and Means Motions to amend the Excise Act (2) and the Excise Tax Act (3), issued by the Department of Finance, dated May 26, 1981.

NORTHERN PIPELINE

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. William J. Petten, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), moved:

> That the name of the Honourable Senator Bonnell be substituted for that of the Honourable Senator Rowe on the list of senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on the Northern Pipeline.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, is the Deputy Leader of the Government in a position to tell us what is planned for next week? It appears that we will not receive any legislation from the other place, and I understand that no committee meetings have been scheduled. Therefore, would there be any necessity for our regular week's sittings?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first I will mention the business we might expect from the other place and then what we have on our order paper. As I understand the situation regarding legislation in the House of Commons, I believe that today is an opposition day and that tomorrow they will resume the debate on the report stage of Bill C-57. That bill involves 135 amendments, and I presume that will occupy them fully tomorrow. In fact, bearing in mind the state of business in the other place, it is reasonable to assume that we will not receive Bill C-57 for a few weeks. Therefore, the possibility of our receiving legislation depends on their managing to deal with some of the so-called less controversial bills in the other place. They plan to do so on Fridays. I have counted some 35 non-controversial bills they hope to start cleaning up on Friday.

As far as our order paper is concerned, we anticipate proceeding with two inquiries today and another one tomorrow.

Senator Flynn pointed out that there does not appear to be a heavy schedule of committee meetings for next week and, therefore, his suggestion to me, when we discussed the matter before this sitting, was that if we are to adjourn for a week because there is not sufficient business to justify our sitting, then probably next week should be that week. Therefore, I shall take his suggestion under advisement and discuss it with the Leader of the Government when he returns, reviewing what I have said about proposed legislation, to ascertain whether we can anticipate receiving any business from the other place, having regard to their workload on Friday. I will check on Inquiries and on the committees schedule and have a report for honourable senators tomorrow, with a view to ascertaining whether we have enough to justify our sitting next week.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

REAL DISPOSABLE INCOME OF CANADIANS—STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to reply to a question asked on May 19 by Senator Roblin in which he asked for the source of information on which the Prime Minister based his recent statement that real disposable income increased by 50 per cent between 1970 and 1980.

I can inform Senator Roblin that the basis for that statement can be found in a document entitled Economic Review, A general review of recent economic developments, dated April 1981, issued by the Department of Finance, which was tabled in this house on Wednesday, May 20 last.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF STATUTE LAW (MILITARY AND CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS, COMPENSATION AND ALLOWANCES) AMENDMENT ACT, 1980

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on May 19 concerning the proposed amendment of the Statute Law (Military and Civilian War Pensions, Compensation and Allowances) Amendment Act, 1980.

Honourable senators, we have been in contact with the Acting Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Honourable Gilles Lamontagne. The minister wishes to discuss the matter with his cabinet colleagues before he brings forth the aforementioned legislation. Therefore, I cannot confirm that that legislation will definitely be brought forth before the summer recess. However, we know that the honourable minister is concerned, and that should be cause for some optimism.

• (1410)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, I wonder if the Deputy Leader of the Government has an answer to the further question that I asked. If the time table in the other place prevents them from introducing the legislation, and if it is ready before the summer recess, would he consider introducing it in the Senate?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, yes. I recall that the honourable senator did ask that question and the suggestion was favourably received by all senators. I will point out that that part of the question was not answered. I will urge that the government do consider making the bill an S-bill.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEW BRUNSWICK—STATUS OF AGREEMENTS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, some time ago Senator Sherwood asked for a report on the status of the Kent County agricultural agreements and related matters.

I am informed by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion that new development programs are being planned for southeastern New Brunswick, including the County of Kent and parts of the Counties of Albert and Westmorland. These programs would give priority to agriculture development and would include also fisheries, tourism and manufacturing industries.

Mr. De Bané informs me that he was pleased that Premier Hatfield was willing to ensure continuity of joint agricultural programs in the Kent region by providing for special joint measures to be applied in the months ahead until longer-term programs are put in place.

Subsidiary agreements currently in force in New Brunswick include agriculture, forestry development, Saint John and Moncton arterials, developing regions, pulp and paper modernization, Saint John Market Square and Northeast New Brunswick.

Three subsidiary agreements were signed with New Brunswick in the fiscal year 1980-81—pulp and paper, Market Square and forestry development—representing a joint commitment of $89.8 million, of which the federal share is $71.8 million.

Discussions with regard to future policies and agreements are currently under way.

Hon. Cyril B. Sherwood: Honourable senators, I may not have heard it mentioned, but did Senator Argue indicate that the agreement had, in fact, been signed with regard to Kent County?

Senator Argue: My opinion would be that the agreement has not been signed; that discussions are still going on toward the finalization of the agreement. According to this information, as I read it, the programs are being continued by a joint arrangement or joint understanding pending what I am sure we all hope will be an optimistic outcome of the negotiations that are still going on.

Senator Sherwood: Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Argue has, as I have, a particular interest in the Kent pilot project, because of his chairmanship of the committee in past years and his long-term interest.

If I may, honourable senators, I should like to join with others in commending the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, and the government, upon the important wheat sale to Russia which has just been completed. It means much to western Canada in particular, and certainly it will have good spin-off effects in New Brunswick and the rest of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Sherwood: I would like to impress upon Senator Argue that in his consultations with the Honourable Pierre De Bané, Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, he bring to the minister's attention again the extreme importance of getting the agreement signed so that plans for the Kent County project can continue.

Senator Argue: I thank the honourable senator for his compliments regarding the grain sale. Certainly I am very supportive of agricultural development in Kent County. Over recent years some major and imaginative developments have been forthcoming in that county following the Senate committee's report and action by the Government of Nova Scotia and also the federal government. I assure him, if he wishes this assurance, of my continuing support for this further development. I think that in this day and age it is important to Canada. An improvement in, and an increase in, the production of agricultural products in Canada is also a contribution to the world.

● (1415)

Senator Olson is supportive of the principles that Senator Sherwood and I have enunciated. The negotiations are still going on. I am hopeful, as I have already said, that they will come to a successful conclusion and that the Kent County projects and Kent County development will continue.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the Orders of the Day are called I should mention that we on this side have decided not to prolong the Question Period because there is an important meeting of the National Finance Committee now in progress, and it is more important to question the ministers there than here.

STATE IMMUNITY BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the motion of Senator Goldenberg for the adoption of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-19, to provide for State Immunity in Canadian Courts.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it seems to me that the few words I have to say on this bill would be more appropriate at the third reading stage. Therefore, I have no objection if the question on the motion for the adoption of the report is put at this time. If the sponsor wishes to move third reading right away, I would then make the few remarks I have in mind.

Senator Frith: I was thinking of moving third reading at the next sitting.

Senator Flynn: If you want to proceed today, that is fine. As far as the report is concerned, the chairman of the committee has explained the amendments and I have nothing to add to that.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator van Roggen, the sponsor of this bill, is not in the chamber at the moment. I did discuss this with him, and I do not think he wants to add anything to what he said on second reading. It will be remembered that he felt the bill should be studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in any event, rather than by the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

I move, therefore, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, referring to this bill I believe that the committee chaired by Senator Goldenberg has done an excellent job. It was extremely useful to have the committee examine the problem which we want to try to solve through this legislation. In fact, as I said on second reading, and as it is quite obvious, what we are trying to do is to codify the jurisprudence with respect to immunity of foreign states in Canadian courts. From a legal viewpoint it is a very complex problem. The committee was made aware of that because it heard witnesses and discussed it with the officials of the Department of Justice and made very useful amendments.

I am not sure that we have solved more problems than we have created. We will find out only after a few years of experience, and it seems to me that in the very near future it will be necessary to introduce amendments if we want to have legislation which really covers every aspect of the question. The major problem we face here is that in our system, in Ottawa especially, it is so complicated to bring in remedial legislation and we often have to wait a long time.

In any event, it will be interesting to see if that legislation is approved as is by the House of Commons. They will have an opportunity to examine the same questions we have raised and perhaps find solutions to those which remain unanswered. It is a very interesting problem. We are trying to clear up the situation of Canadians subject to court action by foreign states. I believe that once again we are finding solutions to certain problems, but there are many left. We will see what the Commons do with it. If the bill is passed and given royal assent we will watch with interest to see how it works out.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, may I add a few words to the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition? I did not attend the sittings of the committee, but I obtained a copy of its report and I studied it with the text of the bill. I noticed that even the proposed amendments, which the committee chairman described as being procedural, are of a rather substantial nature. Words were added which, from a legal point of view, add something rather important, I imagine.

It is for that reason, after the remarks made at this stage, that I move third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

EXCISE TAX

PRELIMINARY REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-57—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Barrow calling the attention of the Senate to the Preliminary Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject-matter of the Bill C-57, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas", tabled in the Senate on 19th May, 1981—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday I adjourned this debate because we had the report of the committee as a sort of aperitif before receiving Bill C-57, which will eventually come here and, no doubt, be the subject of some important commentaries and intense debate.

The question that concerns us now—and I would like honourable senators to perhaps consider it—is that we will probably not receive Bill C-57 for two or three weeks. I believe the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee will continue its study of its subject matter. We have before us now simply a preliminary report. Should we continue our pre-study? I think there is no question that we should. However, perhaps it would be a good idea to leave this item on the order paper so that we can, in a sense, pre-debate Bill C-57. At least we will have an opportunity to discuss some of the provisions of the bill. If not, tomorrow I will simply ask that this particular inquiry be considered debated.

I am really asking honourable senators whether they wish to add anything to the debate on the inquiry, which is only an inquiry calling attention to a preliminary report. We have until tomorrow to decide this question, because we will be receiving a further report from the committee, and eventually we will receive Bill C-57.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): The subject matter of the bill is still before the committee, is it not?

Senator Frith: Yes, it is.

Senator Flynn: By that I mean the committee is not functus officio. This is only a preliminary report.

Senator Frith: That is right.

Senator Flynn: We can drop the inquiry if nobody wishes to speak to it. Anyone can revive it, if he or she wishes.

Senator Frith: Yes. I suggest that this order stand until tomorrow.

Order stands.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, entitled: "Child at Risk", tabled in the Senate on 16th October, 1980.—(Honourable Senator McGrand).

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Stand.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): I believe that Senator McGrand wanted to go on.

Senator Flynn: That will be very difficult because he is not here.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Save it for a heavier time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the fact that Senator McGrand is not here does not change the accuracy of my statement, that he wanted to go on; he is simply not demonstrating his wish to do so at this second. Let us stand that order until later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

NEWFOUNDLAND

DEVELOPMENT OF HYDRO POWER AND OFFSHORE OIL RESOURCES—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eric Cook rose, pursuant to notice of Thursday, May 21, 1981:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to certain matters relating to the development of hydro power in Labrador, and to the development of the offshore oil resources of Newfoundland.

He said: Honourable senators, if I am speaking too often about the position and problems of Newfoundland and Labrador, I ask your indulgence. What I am about to say will probably be my last words for some time to come, unless, of course, the problems grow worse rather than better.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Considering the recent statement by Mr. Chrétien, there is that risk.

Senator Cook: Newfoundland and Labrador became Canada's tenth province on March 31, 1949, some 32 years ago. Since that time our historic industries—namely, the fisheries, pulp and paper, and tourism—have grown, like similar industries throughout Canada. In addition, three new major industries have come into existence, and I intend to supply you with some facts and figures on these industries in a few moments.

However, in dealing with the present situation I will recall some words I used in the Senate on previous occasions. On June 1, 1977, as reported at page 800 of Hansard of that date, I said:

> Newfoundlanders have benefited greatly from being part of Canada. When I view the great new university, the numerous magnificent schools, the hospitals, the public buildings, and the trans-Canada highway across our province, the advance is almost unbelievable. When I contemplate the numerous social benefits, family allowances, old age pensions, unemployment insurance, and so much else, I realize Newfoundland alone never, never could have been in a position to do so much and to give so much. The numerous shopping centres, all with their large supermarkets, are striking evidence of the impressive improvements in the standard of living of those who frequent them.

On October 14, 1980, as reported at page 858 of Hansard, I said:

> First, in my opinion, Newfoundland has benefited to a remarkable extent because it is a province of Canada. For my part, I acknowledge freely, frankly and with deep gratitude what being a Canadian means to me and other Newfoundlanders. In Newfoundland, young and old alike, the war veterans, and indeed, all Newfoundlanders, have benefited. We have had advances in education and health, much of which would have been beyond our own resources to provide.

Honourable senators, I have not changed my views, and I still stand by those comments. I must, however, point out that too many of my fellow Newfoundlanders direct their appreciation for the benefits of Confederation to the wrong source. A disturbing myth has been created in Newfoundland since 1949. The myth to which I refer is that all good things come from the government in Ottawa and that we must be grateful to and obedient to "Uncle Ottawa."

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is not a myth.

Senator Cook: This is undemocratic, and it is the wrong attitude. It is only necessary to go back into history a little distance to understand the true and correct relationship between federal and provincial governments and the relationship between Canadians, wherever they live in Canada. One of the great documents in Canada is the Rowell-Sirois Report, which came out in 1940.

• (1430)

I now quote the following paragraph from Book II of the report which contains the recommendations of the commission:

> There is a second aspect of the distribution of the national income which is of great importance in a federal system, and of particular importance in Canada. The unequal distribution of the national income as between the people of different regions may excite feelings quite as dangerous to national unity as those aroused by gross inequalities between different income groups. The provision of a national minimum standard of social services in Canada cannot (without complete centralization of all social services) be divorced from the assurance to every government of Canada of the revenues necessary for the adequate performance of its recognized functions. This assurance, which the Fathers of Confederation were able to give by means of a system of subsidies and debt allowances financed by taxation that was national in character, is infinitely harder to give now that the recognized functions of provincial governments have become far larger than they were in 1967. We have attempted to compute what the financial balance of each provincial government (and its municipalities) would be with taxation at the national average and after making provision for services of at least national average quality.

The Rowell-Sirois Report, I point out, was completed in 1940, which was nine years before the union of Newfoundland with Canada.

Canadians adopted the recommendations and philosophy of the Rowell-Sirois Report, and since its preparation the social legislation of the Parliament of Canada has been nothing short of astonishing. Without attempting to give an exhaustive list, I mention the Veterans' Charter, second to none in the whole world; old age pensions; Canada Pension; Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation; Medicare; equalization payments to have-not provinces; and the DREE legislation. While all this was taking place, the country also created Air Canada, the CBC, and the Trans-Canada Highway. Most, if not all, of this was done or was planned before Newfoundland and Labrador became the tenth province. All this was done, honourable senators, not by Ottawa or the government in Ottawa, but by the Parliament of Canada, made up of representatives from all the provinces of Canada. It is the Parliament of Canada which enacts all legislation, which imposes the taxes and allots the expenditures. Parliament, honourable senators, is made up of representatives from all across Canada. In short, Parliament is comprised of all Canadians; indeed, Parliament is Canada.

While these things were being accomplished by the federal Parliament, the provinces were building universities, schools, hospitals and other public buildings, public works, roads and more roads. The nation grew and grew, all of which was achieved by co-operation and not confrontation.

Therefore, I say to my fellow Newfoundlanders, that they must reject this "Uncle Ottawa" nonsense. In common with all other Canadians, we share proportionately in the benefits of the social legislation of Canada. Because we have been a have-not province, and because we were behind most other parts of Canada at the time of union, we have benefited more in many cases. The benefits come from the system and not from any government. Therefore, there is no need to bend the knee to Ottawa or to anyone else. Nor is there any need to abate one jot any right to which Newfoundland or Newfoundlanders are now, or in the future will be, entitled. Indeed, no Newfoundland government has the right to do other than safeguard Newfoundland's position in the Canadian system.

Honourable senators, I want now to bring you up to date on three major natural resources of Newfoundland and Labrador. These three natural resources are new in the sense that they were discovered after 1949, when we became part of Canada.

The first of these resources is the iron ore of Labrador. Labrador produces in the order of 30 million metric tons per year, to a value exceeding $900 million. This is 50 per cent of Canada's production. Labrador has reserves exceeding 4.5 billion metric tons. Capital invested is in excess of $600 million, pre-inflation. This investment is mainly American.

The second of these resources is hydro power. Churchill Falls produces and sells to Quebec, in round figures, 37,830,000 megawatt hours, a megawatt being 1,000 kilowatts. These are 1980 figures. The sale price to Quebec is $97 million, which, in round figures, is worth $600 million to Quebec. The capital, almost all American, invested in Churchill Falls exceeds $1.6 billion, pre-inflation. The developed plant capacity of Churchill Falls is 5,468 megawatt hours. The potential of the undeveloped power in Labrador is as follows:

1. The Churchill River Basin	2,878 megawatts
2. Southeastern Labrador	845 megawatts
3. Northern Labrador	700 megawatts for a total of 4,423 megawatts.

In addition to this potential of 4,423 megawatts, the capacity of the five major river systems shared by Quebec and Newfoundland is 3,350 megawatts. This gives a grand total in excess of 7,770 megawatts, or a total 42 per cent greater than the present development at Churchill Falls.

Labrador now provides in excess of 45 per cent of all the hydro power shipped between provinces and exported to the United States.

The third resource is oil. Off the east coast of Newfoundland lies an oil and natural gas field which is presently estimated to contain two billion barrels of oil and two trillion cubic feet of natural gas. The capital, mostly American, invested to date in exploration of this field exceeds $200 million. To bring the oil into production will require an expenditure of some $3 billion to $5 billion.

At two billion barrels, the Hibernia field would be the largest in Canada. Based on current reserve estimates, only two out of thirty-three oil fields in the North Sea—namely, Statford and Brent—at three billion and two billion barrels respectively, equal or exceed Hibernia in size.

Notwithstanding the disputes between the federal and provincial governments and the effects of the new energy policy, one fact cannot be ignored or obscured: this vast addition to the wealth of all Canada comes about because of, and only because of, the union of Canada with Newfoundland. If union had not occurred, this oil and gas field would still have been developed with the aid of American capital, and eventually ownership would have been shared between the exploring companies and the Dominion of Newfoundland.

Here, perhaps, it should be pointed out that there is a great deal of misinformation being disseminated about the sharing of the benefits of these resources between the federal and provincial governments. I am advised that the true and correct position is as follows: To state that Newfoundland wants to keep all oil revenues for itself is a misstatement; and to say that the federal government would give us, under its system, 100 per cent of revenues is also as false as it is misleading.

Under federal regulations and federal resource ownership, the federal government would take about 75 per cent of total government revenues from the offshore and leave this province with about 25 per cent of revenues and absolutely no say in the rate or type of petroleum development that might occur. With Newfoundland's unique and sensitive rural society, the latter is as important as, and perhaps more important than, the revenues themselves. Under Newfoundland ownership and regulations the province would get about 63 per cent of the revenues from the offshore while sharing, from the first day that the oil starts to flow, 37 per cent of the revenues with our fellow Canadians through the federal government.

What can the average Canadian think about these conflicting claims? The old saying is that "figures cannot lie, but liars can figure." This old saying puts the problem in too harsh and uncompromising a manner. I prefer to say, "Figures cannot lie, but experts can figure!"

● (1440)

Is it too much to ask that the experts from both levels of government get together and clean up their acts? Surely, it is not asking too much to suggest that both federal and provincial ministers, and their officials, stop drifting apart, one group from the other. The solution to the problem is of importance to all Canadians, and I appeal to both groups to reconcile their differences and to reach a reasonable and fair solution.

However, if I understand correctly the first and original federal proposal, I find it incredible. The position is that under the Canadian fiscal laws of general application to all provinces and to the federal government, the province of Newfoundland, at the present time, is entitled to equalization payments. The federal government's proposal, as I understand it, is that the province will receive 100 per cent of a certain portion of the revenues arising from the production of offshore oil. However, each dollar paid in respect of the oil will be matched by deducting $1 from the equalization payments. Then, when the oil revenue so paid to the province amounts to the same total as the equalization payments, the equalization payments will cease completely and will be replaced by the oil revenues.

Now, no one is so stupid or greedy as to expect to receive both equalization payments and the oil revenues. The general and final result will be that one will replace the other, but to place an arbitrary cut-off on the amount or the total of oil revenues which may or could come to Newfoundland cannot for any reason be justified.

To me, this proposal is a sham. Indeed, it is an insult. Newfoundland, in the end result, will stand still and will receive no benefit whatsoever from the oil revenues. It is not even as good a deal as the Churchill Falls agreement.

If good fortune does bless Newfoundland, then the province must and will contribute under the terms of fiscal legislation of general application equally and proportionately, as does every other contributing province, but to suggest that there must be an arbitrary cut-off limit for Newfoundland is both outrageous and illegal. I find nothing in the Terms of Union of Canada and Newfoundland, or anywhere else, which would authorize such a course of action. The current position is that just as Newfoundland has in the past and still is receiving the equalization payments under the formula provided under federal legislation— which federal legislation, I must repeat, is of general application—if the fortune of the province improves in the future the province must and will willingly and happily contribute equally and proportionately pursuant to the stipulations of the formula authorized and provided for from time to time by the fiscal legislation of general application enacted by the Parliament of Canada.

I do not for one minute believe that the Parliament of Canada would pass legislation forbidding or making it impossible for Newfoundland, or any other province, to grow stronger or more prosperous in the future than it is now. Such legislation is unthinkable, but if I understand the original proposal correctly, that is just exactly what some bureaucrats and politicians in Ottawa are seeking to force upon Newfoundland.

Ottawa has expended a fair amount of time in an effort to cloud the true situation and in bad-mouthing Newfoundland for refusing to share. Ottawa, at the same time, has been misleading Canadians by claiming that Newfoundland refuses to share and refuses to settle, even though Ottawa has offered to give Newfoundland 100 per cent of the revenues from the offshore oil. At the same time, Ottawa adopts a very superior attitude, stating that it will not bargain fish against rights, and so forth. Actually, Ottawa is a rather cynical, small-time horse trader and is using all its fiscal, economic and political muscle to coerce Newfoundland into submitting to an unfair and unjust proposal.

To sum up, honourable senators, the universe is not unfolding in Newfoundland and Labrador in the way or in the manner in which the universe should unfold if all were well.

First, with regard to hydro, it seems to Newfoundlanders that trying to get the federal government to make a right and firm decision on the transmission of Labrador power, which still remains undeveloped, across Quebec is very similar to trying to get an unwilling worm on a trout hook. It is likely to be a long and messy affair, particularly if Ottawa has no intention of using its fiscal, economic and political muscle against Quebec in the same way as it has attempted to do against Newfoundland.

Then, there are unhappy differences between Quebec and Labrador over the power now developed. As a result, the Government of Newfoundland has enacted legislation cancelling the water rights of the original Churchill Falls operating company, which will in due course make it impossible to continue the generation of power and its consequent supply to Quebec, thus effectively terminating the contract for the sale of power to Quebec.

I would be less than honest if I said that that would be a satisfactory outcome to the dispute. As I have said on previous occasions, a contract is a contract. It is my view that a contract should be honoured, no matter how harsh or how unsatisfactory the terms.

However, the possibility that contracts may be altered or breached by governments has now become a grey area. Mr. Lalonde seems to be claiming that he has the right to alter oil contracts and licences, although he now seems to be retreating somewhat from his original claim that the licensees could be deprived of 25 per cent of their property without compensation. He now seems to be offering some form of compensation, but we still have to read the fine print surrounding the new policy. In the final analysis, both the Newfoundland government and the federal government would be following the same principle, the only difference being one of degree.

In passing, I should perhaps make the point that the original contract was made between Hydro Quebec and the Churchill Falls Corporation, a subsidiary of Brinco, which was and is a public company independent of the Newfoundland government. This does not of course affect the rights or wrongs of the situation, but I mention this as many people think the contract was in fact made by and with the Newfoundland government.

The remaining problem arises from the dispute over the ownership of the offshore oil. On this problem, I can say no more than I said when I spoke in the Senate on April 14 last.

Here perhaps I should say that I sincerely hope that a settlement will be reached regarding both the problems between the federal government and Newfoundland and the problems between the Quebec government and the Newfoundland government. However, if no settlement is forthcoming, I am bound to say that I fully support the thrust of the policies of the Honourable Brian Peckford, Premier of the Province of Newfoundland, both on the oil and hydro problems.

It is truly unfortunate that these disputes arise at this time, because other important differences of opinion are bound to arise in the near future. These disputes may grow worse, because it may be that the cost of the social advances we have made to date will prove to be beyond the capacity of the national income to bear. It does seem as if the federal government will be forced to scale down somewhat the transfer payments to the provinces. Indeed, it seems to me that without greatly increasing taxation the resources of the federal government, strained as they are by its oil pricing policy, are driving the federal government towards, on the one hand, reducing equalization payments and its contribution to the social payments and, on the other, to making unwarranted and unreasonable demands on the oil resources of the provinces.

It might be helpful if the oil pricing policy of the federal government were the subject matter of a special debate in this chamber. I note that Premier Hatfield has appealed to the federal government to do away with the oil subsidy. This policy has already cost the country billions and billions of dollars added to the public debt. Premier Hatfield is quoted as saying, "We're paying a subsidy which is producing nothing for the country. It's producing a lot for Saudi Arabia and for Venezuela—that's where all the money goes—but it produces nothing for Canada". How right he is!

● (1450)

Canadians, in my opinion, and particularly those living in the have-not provinces, are living in a fool's paradise if they think for one minute that they are burning cheap gasoline. The bill for all this gasoline is being paid by adding to the national debt. Furthermore, as Mr. Hatfield is reported to have said:

> —the subsidy gives an unfair financial break to oil users since other forms of energy such as electricity and natural gas are not covered but are also becoming more expensive.

He also said:

> The federal government has had to curtail some of its regional economic expansion programs because after the federal treasury pays out $2.5 billion for the oil subsidy there is no money left for programs to reduce regional economic disparity.

In due course, the burden of paying for this program will fall most heavily on the have-not provinces, because not only will they share the burden of extra taxation needed to service the increased public debt but also so much will have been expended that no money will be available for other desirable expenditures.

Honourable senators, I hope and trust that the unhappy difference which now exists between the Government of Quebec and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador will, in due course, pass and disappear in light of discussions between reasonable people. I further hope and trust that, when mutual confidence is established, work can begin on the development of the remaining huge hydro resources of Quebec, Newfoundland and Labrador for the good not only of the two most interested provinces but also of all of Canada.

I also hope and trust that finding a just, fair and reasonable solution to the problem of developing and sharing the oil resources of Newfoundland will not be beyond the wit and wisdom of those Canadian statesmen who now hold the reins of federal and provincial power.

To end my remarks, I draw your attention to some words of the Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent. On November 15, 1966 in a foreword to Mr. John Chadwick's book on Newfoundland, he wrote in part as follows:

> He had the further advantage—

"He" being Mr. Chadwick.

> —of an intimate association with the culminating event in the history he has written, the union of Newfoundland with Canada. I have always regarded that union as the most important achievement of my years in public life—

The Right Honourable Louis St. Laurent was not only a very gracious gentleman, but also a very great Canadian. I firmly believe that his very kind assessment of the importance of the union of Canada with Newfoundland was well founded. I feel sure he would be most disappointed that such vexing problems have arisen. It is sad to think that if reasonable solutions are not forthcoming, Newfoundlanders will feel that their province will suffer unjustly.

It may be argued, and it could indeed be true, that in the long run it may not make much practical or financial difference to Newfoundlanders if the Quebec government or the federal government receive the lion's share of the revenues arising from Newfoundland's natural resources, but it will make a great deal of difference to the pride of young Newfoundlanders and to their sense of justice, equity and decency.

If we are pushed aside, and if the public account is charged with the benefits which accrue to Newfoundland and yet we are not credited with the benefits which accrue to our fellow Canadians because of Newfoundland, it will be hard not to be disappointed, if not bitter.

To me, no longer a young Newfoundlander, it is clear beyond doubt, that as we enter the 21st century Canada will be a greater Canada, a stronger Canada and a richer Canada, because of the union of Canada with Newfoundland and Labrador.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, for Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

CHILDHOOD EXPERIENCES AS CAUSES OF CRIMINAL BEHAVIOUR

REPORT OF HEALTH, WELFARE AND SCIENCE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 7:

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, December 2, 1980 the debate on the consideration of the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science entitled "Child at Risk," tabled in the Senate on October 16, 1980.

Hon. Fred A. McGrand: Honourable senators, I am pleased to take part in this debate. I have been asked to describe the work of our committee in producing this report.

Many will agree and recognize that this is the only report of its kind ever produced in Canada. It is also remarkable in another respect: the entire cost of producing this report, up until the time it went to the printers, was $6,922.14—less than $7,000. The most remarkable thing about it is that it took me 25 years to get the Senate to produce it. Why was there so much lethargy on the part of our society to understand this problem that has been with us for years and gets worse as the years pass? The reason is because public opinion has for centuries been focused on the punishment of the offender as the essential treatment of crime in our society and has forgotten about the many causes of crime. The theory of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" shaped public opinion in the days when most people believed that crime was inherited from our ancestors.

"Spare the rod and spoil the child" was the slogan used at home and in school. We still hear the expressions: "Bring back the rope! Bring back the lash! Don't coddle criminals. Put offenders in jail, punish them and make them suffer for the crimes they have committed. Treat them rough and make them like it." It is no wonder that with that background there was much public lethargy regarding the studying of such causes of crime as we have in this report.

Learning disabilities and minimal brain dysfunction had no meaning to most people. Parental neglect and abuse were something new, and it did not occur to many people that human violence is the greatest problem in our society today and that human violence is learned, not inherited. Violence in the street is an extension of violence in the home. It is difficult for people to believe that the prenatal experience of a child, which includes lack of oxygen at birth, can shape its adult life.

Having read this report, you should be aware that no adult ever became a criminal during his adult life. Criminality starts in early childhood and is shaped and fashioned by childhood experiences.

Every violent criminal has had an unhappy childhood, the result of neglect and abuse, and it usually started before the age of three. A 16 year old boy, so incorrigible in school that it is necessary for a policeman to come and remove him from the school, did not acquire his hostility at the age of 16, 14 or 12, but it began at a very early age. In fact, it began when he failed to bond with his parents or other children of his age; he is usually the victim of parental neglect and abuse.

An alert child at birth recognizes its mother's voice because it has listened to that voice for the past three months. Its mother's voice and heart beat are the only two familiar sounds it hears in the strange world it has come into. At birth a child's eyes cannot focus on the ceiling or the walls of a room. Its eyes focus best at 12 or 14 inches, and that is the distance between its face and its mother's face while it is nursing. When the exchange of eye signals begins, bonding between mother and child has started. Its mother's voice and eye movements help it to adjust to the new life it is going to have. Bonding with the mother is the most important event in the early life of a child. There is nothing mysterious about bonding. Mother and child get acquainted early in life. They fall in love with each other. It is a case of the first impression being a lasting one. Bonding is the beginning of the personality structure. The behaviour of a youth of 17 depends on the quality of his personality structure, which began at birth. If eye and voice signals between mother and child do not take place soon after birth, due to a prenatal experience, bonding may be delayed. Therefore, it is essential that a child be born without minimal brain dysfunction.

A victim of minimal brain dysfunction or learning disability can build one hostility on top of another until he becomes an enemy of society, a society that has never understood his needs or tried to understand them. That is why bonding is so important. It is easy to hate when you cannot love, and the abused child can easily learn to hate his parents because the abused child has lost confidence in all around him. He cannot trust anyone because he distrusts everyone. The abused child watches violence on television and accepts violence as the implement that will answer all his problems. Slowly the abused child builds a wall around himself for his own protection. Hostility develops, violence becomes his creed.

Why put a criminal in prison and expect to rehabilitate him? Rehabilitation means to return a person to his former and normal way of life. But the criminal never had a normal life- style to return to. He has missed the training of a normal child to develop a normal personality structure. Why try to do for him, at the age of 26 when he goes to prison, what should have been done for him at the age of six? The proper thing to do for him, when hostility shows up in his early life, is to rescue him and place him in the custody of those who will correct his personality structure.

When in 1975 I made the motion for the conduct of this study, I asked this question: Why does a boy of six, with a psychological trauma, become a psychopathic killer at the age of 26? Dr. Murray Straus of the United States, who made an extensive study of this matter in 1967, wrote:

> How much violence you experience as a child is how violent you will be as an adult. There is a direct relationship. The more you beat up kids the more violent they are going to be.

Dr. Ben Tensel, from Minneapolis, one of our witnesses, told the committee:

> With regard to child murderers, if you look at children who kill, you will find that a child as young as 5 can experience homicidal rage and plan to carry out a first degree murder.

And these are not uncommon in our society. He went on to say:

> I have never met a violent juvenile delinquent who was not abused as a child. I am not talking about status offences. I am talking about arson, murder and carrying of dangerous weapons.
> Secondly, all the criminals in the San Quentin prison have been studied and they all had violent upbringing as children.

Dr. Karl Menninger, one of the most famous of all criminologists in the United States, has done a tremendous amount of work in the cause of research. He says:

> Aggression becomes an easy outlet through which the child's frustrations and tensions flow, but because these traumatic experiences have overwhelmed him, his own emotional development is too immature to withstand the crippling inner effects of outer violence. Something happens to the child's character—

Dr. Menninger continues:

> Every letter I get—

He is referring to criminals.

> —every interview I give, every case history I review starts with the beatings and the kicks and cuddlings given to children by their angry, worried parents.

Dr. Cyril Greenland, of McMaster University, was also a witness, and he described the effect of abuse on the minds of young children and how it influenced them to develop careers in crime. He said:

> Dangerous criminals are not big, powerful men, they are in most part small, under-sized, poorly nourished, narrow-chested, with bad teeth or no teeth at all, victims of childhood neglect.

That is all I will say about child abuse.

Three things are essential in the development of the early education of a child: a healthy curiosity, good companionship, and self esteem—that is, confidence in oneself. That curiosity should be developed and guided or self esteem will not develop. A child whose hands and face are slapped by an angry parent when it expresses natural curiosity is a child with a wounded self esteem, the first step in the development of hostility.

My first request for this study was made in this chamber on May 14, 1975. The next day the CBC in Halifax called me at six o'clock in the morning. A young lady asked, "What do you want the Senate to study?" "The causes of criminal behaviour," I answered. "What do the senators know about that?" she asked. I replied, "They know nothing, and please tell me who does." She said, "That's easy. The lawyers know all about it, the judges know all about it, the police know all about it." I replied, "Pardon me, young lady, the judges know nothing about it, the lawyers know nothing about it, and the police know nothing about it, and they don't care." "You're wrong," she said, "The RCMP know everything about the causes of crime and they will be glad to tell you if you ask them."

It is tragic that the hostility of children that leads to delinquency has been regarded in the past as a matter of law and order. It is strictly a matter of education, and the work of child psychologists, and the time to intervene is when hostility begins. If the child psychologist gets the child at the age of six, the Mounties will never have to get him when he is a killer at the age of 26.

I hope that no one will take any offence if I offer some mild criticism of this chamber and of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee for the delay in making this study. In April 1956, I discussed this subject in the first speech that I made in this chamber, and, of course, I got no response. I raised it again when we were discussing the abolition of capital punishment for the murder of other than policemen and prison guards, and this, in part, is what I said:

> We know little, too little, about the magnitude of crime and its cause to deal with it effectively at the present time. Our system of crime control is an unplanned product of history.

On May 14, 1975 I introduced a motion asking for a study of criminal behaviour to be made by a committee of this house. Only four senators supported my motion. Just before the Christmas adjournment, eight months after I put my motion, it was passed on to the Health, Welfare and Science committee to deal with, and my suggestion was rejected. On December 2, 1976, I moved that a subcommittee of this house study childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour. That motion was agreed to, and a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science was appointed to conduct the inquiry.

Due to the indifference of our society to the causes of the growth of human violence and crime, I was not surprised at the cool reception my motion got on April 14, when the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science met to discuss it. It was the opinion of most members that the question of crime at all levels was a matter of law and order, and not for the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, and that that committee was not competent to undertake the task.

To support my case I told of my experiences with problem children, who were injured at birth through lack of oxygen or by obstetrical forceps, and when I got through I was promptly challenged by an honourable senator who said, "We are not psychologists, nor are we sociologists, in this room, and I think that the Senate committee really could do little in return for the time, money and effort involved in such a study. It would be useless, in my opinion. This is not what the Senate is here for."

When I mentioned my experiences with children who had birth injuries, one senator said, "We would look like a bunch of idiots if we went around looking for children with birth injuries as causes of criminal behaviour."

A little later, at another meeting, a senator who is not a member of the Health, Welfare and Science Committee, paid a visit to the committee. He apologized for coming as he was not on the committee, but he explained that he was there for a very serious reason: he was afraid our committee would get into trouble if it conducted such a hearing. He believed that criminal behaviour in the young and in adults was a matter for the courts to deal with, and he thought that we might even be violating the British North America Act if we tried to undertake such a study.

Another senator said, "Crime is a matter of free will. If a youth decides to be an honest citizen he will be rewarded by society. If he decides to be a criminal, society will punish him. It is all a question of free will, and is as simple as that."

I do not criticize any honourable senator who opposed my motion. They grew up at a time when violence in the home and in the street was a matter for the police and the courts to deal with; it was not considered to be a matter of mental health.

Then, on March 4, 1976, our committee heard two witnesses from the Department of Criminology of the University of Ottawa. One of them told us that he was from the United States and had worked for two years in the post-graduate clinic that dealt with youngsters with learning disabilities. The meeting lasted for two hours, and that was the only reference to learning disabilities that was made. I do not think that minimal brain dysfunction was ever mentioned at any of our meetings.

One of those professors gave me a book to read. It had been published 20 years previously, and I had read it shortly after it was published, but there was nothing in that book that dealt with any of the problems that I wanted the committee to study.

About a year later I went to Boys Town, Nebraska, to meet Father Hupp, Superintendent of the Flannigan Home for Boys. I had read a biography of the famous Father Flannigan, and how he handled young criminals who came under his care. I had read the story of a young inmate who had planned and carried out two murders at the age of 10 and how Flannigan handled this boy. I asked the superintendent if there were any inmates in his institution who were child murderers. He said, "Oh, yes." I asked him, "How could you recognize a potential psychopathic murderer?" He replied, "I don't know; but I'll tell you one thing: they all have learning disabilities." That was the first time I really grasped the importance of learning disabilities.

The committee was evenly divided for and against my motion. Senator Norrie was very much in favour of it. She was in New Brunswick due to illness in her family on the day our committee met to decide the fate of my motion. She planned to be present for the vote, but all air services between New Brunswick and Ottawa were out because the pilots were on strike. However, nothing stopped her: she came into the Ottawa airport by private plane, and got to the meeting to vote. My motion carried by a majority of one. Had she remained in New Brunswick the motion would have been defeated, there would have been no committee to study childhood experiences as causes of criminal behaviour, and there would have been no report entitled Child at Risk.

The cost of our committee's work was small. We did not hire researchers. Our witnesses were people who had done their own research. We paid their travelling expenses and they charged nothing for their time. Their evidence attracted attention, but more in the United States than in Canada. The press was invited to each of those meetings, but only one paper ever gave us any space, and that was the Globe and Mail. The Globe and Mail article on our proceedings was copied by American newspapers, and attracted much attention in the United States. Eventually we had a mailing list of over 600, and most recipients were in the United States.

Dr. Elliott Barker, who was a witness before our committee on March 5, 1978, wrote me a letter stating:

> Many of my colleagues are following the work of your Senate Committee with interest, and I hope you are getting rewarding feedback with regard to the impact you are making. For example, I had a telephone call from Boulder, Colorado, yesterday requesting the entire transcript of my testimony before the Committee December 6th. For some reason a journal that I had never heard of before—called "Behaviour Today"—printed an extract of some of the things that I said, and as a result I have had nine different requests for reprints from five different States in the United States.

That was the kind of interest we stirred up down there, but not in Canada, or at least not much.

On March 24, 1978 I received a letter from a professor of criminal justice of the Northeastern University, Boston, Massachusetts, that read as follows:

> Thank you ever so much for the material on the subject of childhood experiences and the causes of criminal behaviour, which has been sent to me at your direction. As far as I know, this is the first time such knowledge has been presented in such a comprehensive fashion anywhere.

The letter was signed by Edith E. Flynn, Ph.D.

I received between 30 and 40 letters from the United States, all inquiring about the success of our investigations. I had a letter from a juvenile court judge at Houston, Texas; one from the juvenile court, Reno, Nevada; one from Jackson, Mississippi; and one from Phoenix, Arizona. I had about a dozen letters from California, and one from a clinic which said:

> We hear you have discovered the causes of criminal behaviour and we would like to know more about it.

I wrote back that we had discovered nothing, but were only drawing the attention of the public to certain facts that some people had known for years.

About that time I had an inquiry from Massey University in New Zealand, and one from a university in Japan.

• (1520)

All these letters I received praised the work of the Senate. No one suggested that we looked like a bunch of idiots when we were studying birth injuries. But the letter I liked the best came from a psychologist at the Sick Children's Hospital in Toronto. It was written on October 27, 1978, was addressed to me, and read:

> This is just a short note to congratulate you on the work of your committee studying Childhood Experiences as Causes of Criminal Behaviour. My father, Carl Goldenberg, has sent me copies of all the hearings and I have read them with great interest. As a social worker involved with emotionally disturbed adolescents at the Hospital for Sick Children, your findings certainly have a bearing on my work. As a mother of an eight week old baby, I will be very careful not to make the mistakes mentioned in your study.

Shortly after receiving the request for information from Massey University in New Zealand, I received another request from a Dr. J. E. Hefford of the Albert Street Medical Centre, Palmerston North, New Zealand, asking for a copy of our proceedings. Later I received another letter from him, stating that the Parliament of New Zealand was being asked to conduct a study along the lines we had developed. Several months later I received a copy of the report made by the New Zealand Parliament.

Several copies of the report entitled Child at Risk reached New Zealand—how, I do not know. Nevertheless, about December 1, I received a letter from Professor Philip New, a member of the staff of the Medical School at Christchurch, New Zealand, congratulating the Senate on the work it had done. His letter included a three-page critique of our work and he suggested that we continue.

I should like to take a few minutes to tell you how I became involved in this study. When I began to practise medicine in rural New Brunswick in December, 1924 I expected to meet patients with physical diseases. However, patients with definite physical diseases were comparatively rare.

I met people with problems, worries, feelings—some big, some small—many of which could be traced to childhood experiences which involved slight psychological trauma and which left slight psychological scars. I met small children and older people who may have suffered from lack of oxygen at birth—an event which, in their cases, led to personality changes. I became interested in the causes of violence and sadism.

In June 1925 I saw a six-day-old baby whose head and face were battered from the use of obstetrical forceps. There was evident brain damage. Thirteen years and four months later, as I was coming along a road which is now part of Camp Gagetown, I saw a teenage imbecile standing in the doorway of a farm house. I stopped and inquired as to the boy's identity. He was the baby I had seen at the age of six days with a battered head. The cause of his imbecility was evident.

That was in September 1938, and I decided that some day I would investigate this phenomenon.

I was later to meet a number of persons with behavioural problems who had a history of a difficult birth. As time passed, I followed the work done by the Menninger brothers in Topeka, Kansas, and that done by Father Flannigan at Omaha, Nebraska. Father Flannigan said that there was no such thing as a truly bad boy, but there were bad homes, bad parents and bad laws. The Menninger brothers proved that crime and violence are learned. Father Flannigan proved that a boy involved in juvenile crime can be rescued by a good home.

When I came to the Senate I thought that it was time to do something about this grave situation. I visited the Department of Health and talked with psychologists and psychiatrists, yet they gave me very little encouragement. The reason for this was always the lack of money. Looking back, it is difficult to determine which came first, the lack of interest or the lack of money. The late Dr. Gordon Bates, founder of the Health League of Canada, was a frequent visitor to the Senate in those days. He suggested that I talk to certain people in Toronto.

I went to Toronto and Dr. Bates escorted me to the offices of those who could help me the most. One was a psychologist who was employed by the municipality of Toronto, and another was a psychologist employed by the provincial Department of Health. Both of these people agreed that such a study was long overdue, but neither of them had any idea where the money for such a project could be found.

I was advised to see Dr. Grygier, a Polish psychologist who had spent most of the Second World War in a German internment camp and who was doing research on the effects of prisoner-of-war camps upon inmates. He was interested in my purpose, but, like the others, did not have any money. He suggested that I interview Dr. Bruno Cormier at McGill University, who was doing research work on the criminally insane.

I went to Montreal and spent an afternoon with Dr. Cormier in his office on the slope of Mount Royal. He was enthused. In his view, this was work that should have begun long ago. He called in his staff of three or four and they were as anxious about it as was Dr. Cormier. Yet he, too, gave me the same response—there was no money for such a project. He told me that he and his colleagues were employed on a monthly basis, and that when they began a month's work they were not sure whether they would be employed the following month.

It was then, in the spring of 1958, that I met Professor Robert Wake of Carleton University. His views were similar to my own. We decided to undertake a project to study sadism in young boys. Professor Wake had two senior students of psychology who were eager to undertake the study. They did not want a salary; they merely needed their expenses paid. The Department of Psychology at Carleton University could find no way to finance this project, so I agreed to put up $800 to cover their expenses for a four-month project. This scheme was repeated in 1959 and 1960.

The students found difficulties in their work because children in the custody of the law were wards of the court and, as such, could not be interviewed. The students' work was restricted to interviewing inmates of the School for Delinquent Boys at Alfred, Ontario. After three years and an expenditure of over $2,400, I decided to give up the project. Professor Wake published an article on the results of this inquiry in the Canadian Journal of Psychology, and it is very interesting reading.

I wish to remind this chamber that the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science has not been very active during its existence. It has not developed a progressive study of the health and welfare needs of Canadians.

During my first session in this Senate, in 1956, the committee was called to order only once, on January 26, 1956, for an organizational meeting. Senator Veniot was chairman of the committee. He called the meeting to order and asked if there was any business. There was none; the meeting adjourned; it was all over in five minutes.

During the 1957-1958 session there was one organizational meeting of five minutes' duration, and a second meeting was held to discuss Bill C-30.

● (1530)

In 1959 one organizational meeting was held, and it lasted five or ten minutes. The committee met four times during the 1960 session to study bills. In 1961 there were two meetings and in 1962, three meetings, one for the purpose of organization and the other two to discuss legislation.

The committee met in 1963 on two occasions, and in 1964 it met once for an organizational meeting. In 1965 there were two meetings, and in 1966 and 1967 there was one meeting in each year for organizational purposes. There was no meeting in 1968. In 1969 there was one meeting for organizational purposes and one to discuss legislation.

The following year, 1970, was an active year. There were five meetings. In 1971 there were three meetings; in 1972, four meetings; in 1973, four meetings; in 1974, five meetings; and in 1975, six meetings.

Now we come to 1976, the year I introduced my motion to have this study carried out, in which there were eight meetings. The purpose of those eight meetings was to discuss the merits of my motion to study the causes of criminal behaviour. After the eight meetings, the committee made a decision that the study I had proposed was not feasible and, therefore, not warranted. However, the committee did make a suggestion. It had been reported that in a certain country—and the exact country escapes me at the moment—studies had been conducted on children who were problems of society. It was suggested that a committee could be formed to study the problem, if it existed in Canada.

On December 2, 1976 I moved that the committee study this work. The senators who opposed my motion of May 1965 were equally opposed to my motion in December 1976. Altogether, it took 12 meetings of the committee to decide on the merits of my motion to study the causes of crime.

The cost of welfare takes a major part of Canadian tax revenue. This chamber should have a vital interest in the psychological and emotional health of Canadians. At the beginning of this century there was little or no control over physical diseases such as smallpox, diptheria, polio and so on, diseases which took many, many lives. Typhoid fever alone took the lives of approximately 30,000 people annually on this continent.

These contagious diseases are now gone. Vaccines and antitoxins have robbed them of their terrors. I believe that not one case of smallpox has been reported in the world for some time, although such diseases are still in existence. There are still plenty of the germs around, I am sure, but immunization has enabled us to live with them.

But what about emotional disorders, the causes of criminal behaviour? It costs Canada $300 million per year to maintain its penitentiaries, and the provinces pay $600,000 per day to operate their correctional institutions. Meanwhile, crime is increasing every year, and there are more incidents of human violence.

I would like to tell you of the success of the group homes which provide the so-called "bad boy" with a place that meets his emotional needs. I experienced such homes when I visited the Flannigan Home in Omaha and the Menninger Villages in Topeka, Kansas. The Flannigan Home in Omaha is able to keep in touch with approximately 85 per cent of its former inmates. Representatives of that home say that of that number, 70 per cent never get into trouble with the law and that only between 2 and 4 per cent remain criminals. The Menninger Villages have a similar success rate. The representatives there tell me that of 182 graduates only 7 adults and 5 juveniles had subsequent trouble with the law.

I remind honourable senators that these children in these homes all came from broken homes, from families on welfare and families which included major or minor criminals. I had to ask myself, if these homes can achieve this rate of success, what would be the rate of success if we educated children between the ages of 3 and 5 years before their hostilities developed into hatred? These are the ages at which such children need help.

As I was walking down the corridor with the house mother in one of the Menninger Homes, I saw a young woman hurrying out the door with a briefcase in her hand. The house mother said that she would like me to meet that girl but that she was in a hurry because she was writing an exam for her third year architecture course at Washburn University. She then proceeded to tell me something of the girl's past. The girl had been admitted to the Menninger Home at 15 or 16 years of age. At that time she was a drug addict, alcoholic, prostitute, shop-lifter and a passer of bad cheques. It was on a charge of passing bad cheques that she ended up in the Menninger Home. But there she was, some five or six years later, a third-year student in architecture.

In conclusion, I want to say this: Crime is caused by unchecked emotional disturbances of childhood. The nine months in utero are as important as any nine months in a child's life. We know more about prenatal life today than we did 20 years ago, and by the year 2000 we shall know more than we know now. I should like to commend to anybody who is interested a book written by a well-known Canadian psychiatrist who has done considerable research on prenatal life, which is called Secret Life of the Unborn Child.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before I adjourn the debate on behalf of Senator Bell, I should like to take this opportunity, on behalf of the Senate—and I hope that I am not being presumptuous—to say how impressed with, grateful for, and proud of the work Senator McGrand has done on this subject we all are.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Bell, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

ITALIAN CULTURAL GROUP

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I draw your attention to the presence in the south gallery of Dr. R. Ricciuti, former President of the Region of Abruzzo, Italy; Dr. S. Petricone, President of the Province of L'Aquila; and Dr. T. De Rubeis, Mayor of the City of L'Aquila, all of whom are visiting Canada with a cultural group. They are accompanied by the President of the Italian Chamber of Commerce of Toronto, Dr. Tony Valeri.

I extend to them, on behalf of the Senate, a hearty welcome to this country, and wish them a pleasant visit.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CLERK'S ACCOUNTS

STATEMENT TABLED PURSUANT TO RULE 112

[Translation]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Hon. Léopold Langlois moved:

DOCUMENTS TABLED

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government) tabled:

Report of the Commission of Inquiry on Aviation Safety, Volume I (Commissioner, The Honourable Mr. Justice Charles L. Dubin), dated May 1981.

Report of the number and amount of loans to Indians made under section 70(1) of the Indian Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1981, pursuant to section 70(6) of the said Act, Chapter I-6, R.S.C., 1970.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, June 9, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1410)

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Could the Acting Deputy Leader of the Government explain the reason for this adjournment? I think the record should show that.

Senator Langlois: The reason for the adjournment is that we do not expect to receive any legislation from the other place for perhaps two weeks.

Certain committees of the Senate have meetings scheduled for next week, but I am informed that those meetings will be cancelled. Senator Barrow might make a statement on that later this afternoon.

Senator Flynn: He is here, so let him make it now.

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, Senator Hayden, I wish to announce to members of that committee that the meetings scheduled for Tuesday and Wednesday of next week are cancelled, and will be rescheduled for a later date.

Senator Flynn: It is my understanding that those meetings were to consider the subject matter of Bill C-57.

Senator Langlois: Those meetings were to consider Bills C-50 and C-57.

Senator Flynn: But only the subject matter of them.

Senator Barrow: Yes.

Senator Flynn: That makes it clear that there is no urgency about those meetings. Since there will be no legislation coming from the other place, I think the decision to adjourn to June 9 is a wise one.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to tell you that the meeting of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments will be held, as usual, next Thursday morning.

Senator Flynn: We can always count on the fidelity of Senator John Godfrey.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY

ALBERTA—OIL PRODUCTION CUTBACK—SUGGESTED SURTAX REDUCTION

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Minister of State for Economic Development, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

It is becoming obvious that, due to the reduced demand for oil in eastern Canada, the government will not have to pay as high a subsidy to petroleum importers as was originally expected. The government, however, continues to collect a tax amounting to $1.3 million per day, which it levied some time ago amid much fanfare and in reaction to the Alberta cutbacks.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate inquire and report to the Senate as to whether, in light of this reduction in demand, the government will be required to expend all of the monies which it is collecting under this surtax and, if not, whether Canadian taxpayers can anticipate some relief in this regard?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The question will be taken as notice.

[Later:]

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, as a supplementary to the question asked by Senator Balfour, I should like to say that the tax to which Senator Balfour referred was imposed as a result of a cutback which averaged about 60,000 barrels a day of the oil available to the Canadian market from Alberta, and that tax, as senators know, came to about half a cent a litre.

I should like the government leader, in answering the question put by Senator Balfour, to deal with the imminence of a further cutback of the same amount by the Province of Alberta, which, according to their statements, would be due on June 1, and a possible third cutback which could take place at the beginning of September. This would mean a total cutback of 180,000 barrels a day. In view of that potential, would the government be considering exposing itself to a higher deficit?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the supplementary question asked by the Honourable Senator Austin will be taken as notice. It is a very important question.

As honourable senators are aware, the proposal is to effect a further cutback in Alberta oil production of another 60,000 barrels on June 1. The implications are of importance to every section of the country. It is hoped that a statement can be brought to the chamber when next we meet.

[Senator Godfrey.]

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

STRIKE BY FRANCOPHONE JOURNALISTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in connection with the strike of journalists with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am wondering whether the Leader of the Government would consider favourably a motion to refer to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications an inquiry into the positions of both sides in this issue with a view to having the committee study the matter and determine if anything can be suggested to solve this problem, which has been with us for quite some months now.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I thank the Leader of the Opposition for his proposal. I would appreciate an opportunity to discuss this with him or to consider a memorandum he may wish to prepare on that subject. Perhaps decisions can be made following that.

INDUSTRY

BUSINESS AND LABOUR TASK FORCE ON INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Hon. Guy Charbonneau: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. We hear from various sources that the government has started to prepare an industrial strategy for the country. As the minister knows, an 80-member task force of business and labour leaders has also been studying an industrial strategy, which I presume has come to the minister's attention. One member of that task force has already stated that the prevailing attitude within this task force is that if the government does not implement its basic recommendations there will no longer be a bilateral project to advise the government on industrial policy. Would the minister care to advise us as to whether the government has officially reacted to this attitude?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no information on that specific point, but since this government assumed its responsibilities a few months ago it has entered into a widespread process of consultation with business and other sectors of society. The question will be taken as notice.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN—PENDING JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on Tuesday last, a question was asked by Senator Asselin regarding a statement attributed to the Honourable the Minister of Justice. Inquiries in this connection went forward.

The reply received from the Minister of Justice is to the effect that he was saying that, if we cannot reach agreement with the provinces, it will be the Supreme Court which will have to decide where the law lies. Reference to the Supreme Court of the question of offshore resources would be an example.

The office of the minister has provided a comment, also, to the effect that we have a Constitution, which is the prime law of the land. For the Minister of Justice to say that this act must be respected and judged by the Supreme Court of Canada does not constitute any threat. It is a correct interpretation of the legal situation.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Hon. Martial Asselin: What about the minister's comment regarding relations between Canada and France? I did ask a question regarding the statement he made in connection with the new French government.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question went forward on that point as well. I understand that no formal text was involved in the statement made on that subject. An effort is being continued to determine, if possible, the exact words which were used on that occasion. It is my hope that an answer can be provided.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): You can always ask the minister to tell you what he said.

Senator Perrault: I want to emphasize that the question has been put to the minister, and he may be at the moment—

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Dreaming up an answer!

Senator Perrault: —preparing a reply.

AIR CANADA

FLIGHT ATTENDANTS—APPLICATIONS FOR POSITIONS—QUALIFICATIONS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wish to raise a question of privilege in connection with a reply I received to a question on the order paper. I had asked how many applications were received by Air Canada for positions as stewards, male and female, by province, in 1980. The reply stated that no record was kept of applications received on a provincial basis. That is very far from the truth. I put the same question on the order paper in 1977, and in 1978 I received a reply together with a complete breakdown, by province, of the number of applications received. Perhaps the Leader of the Government would tell Air Canada that the company is not as smart as it thinks it is. The company should show some responsibility and give the information requested.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is always the possibility, of course, that a procedure followed in 1981 may not be identical to that followed in 1977. However, the apparent discrepancy in the willingness of Air Canada to provide certain information in 1977 and their response to a recent request will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport. I hope that we can provide the honourable senator with a reply.

TRANSPORT

VANCOUVER—BOUNDARY BAY AIRPORT—RE-OPENING FOR LIGHT AIRCRAFT

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the government leader with respect to the International Airport at Vancouver. Can the government leader advise us when small aircraft, which comprise about 70 per cent of the landings at Vancouver International Airport, will be required to be moved to the Boundary Bay Airport? Will that plan be executed in the next short while, or is the decision still pending?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is the intention of the government to re-open Boundary Bay Airport exclusively for light aircraft and helicopters, as approved. Conversations have been held in recent weeks concerning a number of matters, including, I understand, an established target date for the commencement of operations. I do not believe a precise date has yet been established, but that inquiry will go forward.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 9, 1981, at 8 p.m.

STEFAN CARDINAL WYSZYNSKI

TRIBUTES TO THE LATE PRIMATE OF POLAND AND THE POLISH NATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, this is the earliest opportunity I have had in this chamber to bring to your attention the presence of an official Canadian delegation at the funeral service last May 31, in Warsaw, for the Primate of the Roman Catholic Church in Poland, the late Stefan Cardinal Wyszynski. By that presence the Canadian government, on behalf of our people, paid solemn tribute to the revered memory of a great religious leader, patriot and statesman of Poland, whose fellow countrymen fought heroically alongside the allies in World War II to defeat Hitler's Nazi forces but, in the end, were abandoned to a horrible fate behind the iron curtain dominated by atheistic communism from the Kremlin.

In defiance of religious oppression by civil authorities, the Primate fought courageously for fundamental human rights, human dignity and religious freedom.

● (2000)

From 1953 to 1956, civil authorities held him under house arrest. Freed in October 1956, he continued to struggle for greater religious freedom and social justice. He became the conscience of the Polish nation, which was fed up with poverty, harassment and incompetence. On more than one occasion an atheistic government was forced to seek the Primate's help before the anger of the Polish people. Calling for justice, prudence and reason, he preserved peace in Poland.

A great educator, he became the mentor of Cardinal Wojtyla, now His Holiness, Pope John Paul II, and the inspiration and guide of Lech Walesa.

He lived to see the establishment of Solidarity, the first independent union of workers in a Communist regime. Although Cardinal Wyszynski's lips are now sealed, his words still ring loudly in the ears of his fellow countrymen, whom he served so well, and will do so for a long time in the future. They regarded him as a national hero, loved and now sorely missed by his followers; feared and now respected by his adversaries.

I believe honourable senators would like to join me in expressing our sympathy to the mourning Polish nation on the loss of their Primate and dearest son.

On the eve of another crisis in Poland, his courage and wisdom will be relied upon to preserve peace, for he was truly a man of peace. That is why he was and remains a worthy candidate for the Nobel Peace Prize.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Honourable Senator Haidasz who the members of the Canadian delegation were.

Senator Haidasz: The official delegation from the Parliament of Canada consisted of the Honourable Steven Paproski (Edmonton North) and Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park), and from the Ontario Legislature, Mr. Bernard Newman (Windsor-Walkerville).

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development) tabled:

Letter from Northwest Alaskan Pipeline Company to the Prudhoe Bay gas producers regarding the financing plan for the Alaskan Pipeline and Gas Conditioning Plant, dated May 21, 1981 (English and French texts).

NORTHERN PIPELINE

FINANCING—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I should like to make a short statement this evening regarding the recent agreement on the financing plan for the Alaska segment of the Alaska Highway Pipeline project.

Senator Asselin: Do you have a copy for the opposition?

Senator Olson: Yes, I have some extra copies here that I would be happy to have distributed.

As I announced in this place on May 21, 1981, agreement has been reached between the project sponsor, Northwest Alaskan Pipeline Company, and the Prudhoe Bay gas producers—Exxon, Standard Oil and Atlantic Richfield—for financing of the Alaska portion of the natural gas transmission system. My earlier statement was made after I had been advised by John G. McMillian, chairman and chief executive officer of Northwest Alaskan Pipeline Company, that an agreement had been reached. The details of the plan were subsequently provided to me. In my judgment, Canadian interest in this matter is such that the Canadian Parliament should have this information.

The agreement covers the 1,180-kilometre segment—that is about 730 miles—of the pipeline in Alaska and the gas-conditioning plant at Prudhoe Bay. Under the proposed financing plan, the gas producers would hold an equity position, equal to 30 per cent, in the system, which includes both the preconditioning plant and the line. While such participation is prohibited under the current United States legislation, it is my understanding that the Secretary of Energy, James B. Edwards, said in Washington on May 28, 1981, that he is prepared to seek a waiver from Congress to permit the producers to possess ownership in the project and to provide for such other amendments as may be required to facilitate the project.

Honourable senators, I have tabled a copy of the letter to the Prudhoe Bay gas producers from Northwest Alaskan Pipeline Company outlining the basis of the financing plan which is currently being presented to the financial community.

Most of the information contained in the letter, which was addressed to these companies from John G. McMillian, chairman and chief executive officer of Northwest Alaskan Pipeline Company, has already been reported in the press in many parts of North America. However, I think this letter does set out in an orderly and detailed fashion the comprehensive way in which this financing package has been put together.

I should like to refer to some of the highlights of the letter without reading it in toto, but I would ask that it be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of letter see appendix, p. 2498)

Senator Olson: I will point out some of the highlights:

For purposes of financing, the "as spent" cost of the Alaskan pipeline will be $21 billion—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Billion!

Senator Olson: Yes, $21 billion; and that of the preconditioning plant will be $6 billion.

In addition, a pre-committed completion assurance pool of $3 billion will be formed.

As you can see, that adds up to approximately $30 billion, with a fund of $3 billion for cost overruns and that sort of thing.

The debt equity ratio for all capital investment will be 75:25.

The investment limits of all participating companies will be defined from the outset. As a group, the transmission companies will provide equity in an amount not to exceed $5.25 billion. As a group, the producer companies will provide equity in an amount not to exceed $2.25 billion, and be further responsible—

And I want to be clear on this.

—further responsible for arranging for an amount of debt not to exceed $6.75 billion.

When you look at all of this, you will see that it comes back to the 30:70 ratio, that I mentioned in my opening remarks, which exists between the responsibility of the producers on the North Slope and that of the sponsors of the pipeline.

Debt funds (pipeline and plant) will be sought on a project credit basis. The transmission group will be responsible for arranging for $15.75 billion in project debt. The producer group has accepted responsibility for arranging for $6.75 billion in additional project debt. The debt which the producers are responsible for arranging will be accorded terms and conditions equivalent to those accorded other project debt.

There is more information contained in this letter, honourable senators, but those are some of the highlights of the agreement that was reached between the producing companies on the North Slope of Alaska and the sponsors of the pipeline.

More importantly, perhaps, the completion of the engineering for the line itself, as well as the engineering and the design of the preconditioning plant, is now of a nature such that both parties have confidence in those cost estimates. Therefore, they are now prepared to present the concept to the financial community for its consideration. We have every confidence that it will be taken up with some very substantial companies being participants in both sides of the agreement. It is my hope that that will be done expeditiously so that the rest of the line that we in this country have prepared to build can be completed within the time frame that I indicated in my previous statement.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I may say a word in response to the minister's statement, I will begin by thanking him on behalf of this side of the house for his courtesy in letting us have a copy of this statement before we met tonight, thereby giving us a chance to read it. I must say that the statement answers several questions I raised with the minister the last time this subject was before us. On a first reading of the statement, I find myself satisfied with what I see.

There is one point, however, about which I would like some further information, if it is available, and that has to do with conditions precedent. Clause 6 of the summary indicates that each company's participation will be subject to satisfaction of conditions precedent, a number of which are listed. I would like to direct the minister's attention to the following:

All parties are assured that the Canadian segment will be financed and completed without U.S. company involvement.

I presume that refers to the portion of the pipeline from the Alaska-Yukon border that will come through the Yukon, British Columbia and Alberta until it links up with Alberta's system where the prebuild lines are.

Can the minister tell us anything about the situation with respect to engineering, financing and construction in connection with that Canadian segment which is a condition precedent?

• (2020)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could give a fairly detailed report on the progress of the survey, the routing and, indeed, almost all of the other terms and conditions that were required under the Northern Pepeline Act. It is a fact that the Canadian portion that is referred to is from the Alaska-Yukon border through the Yukon and then into Alberta to a point—I am not sure of the exact number of kilometres, but some miles north of Caroline, Alberta. That is where the Y is in the line going to the so-called western leg which is now complete except for some valves and interconnections. The eastern leg is also under construction. North from Caroline there is a section of 56-inch line which is going to be part of the gathering system for the prebuild sales, if I may call it that—the Canadian gas that goes in there—but it is also for the purpose of testing that size of pipe because, as you know, it is the largest pipe that has ever been produced in Canada, and there are some tests required with respect to it.

There are still some environmental problems that have not been completely resolved in the Yukon. There is a requirement for the environmental panel—EARP—to complete a hearing on the passage through the Ibex Pass near Whitehorse. I do not want to prejudge what may happen as a result of those hearings, but I do not think that we are going to find ourselves in a position where we have every single detail resolved at any given time. Generally speaking, the company—in this case, Foothills—has presented the Northern Pipeline Agency and me, the minister responsible, with the plans that they have worked out. For example, the manpower plan, the environmental plan, some of the socio-economic conditions that were required for each section of the line, are all either completed and approved or in a highly advanced stage. In addition to that, I think it can be fairly said that the company had arranged, to the satisfaction of the National Energy Board and myself, to finance the entire section that is to be built in Canada. That has not changed.

I believe that has answered most of the questions that have been raised, but, as a matter of fact, I would expect that from here on, as soon as the financing is in place in the United States so that they can look to the schedule of construction and to the completion date, it will be in the interest of and perhaps—I was going to say "easy" but maybe that is not the right word—I think Foothills is in such an advanced stage of planning all of these things that they will be able to accommodate their construction phase so that it will be ready about the same time as the gas can be delivered to the Alaska-Yukon border.

Senator Roblin: The minister anticipated a couple of other questions I had. I believe the Foothills people are a pretty competent bunch, and my expectation is that if the financing is in sight, as he says, he may be able to report to us further on the amount of money involved, because I am astonished at the $21 billion figure for the Alaska portion. It would be interesting to know what the cost of the Canadian portion is too.

The minister dealt with the question of timetable. Does he think that the two portions will be completed in tandem?

Senator Olson: It is important in this case that construction scheduling be done because of the cost of carrying the capital and the costs.

Senator Roblin: We don't want it done too soon.

Senator Olson: If it is done too far in advance, that is fairly important these days.

So far as the cost of the Canadian section is concerned, honourable senators will appreciate the fact that a recent assessment of the cost of the Canadian section has not moved very much from what was predicted two and a half years ago. There were some predictions then of the increases as time went by, but if you take into account the passage of time since those predictions were made—I am subject to correction—they are right on target.

Senator Roblin: How much?

Senator Olson: Within the time frame that it will now be built, it is slightly over $8 billion in Canada.

Senator Roblin: Thank you.

Senator Olson: I shall check that out because there are some additions and subtractions because of the sections that have already been built in southern Canada.

Hon. George van Roggen: Would the minister please clarify one point? I understand that the $6 billion figure relating to the gas plant is wholly in respect of Alaska, that the $3 billion overrun fund is for an overrun in Alaska, but that the $21 billion figure includes not only that portion of the line built in Alaska but the whole line. Is that correct?

Senator Olson: I do not think it does; I believe it is primarily for the Alaska section.

Hon. Ernest C. Manning: Honourable senators, I wonder if the minister would comment on another aspect of this matter. Certainly, the fact that the consortium has finally completed an agreement in the United States is good news, and probably one of the biggest hurdles has now been overcome so far as their end of this whole project is concerned.

Since the announcement appeared in the press some time ago there have been several reports expressing concern on two points, and I am wondering if the minister is in a position to comment on them. First, there still seems to be uncertainty as to what will be the ultimate cost of the gas from Alaska delivered at the south end of the line. As the minister has indicated in his figures tonight, we are talking about a construction cost which is now at least three times what was proposed when the project first came into being, which, of course, has to be reflected in the transportation cost.

The concern that has been expressed in some reports—it bears on the question of the economic viability and the ability to finance—is as to what will be the actual cost of this Alaskan gas at the south end of the pipeline. Having regard to the high cost of the gas in Alaska, plus the tremendous cost of the project to move it, is it going to be a figure that will jeopardize the sale of that gas in competition with gas from other sources? That concern has been expressed by the financial world, and I am wondering whether the minister is able to comment on it.

Perhaps the minister can deal with the second point at the same time, as it is related. There have also been at least one or two reports that I have seen since the press release on the completion of the consortium in which some members of the financial community have expressed concern that there did not appear to have been addressed, in these final negotiations that led to this agreement, any clear position on the automatic flow-through of cost overruns which may still be encountered before the project is completed. This, again, is a factor which is bound to come up in trying to finance this project. I wonder if the minsiter has heard anything on those two points and if he can enlighten us.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, in dealing with the second question first, no, I have not had any specific or more official comment made to me about that matter, although I have heard about some of the speculation in the press respecting that.

• (2030)

Dealing with the first question, namely, the cost of the gas delivered, I suppose to talk about the southern end you would be talking about the 49th parallel. Some calculations can be done on that, and I will ask that they be done. However, I do not have the figures on the tip of my tongue at the moment. I can say, though, that the United States government has given an indication, and they have been firm in that indication, that that gas supply is an integral part of their total energy program. They realize that in the initial stages there will be a requirement that that gas be rolled in or blended with other gas to make it viable in the market, and they are prepared to do that.

There are, of course, some additional supplies of gas that have been found in the United States recently. Indeed, there have been, I think, two winters in succession now when lower than normal amounts of gas were required throughout a large part of the United States. That has added to what used to be called the gas "bubble." It is now more of a gas "sausage"; it is a little longer than was anticipated some time ago.

I think we have to rely on the statements made by the United States administration, and indeed by both houses of the United States Congress, that they place a high priority on getting that gas into their consumer distribution system, because it represents over 12 per cent of their total gas supply. Indeed, they are prepared to make some accommodation for that gas to enter the market on a reasoned basis so that it will make the project viable. However, I will obtain more specific figures as soon as the calculations can be made.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I should like to put two questions to the Minister of State for Economic Development.

First, is he prepared to give a time schedule which will indicate when Alaska gas will be passing through the line? Is that part of the agreement? Perhaps he would venture to say when that would be in effect.

Secondly, if and when the Alaska gas is passing through to the American market, what will be the position of the Canadian producers of gas, the Alberta producers especially, who now have a large market in the United States? How will they be affected? Will there in fact be markets for Alberta gas, which is such an important part of the economy at the present time?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the target date for the completion of the line is the end of 1985. That was stated in the resolutions passed by both the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States, and it was indeed the stated target date of the administration in the United States as well.

With respect to Alberta gas or Canadian gas, whichever you prefer to call it—I guess both—I must point out to the honourable senator that that is subject to the terms and conditions of the export permit contained in the National Energy Board permit. I believe that is for a maximum of 3.7 trillion cubic feet of gas over a given number of years. I am not exactly sure of the number of years at the moment, but it was anticipated that by the time the Prudhoe Bay gas was down there, that would start to replace some of the Canadian gas in the capacity of the system. But it was for a longer period than until the end of 1985.

Honourable senators, if I may, I should like to answer Senator van Roggen's question, which is made clear in the statement I gave a few minutes ago, and that is that the agreement covers a 1,180 kilometre/730 mile segment of the pipeline in Alaska, and the gas conditioning plant at Prudhoe Bay.

Senator Buckwold: As a supplementary, honourable senators, I am still not clear as to what the position of the producers of Canadian gas located in Alberta will be in 1985. Will there be a substantial market for Canadian gas, or will this, under the program, disappear? I am still not quite sure.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the National Energy Board has issued a permit to deliver the amount of gas that is outlined in that permit, beginning as soon as they are ready, and I suppose some of that gas will start to flow, in the western leg, in 1981. In addition to that, they have set some limits for the total amount, and also, of course, for the staged amount. The amount of gas contained in that export permit will not have been exhausted, either in terms of the volume or of the time frame, by the end of 1985; so it will go on beyond that year.

This line is for the purpose of delivering, eventually, United States gas to the United States, and therefore our use of that section of the line will be in effect during the period when they are not up to full capacity at Prudhoe Bay, using the southern sections that were built last year and will be completed in this construction season and during part of the 1982 construction season.

The regulatory authorities here have issued the permit allowing the export under certain terms and conditions. I do not believe there was a "take or pay" or any obligation of that nature, given to the producers. When we went ahead with the building of that section there was an undertaking given that a certain amount of money would be paid to the constructors of the pipeline, whether they used it or not; and that, of course, is all in the agreement.

THE ESTIMATES

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)—NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE STUDY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending 31st March 1982, tabled in the Senate on June 9, 1981.

He said: Honourable senators, by way of explanation concerning leave, perhaps it might be recalled that earlier this evening the Leader of the Government tabled the supplementary estimates and, according to our usual practice, we have in this motion a reference to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to move that the National Finance Committee be allowed to meet tomorrow afternoon while the Senate is sitting?

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): To consider supplementary estimates (A)?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is meeting tomorrow morning. Although Senator Lafond is not present in the chamber to tell me, I think the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance would be the only committee meeting tomorrow afternoon while the Senate is sitting, so, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting tomorrow, Wednesday, June 10, 1981, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: Yes, but I would like to know why. Is it to study the supplementary estimates?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, on Thursday, Professor McQueen is appearing as a witness before the committee, and on the following Tuesday the Finance Minister of Newfoundland will be before us. On the following Wednesday I shall be speaking to the committee's report on the main estimates. Also, on Wednesday afternoon and Thursday morning the committee will meet in camera to consider its report following its study of government policy and regional disparities.

There is a time element, and I thought, if it is at all possible, that the committee could meet at some time tomorrow to deal with supplementary estimates (A), which I gather are quite brief.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: May I ask at what time it is proposed the committee should meet?

Senator Everett: The normal time is 2.30 p.m., but if the honourable senator desires a later time we could meet at, say, 4 o'clock. Would that accommodate his wishes?

Senator Roblin: After Question Period.

Senator Frith: I agree.

Senator Everett: Would 3.30 or 4 o'clock be agreeable?

Senator Molson: At 3.30.

Senator Everett: If we meet at 4 o'clock, I doubt that we will impinge on any business of the Senate.

Senator Molson: At 3.30.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

THE PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. The Prime Minister who, as everybody knows, is quite obsessed with constitutional reform, is reported to have stated that, following the adoption of the project which is now before the Supreme Court and subject to a decision which he would consider favourable, he intended to concern himself with a reform of the Senate and a pro rata representation in the House.

I do not know exactly along what line the Prime Minister would like this reform of the Senate to go. I have been very curious about this, ever since he accepted that particular amendment before the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution.

Could the Leader of the Government provide us with the text of the Prime Minister's statement? In case the Prime Minister spoke in general terms of a reform of the Senate, could he provide us with specific details, that we may compare his project with the report of the Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, whose heart and soul was Senator Lamontagne?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the remarks made by the Prime Minister were general in nature.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: And in content.

Senator Perrault: Indeed, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister set forth his views that this government will not rest content until there have been a number of other changes, reforms and improvements in a variety of ways. I am rather surprised that the Leader of the Opposition would be concerned over these remarks attributed to the Prime Minister, in view of the fact that for years he has called for change and reform in the second chamber. Surely, the Leader of the Opposition is not offended by the idea that something could be changed in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I can say that I am not offended. However, I am worried because of the feeling which exists on the government side of the Senate. We all know the reaction of Senator Steuart and others on that side when we received the proposal to limit the power of the Senate to 60 days. They were so worried they almost instigated an insurrection.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Apprehended an insurrection.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would hope that the Leader of the Opposition will canvass the opinions of members of his own caucus before he speculates on the possible reaction of those who support the government in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: I am not speculating at all.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Then why don't you speak?

Hon. G. I. Smith: Why don't you answer?

Senator Perrault: This matter of Senate reform and Senate change has been discussed before and, frankly, it is a matter which distresses no one on the government side.

Senator Flynn: That I doubt, but I am entitled to be curious about the workings of the mind of the Prime Minister. We never seem to know. One day he says one thing and the following day he reverts to his old priorities. Every senator knows that the Prime Minister has only contempt for this institution.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Just that side.

INDUSTRY

IMPORTATION OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILES

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Economic Development. It relates to the matter of the importation of Japanese cars into Canada, and I doubt that the minister will have the information I require at his fingertips. The question is: How many cars made in Japan were imported into Canada in the period from January 1, 1981 to March 31, 1981, and how many during the same period in 1980?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): I do have those figures, but I believe I shall let caution pervail and check them before I present them.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Agreed.

Senator Smith: That is a very wise judgment and I congratulate the minister on his wisdom.

Hon. Martial Asselin: For once.

Senator Smith: Perhaps I could ask the minister to consider a couple of supplementary questions while he is making his investigations, or I could wait and ask them when he brings in his answer to the question I have just asked. Would the minister find it convenient if I were to ask my questions now?

Senator Olson: Yes.

Senator Smith: If there was an excess—and I am not asserting there was; I am merely asking—of imports from Japan in the period in 1981 which I mentioned as compared with the same period in 1980, how much is it and how does it affect the number of cars which will be imported into Canada from Japan during the period from April 1, 1981 to December 31, 1982?

Perhaps, to make clear what I mean—and sometimes, I am sure, the minister wishes that I would—I should ask: Does the number of cars which are either agreed upon or under discussion for agreement to be imported from Japan in the period from April 1, 1981 to March 31, 1982 include the inventory which existed in Canada at the beginning of that period?

• (2050)

Senator Olson: I am glad to hear that the honourable senator did ask the rest of his question, because I will take that into account. He realizes, of course, that what we are really talking about is a restraint exercised by the Japanese automotive industry, and the thing becomes even more complex because within the North American auto producing sector there is an agreement with the United States covering certain phases of automotive production.

He will also realize that there was a restraint program introduced by the Japanese automotive industry with respect to the volume of sales directly to the United States. I will obtain those figures, but I think I can say at this point that there was an increase between January 1 and the end of March 1980, and January 1 to the end of March 1981.

I think the honourable senator should also realize that the amount of the restraint is, indeed, higher than the actual sales for the same period in 1980, but it probably will be less than the amount projected for the whole year based on first quarter imports. This, of course, is part of the concern we have because it has gone up substantially. However, I will obtain those figures for the honourable senator.

The other part of his question relating to the inventory in Canada—and, I presume, that is unsold—I will have a look at. I do not believe at this point that that is to be included within the restricted levels for the rest of this year, and indeed over to April 1, 1982. However, I will check that too.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable minister. Perhaps he will allow me to add that his expectation of what I realize will be determined by the figures which he gives me.

Since he mentioned the question of restraint, may I ask an additional question? Is there some sort of agreed restraint for the fiscal year 1981-82 in this matter of imports, or is this just a matter of discussion so far?

Senator Olson: I suppose it has been a matter of discussion over some period of time. The honourable senator realizes—and I know that he does not like me to use that word—

Senator Smith: I don't mind at all.

Senator Olson: I find that sometimes there are deficits in what the opposition members admit they know by way of background information. That is why I use that word from time to time. Perhaps in some cases it is genuine, but they conveniently omit certain parts of the background information, and I feel an obligation to draw that to their attention.

Senator Flynn: We learn from you.

Senator Olson: I will check that too. As far as I am aware, it is for the balance of this year, but it might run over to April 1982.

Senator Asselin: Check the increases in the prices.

Senator Smith: I thank the honourable gentleman for his explanation and for his obvious intention to be as peaceable as he can be, having regard to the very high degree of restraint which I exercised in posing my question in order to comply with the rules which he says ought to be followed.

Senator Olson: I appreciate that.

ENERGY

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD—DECISION RE APPLICATION OF TRANS MOUNTAIN PIPE LINE CO. LTD.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Honourable senators, contrary to my usual procedure, this evening I wish to direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

I am sure it has come to his attention—and if it has not come to his attention it is inexcusable—that the National Energy Board has announced that it is prepared to accept the application by Trans Mountain Pipe Line Co. Ltd. over that of the other applicant, Northern Tier, despite the United States government's support for the Northern Tier alternative.

The government has shown a willingness to provide direction to the National Energy Board, and that willingness, of course, is exemplified by the declaration that the maritime gas pipeline will be built, whatever the evidence presented to the National Energy Board is.

Would the leader indicate, consistent with his declaration in 1979 the application by Trans Mountain Pipe Line would be ecologically and environmentally dangerous to the west coast—a position which I presume he still maintains—whether he has appealed to the Prime Minister to override the decision of the National Energy Board?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, an application was made to the National Energy Board. That hearing was held and, after considering all factors, it was felt that permission should be granted to those who wished to build the line. The decision has yet to be made as to whether or not the line will indeed proceed. Regarding the reasons for judgment, I have not had an opportunity to study supporting documentation. Thus, I will take the question as notice.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): He can read the decision if he wants to.

HOUSING

INCREASED SUBSIDIES TO CMHC FINANCED PROJECTS

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The government has announced increased subsidies to offset high interest rates in certain financially troubled CMHC financed projects. My question is a two-part one.

First of all, I should like to know the criteria for determining which projects will be assisted, and, assuming that the Leader of the Government will take that as notice, I should like to ask him if he could also inform the Senate of the names and locations of the projects that have been selected to receive this additional subsidy.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the question will be taken as notice. I know the minister responsible for the housing program, the Honourable Paul Cosgrove, is making a conscientious attempt within the resources available to him to provide a great range of housing in this country.

I can say, honourable senators, that only last Saturday I had the great pleasure to assist in the opening of a project on the west coast, and the effective interest rate for that project, for those in some degree of social need, was 2 per cent. I wish we could do this for all Canadians, and I am sure that the former Conservative government would have wished it had been able to lower interest rates.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Do we get an answer or a speech?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Don't let him get away with that.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ISRAELI ATTACK ON NUCLEAR REACTOR IN IRAQ

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question to direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The question concerns the attack by the Israeli air force on an establishment in Baghdad. Yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that more information was required before Canada could take action or make utterance. Could the minister advise us whether sufficient information has now come in and if Canada has made its comment, and what, in essence, is that comment?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government cannot condone the recent Israeli attack, which it considers most unfortunate and counterproductive to the goal of peace in the Middle East. The government is aware of Israel's concern regarding security and is also aware that Israel, in this connection, has long been concerned that Iraqi nuclear facilities might eventually be used to manufacture weapons which in turn might be used against Israel. However, Iraq is a signatory to the NPT, and periodic international inspections of its nuclear facilities have shown that Iraq is conforming to the treaty's obligations.

We are now checking with our embassy in Baghdad to determine whether there might be a problem with the release of radioactivity, and, if so, whether any Canadians might be affected by that. We would want further information on the attack before deciding on any additional action.

Senator Macquarrie: May I ask in a supplementary way—the issue is certainly not supplementary—whether the Government of Canada has conveyed any message to the Government of Israel, and, if so, how was that done?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I have not been advised of any official message. One may have been sent. The question will be taken as notice and, if a message has been sent, the information will be brought to the Senate tomorrow.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES—VISITS TO UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. Would he inform this chamber as to how many parliamentary secretaries have visited the United Kindgom in the last two months; who they were; whether they were on official business; and what was the nature of that business?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that ordinarily is very much an order paper-type question. However, the question will be taken as notice because of its detailed nature.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Whenever we put a question on the order paper, we receive answers in six months' time.

Senator Perrault: I am rather disturbed at the increasing cynicism of the Leader of the Opposition concerning the intentions of the government.

Senator Flynn: You should not be surprised; you created it.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I can give the Honourable Leader of the Government chapter and verse on how long it takes to get an answer because on December 9, 1980 my colleague Senator Murray, asked a question concerning the Western Development Fund, and he still has not received an answer.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: I am still waiting for an answer to a question I asked of Senator de Cotret!

Senator Flynn: You should have been told that there has been a change in government.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): We learned at the master's knee.

Senator Roblin: I suppose the honourable senator who interjected does know that the Honourable Robert de Cotret is no longer a member of this chamber and, indeed, that there has been a change in government.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

WESTERN DEVELOPMENT FUND—ALLOCATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question regarding the Western Development Fund to the Minister of State for Economic Development, since he is probably best qualified to answer.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): That does not prove much.

Senator Roblin: In the budget of last October, an amount of $350 million was earmarked for the fiscal period 1981-82 in connection with the Western Development Fund. My question is: Has any of this sum been allocated or set aside for the purposes of this fund by the Treasury Board or anyone else?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, no, no specific commitments have been made from the Western Development Fund. Indeed, part of the statement made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech of October 28 last year was to the effect that that matter and a number of other matters were dependent upon reaching an agreement with the producing provinces. My honourable friend knows very well that, as yet, that has not been achieved.

My honourable friend and his colleagues in the other place, particularly the member for St. John's West, the then Minister of Finance, know, agree or admit—however you want to describe it—that it is extremely difficult to do budgeting on a national scale without an agreement on energy, quite apart from whether there is a Western Development Fund.

It is certainly my view, and I believe it has been stated previously, that before any specific commitments will be made from the Western Development Fund we will await an agreement so that we can budget and predict with some precision as to what revenues and expenditures will be.

Senator Roblin: I thought the minister might answer in that vein. I should like him, then, to clarify the statement made by the Honourable Lloyd Axworthy in the other place the other day, when he said:

> —that the blueprint and the strategy by which the federal government can provide major support for economic development in the west, are already in place.

I interpret that to mean, and I may be wrong, that he is talking about not just a plan but specific projects that he might have in mind. Is that the case?

Senator Olson: I am sure my friend, Senator Roblin, will understand fully that when this government makes important moves such as this, they are based on a great deal of detailed study, planning and projection.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Answer the question.

Senator Olson: He can, therefore, assume that Mr. Axworthy is correct, and that a great deal of planning has been done. When the other pieces fall into place, such as those I mentioned a few moments ago, we will not only have a well developed plan which will outline what it was suggested that the Western Development Fund ought to do, but we will also be in a position to move expeditiously in implementing it.

Senator Roblin: I admire the skill of the planners because, if they do not know how much money they have to spend, I find it hard to understand how they can plan anything that is meaningful or effective.

Have any projects related to the Western Development Fund been submitted to the Economic Development Committee of cabinet; and have they been approved?

Senator Olson: My honourable friend is now asking what is on the agenda of a cabinet meeting, and he knows better than to ask that kind of question.

A great deal of consideration has been given to the priorities, of which there are a number such as transportation, which has been mentioned a number of times, economic and industrial diversification and so on. However, I cannot answer my honourable friend's question as to what specific projects have been on the agenda of a cabinet meeting.

Senator Smith: He did not ask you that.

Senator Olson: My honourable friend knows very well that, when announcements are agreed to and ready to be made, they will be made, but we do not discuss what is on the agenda of a cabinet meeting.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend reminds me of a prairie chicken trailing her wings to lead the fox away from the nest, because that is exactly what he is doing.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): It is better than dragging in a red herring.

Senator Roblin: If there are red herrings to be dragged in, my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, is the best red herring dragger in this chamber. I stand second to no one in making that assertion. He is an expert in red herrings. He can even tell which ocean they come from. To him red herrings are the staff of life. He would not be able to answer a question or get through a speech if he could not deal with red herrings. There was a famous American who talked about the mackerel stinking and shining in the moonlight, and I think there may be some reference to that which escapes my honourable friend opposite.

However, to come back to my point, what I am saying is this: Statements have been made by some that the rapid transit grant of $60 million to Vancouver was part of the Western Development Fund; and statements have been made by some that the Winnipeg core area development program, which is also a large one, is part of the Western Development Fund. From what my honourable friend has said tonight, I presume that is not the case, that they are not funded by this fund, and that they must be funded from some other source. My question is: Where are those two projects funded now?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as a result of a cabinet decision, those two projects are funded within the budget of the economic development envelope. There is no question about that.

They have probably been identified as prime targets for the use of the Western Development Fund, but I stand by what I said a few moments ago, that there have not been specific allocations from the Western Development Fund.

If I have to repeat myself several times, it is only to attempt to enhance the learning process of the honourable senators opposite, but it does not change one iota the validity of what I said a few moments ago—that is, the high level of responsibility felt by this government is such that we do not make commitments out of a fund until we know how much is in it.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has certainly convinced me that there is no such thing as the Western Development Fund at the present time—none at all. There will not be a cent in it until the National Energy Program has been settled, but I expect there will be.

Senator Perrault: You may not be invited to the opening ceremony.

Senator Roblin: There is not a cent in it.

Senator Smith: There is a lot of hot air.

Senator Roblin: Hot air comes free and gratis around here. We are all experts at it, and I am not too bad myself.

I would hope my honourable friend would do us the courtesy of letting us know when the Western Development Fund takes on some real form and substance; how much money is being appropriated for it; and, in due course, whether he is going to spend any of that money in western Canada.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I would be very glad to assume the obligation to convey that information to my honourable friend. I will not be making the announcement of the specific projects from time to time as they unfold because the ministers directly responsible for administering those projects will, in fact, be doing that.

• (2110)

My honourable friend says that the fund does not exist. If he cannot accept the qualifications that were put on it by the Minister of Finance on October 28 when it was announced, or the several statements made by the Prime Minister since, or what I have repeated here tonight, I am afraid that I despair of his capability to understand plain English.

Senator Flynn: That is what you said.

Senator Smith: I understand a big bluff.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ENTITLED "CERTAIN ASPECTS OF THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION"

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, if I may, I would like to put a question to the chairman of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. This evening, the Leader of the Opposition referred to a statement by the Right Honourable Prime Minister concerning certain changes which would be made to the Senate in keeping with his plan or ideas for changing federal institutions. Since a Senate committee was set up one year or one-and-a-half years ago and sat for many days or rather many months, even during the summer, under the chairmanship of Senator Goldenberg and his associate, Senator Lamontagne, has a report been tabled in the Senate following the work of this committee which has not been completely discussed?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Not at all.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): It was tabled in the Senate, but not discussed.

Senator Asselin: You are right, it was tabled in the Senate, but not discussed.

Could the chairman of the committee tell me, or if not, could he ask Senator Lamontagne, whether the Prime Minister has seen this report and discussed it with him? If so, what was his reaction? Of course, if Senator Goldenberg has not done so, I am asking this question indirectly of Senator Lamontagne, who is partly responsible for the report.

Hon. H. Carl Goldenberg: I did not discuss it with the Prime Minister. We tabled the report of the Senate committee, Senator Flynn adjourned the debate, in November as I recall, and he has done nothing about it since.

Honourable Senator Asselin has referred to the comments made by the Prime Minister—and Senator Flynn had already spoken about them—about a possible reform of the Senate. I noted in one of the newspapers this morning that the Right Honourable Joe Clark, Leader of the Opposition, also spoke about a reform of the Senate yesterday and suggested that he would agree to having the approval of the provincial premiers for Senate appointments or an elected Senate. Both leaders have therefore spoken about this.

Senator Asselin: But that does not mean anything.

Senator Goldenberg: No. In answer to your question I can tell you that I did not discuss it with the Prime Minister and I do not see why you should think that I was supposed to discuss it with him. We were supposed to debate the committee report here in the Senate and I am waiting for Senator Flynn's speech.

Senator Asselin: Well, since you did not, may I ask the deputy chairman of the committee, considering that he has been special advisor to the Prime Minister on constitutional matters, whether he has had an opportunity to talk this over with the Prime Minister? I am asking this question because I need to have answers more specific and clearer than those given to me by the Leader of the Government.

Senator Lamontagne: Senator Asselin, I believe there is a dual error in your question because I never was the deputy chairman of the committee. Neither have I ever been, like Senator Tremblay, the advisor—

Senator Asselin: I said "instigator".

Senator Lamontagne: —advisor to the Prime Minister on constitutional matters.

Senator Asselin: How humble you are tonight!

Senator Lamontagne: However, I tabled a report in the Senate, with the co-operation of Senator Goldenberg, as the Senate had asked us to do. I explained the contents of that report in a speech before the Senate in late November. Senator Flynn adjourned the debate and has not seen fit, since then, to resume the debate and contribute, as quickly as possible, to a reform of the Senate.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): On a question of privilege: I adjourned the debate but I have never stopped anyone from speaking.

Senator Lamontagne: But you yourself never spoke on the issue!

[Senator Asselin.]

Senator Flynn: Because I had nothing to say in the light of the position taken by the Prime Minister, at least at the start, in his proposed constitutional reform where he wanted to limit the power of the Senate to 60 days so that he could eventually abolish it, that is all. Since then, he has had a change of heart and once again, he has new ideas. So, I am waiting; if anyone wants to reopen the debate, he is free to do so. I have never prevented anyone from doing so.

ENERGY

CANADIAN OIL SUBSTITUTION PROGRAM

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised on May 26 by Senator Donahoe which concerned the Canada Oil Substitution Program.

I would like to inform the honourable senator that I have consulted with my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who has advised me that this program is not indexed to 1980 costs. I can say, however, that the Canada Oil Substitution Program will be reviewed from time to time and that indexing could be considered at a later date.

SASKATCHEWAN—OIL WELL SERVICING ASSISTANCE GRANT PROGRAM

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of State for Economic Development): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised on May 19 by Senator Balfour which concerned Saskatchewan's Oil Well Servicing Assistance Grant Program.

My colleague, the Minister of Finance, has informed his counterpart in Saskatchewan that the federal government cannot exempt this grant from federal corporate taxes. There has been a long-standing principle in federal tax policy that, where amounts are received in the form of grants or other government assistance that are in respect of expenses or capital expenditures, taxpayers be allowed to deduct, or write off, only the amounts of their net costs.

The federal government believes that the appropriate way to alleviate the difficulty that some oil well operators are facing for marginal wells is a speedy settlement of the energy issues between the provinces and the federal government. I remain optimistic that this settlement will soon be arranged.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

FEDERAL AID FOR CONSTRUCTION OF TRADE AND CONVENTION CENTRES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a rather long reply to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on April 9, 1981, concerning the Winnipeg Convention Centre, which I ask be incorporated in the record of today's proceedings.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Over the past several months there have been a number of questions raised in the Senate concerning a federal contribution to the City of Winnipeg to assist the city in carrying the financing charges for the existing trade and convention centre.

The City of Winnipeg has approached the federal government with several requests to provide a post facto contribution to the cost of construction of the centre which was completed in 1976 as a joint city/province undertaking. The city's requests have covered two areas: first, a request for a contribution equivalent to 25 per cent of the original cost ($23.7 million); second, a cancellation of the remaining installments of a 20-year debenture sold to the federal government in the amount of $1,854,-943.92, carrying an annual interest rate of 6.9 per cent.

With regard to the former request, as the convention centre was not built within the time frame of the program, and as the program was established to assist in the construction of new convention facilities, a positive response to this request would not be feasible under the Industry, Trade and Commerce program of assistance to the capital costs of construction of convention centres. With regard to the latter request, the Department of Finance has indicated that it is not willing to forgive the remaining installments on the debenture.

Mayor Norrie of Winnipeg has been advised that, in the event the City of Winnipeg wishes to expand the convention facility, a request for assistance in the cost of expansion would be reviewed by Cabinet with the following points in mind: first, current commitments from the fund for new construction in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal; and second, consideration to actual and anticipated proposals from cities planning new facilities. Mayor Norrie has also been advised that any federal assistance toward expanding the existing centre would require an equivalent in provincial assistance.

On March 26 Mayor Norrie wrote to the Minister expressing his surprise at the government decision to grant financial assistance to Halifax, Windsor, Hamilton and Charlottetown. He made a particular point that the $300,662 granted to Windsor was toward the renovation of the existing Cleary Auditorium. In his response of April 14, Mr. Lapointe noted that these contributions were made possible by an unforeseen limited cash flow in fiscal year 1980-81 and the capacity of the four centres to meet all conditions. In the case of Windsor the contribution was not for the renovation of the existing Cleary Auditorium, but rather for the addition of exhibit and meeting space in a building being constructed adjacent to the Cleary Auditorium. Finally, the Minister mentioned that a proposal from the City of Winnipeg for assistance in expanding the existing convention centre could be reviewed by Cabinet in the context of commitments already made for funds for new construction as well as those proposals from cities planning new facilities.

TRANSPORT

AIR CANADA AND CP AIR—OTTAWA-TORONTO AND MONTREAL-TORONTO FARES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Benidickson on April 14. The question was: Why do return flights between Ottawa and Toronto now cost Air Canada and CP Air passengers $20 more than the return flight on the same airlines between Montreal and Toronto?

As a general rule, both Air Canada and CP Air use a national pricing formula when applying to the Canadian Transport Commission for approval of their domestic air fares. With few exceptions, this approach results in Canadians across the country paying the same amount for comparable services.

As a competitive response to an innovative excursion fare offered by Nordair in the Montreal-Toronto market, Air Canada and CP Air recently introduced a matching $124 return excursion fare, which requires passengers to make the return trip within a week and no later than the first Friday. Although Air Canada and CP Air do not offer this particular fare in the Ottawa-Toronto market, both carriers offer a wide range of other fares in this market which may be less or more expensive, depending on the associated travel conditions. However, when comparing like fares with like—and this is the only appropriate basis for comparison—there is no anomaly in the Montreal-Ottawa-Toronto fare structure. For example, the current, as of June 2, 1981, lowest Ottawa-Toronto return excursion fare is $80. This is $11 less than the comparable fare in the Montreal-Toronto market.

OTTAWA-NEW YORK ROUTE—DESIGNATION OF AIR CARRIER

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Benidickson on April 14, 1981, concerning the Ottawa-New York air route.

The Air Transport Agreement between Canada and the United States gives a U.S. carrier the right to operate between Ottawa and New York. The Minister of Transport has urged the U.S. authorities to determine as quickly as possible whether there are any U.S. carriers interested in exercising this right. The Canadian government has proposed that if a suitable U.S. carrier is not found after a reasonable period of time, then a new Canadian route between Ottawa and New York be established and operated by a Canadian carrier. This proposal is under active consideration by U.S. officials.

On the same date Senator Benidickson asked a question concerning the general advantages and disadvantages of regulation versus deregulation in both Canada and the United States. The answer is rather long, and I ask that it be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Although it is too early for a definitive assessment, preliminary indications are that deregulation in the U.S. is having both positive and negative results. Proponents of airline deregulation claim that it has decreased fares, increased traffic, generally improved efficiency and service, minimized the effect of rising costs, and is a source of industry profitability. Its opponents point to a decline in service to small communities by large airlines and warn that deregulation has led to overcapacity on major routes, industry instability and mergers, citing the sharp reduction in industry profits in 1979 and 1980 in support of these concerns.

In recent years we have witnessed greater competition in Canada, through relaxed market entry controls and pricing flexibility, particularly in the larger markets. Any future moves towards deregulation in Canada will be influenced by the effects of increased competition on Canadian airlines and by the U.S. experience with deregulation, both of which are being closely monitored. Interestingly, a recent Transport Canada review indicates that the level of direct competition between carriers in comparable Canadian and U.S. markets is generally similar. Also, air fares in 1979 and 1980 were typically lower in Canada than domestic U.S. fares, whether currency differences were taken into account or not.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

LEBANON—CURRENT SITUATION—STATEMENT BY GOVERNMENT LEADER RE GOVERNMENT REFUGEE POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Bosa on May 26, concerning the situation in Lebanon.

Canada deplores the violence in Lebanon and has called on all parties to the conflict to refrain from further hostilities. Canadian concern has been brought to the attention of the Lebanese, Syrian and Israeli governments. Canada would support any reasonable proposals to resolve the crisis. We earnestly hope that the Habib mission will reach a successful conclusion and that more bloodshed will be avoided and stability restored. We are monitoring the situation carefully through daily reports from our embassy in Beirut.

Our embassy continues to function as normally as possible under the circumstances. Dependents and non-essential personnel, who were given the option to leave Beirut some days ago, have now done so; 14 Canadians remain on duty in Beirut. The Secretary of State for External Affairs issued a press release on this subject on April 9, and on April 29 he announced a contribution of $100,000 by CIDA to the International Committee of the Red Cross for humanitarian relief.

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS—ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on May 26, concerning the current status of the negotiations on St. Pierre and Miquelon.

Negotiations with France have been pursued, on and off, since 1972. The most recent round of discussions took place in Paris on May 6-7, and are expected to resume in Ottawa in the fall. In Paris, the Canadian delegation made it clear to the French side that we are not prepared to accept unrealistic, exaggerated claims of anything even approaching a 200-mile economic zone around these small islands located right off the coast of Newfoundland. While prepared to contemplate a very limited economic zone around the islands in the context of a negotiated settlement, the French must accept that the classic "enclave situation" of their North American possession does not entitle them, either under international law or international practice, to any extensive zone of maritime jurisdiction.

Then a second question was asked: If the negotiated settlement route is not successful, what are the prospects for going to the International Court of Justice or some international arbitral forum? The reply is that at this stage, we are concentrating our efforts towards a negotiated settlement and, pending the results of the next round, it is too early to look at other options.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

CEREALS—DECLINE IN EXPORTS

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Nurgitz on April 1, concerning a report issued by Statistics Canada in the month of February that exports of cereals were down $120 million from January, which I ask be taken as read.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(The answer follows:)

Exports of cereals other than oilseeds (wheat, including Durum, barley, oats, rye and corn) were 11,835,500 tonnes in the August 1980 through February 1981 period compared with 10,240,600 tonnes a year earlier, according to the Canadian Grain Commission. Exports of cereal grains in February totalled 1,063,400 tonnes almost the same as the 1,078,300 tonnes exported in January. The Commission does not compile statistics on the value of exports but we would expect that value of February shipments to be at least equal to, if not higher than, January values as most sales would have been made in a rising market situation.

We have confidence in the Commission figures as they monitor and record actual loadings as they take place. They also jibe closely with Canadian Wheat Board data obtained from Bills of Lading.

There is a large discrepancy between the Statistics Canada cereal export figure for January of 1,716,000 tonnes and the Commission figure of 1,078,300 tonnes. The Statistics Canada figure is taken from B13 forms submitted to Customs by the exporters, which show product, volume, and value. The forms are mailed to Statistics Canada for processing and the information is recorded in the month it is received rather than on the date the form was filed with Customs. There are deviations from actual export loadings for this reason. The comparative figures on cereal exports compiled by the two agencies since the beginning of the crop year are as follows:

	Statistics Canada	Canadian Grain Commission
August	2,168.5	1,925.8
September	1,510.2	2,041.4
October	2,316.5	2,261.8
November	1,576.5	1,923.7
December	1,534.4	1,541.1
January	1,716.0	1,078.3
February	1,025.9	1,063.4
TOTAL	11,848.0	11,835.5

The totals are about the same, which would support the suggestion that time lags in the reporting of the Statistics Canada figures account for the month to month discrepancies.

GRAIN

NEGOTIATIONS RE CROWSNEST RATES

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, Senator Balfour on March 26 and Senator Nurgitz on March 31 raised the question concerning a newspaper report stating that the railways had submitted a new proposal to the government with relation to the Crow rate.

The report referred to by Senator Balfour and Senator Nurgitz is a reiteration of an earlier report by the railways on their financial and capacity requirements, specifically in western Canada, over the next decade. The railways have given this report wide public circulation. This reiteration is an update of an earlier report and is an input in the government's ongoing deliberations on western railway capacity. The issue of the railway's financial and capacity requirements is a matter of current consideration by my colleague, the Minister of Transport.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

The Senate resumed from Thursday, October 23, 1980, the debate on the motion of Senator Austin for second reading of Bill S-11, to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I regret having to proceed in the absence of the sponsor of the bill, Senator Austin, who, I understand, is out of the country on public business. I had given him an undertaking that I would let him know when I was going to deal with his bill, and when I tried to do that today I discovered that he had already left Canada.

However, I feel I can proceed in good conscience, first of all, because he has been urging me privately for some time to reopen the debate which I adjourned some time ago. Secondly, there is nothing in what I have to say to which he or anybody else, in my opinion, can take serious exception. Thirdly, I think it is appropriate for us to move this bill forward, because we may be nearing an adjournment of Parliament for the summer—at least, that is what one hears in the corridors. Finally, I note from newspaper speculation in the last day or two that Senator Austin is one of two senators from British Columbia—the other being Senator van Roggen—who are being considered for elevation to the cabinet as British Columbia's representative to replace Senator Perrault. I was not aware that Senator Perrault had any plans to go anywhere.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): There are no such plans. Why don't you stop right there and go on with your speech.

Senator Murray: I also note from the same newspaper article that Senator Frith, who has just intervened, is being groomed to take over the leadership of the government in this place. All of this is right for the mill, and I think it is important to move this bill ahead before Senator Austin joins the cabinet and changes his mind, as Liberals frequently do.

Senator Frith: This is all according to "Prime Minister Douglas Fisher."

Senator Murray: The evil that this bill proposes to eradicate is, I believe, fairly well understood by honourable senators. The sponsor described the terrible sense of inefficacy and alienation that was felt by western Canadians on election night when they turned on their television sets and radios as the polls closed in western Canada only to find that a government had been elected and the issue had been decided even before their own votes had been counted.

There is another problem to which Senator Austin alluded, and which, I believe, is at least equally serious. It happens that broadcasting stations in the United States who, of course, are beyond the reach of the Canada Elections Act, are able to broadcast election results from eastern Canada into western Canada hours before the polls close in that part of the country.

In the last few years, I think recent Parliaments have made very good progress on some aspects of political reform and of electoral reform. The spending limitations that have been imposed on national parties and on candidates have been good, in my opinion, and in no way impair our ability to conduct campaigns. We restrict advertising now to the final 28 days of the campaign, which can only be regarded as a godsend insofar as the long-suffering viewers and listeners in the country are concerned.

The provision of public funds to national parties and to local candidates, and the institution of a tax credit in respect of donations to political parties, have given our political parties the opportunity, if they want to take advantage of it, to make the system as a whole more democratic, and to make themselves much more effective at the constituency level if they wish that.

• (2130)

Our election law seeks to invest that final act of voting, when the citizen is alone in the privacy of the polling booth with his or her conscience, with as much dignity and, indeed, solemnity as possible, and to keep it as free of extraneous influence or pressures as possible. We black out television and radio advertising 48 hours before election day. We go so far as to forbid the use of campaign signs and party insignia near the polling stations. One of these days we may even get around to trying to deal with the activities of professional pollsters during the writ period.

So the problem that I raise, and which Senator Austin has alluded to in his speech—that of the United States broadcasting stations broadcasting election results from eastern Canada into western Canada hours before the polls close there—is, in my opinion, a real problem, and I think it is appropriate for us to take some legislative action on it. I say that without necessarily committing myself to every detail of the bill before us.

Bill S-11 provides that the polls will remain open for 11 hours on election day, as is now the case, but that the times would be different in the different time zones across the country. The result is that the polls would close in British Columbia and the Yukon one and a half hours after the polls close in Newfoundland, instead of four and a half hours, as is the case now.

Senator Austin adds a new wrinkle in his bill. He would provide that the counting of the ballots would begin no less than one hour after the closing of the polls. The effect of that, which is very relevant to the problem of the American broadcasting stations beaming results to western Canada before the polls close, is that the count would not begin anywhere until the polls had closed everywhere.

Obviously, honourable senators, no one wants to create a new evil in eliminating an old one, and if I support this bill it is because I do want to see discussion go forward on all the possible hardships and inconveniences that might be created. In particular, I think a committee of this place or the other place should hear from those most directly affected and concerned, such as the voters, the representatives of the various political parties, and the Chief Electoral Officer and his staff.

For example, no change is proposed by Senator Austin in the hours of voting in Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan—that is to say, in the eastern and central time zones, where the polls would be open from 9 a.m. to 8 p.m., as they are now. In the mountain region, the polls, under Bill S-11, would be open from 8 a.m. to 7 p.m.

It seems that the greatest possibility of hardship would exist at the extremities of the country—that is to say, in the Atlantic provinces and British Columbia. For example, in Newfoundland the polls would open at 10.30 in the morning, when most Newfoundlanders, I believe, have already done half a day's work, and close at 9.30 in the evening. Newfoundlanders would then have to wait for an hour before starting the count. That would take them to 10.30 p.m. What would happen between 9.30 p.m. and 10.30 p.m. I don't know. Perhaps it could be called a happy hour, or perhaps not. One would have to give some thought to that problem. But seriously, that makes a long day for what are called DROs, Deputy Returning Officers, and scrutineers, not to mention the candidates, their supporters and the general public.

In British Columbia the polls would open at 7 o'clock in the morning, according to Senator Austin's bill. That is quite early, particularly in some of the larger ridings in that province, to ask your election personnel and staff to be on the job.

I think we all understand that the ability of the various parties to recruit partisans to do the myriad jobs that have to be done in connection with the campaign, and on election day, is a function of the enthusiasm that our supporters feel in a given election. There is a continuing problem, I think it fair to say, in recruiting people to do the jobs that have to be done under the supervision of the Returning Officer and the Deputy Returning Officer. The pay is not great, and I found in the last couple of elections that in many constituencies the Returning Officers and the Deputy Returning Officers had a difficult time recruiting people to do some of those jobs. I wonder whether the awkward hours that this bill would create in some parts of the country might make it more difficult.

There is an added problem in that the bill deals with time zones. We must observe that there are five provinces in this country in each of which more than one time zone applies. In connection with this bill, the two provinces that would be concerned would be Saskatchewan, which exists in both the central and mountain time zones, and British Columbia, where mountain and Pacific time zones apply. So, under this bill, what we would have in both of those provinces would be different opening and closing times in different parts of the provinces. I raise the question for later consideration as to how much, if any, confusion or of a problem this would create.

Honourable senators will be aware that there are other bills similar in intent although different in detail in the mill in the other place. I have one here, Bill C-626, which was given first reading in the other place on January 26, in the name of Mr. Kilgour; and another, Bill C-237, in the name of Mr. William Clarke, introduced on May 2, 1980. Both of those, of course, are private members' bills. Mr. Clarke's bill would reduce the hours available to vote from 11 to eight, and he would have the polls open simultaneously across the country and close simultaneously. This would mean that in Newfoundland, for example, the polls would open at 12.30 noon and close at 8.30 p.m.; and in British Columbia they would open at 8 o'clock in the morning and close at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

The argument has been made that reducing the voting hours from 11 to eight would necessitate the creation of additional polling districts, or at least polling stations, in order to relieve congestion at the polls, and that in some areas—British Columbia, for example—it would be necessary for Parliament to legislate more time for employees to leave work in order to vote. A committee of this place or the other place could hear those arguments about what I call the Austin bill, Bill S-11, as well as the alternatives.

● (2140)

I note that the government has Bill C-58, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, now before the other place. I am disappointed that the government did not see fit either to incorporate Senator Austin's bill or to address in some other way the problem Senator Austin's bill tries to address, because I repeat, and I insist, that I believe it is a serious problem in terms of national unity, as Senator Austin has pointed out. But, more than that, it is also a serious problem in terms of the dignity, solemnity and, generally, the atmosphere we want surrounding election day in this country. I refer again to the problem of broadcasting results to western Canada long before the polls have closed there.

If the government has some objections to Bill S-11 or to this idea, we should know what those objections are. There is some cause to believe that for various reasons, perhaps for some of the reasons I have noted, the Chief Electoral Officer is cool to the idea, but, I repeat, if the government has objections, then let government spokesmen say what those objections are. If the government has a better idea, then let those spokesmen come forward with that better idea. Indeed, if any honourable senator has a better idea, let him or her give it to us in the course of this debate.

My point is that the problem the bill addresses is serious and it is appropriate for us to take legislative action on it. As I have said, without committing myself to every detail of this bill, I hope that the government and all honourable senators will approach the bill in that spirit.

Hon. W. M. Benidickson: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Honourable Senator Murray. When Senator Austin introduced this bill and spoke to it on second reading, did he indicate which committee of the Senate might have this bill referred to it? Has Senator Murray himself some idea of which committee of the Senate should study the bill after it has had full debate at the second reading stage in this chamber?

Senator Murray: To the best of my recollection, Senator Austin has not suggested that the bill be sent to a committee. Nor do I have a committee in mind. I am aware that at least one other honourable senator, and perhaps two, might wish to enter this debate. Perhaps at a later stage, and after some consultation between leaders, we could agree on whether to send this bill to committee and, if so, to what committee. I did not make the suggestion myself because I somehow wondered whether it would be preferable to let a matter which, after all, has to do with elections be discussed in a committee of the other place. However, I leave that for further consideration.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I propose to adjourn the debate unless someone else wishes to.

Hon. John M. Macdonald: I should like to adjourn the debate.

Senator Frith: Very well. I will not adjourn the debate, but I should like to ask Senator Murray a question. If I understand the essence of his intervention on this bill, it is that he agrees that the problem addressed by the bill is serious and should be dealt with by electoral reform, and I agree with him.

He also invited any other senators who intervene in the debate to come up with a better idea, if they have one. Senator Murray is certainly one of our resident experts in the Senate on electoral reform. I do not say that with any sarcasm at all, but quite sincerely. Does Senator Murray himself have a "better" idea, as he has suggested others might have, or is he studying the matter, or is the matter something he wishes to discuss in committee? Other than the points he has made, can he give us any other direction he thinks we should be taking, other than the direction taken by Bill S-11? Does he feel that it is a matter of tinkering with these hours, or does he accept the concept of the hours, and does he have an idea as to how they might be improved?

Senator Murray: I do not see how we can deal with the problem without some kind of what has been called "universal election day clock." I would vote for this bill right away, if I could be convinced that the hardship and the inconvenience that will be caused, particularly in the Atlantic provinces and in British Columbia, will not be too great. In that respect I am encouraged by the fact that the bill was sponsored by a senator from British Columbia. However, I would want to hear from voters, representatives of political parties and the Chief Electoral Officer on that subject.

On motion of Senator Macdonald, debate adjourned.

EXCISE TAX

PRELIMINARY REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-57—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Tuesday, May 26, 1981, the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Senator Barrow calling the attention of the Senate to the Preliminary Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-57, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to provide for a revenue tax in respect of petroleum and gas", tabled in the Senate on May 19, 1981.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I propose that this inquiry be treated as having been debated. I do so for the following reasons: There have been only two interventions in the debate on this report. The deputy chairman of the committee, Senator Barrow, introduced the report and spoke to it. Senator Roblin then spoke to it. I have since spoken to Senator Roblin, who feels that for the moment he has said everything he wishes to say respecting the report, and he agrees that the matter should now be considered as having been debated. That is the first reason.

The second reason is that I understand there is a good chance we will receive the bill itself next week, because there has been a time allocation notice given in the other place for Bill C-57. If that proceeds in the normal course, we will probably have the bill next week, or the week after, when I expect we will have a number of bites at it.

For those reasons I suggest that this particular item on the Order Paper be considered as having been debated.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tem: As no other honourable senator rises to speak, or wishes to adjourn the debate, I declare the inquiry debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Re: Project Financing Plan—Alaskan Pipeline and Gas Conditioning Plant

Gentlemen:

Over the past several months, we have worked constructively with you to develop a mutually agreeable formulation of the concepts underlying a financing plan for the Alaska segment of the ANGTS, and the conditioning plant necessary for transport of Prudhoe Bay natural gas to the lower 48 states. In January, 1981, Exxon presented to the transmission company sponsors of the Alaska segment, on behalf of Exxon, Arco, and Sohio, a conceptual approach to financing which the producing companies could support in a joint approach to the financial community.

After extensive negotiations with you, and giving effect to our mutually held view that time is of the essence in taking a financial plan to prospective lenders and receiving their reactions, the Alaskan Northwest partners are now prepared to utilize your suggested approach as the basis for the discussion of a financing plan for the pipeline and plant with the financial community.

To insure a complete understanding concerning this approach, let me summarize the concepts which would be presented to the financial community at the earliest practicable date:

1. For purposes of financing, the "as spent" cost of the Alaskan pipeline will be $21 billion, and of the plant will be $6 billion. In addition, a pre-committed completion assurance pool of $3 billion will be formed.

2. The debt/equity ratio for all capital investment will be 75:25.

3. The investment limits of all participating companies will be defined from the outset. As a group, the transmission companies will provide equity in an amount not to exceed $5.25 billion. As a group, the producer companies will provide equity in an amount not to exceed $2.25 billion, and be further responsible for arranging for an amount of debt not to exceed $6.75 billion.

4. The Alaskan Northwest partners will own 70% of the pipeline and the plant, and the producing companies will own 30% of the pipeline and the plant. Equity commitments to the completion assurance pool will be made on the same 70:30 ratio.

5. Debt funds (pipeline and plant) will be sought on a project credit basis. The transmission group will be responsible for arranging for $15.75 billion in project debt. The producer group has accepted responsibility for arranging for $6.75 billion in additional project debt. The debt which the producers are responsible for arranging will be accorded terms and conditions equivalent to those accorded other project debt.

6. Each company's participation will be subject to satisfaction of conditions precedent, namely —The conditioning plant will be included as part of the Alaska segment of the ANGTS.

—Each company's investment will be limited to a sum certain defined in the financing plan.

—All debt and equity participants will issue firm commitments, acceptable to all other participants, prior to construction of the pipeline or plant.

—All necessary governmental approvals and authorizations will be issued and accepted by the participants.

—All parties are assured that the project is economically viable.

—All parties are assured that the Canadian segment will be financed and completed without U.S. company involvement.

—Each financing layer will be afforded equal terms and conditions.

The Alaskan Northwest partners believe that this outline fairly summarizes the financing plan concepts, as discussed in our several meetings, and the partners hereby indicate their willingness to present the same to prospective lenders, jointly with producer representatives, as a conceptual basis for a financing decision. The partners reserve for further consideration how the conditioning plant should be included in the project, whether by integration into the ANGTS or as a certificated transportation facility necessary to the ANGTS.

We will proceed forthwith on the basis of this letter in presentations to financial advisors and institutions, and look forward to our first presentation on May 21 in New York.

Very truly yours,

John G. McMillian

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which were referred the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 2511.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DESCHATELETS

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, before we proceed to Question Period I would like to say that certain of our colleagues have asked me to ask you, knowing your unfailing courtesy, to listen to a statement which our former Speaker and greatly respected colleague for 15 years, the Honourable Jean-Paul Deschatelets, wishes to make. It is a statement with which I personally am in complete agreement in every respect. I welcome it most heartily, and ask you to extend this privilege to our colleague.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I am grateful to you for your courtesy which permits me to read the following statement in both English and French.

A number of senators have reached the conclusion that to serve Canada in the fullest sense, and to maintain the balance between representation by population and representation by region, they must take part in any proceedings or votes in the Senate independently and free of partisan dictates.

Those senators believe that principle to have been a fundamental tenet in the creation of a second chamber.

At Confederation, Sir John A. Macdonald said:

> It would be of no value whatever were it the mere Chamber for registering the decrees of the Lower House. It must be an independent House, having a free action of its own, for it is only valuable as being a regulating body, calmly considering the legislation initiated by the popular branch and preventing any hasty or ill considered legislation which may come from that body.

On page 95 of F. A. Kunz's The Modern Senate of Canada, speaking of the Right Honourable Arthur Meighen, we find this:

• (1410)

> Following in Dandurand's footsteps he developed the practice of utilizing caucuses in the Senate as little as possible. When he summed up his ideas about the Senate in an article in the Queen's Quarterly in 1937, it sounded exactly like Dandurand:
> > The Senate is worthless if it becomes merely another Commons divided upon party lines and indulging in party debates . . . Members of the Second Chamber must get away, lift their minds far from those hard-drawn lines of party, or they cannot serve their country.

This concern, honourable senators, has been growing over the last 10 years, and although the constitutional resolution now before Parliament and the courts is not the only reason for this declaration, it has brought that concern into focus.

These senators are not changing party affiliation, nor are they forming or joining a new party, but they desire their role to be in accord with the concept of the Fathers of Confederation.

They desire to be associated only in their individual freedom and individual independence with respect to the discharge of their responsibilities as members of the Senate of Canada.

They would welcome any other honourable senators of whatever party affiliation, or of no party affiliation, who would wish at any time to join in subscribing to this declaration.

I have therefore been authorized by Honourable Senators Cameron, Inman, Molson, Beaubien, Cook, Lang, Deschatelets, Thompson, Bell, Manning, Lafond, Lawson, and Bonnell, who subscribe to this declaration of independence, to request you, Mr. Speaker, to permit them to be seated together in the Senate Chamber.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I want to sum up the essential points of the statement I have just read in English, on behalf of my colleagues.

We believe that over the years we have lost sight of the original role that the Fathers of Confederation expected the Upper House to play, and we believe that the time has come, for us, to serve this institution in a context where our freedom of action will be full and not subject to the discipline of a political party.

Honourable senators, may I say here, as I ask this question: Why do you think that a bill such as Bill C-60, which had to do with the reform of the Senate and gave half of the representation of the Senate to the provinces, was submitted to us? Why do you think that, in the beige paper of the Quebec Liberal leader, the Honourable Mr. Ryan, they raised the possibility of giving the entire representation of the Senate to the provinces under the name of Federal Council? And, in the same breath, I add: What was the idea of the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Mr. Trudeau—and this has nothing to do with the quality of our work—when he said very recently in Fredericton that over the years the Senate had lost its vocation? Those are questions I leave with you for you to reflect upon.

These honourable senators who accept this philosophy, as I said a moment ago, are not changing party affiliation, nor are they forming or joining a new party; they are simply proclaiming that they desire to be associated only in their individual freedom and independence with respect to the discharge of their responsibilities as members of this House.

Needless to say, if other honourable senators would wish to join in subscribing to this declaration, we would welcome them at any time.

THE SENATE

PROPOSED MEETING TO CONSIDER SENATOR DESCHATELETS' REQUEST

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in view of the statement just made by Senator Deschatelets, I could perhaps ask the Leader of the Government if he would agree to discuss with His Honour the Speaker of the Senate how we could best meet the wishes of Senator Deschatelets and his group.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government side is always willing to discuss matters at any time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

STRIKE BY FRANCOPHONE JOURNALISTS

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I see that the Leader of the Government is much less talkative than usual, because, normally, such a question would have gotten us a speech of half an hour, which would have added nothing to the answer that we got, but which would still have taken up half an hour of the time of the Senate.

My other question concerns another matter, and I can see that the Leader of the Government will be relieved that I do not continue on the same subject.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne: Ah, ah!

Senator Flynn: Has Senator Lamontagne anything to say? He is reflecting on whether he should join this group, but as I said earlier, he will reflect for a very long time.

Senator Lamontagne: Not as long as you.

Senator Flynn: But your reflections never lead anywhere.

My question follows one which I asked the Leader of the Government approximately two weeks ago about the strike of the CBC francophone journalists. I suggested to him that he might agree to a motion which would ask the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications to look at the problem and perhaps to question the parties involved about it, to see what the trouble is and what could be done to settle a conflict which has lasted far too long.

[English]

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, the proposal by the Leader of the Opposition will be given renewed consideration by the government.

Senator Flynn: Renewed? When did you stop?

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

TEMPORARY RELOCATION OF SENATORS IN EAST BLOCK

[Translation]

Hon. Martial Asselin: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the government leader. I was wondering whether I should ask it during Question Period or by way of a question of privilege. In any event, I would like to submit my case to him and, indirectly, to the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, Senator Graham.

Senator Graham and his committee have asked the senators whose offices are in the East Block to move out in preparation for the economic summit—

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: For two days only.

Senator Asselin: For two days only—this, I do not know, but in any event, the senators involved met, discussed the matter and agreed to go along with the request of the chairman and members of the committee to the effect that we would move out of the East Block on June 12 so that they could organize the summit.

We had asked them whether everybody was going to have to move out, including the members of Parliament who occupy the first floor as well as the ministers. We were told that they would.

So I would like the minister to explain how come we have recently learned that senators would have to move out, but that M.P.'s could stay in the building despite the very heavy security measures that will be taken to follow the comings and goings of the heads of state? If this information is correct, why are members of the Senate treated any different from members of the other place?

● (1420)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the fact that Senator Asselin provided at least some degree of prior notice of his question. I have been apprised of this situation only very recently by the honourable senator. If there is a difference in the manner in which members of Parliament from the Commons are treated as compared to members of Parliament from the Senate, that will be investigated immediately.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, when we dealt with this matter at a meeting of the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, a question was asked of the honourable senator at that time as to whether everybody would have to vacate the building for that particular meeting. We were told that the matter would be looked into. At the next meeting of the committee we were told that everybody would have to vacate the building and, therefore, that we senators would receive equal treatment.

I have to agree with Senator Asselin: now it is an entirely different story. Only the second floor is being vacated, which results in a disadvantage to us. I hope that in the future, when we are told that a certain thing will take place, we will not be misled, as we have been in this instance.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, as I stated in reply to Senator Asselin, an inquiry will go forward immediately to determine whether there has been any inequality in the treatment of members of the two chambers.

[Senator Asselin.]

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, on December 11 last I moved a motion, which is now item No. 8 on our order paper, which would have had the effect of referring energy matters—the national energy policy—to a committee of this house. In taking the adjournment, the Deputy Leader of the Government indicated that the government was not opposed to doing this.

Some considerable time has now elapsed. I should like to know whether the government seriously intends to allow energy matters to be discussed by a committee of this house, and whether such a committee will have the opportunity to question representatives of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Department of Finance, representatives of the industry, of the provincial governments and so on, as was contemplated in the motion and in the speech which I made and he heard at that time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is the intention of the government to allow the appropriate committees of the Senate to discuss the National Energy Program. When the honourable senator made his inquiry, we were not facing the likelihood of receiving the two major packages of legislation that reflect the National Energy Program as immediately as we now are. I had hoped that we would have received Bill C-57 and Bill C-48 before this time. However, it now appears likely that next week we will receive Bill C-57, which will be referred to the appropriate committee, and that we may receive Bill C-48 before the summer adjournment.

That is the reason I have been standing this order; not because I disagreed with the principle that the honourable senator advanced when he introduced the inquiry—in fact, I agreed with it, as he has pointed out—but because I think it is better for us to deal with the actual legislation rather than simply the principles of the program. In the event that we do not receive the actual legislation, I think we should go ahead with the inquiry.

Senator Murray: Does the government undertake, then, that when that legislation is referred to the appropriate committee, that committee will have sufficient latitude in calling witnesses from the industry and from the various departments of both the federal and provincial governments, and sufficient latitude to question them not only on the details of the tax bills—which is what they really are—but also on the national energy policy as a whole?

● (1425)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the government has no intention to try to restrict the activities of the committee in any abnormal way. So far as the government is concerned, the committee will have the right to make the decisions it always makes with respect to the witnesses it wants to call and the scope it wishes to give to its study of the bill.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Will it do so in the normal way?

Hon. G. I. Smith: Honourable senators, as chairman of the committee I am of the impression that the committee decides what witnesses it will call and that the government does not make that decision.

Senator Frith: No, the committee makes its own decision in that respect.

Senator Smith: If that is what the honourable senator said, that is fine. I just want to make sure that is on the record. As I understood you, I thought you said the government makes the decision.

Senator Frith: I thank the Honourable Senator Smith for giving me the opportunity to clear up any misunderstanding. The question was asked as to whether the government intends to give the committee full scope in the calling of witnesses and in its inquiry. My answer was that the government has no intention of trying to restrict the committee in making those decisions. If there was any misunderstanding, that is what I meant to say.

Senator Flynn: The question that remains is whether the government, if it does not instruct the committee, will instruct committee members.

Senator Frith: That would be abnormal.

Senator Flynn: There may be a change following the decision made today by some 12 members on the other side.

Senator McElman: You counted wrong.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CANADIAN INVOLVEMENT IN PROPOSED CARIBBEAN ECONOMIC AID PROGRAM

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in reference to the meeting which took place between the President of Mexico and the President of the United States two days ago. Out of that meeting there emerged the suggestion that in reference to the extensive plan for the economic aid program for the Caribbean there would be some Canadian involvement, or that, indeed, that would be a desirable goal. Has the Government of Canada heard anything about that suggestion? If so, what is its response to it?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received no advice from my cabinet colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, with respect to that matter. As soon as a message is received here it will certainly be reported to the Senate.

GRAIN

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—ANTICIPATED ANNOUNCEMENT OF INITIAL PRICES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board on a matter domestic to western Canada and inquire whether he expects to make an announcement respecting the initial prices that will be offered for wheat and other grains.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am not certain that I can put a date on it at this time. The necessary action by the Governor in Council has not been taken, but the honourable senator can rest assured that it will be done in advance of the new crop year.

Senator Roblin: May I ask the Honourable Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board if he is proposing a change from what has usually been the case with respect to the announcement of prices? If my memory is correct, the announcement of the initial price for wheat is made at the time of seeding, or thereabouts, because some farmers use that as a market indication or a planning indication. Has there been a change of policy in this respect?

Senator Argue: Well, the change this year will speak for itself. Last year, in April, I announced the initial prices that were to prevail on August 1 of that year. Because the market conditions were not entirely clear at that time, so far in advance of the market, I had to announce a low in initial price. I was able to make a further recommendation before the beginning of the crop year that resulted in an increase in the initial price over the first announcement.

This year I decided that, if the announcement were to be made early, it would at that time—and I made that clear—have necessitated quite a large drop in the price as related to the adjusted price, and I felt that those signals which would go from that announcement might be wrongly interpreted, because I felt then, as I feel now, that the outlook for the grain market was very buoyant and that it was wise for me to recommend, as I did, an increase in spring wheat acreage and an increase in barley acreage. Those increases, or increases along those lines, have certainly taken place.

I see no reason at this time to withdraw or to amend anything I said earlier. All I can say to the honourable senator at this time is that the effective initial prices will be announced in advance of the crop year.

• (1430)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if I may make a final point with my honourable friend, I would ask him if he would reconsider his decision, because it is perfectly true that he has recommended that farmers increase their wheat acreage by 10 per cent and their barley acreage by 6 per cent. Of course, the question of price is highly significant. Many of the farmers who communicate with friends of mine have indicated that it is helpful if they have some idea of what the initial price will be because it is useful as a management tool.

For years we have followed the other process whereby the farmers are given in advance a reasonable statement on what the prospects look like. Because some very large sales have already been consummated this year, we have some idea of where we stand. I would ask my honourable friend to reconsider and advise him to make an early announcement on this matter.

Senator Argue: I am not sure whether the honourable senator is talking about this year or another year, but to forecast the prevailing prices of the new crop year, one would have had to make a judgment in January. I have said, and I repeat, that while there are experts and there are experts, I really do not know of any expert who would be able to say with any degree of certainty in January what will be the prevailing wheat price and, therefore, what the initial price should be in relation to those prevailing prices for the next 18 months.

I believe that the wheat prices thus far in 1981 underline my very statement. If I remember correctly, in early January the price was approximately $270 per tonne for wheat. While I have not checked today's prices, the price for No. 1 CW, 13.5 per cent protein, is around $235 to $240 per tonne. These factors and the fact that there has been a very major drop in wheat prices since the beginning of this year should be taken into account.

I do not believe that the farmers should have to depend on a politician in Ottawa to forecast what wheat prices are likely to be. All I can say is that I hope that the Canadian Wheat Board will be able to recommend prices that are a fairly high percentage of the prices that currently prevail.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend seems to have no difficulty in recommending what volume should be sowed, and he is quite able to make a prediction about the market with respect to quantity. I think he is in a far better position than the farmers to make a prediction with respect to prices. I repeat to him that while it may be too late to make a forecast for this year, because the seeding is almost completed, I hope that he will consider doing so next year.

Senator Argue: I will be happy to consider the matter, but I believe that I have taken the right course. Of course, no one can predict the weather. Weather conditions have been generally good of late, and when weather conditions are good the Soviet Union and the United States, the two largest wheat-producing countries in the world, forecast very large crops, and that affects the market. That forecast is probably the main factor which is acting to reduce current international prices for wheat. However, the volumes are there, the sales volumes appear to be assured. I believe that long-term demand is likely to exceed long-term supply. Currently, there are prospects across the world for a much improved grain crop this year.

Senator Roblin: As a last effort to try to persuade my friend to take a more relaxed view of this, may I remind him that he is the one who is recommending that acreage be increased in Canada today, so he, surely, has to have price in mind.

He is the minister of the crown—the only one I am aware of at the moment—who supported the effort of the Canadian Wheat Board and others recently to have a pricing system put in place which would encourage volume. If my honourable friend wants supply and co-operation from the western farmers, price is of the essence. I appreciate that he cannot create the price, since it is created by market forces throughout the world, but I think he could assist the agricultural industry by giving as early a forecast as he possibly can concerning the initial price that is recommended to him. I believe he should take into account that an early initial price recommendation has been made for years.

Senator Argue: The Canadian Wheat Board fully supports the course I have taken and believes it is a wise one.

Senator Roblin: It had better.

Senator Argue: The Canadian Wheat Board can at times be very independent of the minister. However, this was and is their considered point of view.

Senator Roblin: You are the minister.

Senator Argue: Some farm organizations did not agree with the course I took, while other farm organizations, such as the Alberta Wheat Pool, were very supportive of the course I took.

The markets are tremendous; the price today is about $235 a tonne, which is generally quite good and which might result in a net return to the farmers of $5.50 a bushel, or better, if it continues throughout the course of the year.

The normal, accepted rule—I believe it is normal and accepted—is that the initial price should bear a reasonable relationship to the likely final price or to the likely current price, and this would be in the neighbourhood of 70 per cent. I would hope that the initial price I will be announcing before the opening of the crop year will be in tune with those principles.

EMBARGO ON SALES TO U.S.S.R.—LOSS TO FARMERS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, since we are on the subject of wheat, would the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board inform this chamber of the estimated loss to Canadian grain producers as a result of Canada's support of the U.S.-led grain embargo against the U.S.S.R. following the invasion of Afghanistan?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am not in a position to make a response to my honourable friend's question that would be of particular help. I am optimistic.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): What do you mean by "optimistic"?

Senator Argue: I am optimistic that in due course an announcement will be made in keeping with commitments made. At that time I am sure the details will form a response to my honourable friend's question.

Senator Flynn: Are you optimistic that you will make a payment to the farmers?

Senator Argue: I have been optimistic all along.

Senator Flynn: You just recited a statement indicating that everything is going well as a result of demand. Do you think you can prove that the farmers have lost due to the embargo?

Senator Argue: I am not offering any proof.

Senator Flynn: You should know, now.

Senator Argue: Just relax! I am not offering any proof.

Senator Flynn: You have to find some.

Senator Argue: I am not offering any proof myself, but all of the studies that have been done, by persons more competent in this field than either Senator Flynn or I, indicate that a loss has been sustained.

Senator Flynn: That does not prove much.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I ask my honourable friend: What are you going to do about it? We have asked this question about once a month for the past six months, and he indicates he is still an optimist; but the results—zilch!

TRANSPORT

AIRLINES—SALE OF NORDAIR

Hon. Martial Asselin: For several weeks and even months now I have been asking the government leader in the Senate to report progress on the situation in the Department of Transport with regard to the sale of Nordair shares to other private regional airlines. The minister has already told us that the government could not make up its mind because of certain deadlines. Yesterday however, the President of Quebecair complained on the national television system about the fact that the government delayed in making a decision. Because the leader has some difficulty in obtaining clear and specific answers, would he accept a motion referring the entire question to our Senate Committee on Transport and Communications where we could hear witnesses, officials or the Minister of Transport himself and obtain some details which the Leader is unable to get?

● (1440)

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): The situation has been monitored on a continuning basis. The question will be taken as notice in order to determine whether or not some more factual data can be brought to the chamber tomorrow. If at some point it appears to be appropriate to have this matter referred to committee then, of course, we can discuss that initiative at that time.

THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF NEW MEMBERS

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that for many months now there have been eleven vacancies in the Senate, and in the light of events earlier today, will the Leader of the Government tell us when we may expect these seats to be filled, and what qualifications the government is looking for in the nominees?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the appointment of outstanding Canadians to this chamber is a priority item, but there are a number of other priority items before Parliament at this time which should be given immediate attention.

SPECIAL INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

CONCEPT AND DESIGN OF PROGRAM—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate resumed from Wednesday, February 11, 1981, the debate on the inquiry of Senator Murray calling the attention of the Senate to the government's Special Investment Tax Credit Program for areas of greatest disparity, announced in the budget address of October 28, 1980, and to inter-ministerial confusion in the concept and design of the program.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this inquiry deals with the government's Special Investment Tax Credit Program. When it was first introduced in the Senate on February 11 it was subtitled in the Debates of the Senate "Concept and Design of Program." I bring that to your attention because that was really the theme of Senator Murray's speech. I propose to continue essentially with the concept and design of the program. When Senator Murray spoke to it on that date, he went into some detail, as I propose to do, but all my detail will be in the context of the design and the concept of the program.

Let me begin, honourable senators, by referring to a certain key phrase in Senator Murray's speech, because I totally agree with it. I propose to mention at the beginning the principles that Senator Murray had taken as his starting point, agree with those, and then see where differences exist between the program launched by the Honourable John Crosbie, under the auspices of the previous administration, and that introduced by the present Minister of Finance and the present Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Hon. G. I. Smith: What is the page number?

Senator Frith: The reference is February 11, 1981, page 1646. The basic theme that Senator Murray, I and anyone interested in and who has thought about DREE agrees with is found at the bottom of the second column of page 1646, where it states:

> Anyone who has had any acquaintance with the regional disparity problem in this country, or who is interested in it, will acknowledge at once that it is as complex as it is persistent, and all of us who are interested in this subject will welcome a better idea in this area, from whatever source it comes.

Senator Murray then went on, at the top of the next page, to say:

> Back in December 1979, when Mr. John Crosbie brought in his budget, he announced what he thought, and what many of us—

And, I take it, Senator Murray also.

> —felt was a better idea, namely, the introduction of a new concept in the form of selective tax credits for firms locating in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé. This was to be a new program that would have been added to the existing regional incentives. This new initiative announced by Mr. Crosbie in his budget had been forecast by the Conservative Party in the preceding general election.

I am still in substantial agreement with Senator Murray that it was the introduction of a new concept in the form of a selective tax credit for firms locating in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé.

Taking as my starting point the starting point Senator Murray used—namely, the principle of complexity and persistence that characterizes the problems that are addressed by DREE—he then, as I pointed out, went on to refer to the program of the Honourable John Crosbie and compared it to the program introduced by the Honourable Allan MacEachen.

For the benefit of honourable senators, I should like to make a comparison which, only for visual purposes, I will say I have in parallel form—that is, in columnar form—and I will refer to it in that way. I should first like to refer to the comparison between the two programs, then I should like to make reference to some modifications that were put into the program by the Honourable Mr. MacEachen, and then refer to some particular comments and principles raised by Senator Murray.

To come to the first part of my intervention, I think the objective is the same. There is no question that, essentially, the objective for DREE in both programs is the same, but the question is how to address that problem. If I can take some poetic licence, what I believe we have here is what might be called a parallax phenomenon. The dictionary definition of "parallax"—so you do not have to rely on my definition—is: "The apparent displacement of an object caused by actual change of the point of observation or the angular amount of this displacement."

Wanting to solve the same problems, and wanting to start from the same point, my analysis of the comparative policy angles would be as follows. First, the program proposed by the Honourable Mr. De Bané is that it should apply to those areas in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé region of Quebec where the "neediest" people live. I have put in quotes the word "neediest". I think that is important to both Senator Murray and me.

The Crosbie program was that it should apply to regions of disparity, meaning the Atlantic and the Gaspé, rather than be based on a definition of areas because they contained needy people.

Now, by way of parenthesis, honourable senators, in many cases I am simply repeating what Senator Murray has already stated, but I am making some different comparisons than the comparative analysis he made.

The second feature is as follows. The De Bané approach is that the program should be available to assist small entrepreneurs who can initiate their own economic development. The Crosbie approach was that the program should be available for, or aimed at, projects of $2 million or more so that a larger economic impact could be created.

● (1450)

I will now deal with the third feature under comparative policy angles. The De Bané approach is that the program should be available to all manufacturing and processing firms in order to provide maximum potential for development. The Crosbie approach—again with a view to creating what was conceived to be a larger economic impact—was that it should be selective so it would only be available to assist significant economic projects.

I will pause at this point. I am not making any invidious comparisons. For, once starting with the policy objective of making what we might call more of a mega impact, it seems to me the Crosbie program was perfectly consistent. The difference, as we have seen and will see—continuing with the parallactic analogy—is in definition of the policy angle.

Dealing with the fourth feature, under De Bané the amount of incentive is to be as generous as possible to maximize inducement to entrepreneurs. Under the Crosbie program the tax allowance or tax credit was anticipated, and the tax allowance would have resulted in lesser inducement to firms and possibly lower cost to government than that now provided by the Special Investment Tax Credit Program.

The fifth and last feature under this heading is that under the De Bané proposal the program should apply to the establishment, expansion and modernization of all manufacturing and processing facilities. Again, and, I say, consistently, because of its policy beginnings or policy take-off point, the Crosbie program should apply to new facilities only and in selected primary and tertiary industries with a view to encouraging new projects in the region with, again, significant economic impact.

As I analyzed and understood Senator Murray's speech, I believe he pointed out—and I will simply expand on parts of it—that there was a change, to some extent, between the program advanced to Mr. MacEachen for inclusion in the budget and what actually appeared in the budget.

Hon. Lowell Murray: If I may interject, the change was between the concept as announced in the budget and a series of subsequent announcements by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Senator Frith: Let me pursue that theme from my point of view. The program advanced to Mr. MacEachen for possible inclusion in the budget, according to my research, was, first, that about 7 per cent of the "needy" population of the Atlantic and the Gaspé would be covered, based on unemployment—not family unemployment—and per capita income data. Second, there would be no minimum or maximum size for project eligibility. Third, eligibility for incentive would be a matter of right rather than discretion exercised via the tax contract proposed by Mr. Crosbie. Fourth, the incentive would take the form of a tax credit—as opposed to a tax allowance—and could be up to a nominal—that is, in name at least—100 per cent of the cost of the investment, recognizing that the real value of the incentive to a firm would be less than the nominal amount, as the firm would be unable to take the capital cost allowances otherwise available to it. Fifth, all manufacturing and processing industries would be eligible. Sixth, the life of the program would be 10 years.

The modifications that were made to that program, as advanced, by the Minister of Finance, Mr. MacEachen, were, first, to extend the program to all provinces, so that the incentives would be available in parts of both Ontario and the west, and to limit the coverage to a maximum of 5 per cent of the population of Canada, to curtail the program cost.

The second modification was to limit the incentive to a 50 per cent tax credit and to restrict eligible industries to those defined under the Regional Development Incentives Act—that is, manufacturing and processing industries, excluding petroleum refining, newsprint and pulp mills.

The third modification was to limit the program's life to five years, for evaluation purposes and to curtail the program cost. Remember, its proposed life was 10 years, and the modification was to limit it to five years so that there could be an evaluation after five years; and, of course, by reducing the length of time that would also curtail the committed costs.

Senator Murray took the trouble to make a very careful and useful geographical analysis of the program.

I will now deal with the geographic modifications made by Mr. MacEachen. He required the introduction of criteria. The first modification was the use of family unemployment rates, rather than unemployment rates, to complement the per capita income criterion. The second modification was constraint of a maximum of 40 per cent coverage in any one province. What I think was the valid defence of that approach at that time was that to provide an incentive for all locations in a province would not result in helping the neediest people within that province. So we see this leitmotiv in one program constantly returning to the criterion of neediness.

The Crosbie program, as I understood it, did not ignore the question of neediness, but its basic approach, as I read it, was to create a very strong impact, to result in making—if it is not a misuse of the word—a mega impact to create mega results.

The third geographic modification was the factor of isolation, including native people. Otherwise, with one or two exceptions like Haliburton, no census divisions would have qualified in Ontario and the west. The defence of that modification was that the circumstances of "needy" natives and those in isolated areas are lost in the aggregate statistics for the whole of the census division in which they are located.

The fourth geographic modification was the exclusion of certain cities—Grand Prairie, Thompson, Sept-Îles, Rimouski—within the eligible census divisions, to get close to the 5 per cent limit on the total Canadian population to be eligible for coverage.

The fifth geographic modification was the exercise of very limited subjective decision-making to avoid the appearance of spot designations across Canada. For example, though the census division of Rimouski did not qualify statistically for designation, it was designated so that all census divisions in eastern Quebec qualified for the tax credit. Also, northwestern Alberta was designated instead of northeastern Alberta to give contiguity with eligible census divisions in northeastern British Columbia.

This measure of subjective choice resulted in what Senator Murray, as I understood him, felt was a rather tortured system of criteria that suffered in comparison with the Crosbie proposal because of the fact that the Crosbie proposal was much more objective as compared to this form of subjectivity, in the sense that it was a much clearer package of criteria to apply than the criteria that are applied here, and I understand that difference.

Moving to the third and penultimate branch of my intervention, honourable senators, as I mentioned there is no difference between the De Bané and Crosbie proposals in the starting point—that is, in the sense of the sincere wish to solve this persistent and complex problem of regional disparities. That principle, that objective, that ideal, is shared by many of our fellow citizens. The opportunities to share in this country's wealth and prosperity should not be limited by the mere fact of where our fellow citizens live. As residents outside the mainstream of economic development in Canada, those people are faced with the prospect of a life-style shaped by high unemployment and low income; and with the lack of economic development, the level of social amenities available to them is often lower than that which most of us take for granted. For those people, who can be found even in our richest provinces, the future may well be bleak unless something is done to help them.

• (1500)

The Government of Canada recognizes this, and we have seen it illustrated objectively by the Government of Canada led by Mr. Clark and by that led by Mr. Trudeau. Both recognized this, and both, over the years—over the months, in the case of the Clark government—launched many programs aimed specifically at reducing regional disparities in Canada. Mr. Crosbie came forward, as Senator Murray justifiably said, with a new approach to the problem.

The special investment tax credit is only one such program, and I know it was only intended by Mr. Crosbie to be one such program. However, the fact that it is only one program must be underscored. It is not, nor was it ever intended to be, a panacea for regional disparities.

I wish now to discuss in some detail the remarks made by Senator Murray. He made much of the statistical criteria used in planning this program, and, of course, as we have seen, there were such criteria; but the figures on unemployment, income and population were the starting point, not the conclusion. Using this information, DREE personnel were able to design a program that will help bring about the maximum possible benefits for those parts of Canada identified as most requiring assistance—again, the criterion of neediness.

Senator Murray: On the question of criteria, can the Deputy Leader of the Government say what the factors were that moved the government to select 30 per cent, in the sense that in the census district the family unemployment rate had to exceed the national average by at least 30 per cent? Why not 20 per cent? Again, what is the magic, in terms of per capita income, of having a per capita income in the area that is less than 89 per cent of the national average?

Senator Frith: I cannot say what the magic is. Those criteria, in my analysis of the two programs—the criteria in this case of that one program—were based on that aspect of subjectivity which I believe was the criterion which was used to produce the result; and there was no particular magic or objective value in those criteria.

Senator Murray: I beg the deputy leader's pardon for interrupting him at this point, but if the government, for example, had decided that the family unemployment rate had to exceed the national average by at least 20 per cent, then, in that case, I expect that all of the Atlantic region, for example, would have been included in the program; whereas now chunks of the Atlantic region have been taken out and rendered ineligible in a program which purports to attack regional disparities.

Senator Frith: That point was made by the Honourable Senator Murray in his intervention, and I gave several examples, such as Rimouski, where admittedly there was an "artificial" criterion applied in order to reach a conclusion regarding the neediness for receipt of the benefits under the program. In my intervention I wanted to underline the fact that there is a great deal more subjectivity and discretion in the De Bané and MacEachen program than, as I understood it, there was in the Crosbie program.

Senator Murray claimed that if one were to adhere strictly to the criteria on unemployment and income, certain excluded areas would have been included while other included areas would have been excluded. However, it is still urged—that is, in the Conservative program—that we include the entire Atlantic and Gaspé regions, even though not all of those areas qualify against the stated criteria. So I guess it is a matter of how we want to be flexible. I admit voluntarily that the flexibility that has essentially been applied here has been a subjective flexibility to produce the results, based more on neediness than on strength or significance of impact.

The government realized that numbers alone were not sufficient to design an effective program. We knew that certain disadvantaged groups and areas, such as native peoples and those in the north, would not be eligible if we were blindly to follow the numbers game. Senator Murray has called it arbitrary and subjective. I admit that it is subjective. I would prefer not to use the word "arbitrary," and therefore will not.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: I would choose my words as he has his and say that rather than arbitrary and objective they were benevolently discretionary.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Frith: It should be borne in mind that the selection of the eligible areas and industries is, however, the sole discretionary aspect of the special investment tax program which, honourable senators should remember, in context is only one DREE program and was never intended to be anything more. So the discretion really applies to the selection of the eligible areas and the industries. That is the only really discretionary aspect. Of course, Senator Murray could say that is quite a lot, and it is, in a program of this kind.

After that, the program does become an automatic one and more objective. If an individual or firm is engaged in an eligible enterprise in a selected area, the credit is available as a matter of course. There is no opportunity to make any judgment as to whether the credit should be given, provided an individual or firm is engaged in an eligible enterprise in a selected area. It is simply claimed by the individual or firm on the income tax form. However, DREE's industrial incentive under the Regional Development Incentives Program remains a matter of judgment or discretion.

Senator Murray made reference to inter-ministerial confusion over the stacking of benefits under the Special Investment Tax Credit Program with DREE's other industrial incentives. I submit that there is no confusion, that the situation is clear and has been clear. The incentives under the Regional Development Incentives Program are discretionary. Those incentives are not a matter of right. Whether an applicant will be offered an incentive, and the amount of that incentive, are decisions that must be made by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and his delegated officials.

Of course, the amount of an incentive is normally based on such factors as the amount of the investment and the number of jobs created; but, in the final analysis, the decision is made on the basis of the contribution a project will make to the industrial development of the region, and, of course, on that objective there is no difference between Crosbie, De Bané and MacEachen. The objective is that the project make a contribution to the industrial development of a region.

Senator Murray: Of a census district, not a region.

Senator Frith: In this case I am using "region" in that sense; that is quite right. I have dealt with that—perhaps not satisfactorily, but I have dealt with it—that is, not to the honourable senator's satisfaction or that of his colleagues. When I say that they agree, I am using "region" in the sense of "a region." In our case it was a census region. In the case of the Crosbie program it was not based on that—as Senator Murray finds it—more restricted basis.

• (1510)

It is entirely possible that it may be in the best interests of the area concerned that an entrepreneur receive both the special investment tax credit, which is non-discretionary, and an incentive under the Regional Development Incentives Program. The amount of this incentive might well be less than it would be were a special investment tax credit not in place; however, it is equally possible that a full incentive could be accorded if it were deemed necessary.

Honourable senators, I want to assure you that the officials administering this program are aware of the need for financial restraint, and therefore will be prudent in determining whether such extra inducements are truly required.

Speaking of financial restraint, while there was a need to limit costs under the Special Investment Tax Credit Program, there is no $15 million ceiling, as I understand it, as claimed by Senator Murray. That figure, according to my research, is simply an estimate of what the expenditures might be. Actual expenditures will depend entirely upon the response to this program from private industry, because, as is apparent by its title, it is an incentive program implemented through special tax credit. So I hope I can assure Senator Murray that one or two large developments will not deplete this program's finances, because it is not subject to a fixed ceiling.

Senator Murray was also concerned that the program fragments provinces because it is available only in parts of provinces and not in the entire area. Again, the program does not carve up regions and provinces, but, rather, recognizes that not all people—and again we come back to the leitmotiv; and it should be remembered that this program is concerned with people, not just places—in a province or region are equally well off. The fact that people do not have equal opportunities, even when compared to their fellow citizens within a province, let alone in the rest of the country, is, of course, the whole raison d'être of these programs. We feel that the government has an obligation to those people, and through this program we are working to meet that obligation. Again, so that there is no doubt about where there is overlap, I am not suggesting that the Crosbie program was not motivated by exactly the same sense of obligation.

Honourable senators, it was a deliberately designed feature of this Special Investment Tax Credit Program, based on the knowledge and expertise available, to focus the program on those areas most severely in need. Without doing so, the program could not be as effective as possible in attracting much needed industry. The government, however, recognizes that there is a need for broader incentives on a regional scale. This need is already met through the Regional Development Incentives Program. For instance, industrial incentives, under the Regional Development Incentives Program, are available in every part of every province in Atlantic Canada. The Special Investment Tax Credit Program simply builds upon these broad incentives, and adds an extra reason for bringing industry to those areas where industry has not, to date, gone in great numbers.

In my submission, therefore, honourable senators, far from fragmenting provinces and regions, the program builds up their weaker points and thereby helps to strengthen the economy of the province or region as a whole and unify it.

Senator Murray, in his remarks, made a point of comparing this program with a proposal that was considered by Mr. Crosbie during the period when the Conservatives were in power, and I have already referred to that. He concedes that the Crosbie plan was not perfect, as I concede that the De Bané and the MacEachen program is not perfect. I certainly do not wish to make comparisons on the basis of a scale of perfection.

By way of another parenthetical note, my father's definition of an incurable optimist was the lady in the front row of the church who put her shoes back on when the minister said, "And now, in conclusion . . ." Truly in conclusion, however, let me add, first, that the Special Investment Tax Credit Program recognizes that people want to be able to help themselves. That is why there is no minimum limit on projects eligible under this program, and no requirement for a $2 million investment, as in the Crosbie plan. Under the Special Investment Tax Credit Program, local enterpreneurs—usually people with small businesses—will be able to strengthen the economy in their area.

The Government of Canada and the previous government agree that this is important. The Government of Canada also knows that small business can and does make a valuable contribution to the growth of Canada's economy at all levels. Secondly, the Special Investment Tax Credit Program recognizes that there are people deserving of special assistance in every province and territory, and not just in the Atlantic and Gaspé regions. Of course, I do not mean to say that this program is intended to assist everyone, everywhere. As both Senator Murray and I have mentioned, we must realize that while the Special Investment Tax Credit Program will make a valuable contribution to reducing regional disparities in selected areas of the country, it is not, as I have said, a complete solution. In fact, whether regional disparities are susceptible to a complete solution is in itself debatable. It seems to me that the only thing that is not debatable is the point at which we both started, and that is that in a country such as Canada—again to quote Senator Murray in his use of the two adjectives that describe the problem, and which I use also as my starting point, namely, "complex" and "persistent"—it is a problem not unlike the common cold: it is elusive; it is difficult to define; and, in fact, we are forced to define regional disparities by indicators or symptoms rather than by true characteristics.

I do not find the continuation of the analogy, that we have to treat it symptomatically, rather than curatively, attractive, but I am afraid there is some merit in continuing the common cold analogy, in the sense that often all we can do is treat the cold symptomatically, and often that is all we can do with regard to regional disparities.

We used some of those indicators, such as unemployment rates and income levels, in designing the Special Investment Tax Credit Program; however, it has also been necessary to use what we hope is common sense and what we see as good judgment. I hope we are closer to finding a solution to regional disparities than medical science is to finding a cure for the common cold. The fact that a complete, simple answer eludes us does not prevent us—and did not prevent Mr. Crosbie—from taking bold initiatives such as in this case we believe we have done in the form of the Special Investment Tax Credit Program.

Hon. Richard A. Donahoe: Try offshore resources.

Senator Frith: "Try offshore resources"? I fully intend to, as soon as Senator Marshall is through with the intervention on Senator Cook's inquiry. I hope to come back to that favourite theme.

As I was saying, the fact that a complete, simple answer eludes us does not prevent the present government—as it did not prevent the previous government—from taking what it conceives to be bold initiatives to solve the problem. In our opinion, such an initiative is the Special Investment Tax Credit Program that is the subject of this inquiry.

We hope, and we feel sure, that the program will do much to attract industry to those specially identified areas of Canada which we all agree sorely need economic development and any benefit that programs of this kind can bring to them.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

ENERGY

GOVERNMENT POLICY—MOTION TO REFER SUBJECT MATTER OF INQUIRY TO BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.:
> That the subject-matter of the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., which appeared on the Orders of the Day on November 20, 1980, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in view of the question asked by Senator Murray during Question Period, perhaps I can be permitted to make a comment about this inquiry.

I am quite prepared to yield or to offer the adjournment of this inquiry to any other senator. However, to repeat what I said earlier today in explanation of my not dealing with it, I intend, as long as it is in my name, to stand it at least until I am satisfied that we are not going to receive the principal legislative packages on the National Energy Program, namely, Bills C-48 and C-57. If another senator wishes to speak on the subject matter of the NEP and therefore wishes to take the adjournment, I freely offer that opportunity.

I repeat, because I do not want to mislead, that I intend to continue standing this order for at least another week, and perhaps two weeks, until I get the impression that we shall not be getting that legislation. If we do not get a substantial piece of legislation on the same subject, then I think we should look at it again.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, in reponse to that, I simply want to say that, while we will be receiving from the other place Bill C-57 and Bill C-48 in due course, and while these bills do have something to do with the National Energy Program, my purpose in putting down a motion to refer the National Energy Program to a committee was to enable senators to examine such matters as the supply and demand forecasts that have been presented by the government in its National Energy Program, the conflicting forecasts that have been made by the industry in the producing provinces, and a variety of other matters that are certainly not likely to be resolved in the debates on Bills C-48 and C-57 when they come to this house.

Arguably, we can get at those matters when Bills C-48 and C-57 go to committee. However, at that time the committee will be under the gun from the government to get those particular pieces of legislation through. My concern is with the medium and longer term problem of the validity and the wisdom of the National Energy Program. There are enough people in the Senate who have experience in and knowledge of this matter who I think could make a considerable contribution to a longer investigation of those questions.

However, I will leave it at that for the moment. If the government is prepared to give us sufficient latitude, and if Bills C-57 and C-48 are referred to committee, all well and good. If not, I am going to try again and again to get the National Energy Program, in general, and the bases of that policy studied by a committee of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: What is your wish, honourable senator?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I ask that the order stand.

Hon. G. I. Smith: Just for convenience, I wonder whether the honourable senator has before him the page reference of Hansard which will indicate when this matter was last debated.

Senator Frith: That is with regard to item No. 8 on the Order Paper?

Senator Smith: Yes.

Senator Frith: No, I do not, but it has been a matter of months. I believe that I took the adjournment, did I not, Senator Murray?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Frith: Therefore, only Senator Murray has spoken on this matter.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

REPORT ON THE ESTIMATES LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1982

June 10, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982, were referred has in obedience to the order of reference of Monday, March 2, 1981, examined the said estimates, and reports as follows:

The Committee was authorized by the Senate, as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of March 2, 1981, "to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Estimates laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982."

The Committee made a general examination of the estimates as tabled, and heard evidence from the following witnesses:

Treasury Board
- The Honourable D. J. Johnston, President
- Mr. J. L. Manion, Secretary
- Mr. L. J. O'Toole, Assistant Secretary Program Branch
- Mr. E. R. Stimpson, Director General Budget Co-ordination Group

Department of Finance
- Dr. I. A. Stewart, Deputy Minister

Bank of Canada
- Mr. G. K. Bouey, Governor

Economic Council of Canada
- Dr. D. W. Slater, Chairman
- Dr. P. M. Cornell, Senior Policy Advisor
- Dr. R. S. Preston, Director, Economic Performance and Outlook Group

THE ECONOMIC ENVIRONMENT

As an integral part of our examination of the main estimates, we have again considered the economic environment in which the expenditures will be made. In its report to this House on the Main Estimates for 1980-81, this Committee expressed its concern regarding a number of factors and problems. We were then concerned with the unsettled energy situation, accelerating rates of inflation, continuing government deficits, and feeble productivity performance. Disappointingly, we must report that little has occurred which would cause us to alter significantly our concerns of last year. Productivity has remained moribund. The energy situation is as yet unsettled. And inflation has accelerated, as yet unhindered by record high interest rates.

It is not our intention in this report to detail all aspects of the medium term future which we discussed with our witnesses. The proceedings are of course available to anyone so interested. However, one topic so dominated our discussions that we believe it merits inclusion in our report. The topic is inflation.

All of our witnesses stressed the importance of bringing inflation under control, not just as an end in itself but, they argued, because the control of inflation will establish the groundwork for a stronger, more equitable, and manageable economy in the future. In Mr. Bouey's words, "failure to face up to the problem of inflation will compound an economic problem, and increase the economic pain involved in resolving them."

A. Sources of Inflation

The difficulties we face in controlling our present inflation, according to the witnesses, are numerous. While inflation has been symbolized by some as a serpentine spiral, their testimony suggested that a multi-headed hydra might be a more apt symbol in present circumstances.

Demand

According to the Economic Council's analysis, based on medium term considerations the economy is not operating at or even near its potential level, and shortages of certain key materials such as concrete and steel do not seem imminent. However, both Mr. Bouey and Dr. Stewart argued that demand conditions in the Canadian economy are contributing to current inflation.

Dr. Stewart pointed to the strong economic growth in the third and fourth quarters of last year and in the first quarter of this year as evidence of the high level of demand in the economy. The growth, he suggested, was due to the sizeable merchandise trade balance of late last year, and he highlighted extremely tight markets in Western Canada. This Western Canada situation was described as, in part, due to the fact that the present Canadian exchange rate may be inappropriately low compared to the Western Canada competitive position. Dr. Stewart also claimed that the resulting high price and wage increases which have their origin in Western Canada are being translated into inflationary price and wage demands in the rest of the country. This, he suggested, reflects defects in the structure of Canadian markets, compared to the operation of standard classical economic models.

Mr. Bouey also suggested that strong demand conditions, especially in Western Canada, were contributing to inflation. He noted Canada's world leading employment growth record over the past decade and continuing tight labour markets, especially for skilled workers.

Productivity

All three witnesses agreed that the weak productivity performance of the post-OPEC period may have also contributed to inflation. They pointed out that improved productivity growth could ease inflationary pressures in two ways; first it could directly reduce the actual costs of production, and second it could increase the available supply of goods and services thus reducing demand pressures. While the causes of the past weak productivity growth remain somewhat of a mystery to economists, Mr. Bouey did suggest that the energy price shocks of the past decade may have effectively rendered some portion of the capital stock obsolete for efficient production. Dr. Slater pointed out that while the economy has invested heavily over the past decade, much of the investment went into large scale projects with long term payoffs, and into environmental improvement efforts with little impact on measured rates of productivity. He emphasized that the economy still faces "an investment decade or unprecedented proportions" and thus it is imperative that Canadian savings rates not be diminished, and that government usage of savings should be curtailed.

Expectations

The witnesses were also unanimous in pointing to entrenched expectations as contributing to current levels of inflation. Mr. Bouey suggested that only through a prolonged period of lower inflation could these expectations be reduced. In his words, "It took 15 or 20 years to build them (expectations) up, and it is going to take a while to get them turned around." Dr. Stewart suggested that these expectations were now part of the structure of the economy, "there is no quick and easy remedy."

Energy Prices

Aside from their possible impacts on productivity, the energy price increases were suggested to have contributed directly to inflation. In particular, in late 1978 and early 1979, the international oil price soared 150%. This engendered inflationary pressures throughout the western world according to Dr. Stewart. In Canada, this has meant that the economy has had to absorb even larger and more rapid energy and import price increases.

Monetary Policy

Despite the Bank of Canada's avowed efforts to combat inflation, it may be that monetary policy is not itself entirely blameless for the current inflationary dilemma. The Governor of the Bank told the Committee that the decision to allow Canadian exchange rates to decline over the last 4-5 years vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar has contributed to inflation by way of demand pressures from export markets, and through increased prices of imported goods. The Governor admitted that last year's decision to allow Canadian interest rates to decline in line with U.S. rates may have been "a mistake". "The monetary policy probably should have been tougher right through last year". With regard to the policy of the Bank over the past few years, Mr. Bouey said that the Bank's targeted reductions in the money supply may have been "too gradual": "We have met our money supply targets every year, which is a bit of an embarrassment when you consider that things did not work out."

B. Policy Prescriptions

The witnesses showed remarkable unity in their suggestions of policies which might be deployed to reduce inflation. In particular, all three favoured a gradualist approach. Speaking for the Economic Council, Dr. Slater stated: "We believe that a balanced approach and a balanced policy, with monetary restraint and fiscal restraint and some other policies would be the appropriate way to go at it". Mr. Bouey suggested that fiscal and "a host of more specific policies affecting the way that individuals, businesses, trade unions and others operate in the market place" might be used in conjunction with an appropriate monetary policy to influence inflation. And Dr. Stewart, in more general terms suggested the need "to use every instrument of the traditional kind available to us—monetary policy, fiscal policy, et cetera" to "get out of this mess with the least cost in the real loss of income and jobs possible, consistent with the gradual elimination of inflation."

The Fiscal Attack

The budget of last October projected a budget deficit of some $10.3 billion dollars. The witnesses suggested that a reduced deficit might contribute to the fight against inflation. First, as excess demand in the economy appears to be creating inflationary price pressures, a reduced deficit would lower demand and thus ease inflationary pressures. Dr. Stewart for example, pointed to the boom conditions in Western Canada and in certain export sectors which translate into inflation in other sectors. Fiscal policies which reduce demand in these sectors, either through expenditure cuts or tax increases, might help. Our witnesses stressed that appropriately applied fiscal policies might be more equitable, and specific than monetary policies in the anti-inflationary battle, and this in itself may represent an important policy consideration.

With regard to federal spending, Dr. Stewart restated the government's policy that expenditure growth should be restrained to the rate of growth of G.N.P. or less. This policy, he noted, has resulted in a reduction of new program spending to roughly 1½% of the previous year's total expenditures. However, significant expenditure cuts, we were told, may be very difficult. According to Dr. Stewart, when increased public debt charges and energy costs are taken into consideration, "there may be virtually no room for net new programs." Mr.

Johnston estimated public debt charges for 1981-82 to be $12.3 billion, increasing to $16.2 billion in 1983-84. He indicated that efforts will be made to reduce expenditures through re-negotiation of the fiscal arrangements with the provincial governments. However, Dr. Slater suggested that the deficit would not be affected significantly on the expenditure side: "I think much of the action lies on the tax front rather than on the expenditure-cutting front. The biggest block of government expenditure goes on health, education, welfare and those types of things."

Despite this, Dr. Stewart claimed, perhaps optimistically: "There is no automatic tendency for the deficit to continue to widen. On the contrary, the automatic tendency is for the deficit to remain roughly constant in absolute dollar terms and to decline as a percentage of G.N.P. as G.N.P. rises." In discussing possible means of increasing tax revenues, Dr. Stewart suggested that partial rather than complete de-indexation of the personal tax system might be considered: "The issue, I believe, is full indexing versus some modification system and not indexing versus no indexing. This continues to be a lively issue. I believe the arguments against a full indexing system have a good deal of validity."

The Monetary Attack

Dr. Stewart agreed with Mr. Bouey and Dr. Slater that monetary policy alone could, or should not be relied upon to combat inflation, particularly as the impact is uneven across society. He suggested that "too much reliance seems to be being placed on monetary policy" at present. He also pointed to an apparent flaw in controlling inflation by controlling the money supply in reference to "the inventiveness of credit institutions to increase the velocity of money." In light of this inventiveness, it may be necessary for the Bank of Canada's monetary target program to extend beyond M1 to include other levels of monetary aggregates. However despite the inequities and apparent lack of success to date, all witnesses did support continued monetary restraint of a gradual nature. Mr. Bouey affirmed his position this way:

> —you always have to look at this in terms of, "What are the alternatives?" If the results are not as good as one would like to see, what should we do: Give up, or print a lot more money? Are those alternatives going to help the situation any? I suggest we have to press on until we lick this thing. . . . When I say, "press on", I mean continue to control the money supply and interest rates will have to be whatever is necessary.

Controls

Dr. Stewart very succinctly summarized his views on the psychological aspect of any attack on inflation: "We are living in a climate in which people are not willing to restrain themselves unless they are assured that everyone else is restrained." All the witnesses supported the idea that a strong anti-inflationary stance on the part of the government was necessary at least to hold expectations in line. Dr. Stewart, in line with the comment above argued that the weapons used to combat inflation directly must not only be equitable, but must also appear to be equitable. He suggested that in principle, the Minister of Finance has rejected controls as a "frightful political interference". However, the Minister, in a speech given recently in Quebec City, indicated that he is continuing to search for a TIP (tax based incomes policy) that would be equitable, fair, effective and administratively possible. This Committee urged in 1971 that no substantial or long-term reliance should be placed on an incomes control policy. Governor Bouey apparently agrees: "Controls can sometimes be useful in circumstances where events have go out of hand but they are not a substitute for sound financial policies."

Energy Agreement

Our witnesses all stressed the value to the economy, and to the value of the Canadian dollar, of obtaining an energy accord in Canada. (Dr. Slater pointed out that an examination by the Economic Council of Canada of the National Energy Program showed that the impact on the economy would result in the short term in a period of slower growth. He also noted with respect to the conservation of oil that " . . . even if we take a fairly optimistic view of the effect that higher energy prices will have on the use of energy, it will take a very large accomplishment indeed by the supplementary programs of encouraging conversions and other things like that, to produce the (reduced oil usage) results of the National Energy Program". Dr. Slater believes that: "There have been some lost opportunities as a result of the continued indecision over energy policy. Nevertheless the main effect has been to delay improvement in economic performance to later in the decade and early in the 1990s". Dr. Stewart reviewed the impact of increased energy costs over a short term, on other Western economies; the overall impression is that their inflation rate did not increase noticeably faster than Canada's did under an energy cost subsidy policy. Whether or not the increase in energy costs, resulting from an agreement between Canada and Alberta will result in a short-term or long-term shock to the economy, the witnesses felt that the level of stability and confidence in the economy will rise with the establishment of an oil price and revenue accord.

Supply Side

In the United States, so-called supply side nostrums are being touted as short term cures for the entire economy. However, the testimony of our witnesses emphasized the medium term need for improved efforts to make markets work more efficiently, and effectively. Mr. Bouey stated his position most concisely and directly: "I think the broad public interest lies in taking a skeptical view of the value of restraints on the functioning of markets and on the rate of supply of particular goods and services." Government regulations are clearly part of the system of constraints on efficient markets, and in this regard, Mr. Johnston indicated that the government is anticipating the final report of the Economic Council of Canada on regulatory reform. This report will be released in June.

In respect to investment, Dr. Slater stated that: "All the evidence now at hand leads me to believe that Canada faces an investment decade of unprecedented size." Energy, capital accumulation and innovation will require greatly increased levels of investment. Therefore, he argues that more emphasis should be put on decreasing deficits and increasing Canadian savings and investment. "We cannot both expand our consumption rapidly and expand the investment rapidly." This investment may be crucial to increasing Canadian productivity, and meeting Canada's energy challenges and opportunities. More specifically, Dr. Slater recommended:

> There is a lot to be said for us to look at our business taxation to see if we could not have a less gimmicky kind of arrangement, something that would be a better encouragement to investment, which . . . is a significant factor in improving our growth in the medium term.

TAX EXPENDITURES

Honourable senators should be aware that under the new expenditure management system, tax expenditures, which do not appear in the Main Estimates, are accounted for as expenditures within the envelopes. Policy committees may make the choice between funding programs in the normal fashion or allowing delivery under the tax system; however, the total expenditure limits, including tax and cash expenditures, on the envelopes will still apply.

In this regard we must emphasize the need for government to define clearly the term "tax expenditure" in order to avoid confusion with measures that are really tax incentives, tax allowances or subsidies. We believe that further study in this regard is necessary. In addition, we recommend that where envelope levels are affected by the use of the tax system to deliver programs, some reference to this should be included in the estimates presented to Parliament.

OIL IMPORT COMPENSATION FUND ACCOUNTING

We would like to draw to the attention of this House a change in accounting practices as a result of a new subsidy program for imported oil. In 1980, the Petroleum Compensation Program was created to replace the Oil Import Compensation Program and the Petroleum Compensation Revolving Fund. In conjunction with the blended oil pricing system which the government adopted, the new program allows for levies against all refiners to be used to offset the subsidies paid by government on imported oil and domestically-produced synthetic oil. Only the difference between the levies and the subsidies is included in the cash outlays. This change, we were told, results in a decrease of $2.5 billion in the estimates as compared to 1980-81.

EXPENDITURE PLAN

The Committee wishes to bring to the attention of our colleagues the expenditure levels and growth rates proposed by the government for 1981-82. For convenience, we have set out the amounts by policy committee and by envelope:

NEW ESTIMATES PRESENTATION

We would like to compliment the President of the Treasury Board and his colleagues on the new look of the Main Estimates. The purpose of the expenditures and the policy objectives are clearly set out in the Expenditure Plan, and the projected four-year plans should assist the public and private sectors alike. We consider the President's statement of February 1981, as well as the background notes on the proposed revisions, to be a succinct and informative description of the three parts to the new presentation; therefore, we have appended the statement and notes to our report.

In November 1980, this Committee recommended the inclusion of brief, summary analyses indicating the relative, regional impacts of federal spending initiatives. While we are pleased with the changes made thus far, we continue to recommend that aggregate information on a regional and sectoral basis be included in the tables and text of future versions of the Main Estimates. We feel that such information is necessary in order to understand and evaluate the government's policy objectives and impacts.

The President of the Treasury Board underlined the fact that if the information contained in the Main Estimates is not fully and efficiently utilized by Parliament, then much of the purpose of the revision will have been lost.

THE IMPACT OF REVENUE DEPENDENCY

As a result of this Committee's recommendations, the government has adopted a revenue dependency policy with regard to the accommodation of departments (through the Accommodation Program of the Department of Public Works). This new policy will be reflected in future Main Estimates, and we anticipate that a clearer picture of the cost of the accommodation program will result.

GRANTS AND CONTRIBUTIONS

In order to make the estimates as clear as possible to Parliamentarians and other laymen, we recommend that the use of the terms "grants" and "contributions" be reconsidered and if possible other, more appropriate, terms be used. At present, a "contribution" is subject to audit and voted, whereas a legislated "grant" is not subject to audit. This can result in unnecessary confusion, particularly for those not well versed in the use of the estimates.

PROGRAM TRANSFERS

We would like to note that a major policy change has been reflected in the transfer of virtually all the key cultural agencies from the Department of the Secretary of State to the Department of Communications. We recommend that such revisions, which greatly affect the estimates, be noted more explicitly and visually in future presentations.

POST OFFICE

The Committee was informed that the estimates presentation will be revised when the Post Office is turned into a crown corporation. The expenditures of the government will then include only the amounts required to cover any deficit incurred by the Post Office, rather than its full expenditures. As the new crown corporation is intended to operate without subsidies from the government, it is possible that no Post Office estimate will be included in the Main Estimates at some time in the future.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT,
Chairman

REFORM OF THE ESTIMATES

Today I tabled in the House of Commons material relating to the Government's proposal to initiate, over the next four years, significant revisions in the structure and the nature of information made available in the Estimates in support of the Government's expenditure requests. These proposals include a description of a three-part presentation of Estimates information and illustrative models of program expenditure plans for the Correctional Service of Canada and Supply Program of the Department of Supply and Services.

As part of these reforms, I will be tabling a new volume with the 1981-82 Estimates which explains the Government's expenditure proposals in summary.

The proposed reforms represent a major first step in enhancing the Government's accountability to Parliament by improving the information available in the Estimates. The reform of the Estimates is closely related to major initiatives under way to develop better information in departments, and to improve the Government's resource allocation decisions through implementation of the Policy and Expenditure Management System. These proposals represent a comprehensive response to the criticism of the present Estimates made by the Auditor General, the Public Accounts Committee and the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability.

The Correctional Service and the Supply program expenditure plans which accompany this letter illustrate the structure and content of information to support and explain planned program expenditures. The information is based on last year's (1980-81) data and does not reflect the upcoming requests for funds for 1981-82. The purpose of the illustrative models is to obtain parliamentary input on the adequacy and usefulness of the information before finalizing the form of these new departmental volumes and extending them to other departments.

I believe it essential that the changes be made on a progressive basis in consultation with Parliament to ensure that the final result is a practical and durable product which fully meets the needs of users. Therefore, our current plans envisage a gradual implementation of the proposed Estimates revisions over four years so that further improvements and changes can take place as we learn to use these new Estimates documents and as the underlying information improves. Thus, even after this round of consultation, improvements and changes will still be possible.

I am asking all Members and Senators, and in particular those who serve on the Public Accounts and the Standing Committees, to provide advice on the extent to which these proposals meet their ongoing needs for Estimates' purposes. I am confident that these proposals will provide an improved basis for the accountability of Government to Parliament, and will provide all users with a greater understanding of the Government's policies and programs.

DONALD J. JOHNSTON

BACKGROUND NOTES ON THE STRUCTURE OF THE PROPOSED REVISIONS TO THE ESTIMATES

February 1981

INTRODUCTION

This paper sets out briefly the government's proposals for revisions to the Estimates and describes the overall framework for the presentation of information.

The purpose of the Estimates is to communicate to Parliament the level and nature of the federal government's spending plans and support the request to Parliament for the spending authority required for the operation of government programs.

The Estimates represent a summary-level description of more detailed information available in departments. The government is implementing major changes to the management practices and control systems throughout departments and agencies. The recent introduction of the Policy and Expenditure Management System, directed at establishing a closer relationship between policy and program decisions and resource allocation decisions, represents a major step in this process. As these systems mature, the quality of the information in support of the Estimates will improve.

Over the past several years, a number of changes to the Estimates have been recommended. The Public Accounts Committee, the Auditor General and the Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability have all stressed the need for more information aimed at relating resources to the achievement of results, thereby providing a higher level of accountability by the government and its ministers. The Estimates proposals respond to these recommendations.

It is intended that the revisions to the Estimates will be implemented progressively and after consultation over a four-year period, to ensure that the revisions are both feasible and durable and fully meet the needs of Parliament. This implementation period will also allow the time required to improve the basic systems and processes upon which the Estimates are based.

THE REVISED ESTIMATES DOCUMENTS

The revised Estimates will be presented in three parts:

Part I —The Government Expenditure Plan
Part II —Estimates
Part III—Program Expenditure Plans

Following the implementation of the revisions to the Estimates, a separate Guide to the Estimates will be developed that will explain the basic structure and accounting conventions, and provide other information to assist readers in readily locating the Estimates data of interest to them.

Part I—The Government Expenditure Plan

Part I provides an overview of total government expenditure plans. It expands on the expenditure portion of the government's multi-year fiscal plan, concentrating on the broad policy areas to which resources are allocated. It will therefore provide a context within which the more detailed Estimates of individual ministries and departments can be examined.

The Government Expenditure Plan is directed to all Senators and Members of Parliament to support their consideration of the government's overall spending plans. Although the primary audience is Parliament, this document will also be of interest to others, including those members of the general public who wish to obtain an overview of government expenditures.

The Government Expenditure Plan will include:

- the government's multi-year expenditure plan in total and according to particular policy areas;
- a discussion of objectives and initiatives over the planning period within each policy area;
- a summary of the Estimates including a discussion of the major types of expenditures and programs included in the Estimates; and
- supplementary analyses on a government-wide basis relating to selected aspects of the Estimates.

Part II—Estimates

Part II supports the government's request to Parliament for spending authority which is granted through the passage of an Appropriation Act. This year the present Estimates, the "Blue Book", will constitute Part II. In subsequent years the document will change as revisions to other Parts of the Estimates are more fully implemented. Part II will expand on the information contained in Part I by providing information on each ministry and program. This document will establish the framework within which further detail will be provided in the Program Expenditure Plans (Part III).

Part II of the Estimates forms the basis upon which Parliament grants spending authority to the government and as such it must set the framework for the government's ultimate accountability to Parliament. It will include:

- information by ministry on the programs of the departments and agencies for which the Minister is responsible;
- government-wide financial summaries similar to those contained in the front of the present Blue Book; and
- a draft of the proposed schedule to the Appropriation Bill, including the vote wording the forecast spending for all items that have not yet received parliamentary approval.

Part III—Program Expenditure Plans

Program Expenditure Plans are intended to provide further details of the departmental programs and activities presented in Part II. The information contained in these Plans will indicate how the program contributes to the objectives of the government, and will provide explanations of what the program expects to achieve with the resources requested. In addition, each Program Expenditure Plan will include a description of the organization responsible for achieving the intended program results.

Each plan will highlight significant issues affecting the program and will present a breakdown of the program into its component activities and their associated financial requirements. Also discussed will be the mandate, major initiatives and goals, efficiency and effectiveness measures, analyses of resource requirements, and resource justifications. The final section will provide supplementary information on selected aspects of the program.

These documents will be available to all Members. However, because of the level of detail provided, it is expected that the specific audience would be the members of the standing committee to which a department's Estimates are referred.

Ultimately, it is intended that these individual program plans would be combined together by department to form a single document.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR DESCHATELETS

Hon. Jean-Paul Deschatelets: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of personal privilege.

This morning my attention was drawn to an article published in the newspaper The Citizen, under the byline of columnist Richard Gwyn, in which it is alleged that, on Wednesday morning, June 10, I was pressured by the Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable Jean Marchand. I insist on denying that allegation which is altogether contrary to the facts.

It is obvious, of course, and for reasons which everybody will understand, that the content of the statement I read yesterday, as well as the date and the hour when it was to be made, had to be kept secret, except from our Speaker.

As a former Speaker, I knew from experience that before he can draft his Orders of the day the Speaker must be made aware in advance of the date, the hour and the procedure for an event of that type.

I must say here that it is quite normal that a senator who may have any kind of procedural problem should consult the Speaker about it.

Therefore I met the Speaker, not Wednesday but Tuesday afternoon around four o'clock, and I must thank him for his kindness in granting me this friendly appointment from which I derived much benefit.

I firmly deny the allegation made in that article and, honourable senators—and I do think and I hope that you know me for being straightforward—if I had a complaint to make about our Speaker it is this: when I was the occupant of the Chair and had a visit from a colleague I would normally offer him an orange juice, an apple juice or a soft drink, unfortunately, the Speaker forgot to do so this time!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators and dear colleagues, I thank the Honourable Senator Deschatelets and I confirm every point of his statement.

As to the apple juice and the orange juice, all I had was scotch and I did not want to be accused of attempted bribery!

THE ESTIMATES

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS AN APPENDIX

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on supplementary estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report see appendix, p. 2531.)

The Hon. the Speaker: I notice from yesterday's Debates of the Senate that there was no French translation of the report of the National Finance Committee presented. I know there have been some problems in that connection, and, therefore, I would ask Honourable Senator Everett if the report he has now presented is in both languages.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: There was no French translation of yesterday's report when I presented it. However, I was informed that the translation was in the process of preparation and would be available for incorporation in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. Perhaps I should have left the presentation of that report until today because it is my intention now not to speak to it until Tuesday evening. If I have inconvenienced the house, then I apologize for doing so.

I do not have the French translation of today's report with me, but I am sure it will be available soon.

The translations department does as well as it can, but when we were preparing the report on the main estimates, which we had hoped to present on Tuesday evening, we were told the translation could not be available until Thursday morning.

I have to admit that a committee chairman should not present a report without having it in both languages. It was my hope that the translation process would be speeded up. In any event, I apologize if I have inconvenienced this house and those senators who speak French.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, I move that the report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there are two points arising out of the intervention by Senator Everett. First, it is hoped the committee's report on the main estimates and its report on supplementary estimates (A) will appear together on the order paper and will be spoken to on Tuesday.

Senator Flynn: I expect they will be in Hansard today.

Senator Frith: Yes. The next point is that that means we should have both the French and English versions of the reports on the main estimates and supplementary estimates (A) printed for consideration next Tuesday when Senator Everett, the chairman of the National Finance Committee, speaks to them. Am I correct in that assumption?

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, that is correct. I will also seek permission of the house when the first report, which I expect to be that on supplementary estimates (A), is called to speak to both at the same time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, you will recall that Senator Everett gave us informal notice that he would be asking me to seek permission for the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, June 17, 1981. He and I discussed that and, as I understand it, the hour of 3.30 in the afternoon seems to be satisfactory. While we do not need to have the hour of 3.30 p.m. included in the motion, it can be noted as a part of the request made on his behalf.

● (1415)

If any explanation is necessary about allowing the committee to sit while the Senate is sitting next Wednesday, June 17, I will ask Senator Everett to give it.

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, June 17, 1981, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 45(1)(g), that when the Senate adjourns today it do stand adjourn until next Tuesday, June 16, 1981, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Before the motion is put, the Deputy Leader of the Government could perhaps tell us first what are the immediate plans for next week. As I understand it, we are to expect normal sittings on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday, barring exceptional circumstances. However, the following week might cause a problem since I understand that there is no way for the Senate to sit on St. Jean Baptiste day, June 24, which is a Wednesday. What type of program does the Deputy Leader have in mind for that week? I think that if he could tell us what are his intentions it would help honourable senators to make their own plans.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, with regard to the first suggestion or the first point raised by the honourable Leader of the Opposition, I can tell him that it is indeed our intention to have normal sittings next week, that is Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock and Wednesday and Thursday afternoon at 2 o'clock, as usual.

As for the two following weeks, we have a double problem, that is we have the same problem for both weeks. As mentioned by the honourable Leader of the Opposition, Wednesday two weeks from now is St. Jean Baptiste day. I understand that it is not because of an order of the Senate that we shall not be sitting, but because of an order of the other place. Normally, we respect the custom of not sitting on St. Jean Baptiste day.

The following week, there is another holiday in the middle of the week on July 1. With the agreement of the leadership of this House and that of the other place, we do have a plan or at least a suggestion. During those two weeks, we could sit on Monday—

Senator Flynn: At what time?

Senator Frith: On Monday, June 22, at 8 o'clock; on Tuesday, June 23, at 2 in the afternoon, and if necessary at 8 o'clock. We would not be sitting on Wednesday, Thursday or Friday. We could follow this plan unless something important occurs, such as a ruling of the Supreme Court or referral of other legislation which would require our attention here on the other two days. We must be ready to alter our plans.

However, as a tentative plan and one that we shall probably be able to follow, we could sit during the two weeks, that beginning on June 22 and that beginning on June 29, Monday at 8 o'clock and Tuesday at 2 in the afternoon, and if required in the evening, but not on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, and this for both weeks.

If I may repeat briefly in English—

Hon. Keith Davey: Dispense.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

I hope that everyone has noticed that Senator Davey was the only one to suggest that we dispense with the English version!

Senator Flynn: In fact, this is the only thing that reassures us; if Senator Davey has understood, so has everyone else! However, since the deputy leader has talked about those two weeks, can he give us some indication concerning the summer adjournment?

• (1420)

[English]

Senator Frith: The major items of legislation that we should be concerned about fall into three groups. The first is the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada regarding the Constitution. That would trigger the order concerning the naming of a day. The order provides that two days for debate are to be named by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is our understanding that he will do this in consultation with the Leader of the Opposition.

The second group relates to legislation implementing the National Energy Program. It is almost certain that next Tuesday evening Bill C-57 will come before us. In my judgment, there is a remote possibility that Bill C-48 will also come before us for consideration, and that also forms a large part of the National Energy Program.

The third group is a cluster of essentially non-controversial legislation, in contrast to that dealing with the National Energy Program, which we should study.

Senator Asselin: What about salaries and pensions?

Senator Frith: I am encouraged to learn that that is being described, by Senator Asselin, as "non-controversial." By Friday we may have received any part of this cluster of legislation from the other place.

Those are the three groups of legislation that we might anticipate and hold ourselves ready for.

Therefore, next week we shall sit on the three regular sitting days—that is, on Tuesday evening, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday afternoon. The following week we shall sit on Monday at 8 o'clock in the evening, and on Tuesday at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and at 8 o'clock in the evening, if necessary. Unless any of these other emergencies arise, there will be no sitting on St. Jean Baptiste Day and no sitting on Thursday or Friday. The following week we shall sit on the same days—that is, on Monday evening at 8 o'clock and on Tuesday at 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and again at 8 o'clock in the evening, if necessary. There will be no sitting on July 1. I know that this is a long way around the question asked, but I think it is necessary background.

So there is hope that, because of the Summit, we will not have to sit on Thursday or Friday for a further reason, namely, that we may have adjourned.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Asselin: Is there any French translation?

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand that honourable senators agree to dispense with the translation from English to French.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

QUEBEC

MICMAC RESERVE, RESTIGOUCHE—RUMOURED OCCUPATION BY PROVINCIAL POLICE

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Is he aware of what is going on in Restigouche, in Quebec, where it would seem that 200 QPP officers have been occupying the Micmac reserve since last night?

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have any information on that subject. The question will be taken as notice.

ENERGY

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND GOVERNMENT OF ALBERTA

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government able to give us a report on yesterday's negotiations in Banff with respect to the energy question?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): All I can say is that I met with my cabinet colleague, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, this morning and his face was wreathed in smiles.

• (1425)

Senator Roblin: Is it correct to say that he is so encouraged by what he has heard, or by what he has been doing, that he is going to meet again with the representative of the Province of Alberta by the end of June?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I understand that is the hope. Certainly, the minister is quite optimistic about the negotiations which have taken place.

Senator Roblin: Does that intention to meet at the end of June have anything to do with the fact that the Cold Lake project is to come up for decision at that time?

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I am unable to divulge further information on the subject. The question will be taken as notice. I have not had an opportunity to discuss that specific consideration with the minister.

Senator Roblin: May I ask the minister to find out at the same time whether there has been any request of the government for an additional gift to Imperial Oil Company Limited, that is, in addition to the $40 million which was given to it some time ago to keep the Cold Lake project on top of the stove?

Senator Perrault: The question will be taken as notice.

Senator Roblin: Will the minister also find out whether there is any possibility of recouping that $40 million which was given to the Imperial Oil Company Limited, if they proceed at the end of June with that project?

Senator Perrault: That additional inquiry will go forward. Certainly, the answer may indicate whether the Cold Lake project is heating up.

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): Could I ask the Leader of the Government whether the smile of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources resembled at all the smile of the Mona Lisa?

FINANCE

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY MINISTER TO CANADIAN NUCLEAR ASSOCIATION

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to a speech reportedly made by the Minister of Finance to the Canadian Nuclear Association. The Minister of Finance was reported to have said that the government is unwilling to keep pouring millions of dollars into industries which are of benefit to only a few provinces. Would the Leader of the Government give us a definition of the government's policy on aid to industries that are in difficulty, or, at least, a clear indication of the policy?

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would be pleased to do so. Certainly, the minister's office will be contacted and, hopefully, a clarifying statement can be made here.

THE CONSTITUTION

STATEMENTS BY MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS AND MINISTER OF STATE (MINES)

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Was the Minister of Public Works speaking for the government yesterday when he advocated that municipalities be given recognition in the Canadian Constitution? I quote the minister:

> Municipal government deserves and warrants a secure place in the constitution and a better share of tax resources to carry out its responsibilities.

My particular interest is in the constitutional regulation of municipalities and whether the minister was speaking for the government in that respect.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Certainly, honourable senators, in this particular instance, the Honourable Paul Cosgrove was speaking on his own behalf. However, there is the theory held by many Canadians that municipalities are entities of emerging importance in this country and that they should be accorded a greater role. That view is held by many people across a number of party lines.

The point which should be made clear is that after the Constitution is Canadianized or brought home from Great Britain, before us will lie many further opportunities to change and amend the Constitution and other matters in this country. Indeed, this intent has been expressed by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and many spokesmen for the government on many occasions. Certainly, a consideration of the increasing importance of municipalities is one of the questions which should be reviewed by those in public life when they come to deal with future constitutional changes.

Senator Murray: If the Minister of Public Works was not speaking for the government, as the leader has just indicated, was the Minister of State (Mines) speaking for the government when she said the following:

> I don't think it is nesessary to have municipalities formally recognized.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, one point that should be made abundantly clear is that there has always been a great degree of freedom of speech and action in the Liberal caucus, whether it be in this chamber or in the other place. It may surprise members of the official opposition that Liberal ministers from time to time both explore and discuss publicly some of their views about the future of various institutions and programs in the country. That is not an unusual or extraordinary process, certainly as far as supporters of the government are concerned. The widest possible latitude is offered to members of our party, and that shall continue to be the case.

• (1430)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the doctrines of cabinet solidarity and collective responsibility exist precisely so that the Canadian people can know what the policy of the government is and can understand that, when a minister speaks, the minister is speaking not for himself or herself and giving a personal, off-the-cuff opinion but is speaking for the government.

I ask the minister how Canadians are to know when a minister is giving a personal opinion on a matter of public policy and when that minister is speaking for the government.

Senator Perrault: May I remind Senator Murray, who was one of the architects of policy for the previous government, that the then Secretary of State for External Affairs went to an international meeting and stated that there must be an enormous improvement in the degree and quantity of aid to the underprivileged nations of the world, and did so at precisely the same time as the Minister of Finance, a cabinet colleague of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, was calling for cutbacks in foreign aid? Surely the senator is not suggesting that that was an example of Conservative cabinet solidarity?

However, in the case which he has cited here this afternoon—

Senator Murray: "Cases."

Senator Perrault: In the cases he has cited here this afternoon, the matters discussed by the minister have not been fully developed and finalized by cabinet. In the meantime, individual members of cabinet are surely at liberty, and should be at liberty, to discuss with their constituents and other Canadians their views with respect to those policies, pending a time when a cabinet decision is taken. Their freedom in that regard has always existed.

Hon. Martial Asselin: No, no.

Senator Perrault: And, may I say, this freedom seems to be in remarkable contrast to the actions which I cited earlier, the contradictory statements by the two former Conservative ministers. During the same week they made contradictory statements about a policy which surely had been adopted in cabinet.

Senator Asselin: Name them.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I don't want to debate—

Hon. Jacques Flynn (Leader of the Opposition): —the irrelevancies.

Senator Murray: I do not want to debate the constitutional practice, but the reason why there is cabinet secrecy, again, is so that ministers can debate in private their differences on matters of public policy; then later, when ministers go public, it is assumed that those differences have been resolved in the secrecy of the cabinet chamber and that the Canadian people are, therefore, in a position to know that when a minister speaks on a matter of public policy that minister is speaking for the government.

Finally, without prolonging this unduly, let me ask the minister whether his colleague, the Minister of State (Mines), the Honourable Judy Erola, is speaking for the government when she says in an interview that opinion is divided among federal cabinet members on what status should be accorded municipal government. Is that the fact?

Senator Perrault: Well, honourable senators, the matter has yet to be resolved in cabinet. The other day, for example—

Senator Flynn: Why don't you say "yes"?

Senator Perrault: The other day in Ottawa, for example—and this is worthy of some consideration—the minister responsible for housing in this country, the Honourable Paul Cosgrove, convened a meeting of certain regional parliamentarians, Conservatives, Liberals, members of the NDP and others to discuss with them the future of housing policy in the country. Senators were included in these consultations. During the course of that meeting the minister suggested initiatives that he, personally, thought might be helpful. It remains to be seen whether all of the initiatives which he espouses personally will ultimately be supported by his cabinet colleagues. But this process of dialogue is surely a useful one. There is a continuing dialogue involving ministers and other members of Parliament with groups, organizations and individuals. Following adoption, of a policy in cabinet, certainly the doctrine of cabinet solidarity is in effect—as the Honourable the Leader of the Opposition indicates by nodding his head in agreement.

• (1435)

Senator Flynn: Yes.

Senator Perrault: But surely it is useful for ministers to attempt to set forth some of their personal views as a prelude to that cabinet decision-making process.

Senator Flynn: May I suggest to the Leader of the Government that he look at the question which was put to him and compare his reply with an alternative, which would have been, very simply, to say "Yes"?

Hon. G. I. Smith: He is too defensive about it.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

REVENUE GAINS AND LOSSES CAUSED BY FOREIGN EXCHANGE FLUCTUATIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I address a question to the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board? I do not know whether he was watching television last night, but a number of us were, when the Canadian Wheat Board came under some scrutiny in the program presented by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It raises a couple of matters on which we perhaps need further information.

One of the points made was that in the middle 1970s there was a loss incurred in foreign exchange transactions in connection with sales of wheat to China on the sterling basis. The sum mentioned was approximately $80 million. I suppose that from time to time the Wheat Board does have problems with foreign exchange, and I am wondering whether the minister can make available to us their record of gains and losses on foreign exchange—for any period he likes, but let us say for the last 10 years. That information would, I think, be pertinent in view of what was said.

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): Honourable senators, I am quite happy to ask the Wheat Board to supply whatever information it feels is desirable and pertinent on that question. There has been a good deal of information provided on that point. I believe the controversy is at least a couple of years old. I will be happy to have the records checked to see what information I may be able to provide for the honourable senator.

I too saw the program, and it was obviously a biased, one-sided, prejudiced attack on the Canadian Wheat Board.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Argue: Conservative members can laugh and giggle if they wish. Leading that attack were the Minister of Agriculture for Alberta, the Honourable Dallas Schmidt, the Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba, the Honourable James Downey, and the man in charge of the marketing commission in Alberta. The proportion of people on that program levelling an attack against the Wheat Board would probably outnumber the comments in favour and support of the Wheat Board three or four to one. Only one representative of the farm organizations, and the general grain trade, was there to defend the Canadian Wheat Board. There were no other representatives of the farm organizations.

I will have further comments to make on this matter as time goes on. In my opinion, the Canadian Wheat Board has done, and is doing, an absolutely tremendous job.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: I believe the CBC's attack on this public institution—and this is not the first attack that the CBC has launched on similar organizations—is completely and absolutely misleading.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: The Canadian Wheat Board is doing a tremendous job, if only to mention the completion of that huge sale, that huge agreement, with the Soviet Union, involving no commission whatsoever.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: If the private grain trade had been in there, whether it had taken one per cent, 2 per cent, or whatever, it would have cost the farmers tens of millions of dollars.

Hon. Martial Asselin: Another speech.

• (1440)

Senator Argue: I think it is very regrettable that members of the party opposite—not members in this chamber, but members, very, very important members, in the west—should be taking that kind of posture.

I want to say that I think the attack by the Conservative Party and the Conservative government in Alberta against the Canadian Wheat Board is being softened. They may be having second thoughts. I met with them on another matter some days ago, and I noticed that they were not nearly as aggressive as I thought they might be.

There was an editorial in the Edmonton Journal of May 27 about the agreement with the Soviet Union—

Senator Asselin: This has nothing to do with the question.

Senator Argue: This is part of the answer.

Senator Asselin: You are making a speech.

Senator Argue: I am defending the Canadian Wheat Board, and I think that is my responsibility. That was a virulent, prejudiced and unprincipled attack that was levied by the CBC in this program, that was basically destitute of facts, destitute of arguments that would carry much weight—

Senator Asselin: We are not quarrelling with you.

Senator Argue: —and destitute of voices from the large majority of farmers who support the Canadian Wheat Board.

Anyway, this editorial is about the agreement, and it concludes as follows:

> In fairness however, the provinces now should drop their errant criticisms of Canadian Wheat Board marketing. Premier Lougheed was particularly critical of the Wheat Board's sales effort after his visit to the Soviet Union in 1977. Events have proven him wrong. The Wheat Board is an effective agency in the federal government's pursuit of international trade.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am relieved that Senator Olson is not here, because he would undoubtedly have felt impelled to remonstrate with his colleague for the type of reply he has given. I am thinking of framing that reply so that it will be available for Senator Olson's perusal. I hope also that the minister will take advantage of the opportunity to send a copy of today's Hansard to the people at the CBC who wrote the program—

Senator Argue: I certainly will.

Senator Roblin: —because I think members opposite should take note that I have not taken a position with respect to that broadcast as to whether it is right or wrong. I have taken a position asking for clarification of the facts; because, if the facts were wrong in that program, then they should be put right. I have asked the minister to give us the information about those facts. He takes advantage of this opportunity to say what he has said, and I do not complain about that, though I am sure the Leader of the Government would if he followed his usual tactic in this matter.

I would like to ask my honourable friend to give me some more information. Has it been the policy of the Canadian Wheat Board to inform the farmers whose money it is as to what the result of their foreign exchange trading, gains or losses, has been? The reason I ask the question is that in almost all commercial corporations that I know of, if they have a foreign exchange loss or gain in their transactions they report it in their annual statements. I have looked through the annual statement of the Canadian Wheat Board for 1980—I have not had a chance to look at any others—and though I may have missed it, and I would like to be corrected if I have, I can find nothing in it that really bears on this point. It seems to me that we should know whether this sort of information about foreign exchange transactions—particularly when the amounts involved are quite substantial—is made known to the farmers who comprise the Canadian Wheat Board's clientele.

Senator Argue: I shall be very happy to take that question as notice and make the necessary inquiries. I think I know part of the answer, but I want to get a full answer, so I am happy to do that as a result of the question asked by Senator Roblin.

Senator Roblin: I am much relieved by the tenor of the minister's answer, because after his first reply I was a little concerned about his blood pressure, and I would have felt guilty indeed if he had been carried away in the paroxysm of interest that he displayed in connection with this matter.

Senator Argue: Don't get too personal.

AGRICULTURE

EXCESS SUMMER FALLOW—EFFECT ON SOIL FERTILITY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board another question arising out of the television broadcast I have already referred to, which I think is of considerable importance.

We have heard testimony—and the minister will probably recall this—about the effect of summer fallow on the fertility of the soil in the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, if I am not mistaken, in which we were given certain warnings about that policy. In this broadcast last night—this is a very serious point, and I know the minister appreciates it—the allegation was made that the quota system, which, in effect, bonuses, or is alleged to bonus, farmers who have summer fallow, is part of the problem in the sense that some farmers are continuing to follow the practice of summer fallowing in spite of the fact that it might be dangerous. What I want to know from the minister—and he may not be able to answer me now—is what the official position of the scientists of the government is with respect to the effect of excess summer fallow on the fertility of the soil?

Hon. Hazen Argue (Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board): I think I should endeavour to answer the honourable senator's question by saying that the whole matter of quotas, and how they are applied in this system, has been under review for some time, and the Canadian Wheat Board has sought advice from many areas. One of the very important organizations or bodies to whom they have looked for advice is their own advisory committee, which is composed of farmers themselves. I have been part of this discussion. There are arguments which say that the quota system should have some relation to productivity itself, while there are others who feel that the quota system as presently established is generally rather good, and improvements, or changes, should be carried out with great care and caution.

The question of summer fallow is an important one for every producer, and it is fair to say, and correct to say, that over the years in western Canada, especially in recent years, there has been a general reduction in summer fallow acreage. This has taken place, in general, in those areas of the prairies where moisture conditions are not usually a particularly difficult factor. In other words, there is less summer fallow in the areas where there is greater moisture and in the areas where there is a lower temperature—the north and northeast—and perhaps even a lower rate of wind, or lower drying factor.

If you farmed in southern Saskatchewan, southwestern Saskatchewan and southeastern Alberta, and were to follow the learned advice of Professor Rennie to remove your summer fallow and engage in continuous cropping, or close to it, you would soon be bankrupt. I am certain, as a farmer, that those people who undertook to follow his advice would go broke very quickly, because the people in those areas, who have as much as half a million dollars or more invested in their farms, many of whom have had a university education themselves and are probably as well trained as Dr. Rennie, believe that Dr. Rennie's advice does not fit their area.

The research station at Swift Current, which is in the middle of this area, where there is almost 50 per cent summer fallow, say—and they have made this very, very clear—that they think Dr. Rennie is very much mistaken as far as that area is concerned. I suppose, therefore, with respect to this advice—as is often the case with advice—that there are places where it fits and others where it does not fit.

Dr. Rennie, however, has done very commendable work in pointing out—and he makes this qualification, with which I certainly agree—that in areas where there is usually ample moisture the amount of summer fallow can be very materially reduced. As a practising farmer in that area, I know that the farmers there, and those to the south and west, who have done well over the years have consistently followed the practice of almost 50 per cent summer fallow.

• (1450)

Senator Roblin: I believe the minister is aware of the Dobson-Lee report of the early 1970's on this subject.

Senator Argue: On quota?

Senator Roblin: Yes, on quotas and on the summer fallow problem involved in the way that quotas are defined these days.

The minister is right with respect to the difficulties he has mentioned, but the problem is, if some scientists are correct, that the fertility of the soil is being damaged in a way that is almost irreparable. It may take decades to bring it back into full production again.

If there is a question in dispute among the scientists, will the minister undertake to have this matter investigated in an authoritative way so that we can be sure of the facts.

Senator Argue: I am not sure that I am going to have anything more done on this matter than is now being done.

Senator Roblin: What is that?

Senator Argue: The Swift Current experimental station is dealing with the question of summer fallow all the time, and Dr. Rennie is dealing with the question of summer fallow all the time. There may be a need for the two to get together, but that is all.

I have practised farming in that area, and although I have not had as much experience as some others my impression is that if the soil is handled with modern methods of tillage—surface tillage rather than deep tillage—and if there is maintenance of trash cover, and the use of fertilizer in years when there is moisture, then that area will be much more productive than it was 20, 30 or 40 years ago. With nitrogen-fixing properties within summer fallow, I feel that—and I give you my own personal judgment because I am not a professional—the practices in that area have not led to a substantial deterioration in the productivity of the land. It may well be that the soil is, in fact, more productive.

Senator Roblin: I am not going to ask any more questions on this subject because there is other more important business to be transacted this afternoon. I merely refer the minister to the record of wheat production in western Canada. I am not asking him to reply, because he will take all day to do it, but he could look at those figures in connection with his fertility argument.

Senator Argue: I have looked at those figures and have found them very favourable.

I want to add something more on the quota systems. The quota system as a marketing tool is necessary in order to have some equity in the system. The quota systems today are in no way a detriment to the marketing of grain, because by the end of the crop year, whether by means of taking them all off—which may not be the means—or some other method of adjusting them, the farmers will be able to market all of the crops that they produce.

Senator Roblin: That is not the point.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): What is the point?

Senator Roblin: The point is fertility.

AIR CANADA

FLIGHT ATTENDANTS—APPLICATIONS FOR POSITIONS—QUALIFICATIONS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Marshall on May 28.

The management of Air Canada has confirmed that it does not keep a record of applications for flight attendants by province of origin. The figures provided to the honourable senator in 1978 reflected the numbers of applicants received for interviews in various Canadian cities with Air Canada bases. Air Canada has been able to provide these figures once more for the year 1980, but warns that they should be interpreted cautiously because they do not give a true picture of applications by province of origin. For example, applicants from Hull would be included in the Ottawa total; a student from St. John's attending a university in Hamilton would be interviewed in Toronto.

The figures are as follows:

British Columbia	2,066
Alberta	1,273
Saskatchewan	205
Manitoba	1,317
Ontario	6,498
Quebec	10,315
New Brunswick	225
Prince Edward Island	41
Nova Scotia	571
Newfoundland	104
TOTAL	22,615

There were also 5,000 applications received for summer employment, but these have not been broken down by province. This then brings the total to 27,615 applications.

TRANSPORT

VANCOUVER—BOUNDARY BAY AIRPORT—RE-OPENING FOR LIGHT AIRCRAFT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have an answer to a question asked by Senator Austin on May 28.

It is difficult to forecast a precise date when the Boundary Bay aerodrome will be reopened. At present, Transport Canada is waiting for the B.C. Agricultural Land Commission to withdraw 120 hectares of aerodrome land from the Agricultural Land Reserve. If this land is made available, Transport Canada will seek a private sector developer for the aerodrome, or, failing that, develop the aerodrome on its own.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ISRAELI ATTACK ON NUCLEAR REACTOR IN IRAQ

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault (Leader of the Government): I have an answer to a question asked on June 9 by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie regarding the Israeli attack on the Iraqi nuclear installations.

On June 9 the Israeli ambassador was informed that Canada strongly condemned the Israeli attack, viewing it as extremely harmful to the cause of peace in the Middle East.

The United Nations Security Council will soon meet in emergency session to consider the Israeli action, probably on June 12.

The government has as yet made no decision concerning what if any further action it might take beyond its condemnation of June 9. This will be done only after the Security Council meets.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

TWENTY-SIXTH ANNUAL SESSION, BRUSSELS, BELGIUM—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the Inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bonnell calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-Sixth Annual Session of the North Atlantic Assembly, held in Brussels, Belgium, from 14th to 23rd November, 1980, and in particular to the discussions and proceedings of the Session and the participation therein of the delegation from Canada.—(Honourable Senator Hastings).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been advised that Senator Hastings does not wish to speak to this matter. Senator Lafond had indicated he would speak to it, but now I believe he has informed Senator Hastings that he will not do so.

I believe I am safe in saying that this item should be considered as having been debated and removed from the order paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

EL SALVADOR

POLITICAL, MILITARY AND SOCIAL SITUATION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Heath Macquarrie rose, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, March 4, 1981:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to:

(1) the increasingly dangerous political, military and social situation in El Salvador;

(2) the compelling hazards of third party interventions and the possibility of the escalation of hostile actions within El Salvador;

(3) the further compelling importance of the resolution of the conflict by means of a political settlement rather than through recourse to sustained and bloody armed conflict; and

(4) the value of Canadian encouragement and support of the efforts of those individuals and groups seeking mediation of the conflict in El Salvador.

He said: Honourable senators, I have great regard for this particular procedure. It is one of the virtues of the Senate that we have this procedure whereby we may give the benefit of our mature wisdom, as a chamber of second thought, to issues which are contemporary, and these may be in the international scene as well as in the national scene. It is important that we have this flexibility, because it is indeed trite to say that it is a rapidly changing canvas which covers the international scene today. I sometimes feel that we lose a bit of spontaneity by the long lapse between putting down the inquiry and dealing with it. Mine was put down on March 4, and much has happened since then.

Another thing which has caused me some concern is that quite often an inquiry prompts remarks from the person who inspired it but no one else. It may very well appear to be some little exercise in particular reasoning that he may have—hobby-horsing, if I were so slangy as to use that expression. I should like to see more of these inquiries carried through with more discussion representing a variety of thought in the Senate. I invite other participation in this matter. Regrettably, the El Salvador situation will not be going away. I think we should give some thought to a better mechanism of having the Senate, or a committee thereof, seized with some of the very important foreign policy issues, because our standing committee is engaged in very useful long-range studies. The committee has built up great expertise and facility in dealing with such subjects.

• (1500)

Since the introduction of my inquiry in March, distressing events in the Middle East and elsewhere have caught the attention of the world, so that there is now diminished media attention for El Salvador. I wish that the dangers had diminished as did the attention given to it by television, radio and the press.

As a serious deliberative body, the Senate is ideally suited to seek beyond today's headlines. For that reason, I am somewhat pleased it is not one of the racy news items of today. In the "electric age," as MacLuhan called it, the devices of our technology make possible a broader public involvement. He used to say that every school child would weep at the assassination of President Kennedy because they knew about it instantly and, therefore, were affected. It contributes, I fear, also to a shortened memory span. The citizenry deluged with data, impressions and action shots becomes a sated, saturated audience all too ready to forget or, at least, to ask for a change of emphasis or perhaps a change of locale. It seems like yesterday, in my mature accumulation of years, that the howling mobs of Tehran, and the grim, glum countenance of the Ayatollah Khomeini dominated the livingrooms everywhere, every day and every night. But little is heard of Iran today, yet the problems, the anxieties and the dangers are still there.

Do we ever hear about Afghanistan today? How often is Afghanistan featured on television in our country? How much space is given to the terrible situation in Somalia? There is danger, suffering, bitterness, conflict and tragedy existing all over the world, but it seems that in our age we have to have periodic fascination. In our age the latest thing is the only thing, otherwise it is no good, and that is a terrible thing if it prevails even in reference to human suffering. Unless you are constantly the recipient of the attention of the television camera, you will not be given consideration. Whether an item is newsworthy on the comparative and recent scale or not, the situations are there and thoughtful people must think about them.

So it is with El Salvador—that sad little country. With problems so immense, with suffering so vast, our first consideration should be—and it is not always given this priority—in human terms. The statistics are imprecise. One thing we do know is that there is a devastating assault upon human life every day in that country. For far, far too many of those poor people, Thomas Hobbes' description is all too true that life is nasty, brutish and short—tragically short for many.

In recent weeks I have been reading what I can from serious and casual articles, and one of the finest articles I read was from the Washington Post, written by Loren Jenkins. He writes about Chalatenango, a small city in the north where, he says:

> It is a dead body by the roadside that first announces the city limits of this somnolent provincial capital in northern El Salvador.

> Seemingly dressed in his Sunday best—a still-clean white Guayabera shirt, dark slacks—the man lies flat on his back on the gravel shoulder of the two-lane black top from San Salvador, 60 miles southwest of here.
>
> The dead man's shoes are missing and his stocking feet look somehow incongruous. Someone has placed a small tree branch on his face to keep the buzzing flies at bay but it does not hide the ugly black bullet hole in his forehead.

He goes on to say:

> A little farther into town, there is the sound of scraping in a cemetery of shoulder-high white tombs. Three men are wordlessly digging a grave.
>
> In El Salvador, where death has become a way of life—

That is a splendid phrase. A fine reporter this man must be. He continues:

> —it is a scene that with only slight variations of setting is seen every day, everywhere.
> No one really knows just how many people have been killed or have disappeared since the old military government of General Carlos Humberto Romero was overthrown 18 months ago by a group of colonels promising reform. The conservative count is 10,000 dead; that of the now underground human rights commission, 16,000.

So we are not sure whether it is 10,000 or 16,000, but we know there are thousands. The article continues:

> Whatever the precise numbers, they are almost beyond belief, certainly beyond comprehension.

Then he writes about how they go into that unhappy state, and he says:

> Some no doubt were killed by rightist death squads that roam the streets after dark seeking out suspected leftists. Others no doubt were themselves rightists, or orejas (ears), the name given to collaborators of the army, who had been slain by leftists. Others might be women raped by soldiers, then disposed of by a bullet to the head, or simply the victims of personal feuds.

That is not a horror story, but careful reporting of what is far, far too prevalent.

The danger of further breakdown in a social situation like that is clear, present and cannot be overemphasized. There are ingredients that make it as nasty and evil as it is dangerous.

A Toronto newsman said that the Salvadorean military makes the Shah's Savak look like a ballet troupe, and they move, apparently, unchecked by the civilian government, because the civilian government does not have the power to check them. The political structure, which never functioned well—no one ever looked to El Salvador as a great, functioning democracy—is more precarious than ever before. Naturally, against such a social background, the economy is in an intolerable state. An American scholar has described five serious socio-economic factors that made this country a likely field for the kind of extreme degradation and deprivation which we see. Little El Salvador has one of the highest population increases in the world and a very high population density. It is a country which has absolutely no frontiers—no more room for further expansion.

This next point frightens me, coming from Prince Edward Island, because it has replaced individual agriculture by commercial agriculture. The independent farmer, on the way out in many places, is out in that country. He also talks about the emphasis upon capital-intensive rather than labour-intensive industries which, in his opinion, is a combination of five bad socio-economic ingredients. Whether he is right or not, what was brewed out of those ingredients certainly is bad enough.

You could not look at an institution in that little country which is not under enormous strain. One of the strongest is the church, and it is obvious it is under great strain, although it is probably, in my judgment, giving the best leadership in these troubled times of any institution there.

• (1510)

If we were talking about the north-south dialogue today, I could say everything that I have said about this country in Central America, because here is a prime example of the sort of social problems with which the north-south dialogue must deal. These are the kinds of social problems which could be the forerunners of a terrible breakdown in our world. One of the unfortunate things is that we cannot finish our discussion and invoke only the north-south axis. All of the ingredients are there: the grinding poverty; the illiteracy; the exploitation of limited resources by a tiny group of people; the military control; the blighting of opportunity. It is the sad, old, familiar tale. What has happened is that, instead of this being dealt with in north-south terms, there has been a superimposition of the east-west. As if this little polity could stand any more, it has come into the forefront of conflict and competition between the east and the west.

We look at the United States today with all of the understanding that we try to bring to the country which is our closest ally and our closest neighbour. As one of my friends in the House of Commons said years ago, the United States is our best friend, whether we like it or not. However, we see things that should make thoughtful people sad. I am convinced that the domino theory has been restored. The flavour of the fifties is being tasted again, and that is not a very good thing. It is sad if one remembers the domino theory of the fifties but forgets what came out of it in the sixties; that is, the tragedy of Vietnam which arose because not everything could be related to east-west terms, everything could not be reduced to simple black and white—or perhaps, one might say, red and white.

The Green Berets are there; the helicopters are there; $25 million in military expenditure is on tap and ready. One reads the headlines which say, "We will not become militarily involved in El Salvador." If one kept a scrapbook, one could find 100 quotations from President Johnson and others to the effect that "We will not be militarily involved in Vietnam."

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): From whom and others?

Senator Macquarrie: From President Johnson.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): President Kennedy, too, for that matter.

Senator Macquarrie: And President Kennedy, of course. Thank you, Senator Roblin.

We were assured that only "experts" were involved. We believed that as long as we could, because we wanted to believe it. I can well recall being in the House of Commons from the very beginning of the war in Vietnam. Most of us there were totally reluctant to criticize the United States. It was a very tense time when the then Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, voiced his criticisms of the United States. After his "conversation", shall we say, with President Johnson, he came back and said, "I have been to Berchtesgaden." His criticism was not well received.

However, we found that the United States was suffering more from that situation than anyone else. The assault upon American society was grievous. Now we have it again. We asked this question: How many years, how many lives, how much social turmoil, how much destruction is necessary to bring about the full unfolding of what was a tragic blunder? Some voices are raised in the United States today, warning that the same thing may happen again.

When I seek the point of view of people who are possessed of knowledge and experience, I try to avoid the extremists. Those who lash out in a denunciation of the President or of the American regime do not come to my mind as people I care to quote or to believe. I have been impressed, in all of this, by the opinions of Robert White, the former United States ambassador to El Salvador, who courageously jeopardized and perhaps terminated a brilliant career in American diplomacy. He has come back from El Salvador and has made some very candid statements, but he has not at any time gone into free-wheeling denunciations of his own country or the government from which he resigned. He feels, however, that the biggest danger in the United States' involvement is that it will drive the populace of El Salvador leftward. That would not be the first time such a thing had happened.

No one can rewrite history and say, "Had this not happened, this would not have followed." However, most thoughtful observers believe—certainly, many people in both countries concerned profoundly believe—that the support of the United States for that dreadful man Batista had much to do with the success of Castro; that the Bay of Pigs invasion had a great deal to do with the sustaining of that man in office. That is another example.

It is always sad if any regime is run by Bourbons, of whom it was said that they learn nothing and forget nothing. If you remember John Foster Dulles, it is too bad that you forget the Bay of Pigs or Vietnam; but if you have that tragic combination, there is danger.

Robert White said:

> The Reagan Administration . . . tends to ignore the fact that in El Salvador there is an authentic revolution which would exist whether or not the Soviet Union existed.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

He said that the engagement of the United States in a military way is sending the wrong signals to Latin America. The United States is a great country. I would have no problem deciding whether I would prefer the country of Thomas Jefferson to the country of Lenin. However, the United States does not have a great record in Latin America. It would only be the most myopic chauvinist who would say any such thing. The United States has a bad record there. It is always wise, I think, to listen to those who have a broad range of knowledge and a deep perception as well, and I think that Robert White has both of those qualities.

I am not a member of the United States Congress; I would far sooner be here. My major interest is in what this country should do. What should be the attitude of this country? Should we say that it is an American concern and not ours? Of course, we cannot say that. The country that produced Sir Robert Borden, the first international statesmen of the land, and Lester Pearson could not think of that kind of foolish detachment which would be worthy of Mackenzie King.

• (1520)

We must try to find our role. Is our role to be totally supportive? Is our role to say that that which emanates from Washington is the voice of Canada too? If honourable senators think that I am trying to be dramatic for some effect and filling the air of this quiet Thursday afternoon with vain imaginings, I assure you that such is not the case. I have been doing my research, and what I am paraphrasing are the remarks of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I have not spent much of my time in public life in criticism of people, even those in the opposite party, and it is certainly not my practice to look upon foreign policy as a great field for partisan controversy. I am, nevertheless, disturbed when I see a significant and revealed alteration in the Canadian attitude on one of the important issues facing the world today, and I think it behooves us in this illustrious senior chamber to give some thought to it.

Not long ago, the Secretary of State of the United States and his counterpart in this country met, and followed with a statement that the attitude of Canada toward the military assistance of the United States was "quiet acquiescence." Later it was stated that that was a mistake; that what was really said was that it was "quiet quiescence." The difference between "acquiescence" and "quiescence" is not in the range of a wide gulf fixed by any means. As a man who has acquiesced a great deal for the last 60 years, I am pretty familiar with the meaning of the words. They mean: to raise no objection; to accept arrangements or conclusions. I am sorry to be pedantic, but I suppose one cannot shake these bad habits. "Acquiescence," I would say, is a better word than "quiescence." "Acquiescence" is moving towards a state of quietude; and "quiescence" indicates that you are already there. When you put before that the word, "quiet," it is really being terribly mum—

Senator Frith: What was that word?

Senator Macquarrie: "Mum." Pardon the slang; I should be ashamed of myself. It means total and complete silence; total satisfaction. I do not think that is our role; we who have knowledge.

Accompanying this was a statement from the minister, in answer to a question in the other place, that Canada has no embassy in San Salvador. Of course, we do not; we do not have embassies in every single Central American state. Whethe · we should is someting we could discuss at another time, but we have one not many miles away which covers that area. We do have some knowledge of the Central American area. We do have a century and a half of close and valued contact with the Caribbean area.

If we do not know that area well, surely we should know the United States better than any other country in the world. We cannot wash our hands and draw around us the mantle of detachment. We cannot put on the cloak of isolation and say that it is not within our field of interest. It is terribly and tremendously within our field of interest. Human suffering; the danger of an east-west conflict in that small country; what could be more important to a respected and valued member of the international community?

I am concerned about our integrity in international matters. I am concerned about our independence of judgment and utterance. Oh, not independence for its own sake; that is nonsense. Not disagreeing with the United States just for the sake of that; that is silly and unbecoming a mature country. We did that in our adolescence. We all do silly things when we are adolescents, and then we get too old to enjoy them, but that is the way with life.

However, in the life of a nation, we must take our place as a mature member of the international community. We do have a stake; we do have information; we must have concern. Quiet quiescence is not enough. It is worthy of "Conscription, if necessary, but not necessarily conscription"—and that never was good enough.

I have some words for some of my colleagues who, with more kindness than candor, said they wanted to hear my speech, and then with more candor than kindness told me when they had to catch their planes. I am now announcing that, as in the old Presbyterian sermon, I am at "Fifthly", and that is "Lastly", because you are not supposed to go beyond five substantial segments.

What has interested me and brought mixed emotions—although I am not a churchman but a politician, but I have been impressed—is that in the last few months, in both Canada and the United States, the quality of the leadership from the church people has been magnificent. There are times when people of conviction, of faith, of fine attunement to the social problems in our own land and in the broader world do perform great things and, in a favourite scriptural expression, "move mountains."

I was impressed that on Good Friday last the Protestant churches of the United States went to Washington to conduct a sublime service. The statement made on behalf of all of them was, of itself, moving and sublime. It was as follows:

> We have come here on this Good Friday to witness to the sufferings of Christ in the sufferings of the people of El Salvador. We remember our brother and father in God, Archbishop Oscar Romero—

This is a statement by Protestants.

> —who during last year's Lenten season was martyred for his ministry to the people of El Salvador. In the midst of these memories, and in the face of violent death rampaging across El Salvador, we are drawn together in the communion of Christ's suffering. We gather to pray to God and to petition the government.
>
> We make these prayers and petitions on behalf of the people of El Salvador who are now under the Cross. Daily they are beaten and wounded and driven like sheep to the slaughter.
>
> We have gathered in support of the thousands of our fellow Americans who have preceded us in protest. We wish particularly to support our sisters and brothers in the Roman Catholic Church. For months they have prayed and petitioned and kept vigil in order to stop the repression.

• (1530)

> We protest the policy of seeking military solutions to human problems. We join hands with those who oppose military aid. We would project the vision of a negotiated peace grounded in justice.
> Above all else we would—if we could—stay the continuing crucifixion of the Salvadoran people. Neither ideological triumph over communism nor political advantage over the Soviet Union, nor renewed national self-confidence, nor any other cause can justify our government's support of the systematic slaughter of the Salvadoran people.

Those are words of beauty, courage and challenge. However, the American Protestants are not the only group. I have an item here, datelined "London", which states:

> Christian churches will continue sending aid to El Salvador despite U.S. pressure to stop European emergency relief to the troubled Central American country, the director of Christian Aid said here yesterday. Speaking on his return from a visit to Central America and Brazil, Kenneth Slack said: "I did not meet a single Christian who was not deeply critical of the line being taken by the Reagan Administration."

Nor are Canadians in the churches remiss. I was very pleased and encouraged to read what the churchman who is just a few miles away, Bishop Adolphe Proulx of Hull, Quebec, Vice-Chairperson of the ICCHRLA, which is a human rights group concerned with Latin America, said:

> I see no reason why the Church in Canada—and the Catholic Church in the United States, because we are not alone—should not bring pressure on their governments to > stop sending arms to a junta that has been murdering people for many years, particularly last year.

He went on to say:

> The Canadian Churches, through the Inter-Church Committee on Human Rights in Latin America, and many local and regional formations, will continue to seek the fullest possible information on the situation of the Salvadoran people, to seek ways of offering them support and to seek a forthright and strong Canadian foreign policy.

That is a fine statement. I think that the way of the military is not the way, or that submerging the entire matter in east-west conflict is not the way. If there is an opportunity for negotiating a settlement, then that is part of the way. If there is an avenue in some organization, be it one based in this hemisphere, the continent or the U.N., then that is part of the way. The emphasis on the humanitarian considerations is part of the way, and in each and all of these ways there must be some way for the Canadian government and the Canadian people to make a contribution. We cannot be comfortable in the presence of such overwhelming suffering. We cannot be calm and relaxed in the face of such great danger, nor can we fail to speak with candor and with concern to any country, however friendly or however strong, if we believe that out of our experience they may be in danger of adopting a course that will lead, not to those things which are good and acceptable but to those things which are dangerous and inconceivable.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Honourable Senator Macquarrie. If I understood him correctly, he feels we should not take a hands-off or uninvolved approach to this situation but that we should do something. The senator has suggested that one of the things we should do is speak out. Can the senator suggest forms of action we can take, other than speaking out with candor to the United States about our value judgments and our value system?

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I thank the Honourable Senator Frith for his question. I do not pretend that I have a pat formula or pat formulae. There is always value in broadening the base for compromise and for action, whether this be done, as I have mentioned, in a hemispheric sense, a continental sense—in this case in terms of South America—or through an appropriate agency of the United Nations. I believe that quite often what the United States might need and what it might even value in such situations is hearty involvement by its allies. I think that in many matters the Europeans have a great accumulation of wisdom and insight, and I do not think it is being used.

I would look first at some kind of international conclave. I do not believe that it is a comfortable view to have the entire country looked upon as a sort of sacred preserve for the United States into which there might be incursions by Cuba or Nicaragua, because that theory in itself allows for a lot of trouble. There are inventive ways. I think that the Mexicans could be very helpful. Perhaps a committee of four countries could be set up. Canada, if we are asked, could be on it, but both Cuba and the United States would be excluded. All these avenues offer hope and aspiration. As honourable senators know, I am an eclectic pragmatist. I try to find different ways of doing things, and I do not set up any pet theses. That is the avenue I would follow.

Senator Frith: I have a second question. Does the Honourable Senator Macquarrie want to adjourn the debate in his own name, to perhaps give us the benefit of his judgment on the recent Canadian involvement that arose through Mr. Broadbent's trip to El Salvador, on whether the visit was a good thing and on whether we can expect good results from it?

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I would be delighted if Senator Frith would adjourn the debate, which would have the effect of keeping the issue open for matters which I mentioned and others.

Senator Frith: Therefore, I compliment Senator Macquarrie on a very sincere and conscience-stimulating intervention, and I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, June 16, 1981, at 8 p.m.

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL FINANCE

REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1982

June 11, 1981

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance to which the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982, were referred, has in obedience to the order of reference of Tuesday, June 9, 1981, examined the said Supplementary Estimates (A) and reports as follows:

The Committee was authorized by the Senate as recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of June 9, 1981 to examine and report upon the expenditures proposed by the Supplementary Estimates (A) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1982.

In obedience to the foregoing, your Committee examined the Supplementary Estimates (A) and heard evidence from the following: From Energy, Mines and Resources Canada, Petroleum Prices and Compensation Branch: Mr. A. Digby Hunt, Assistant Deputy Minister; Dr. T. S. Tuschak, Director General, Operations; Mr. A. J. Kealey, Acting Director, Petroleum Compensation; and from Treasury Board: Mr. E. R. Stimpson, Director General, Budget Co-ordination Group.

The Supplementary Estimates (A) contain only one item, an increase in the 'Payments to refiners of crude oil and petroleum products for the purposes of Part IV of the Petroleum Administration Act'. This increase is in the amount of 2.1433 billion dollars, and raises the total estimates for this purpose to $5.1587 billion. Honourable Senators may be aware that the total increase will be paid for by increases in the Petroleum and Special Compensation Charges.

The witnesses suggested that a number of factors have necessitated the presentation of this Supplementary Estimate. By far the most important of these is the cutback in the production of crude oil in Alberta. To date, two of these cutbacks have taken place, in the amount of 60,000 barrels per day, and a third is expected to occur in September. According to our witnesses, these three cutbacks will increase the amount of compensation paid in respect of imported oil by some $1.5 billion. In addition, due to differences between the average quality of the oil cutback by Alberta and the oil being imported, (the Alberta cutbacks are, we were told, concentrated in the lighter, less sulphorous grades of oil), an additional $.27 billion is required, raising the total costs of the cutbacks to roughly $1.77 billion.

Our witnesses also told us that the previous estimates were based on an average Canadian dollar value of approximately 87-88 cents U.S. Their new estimates are based on an exchange rate of 83-84 cents, necessitating increased subsidies of $.3 billion. This will be partially offset by savings due to lower than expected world crude oil prices in the amount of $.1 billion. In addition, a change in the procedures used to collect subsidies relating to export sales of marine and aviation bunker fuels will increase this account by $.15 billion. This change is, however, strictly an accounting matter, and does not require additional outlays. Miscellaneous adjustments constitute some $20 million in the revision. For convenience, we attach as an appendix to this report a summary of all the pertinent changes.

We would like to add and stress two additional points raised during our examination. First, the demand projections for oil products which underlie this supplementary do not incorporate significant continued reductions in line with the 6.8% reduction we were told occurred in the first quarter. Second, the estimates are based on neither increased nor decreased future prices for crude oil on international markets. The witnesses stressed that international price movements were very difficult to project.

We would also like to stress in this report that accounting changes are planned which will directly alter the manner in which Oil Import Compensation payments will be reported in the estimates. In future estimates, it is intended that only the difference between the amounts paid in compensation and the amounts collected through the Petroleum and Special Compensation Charges will be reported in the estimates. The magnitude of this change is significant. If for example, this procedure had been applied to the Main Estimates for 1981-82, the total of the Main Estimates would have been reduced by over $2.5 billion dollars. If it had been applied to the Main Estimates and these Supplementary Estimates, the total of these two estimates would have been reduced by over $4.81 billion.

Respectfully submitted,

D. D. EVERETT,
Chairman

(APPENDIX TO REPORT)

SUMMARY OF FACTORS UNDERLYING SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES "A", 1981-82

The following factors account for the revised estimate for the payments to refineries of crude oil and petroleum products for the purpose of Part IV of the Petroleum Administration Act.

	Billions of $
1. It has been assumed that the Alberta production cutbacks will persist at least until April, 1982. The cutbacks will increase payments for imported crude by approximately $1.5 billion.	1.5
2. An accounting methodology change in treating marine and aviation fuels involving collection of export charges by the NEB and full compensation payment to importers will result in a $150 million expenditure increase to the compensation account while the revenue collection will accrue to a different account. Therefore, this expenditure will not increase total government outlays.	.15
3. The previous estimates had assumed that international prices would increase on July 1. In the current projection prices are assumed to remain stable for the balance of 1981. The difference should result in a net reduction in projected requirements of $100 million.	(.10)
4. The previous estimate was based on a forecast value of the Canadian dollar of approximately 87-88 cents U.S. The revised estimate is based on a more realistic value of 83-84 cents. The difference in currency values costs the fund about $2 per barrel, and increases expenditures by $300 million.	.300
5. Additional crude oil imports are now projected to be required during this fiscal year. (This would be in addition to imports noted in 1, above.)	.270
6. Miscellaneous adjustments.	.02
Total:	2.14
